But even without such a precedent, could there be a reasonable doubt upon this question? What, sir? Against whom is it that this tremendous power of impeachment is invoked? Is it not against high state criminals? Men of standing and influence and character? And when the House of Representatives bring a culprit of this description to trial, are they to be told that in crimes affecting the whole nation, and which, in their consequences, may bring ruin upon the people, that the accused shall enjoy rights and privileges and immunities which are denied to any ordinary citizen, when arraigned before the most inferior court in the land? We deny the existence of any power, even in this high court, to dispense with the rules of evidence. When the House of Representatives become accusers, it is their right to have these rules administered here as they are administered by the Supreme Court and the other tribunals of the country.

There is another point of view in which the doctrine for which we contend will appear peculiarly proper and necessary. Will not the proceedings upon this trial be regarded as a precedent? And if this court shall decide questions of evidence against the law of the land will not such decisions bring the law of evidence into doubt and confusion throughout the United States?

The gentleman has also invoked the Federalist to his aid; and what does it say? Does it declare that on the trial of impeachments there is to be a departure from the established rules of proceeding, and that testimony is to be admitted here which ought to be rejected in a court of law? By no means. It merely recognizes the principle of the English law, that "in the delineation of the offense" in the form of the article of impeachment the same rigid exactness is not required which is necessary in framing an indictment There is not the least intimation that this court, in the progress of the trial, ought to depart from the ordinary rules of evidence.

In further argument Mr. Storrs said:

I confess I feel alarmed to hear it gravely urged here that an impeachment is to be governed by other rules than the well-known and long-established rules of evidence. Rules of evidence are as much a part of the law of the land as any other part of it, and they constitute the securitiy of every man. A more dangerous principle could not be broached, or a more alarming principle established than that, in the trial of an impeachment, the ordinary rules of evidence are to be relaxed; and I was, I confess, surprised that the respondent should seek to unsettle a principle the overturning of which might easily lead to the most unjust and oppressive proceedings. If this is to be done in favor of the respondent, will it be done in favor of him alone, or may not State favorites be shielded or State victims be destroyed by the same process?

On the question, "Shall this interrogatory be put to the witness?" there appeared yeas 7, nays 35.

Again, on January 10,[1] the same witness being under examination, Mr. Meredith asked this question, which on objection was excluded by a vote of yeas 1, nays 39:

Do you think that the publication signed "A Citizen" was calculated to incense the claimants against the court, and to impair, in their minds, their confidence and respect for the court?

Considering the character of this proceeding, that it is a trial of impeachment before the Senate of the United States, and not a proceeding by indictment in an inferior court;

Considering that Senators are, from beginning to end, judges of law as well as fact, and that they are judges from whom there is no appeal;

Considering that the reasons for the exclusion of evidence on an ordinary trial where the judge responds to the law and the jury to the fact are not applicable to such a proceeding;

Considering that, according to parliamentary usage, which is the guide in all such cases, there is on trials of impeachment a certain latitude of inquiry and a freedom from technicality;

And considering, finally, that already in the course of this trial there have been differences of opinion as to the admissibility of evidence;

Therefore, in order to remove all such differences and to hasten the dispatch of business, it is deemed advisable that all evidence offered on either side not trivial or obviously irrelevant in nature shall be received without objection, it being understood that the same when admitted shall be open to question and comparison at the bar in order to determine its competency and value, and shall be carefully sifted and weighted by Senators in the final judgment.

Mr. John Conness, of California, moved that the paper lie on the table, and the question being taken, there appeared yeas 33, nays 11. So the paper was laid on the table.

2220. In an impeachment trial testimony that can be construed as fairly within the purport of the articles is admitted.—On April 2, 1868,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Charles A. Tinker was called and sworn as a witness on behalf of the managers, to prove the following dispatches:

MONTGOMERY, ALA.,
January 17, 1867.

Legislature in session. Efforts making to reconsider vote on constitutional amendment. Report from Washington says it is probable an enabling act will pass. We do not know what to believe. I find nothing here.

LEWIS E. PARSONS,
Exchange Hotel.

UNITED STATES MILITARY TELEGRAPH,
EXECUTIVE OFFICE, WASHINGTON, D. C.,
January 17, 1867.

What possible good can be obtained by reconsidering the constitutional amendment? I know of none in the present posture of affairs; and I do not believe the people of the whole country will sustain any set of individuals in attempts to change the whole character of our Government by enabling acts or otherwise. I believe, on the contrary, that they will eventually uphold all who have patriotism and courage to stand by the Constitution and who place their confidence in the people. There should be no faltering on the part of those who are honest in their determination to sustain the several coordinate departments of the Government in accordance with its original design.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

Hon. LEWIS E. PARSONS, Montgomery, Ala.

[2] Second session Fortieth Congress, Senate Journal p. 877; Globe supplement, pp. 90–92.

Mr. Butler stated that he introduced this evidence under the tenth and eleventh articles of impeachment to show how President Johnson had endeavored to oppose the reconstruction legislation of Congress, of which the defeated amendment referred to in the dispatches was a part. Lewis E. Parsons was provisional governor of Alabama, and a man of influence.

The counsel for the President objected to the evidence because it did not refer to acts charged in the articles of impeachment. The tenth article referred to the President's speeches, and not to telegrams; and the eleventh charged him with trying to remove Secretary of War Stanton, and with trying to prevent the execution of the reconstruction laws. Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the President, said:

"Designing and intending to set aside the rightful authority and powers of Congress, did attempt to bring into disgrace, ridicule, hatred, contempt, and reproach the Congress of the United States and the several branches thereof, to impair and destroy the regard and respect of all the good people of the United States for the Congress and legislative power thereof (which all officers of the Government ought inviolably to preserve and maintain), and to excite the odium and resentment of all the good people of the United States against Congress and the laws by it duly and constitutionally enacted."

That is the entire purview of the intent. Now, the only acts charged as done with this intent are the delivery of a speech at the Executive Mansion in August, 1866, and two speeches, one at St. Louis and the other at Cleveland, in September, 1866. The article concludes that by means of these utterances—

"Said Andrew Johnson has brought the high office of the President of the United States into contempt, ridicule, and disgrace, to the great scandal of all good citizens, whereby said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, did commit and was then and there guilty of a high misdemeanor in office."

That is the gravamen of the crime; that he brought the presidential office into scandal by these speeches made with this intent. Senators will judge from the reading of this telegram, dated in January, 1867, whether that supports the principal charge or intent of his derogating from the credit of Congress or bringing the presidential office into discredit.

The eleventh article has for its substantive charge nothing but the making of the speech of the 18th of August, 1866, saying that by that speech he declared and affirmed—

"In substance, that the Thirty-ninth Congress of the United States was not a Congress of the United States authorized by the Constitution to exercise legislative power under the same, but, on the contrary, was a Congress of only part of the States, thereby denying, and intending to deny, that the legislation of said Congress was valid or obligatory upon him, the said Andrew Johnson, except in so far as he saw fit to approve the same, and, also, thereby denying, and intending to deny, the power of the said Thirty-ninth Congress to propose amendments to the Constitution of the United States; and in pursuance of said declaration"—

That is, in pursuance of the speech made at the Executive Mansion on the 18th of August, 1866—

"The said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, afterwards, to wit, on the 21st day of February, A. D. 1868, at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, did, unlawfully, and in disregard of the requirement of the Constitution that he should take care that the laws be faithfully executed, attempt to prevent the execution of an act entitled, 'An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices,' passed March 2, 1867"—

Which was after the date of this dispatch—

"By unlawfully devising and contriving, and attempting to devise and contrive, means by which he should prevent Edwin M. Stanton from forthwith resuming the functions of the office of Secretary for the Department of War."

The court will consider whether this dispatch touches that subject.

"And also by further unlawfully devising and contriving, and attempting to devise and contrive, means, then and there, to prevent the execution of an act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes,' approved March 2, 1867; and also to prevent the execution of an act entitled 'An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States,' passed March 2, 1867."

Also, after the date of this dispatch. It is under one or the other of these two articles that this dispatch is, in its date and in its substance, supposed to be relevant.

Mr. Evarts concluded by contending that there was nothing in the telegram that showed the President guilty of crime or misdemeanor in opposing legislation of Congress or in doing anything mentioned in the articles.

Mr. Manager George S. Boutwell specifically cited the concluding words of the eleventh article, wherein the President was charged with "attempting to devise and contrive, means then and there * * * to prevent the execution of an act" known as the reconstruction act. The adoption of the constitutional amendment was part of the reconstruction system, and the telegram to Governor Parsons was an act hostile to reconstruction.

The question being taken, the Senate decided, yeas 27, nays 17, that the evidence should be admitted.

2221. In the Johnson trial the Senate held inadmissible as evidence of an intent specified in the articles an act not specified in the articles.—On April 2, 1868,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, William E. Chandler, formerly Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, was called by the managers and sworn. The question "Do you know Edmund Cooper?", asked by Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler, caused Mr. Henry Stanbery, of counsel for the President, to ask what was the object of eliciting testimony concerning Mr. Cooper. After discussion, Mr. Butler offered the following in writing:

We offer to prove that after the President had determined on the removal of Mr. Stanton, Secretary of War, in spite of the action of the Senate, there being no vacancy in the office of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, the President unlawfully appointed his friend and theretofore private secretary, Edmund Cooper, to that position as one of the means by which he intended to defeat the tenure-of-civil-office act and other laws of Congress.

Mr. Manager Butler further stated that the proof was offered under the eighth and eleventh articles of impeachment.

Objecting to the testimony offered, Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the President, quoted the eighth article's charge against the President:

"With intent unlawfully to control the disbursement of the moneys appropriated for the military service and for the Department of War, on the 21st day of February, in the year of our Lord 1868, did unlawfully and contrary to the provisions of an act entitled 'An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices,' passed March 2, 1868, and in violation of the Constitution of the United States, there being no vacancy in the office of Secretary for the Department of War, and with intent to violate and disregard the act aforesaid, then and there issue and deliver to one Lorenzo Thomas a letter of authority in writing, in substance as follows; that is to say:"

Now, you propose to prove under that, that there being no vacancy in the office of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, he proposed to appoint his private secretary, Edmund Cooper, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. That is the idea, is it, under the eighth article? We object to this as not admissible under the eighth article. As by reference it will be perceived it charges nothing but an intent to violate the civil-tenure act, and no mode of violating that except, in the want of a vacancy in the War Department, the appointment of General Thomas contrary to that act.

As for the eleventh article, the honorable court will remember that in our answer we stated that there was in that article no such description, designation of ways or means, or attempt at ways and means, whereby we could answer definitely; and the only allegations there are, that in pursuance of a speech that the President made on the 18th of August, 1866, he—

"Afterwards, to wit, on the 21st day of February, A. D. 1868, at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, did unlawfully, and in disregard of the requirement of the Constitution that he should take care that the laws be faithfully executed, attempt to prevent the execution of an act entitled 'An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices,' passed March 2, 1867, by unlawfully devising and contriving and attempting to devise and contrive means by which he should prevent Edwin M. Stanton from forthwith resuming the functions of the office of Secretary for the Department of War, notwithstanding the refusal of the Senate to concur in the suspension theretofore made by said Andrew Johnson of said Edwin M. Stanton from said office of Secretary for the Department of War; and also by further unlawfully devising and contriving and attempting to devise and contrive means, then and there, to prevent the execution of an act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes,' approved March 2, 1867; and also to prevent the execution of an act entitled 'An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States,' passed March 2, 1867, whereby," etc.

The only allegation here as to time and principal action, in reference to which all these unnamed and undescribed ways and means were used, is that on the 21st of February, 1868, at the city of Washington, he did unlawfully and in disregard of the Constitution attempt to prevent the execution of the civil tenure-of-office act by unlawfully devising and contriving and attempting to devise and contrive means by which he should prevent Edwin M. Stanton from resuming his place in the War Department. And now proof is offered here, substantively, of efforts in November, 1867, to appoint, in the want of a vacancy in the office of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Edmund Cooper. We object to that evidence.

Mr. Butler urged that the appointment of Cooper was one of the means whereby the President sought to so arrange in the Treasury Department that General Thomas's requisitions from the War Department should be honored.

Mr. John A. Bingham, of the managers, also urged that the appointment of Cooper was intended as a means of illegally drawing money from the Treasury on requisitions of an illegal acting Secretary of War. Mr. Bingham further said on the question of evidence:

We consider the law to be well settled and accepted everywhere in this country and England to-day that where an intent is the subject-matter of inquiry in a criminal prosecution, other and independent acts on the part of the accused, looking to the same result, are admissible in evidence for the purpose of establishing that fact. And we go further than that. We undertake to say, upon very high and commanding authority, not to be challenged here or elsewhere, that it is settled that such other and independent acts showing the purpose to bring about the same general result, although at the time of the inquiry the subject-matter of a separate indictment, are nevertheless admissible. I doubt not that it will occur to the recollection of honorable Senators that among other cases illustrative of the rule which I have just cited it has been stated in the books—the cases have been ruled first and then incorporated into books of standard authorities—that where a party, for example, was charged with shooting with intent to kill a person named, it was competent, in order to show the malice, the malicious intent of the act, to show that at another time and place he laid poison. A party is charged with passing a counterfeit note; it is competent, in order to prove the scienter, to show that he was in possession of other counterfeit notes of a different denomination; and the rule, as stated in the books, is that what is competent to prove the scienter, as a general principle, is competent to prove the intent.

Before deciding the question several Senators propounded questions tending to show whether or not an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury could, in defiance of his chief, the Secretary of the Treasury, or without a special designation from him, or after his removal, honor requisitions for money from the Treasury. The responses of witnesses and the reading of the law did not make plain that the Assistant Secretary would have the power, and rather suggested that he would not have it.

The question being taken as to the admissibility of the evidence, the yeas were 22, the nays 27. So the evidence was not admitted.

2222. In the Johnson trial the Senate declined to admit evidence of a fact bearing on the question of intent, no issue having been accepted in the pleadings on this point.

The Senate refused, in the Johnson trial, to admit as evidence in mitigation testimony held otherwise inadmissible.

Instances in the Johnson trial wherein the decisions of the Chief Justice on questions of evidence were overruled.

Instances wherein Senators propounded questions to counsel during arguments as to admissibility of evidence.

On April 17, 1868,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Gideon Welles, Secretary of the Navy, was sworn and examined as a witness on behalf of the respondent. Mr. Welles testified that he was present at a Cabinet meeting on Friday, February 26, 1867, and thereupon Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the respondent, submitted the following offer of proof:

We offer to prove that the President, at a meeting of the Cabinet while the bill was before the President for his approval, laid before the Cabinet the tenure-of-civil-office bill for their consideration and advice to the President respecting his approval of the bill; and thereupon the members of the Cabinet then present gave their advice to the President that the bill was unconstitutional and should be returned to Congress with his objections, and that the duty of preparing a message, setting forth the objection to the constitutionality of the bill, was devolved on Mr. Seward and Mr. Stanton; to be followed by proof as to what was done by the President and Cabinet up to the time of sending in the message.

Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler at once objected to the admission of the proposed testimony.

The arguments on this question of evidence were made principally on April 18.

Mr. Manager James F. Wilson, in arguing against the admissibility of the testimony, pointed out that the House of Representatives had, in their replication, made no issue on the question whether or not the President had been advised by his Cabinet that the tenure-of-office act was unconstitutional. Whether the President was so advised or not they held to be immaterial to this case, and hence objected to the testimony on that point as irrelevant.

Mr. Manager Wilson continued:

The respondent is arraigned for a violation of and a refusal to execute the law. He offers to prove that his Cabinet advised him that a certain bill presented for his approval was in violation of the Constitution; that he accepted their advice and vetoed the bill; and upon that, and such additional advice as they may have given him, claims the right to resist and defy the provisions of the bill, notwithstanding its enactment into a law by two-thirds of both Houses over his objections. In other words, he claims, substantially, that he may determine for himself what laws he will obey and execute, and what laws he will disregard and refuse to enforce. In support of this claim he offers the testimony which, for the time being, is excluded by the objection now under discussion. If I am correct in this, then I was not mistaken when I asserted that this objection confronts one of the most important questions involved in this case. It may be said that this testimony is offered merely to disprove the intent alleged and charged in the articles; but it goes beyond this and reaches the main question, as will clearly appear to the mind of anyone who will read with care the answer to the first article. The testimony is improper for any purpose and in every view of the case.

Mr. Manager Wilson next proceeded to examine the constitutional provisions relating to the executive power, and the punishment of impeachment, and then said:

The executive power was created to enforce the will of the nation; the will of the nation appears in its laws; the two Houses of Congress are intrusted with the power to enact laws, the objections of the Executive to the contrary notwithstanding; laws thus enacted, as well as those which receive the executive sanction, are the voice of the people. If the person clothed for the time being with the executive power—the only power which can give effect to the people's will—refuses or neglects to enforce the legislative decrees of the nation, or willfully violates the same, what constituent elements of governmental power could be more properly charged with the right to present and the means to try and remove the contumacious Executive than those intrusted with the power to enact the laws of the people, guided by the checks and balances to which I have directed the attention of the Senate? What other constituent parts of the Government could so well understand and adjudge of a perverse and criminal refusal to obey, or a willful declination to execute, the national will, than those joining in its expression? There can be but one answer to these questions. The provisions of the Constitution are wise and just beyond the power of disputation in leaving the entire subject of the responsibility of the Executive to faithfully execute his office and enforce the laws to the charge, trial, and judgment of the two several branches of the legislative department, regardless of the opinions of Cabinet officers or of the decisions of the judicial department. The respondent has placed himself within this power of impeachment by trampling on the constitutional duty of the Executive and violating the penal laws of the land.

After contrasting the constitutions of the United States and England, the manager quoted an opinion given by Attorney-General Black, dated November 20, 1860, wherein it was stated that "to the Chief Executive Magistrate of the Union is confided the solemn duty of seeing the laws faithfully executed," and proceeded:

A departure from this view of the character of the executive power, and from the nature of the duty and obligation resting upon the officer charged therewith, would surround this nation with perils of the most fearful proportions. Such a departure would not only justify the respondent in his refusal to obey and execute the law, but also approve his usurpation of the judicial power when he resolved that he would not observe the legislative will, because, in his judgment, it did not conform to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States touching the subjects embraced in the articles of impeachment on which he is now being tried at your bar. Concede this to him, and when and where may we look for the end? To what result shall we arrive? Will it not naturally and inevitably lead to a consolidation of the several powers of the Government in the executive department? And would this be the end? Would it not rather be but the beginning? If the President may defy and usurp the powers of the legislative and judicial departments of the Government, as his caprices or the advice of his Cabinet may incline him, why may not his subordinates, each for himself, and touching his own sphere of action, determine how far the directions of his superior accord with the Constitution of the United States, and reject and refuse to obey all that come short of the standard erected by his judgment?

In conclusion, Mr. Manager Wilson said:

Concede to the President immunity through the advice of his Cabinet officers and you reverse, by your decision, the theory of our Constitution.

Mr. Benjamin R. Curtis, of counsel for the respondent, in arguing, said that he should not consume time to reply to those matters which seemed to touch the merits of the case. This was simply a question as to the admissibility of proofs. Continuing, Mr. Curtis said:

The honorable manager has read a portion of the answer of the President, and has stated that the House of Representatives has taken no issue upon that part of the answer. As to that, and as to the effect of that admission by the honorable manager, I shall have a word or two to say presently. But the honorable manager has not told you that the House of Representatives, when the honorable managers brought to your bar these articles, did not intend to assert and prove the allegations in them which are matters of fact. One of these allegations, Mr. Chief Justice, as you will find by reference to the first article and to the second article and to the third article, is that the President of the United States in removing Mr. Stanton and in appointing General Thomas intentionally violated the Constitution of the United States; that he did these acts with the intention of violating the Constitution of the United States. Instead of saying, "it is wholly immaterial what intention the President had; it is wholly immaterial whether he honestly believed that this act of Congress was unconstitutional; it is wholly immaterial whether he believed that he was acting in accordance with his oath of office, to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution when he did this act"—instead of averring that, they aver that he acted with an intention to violate the Constitution of the United States.

Now, when we introduce evidence here, or offer to introduce evidence here, bearing on this intent, evidence that before forming any opinion upon this subject he resorted to proper advice to enable him to form a correct one, and that when he did form and fix opinions on this subject it was under the influence of this proper advice, and that consequently when he did this act, whether it was lawful or unlawful, it was not done with the intention to violate the Constitution—when we offer evidence of that character, the honorable manager gets up here and argues an hour by the clock that it is wholly immaterial what his intention was, what his opinion was, what advice he had received and in conformity with which he acted in this matter.

* * * * * * *

I therefore say that when the question of his intention comes to be considered by the Senate, when the question arises in their minds whether the President honestly believed that this was an unconstitutional law, when the particular emergency arose, when if he carried out or obeyed that law he must quit one of the powers which he believed were conferred upon him by the Constitution, and not be able to carry on one of the departments of the Government in the manner the public interests required—when that question arises for the consideration of the Senate, then they ought to have before them the fact that he acted by the advice of the usual and proper advisers; that he resorted to the best means within his reach to form a safe opinion upon this subject, and that, therefore, it is a fair conclusion that when he did form that opinion it was an honest and fixed opinion which he felt he must carry out in practice if the proper occasion should arise. It is in this point of view, and this point of view only, that we offer this evidence.

In the course of the discussion Mr. Jacob M. Howard, a Senator from Michigan, had proposed this inquiry:

Do the counsel for the accused not consider that the validity of the tenure of office bill was purely a question of law, to be determined on this trial by the Senate; and, if so, do they claim that the opinion of Cabinet officers touching that question is competent evidence by which the judgment of the Senate ought to be influenced?

To this Mr. Curtis answered:

The constitutional validity of any bill is, of course, a question of law which depends upon a comparison of the provisions of the bill with the law enacted by the people for the government of their agents. It depends upon whether those agents have transcended the authority which the people gave them, and that comparison of the Constitution with the law is, in the sense that was intended undoubtedly by the honorable Senator, a question of law.

The next branch of the question is "whether that question is to be determined on this trial by the Senate."

That is a question I can not answer. That is a question that can be determined only by the Senate themselves. If the Senate should find that Mr. Stanton's case was not within this law, then no such question arises, then there is no question in this particular case of a conflict between the law and the Constitution. If the Senate should find that these articles have so charged the President that it is necessary for the Senate to believe that there was some act of turpitude on his part connected with this matter, some mala fides, some bad intent, and that he did honestly believe, as he states in his answer, that this was an unconstitutional law, that an occasion had arisen when he must act accordingly under his oath of office, then it is immaterial whether this was a constitutional or unconstitutional law; be it the one or be it the other, be it true or false that the President has committed a legal offense by an infraction of the law, he has not committed the impeachable offense with which he is charged by the House of Representatives. And, therefore, we must advance beyond these two questions before we reach the third branch of the question which the honorable Senator from Michigan propounds, whether the question of the constitutionality of this law must be determined on this trial by the Senate. In the view of the President's counsel there is no necessity for the Senate to determine that question. The residue of the inquiry is:

"Do the counsel claim that the opinion of the Cabinet officers touching that question"—

That is, the constitutionality of the law—

"is competent evidence by which the judgment of the Senate might be influenced?"

Certainly not. We do not put them on the stand as experts on questions of constitutional law. The judges will determine that out of their own breasts. We put them on the stand as advisers of the President to state what advice, in point of fact, they gave him, with a view to show that he was guilty of no improper intent to violate the Constitution.

Mr. Curtis next read a question propounded by Mr. Reverdy Johnson, a Senator from Maryland :

"Do the counsel for the President understand that the managers deny the statement made by the President in his message of December 12, 1867, to the Senate, as given in evidence by the managers at page 45 of the official report of the trial that the members of the Cabinet gave him"—

That is, the President—

"the opinion there stated as to the tenure of office act; and is the evidence offered to corroborate that statement, or for what other object is it offered?"

To this Mr. Curtis replied:

We now understand, from what the honorable manager has said this morning, that the House of Representatives has taken no issue on that part of our answer; that the honorable managers do not understand that they have traversed or denied that part of our answer. We did also understand before this question was proposed to us that the honorable managers had themselves put in evidence the message of the President of the 12th of December, 1867, to the Senate, in which he states that he was advised by the members of the Cabinet unanimously, including Mr. Stanton, that this law would be unconstitutional if enacted. They have put that in evidence themselves.

Nevertheless, Senators, this is an affair, as you perceive, of the utmost gravity in any possible aspect of it; and we did not feel at liberty to avoid or abstain from the offering of the members of the President's Cabinet that they might state to you, under the sanction of their oaths, what advice was given. I suppose all that the managers would be prepared to admit might be—certainly they have made no broader admission—that the President said these things in a message to the Senate; but from the experience we have had thus far in this trial we thought it not impossible that the managers, or some one of them speaking in behalf of himself and the others, might say that the President had told a falsehood, and we wish, therefore, to place ourselves right before the Senate on this subject. We desire to examine these gentlemen to show what passed on this subject, and we wish to do it for the purposes I have stated.

Mr. George H. Williams, a Senator from Oregon, proposed this question:

Is the advice given to the President by his Cabinet with a view of preparing a veto message pertinent to prove the right of the President to disregard the law after it was passed over his veto?

To this Mr. Curtis replied:

It is not of itself sufficient; it is not enough that the President received such advice; he must show that an occasion arose for him to act upon it which in the judgment of the Senate was such an occasion that you could not impute to him wrong intention in acting. But the first step is to show that he honestly believed that this was an unconstitutional law. Whether he should treat it as such in a particular instance is a matter depending upon his own personal responsibility without advice. That is the answer which I suppose is consistent with the views we have of this case.

The arguments being closed, the Chief Justice [1] said:

Senators, the question now before the Senate, as the Chief Justice conceives, respects not the weight but the admissibility of the evidence offered. To determine that question it is necessary to see what is charged in the articles of impeachment. The first article charges that on the 21st day of February, 1868, the President issued an order for the removal of Mr. Stanton from the office of Secretary of War; that this order was made unlawfully, and that it was made with intent to violate the tenure of office act and in violation of the Constitution of the United States. The same charge in substance is repeated in the articles which relate to the appointment of Mr. Thomas, which was necessarily connected with the transaction. The intent, then, is the subject to which much of the evidence on both sides has been directed; and the Chief Justice conceives that this testimony is admissible for the purpose of showing the intent with which the President has acted in this transaction. He will submit the question to the Senate if any Senator desires it.

The question being taken, there appeared yeas 20, nays 29. So the evidence was decided to be inadmissible.

Immediately thereafter [2] a question asked of the same witness by Mr. Evarts was challenged, thereby bringing from the counsel for the respondent this offer:

We offer to prove that at the meetings of the Cabinet at which Mr. Stanton was present, held while the tenure of office bill was before the President for approval, the advice of the Cabinet in regard to the same was asked by the President and given by the Cabinet; and thereupon the question whether Mr. Stanton and the other Secretaries who had received their appointment from Mr. Lincoln were within the restrictions upon the President's power of removal from office created by said act was considered, and the opinion expressed that the Secretaries appointed by Mr. Lincoln were not within such restrictions.

Mr. Manager Butler objected that this question related to the construction of a law, while the other related to its constitutionality; and that both questions fell under the same principle.

After argument, the Chief Justice said:

The Chief Justice is of opinion that this testimony is proper to be taken into consideration by the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment; but he is unable to determine what extent the Senate is disposed to give to its previous ruling, or how far they consider that ruling applicable to the present question.

The question being submitted to the Senate, it was decided, yeas 22, nays 26, that the evidence was inadmissible.

Very soon thereafter [3] another question asked of the same witness was objected to, whereat the counsel for the respondent presented this offer:

We offer to prove that at the Cabinet meetings between the passage of the tenure of civil office bill and the order of the 21st of February, 1868, for the removal of Mr. Stanton upon occasions when the condition of the public service was affected by the operation of that bill came up for the consideration and advice of the Cabinet, it was considered by the President and Cabinet that a proper regard to the public service made it desirable that upon some proper case a judicial determination on the constitutionality of the law should be obtained.

To this Mr. Manager Butler objected:

Mr. President and Senators, we, of the managers, object, and we should like to have this question determined in the minds of the Senators upon this principle. We understand here that the determination of the Senate is, that Cabinet discussions, of whatever nature, shall not be put in as a shield to the President. That I understand, for one, to be the broad principle upon which this class of questions stand and upon which the Senate has voted; and, therefore, these attempts to get around it, to get in by detail and at retail—if I may use that expression—evidence which in its wholesale character can not be admitted, are simply tiring out and wearing out the patience of the Senate. I should like to have it settled, once for all, if it can be, whether the Cabinet consultations upon any subject are to be a shield.

In reply, Mr. Evarts argued:

By decisive determinations upon certain questions of evidence arising in this cause you have decided that, at least, what in point of time is so near to this action of the President as may fairly import to show that in his action he was governed by a desire to raise a question for judicial determination shall be admitted. About that there can be no question that the record will confirm my statement. Now, my present inquiry is to show that within this period, thus extensively and comprehensively named for the present, in his official duty and in his consultations concerning his official duty with the heads of Departments, it became apparent that the operation of this law raised embarrassments in the public service and rendered it important as a practical matter that there should be a determination concerning the constitutionality of the law, and that it was desirable that upon a proper case such a determination should be had.

Mr. John B. Henderson, a Senator from Missouri, proposed this question to the managers:

If the President shall be convicted, he must be removed from office.

If his guilt should be so great as to demand such punishment, he may be disqualified to hold and enjoy any office under the United States.

Is not the evidence now offered competent to go before the court in mitigation?

To this Mr. Manager Butler replied that usually evidence in mitigation should be submitted after verdict and before judgment. Therefore, he said:

There is an appreciable time in this tribunal, as in all others, between a verdict of guilty and the act of judgment; and if any such evidence can be given at all, it must, in my judgment, be given at that time. It certainly can not be given for any other purpose.

The Chief Justice having submitted the question of admissibility to the Senate there appeared yeas 19, nays 30. So the evidence was not admitted.

Immediately thereupon [1] Mr. Evarts asked of the same witness this question:

Was there, within the period embraced in the inquiry in the last question, and at any discussions or deliberations of the Cabinet concerning the operation of the tenure of civil office act and the requirements of the public service in regard to the same, any suggestion or intimation whatever touching or looking to the vacation of any office by force or getting possession of the same by force?

To this Mr. Manager Butler objected as wholly immaterial and excluded under the principles of the last ruling. He said, in response to a question by the Chief Justice, that it was not worth while to object to the question as leading.

The Chief Justice having submitted the question of admissibility to the Senate, there appeared yeas 18, nays 26. So the question was excluded.

[1] Senate Journal, p. 913; Globe Supplement, p. 234.

2223. Evidence that from the nature of the charge was immaterial was ruled out during the Swayne trial, although respondent's answer had seemed to lay a foundation for it.—On February 14, 1905,[1] in the Senate sitting for the trial of Judge Charles Swayne, a witness, Elza T. Davis, was under examination, when Mr. Porter J. McCumber, a Senator from North Dakota, said:

Mr. President, I want to direct the attention of the Presiding Officer to a matter in the way of an inquiry for information. I understand that the pleadings of this case do make an issuable fact possibly of the question of inconvenience; but what I wish to ask the Chair is this: When the law itself provides that it shall be unlawful for a judge to reside outside of his district, with no question whatever of convenience or inconvenience, whether the time of the Senate could properly be taken up upon an issue which, to my mind, is in no wise involved in the case. I call the Chair's attention to the law, which is very specific.

"Every judge shall reside in the district for which he is appointed, and for offending against this provision shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor."

If the question, it seems to me, Mr. President, of convenience or inconvenience is a question at all, it is precluded by the statute itself, which presumes that it will be convenient, or more convenient, if the judge resides there, or less convenient if he does not.

I do not know how many witnesses the managers on the part of the House may have on this subject, but it seems to me that the Chair, sitting as a judge, would necessarily have to rule that all this matter was wholly immaterial. The simple question is, Was he or was he not a resident? And I submit to the Chair whether it should be gone into, and, if so, the limit that should be allowed, taking the position myself that under the statute it can not be an issuable fact.

I may say to the Chair that we might take up a week on this subject, and then every Senator and attorney might concur in the opinion that the question of convenience or inconvenience would not affect it in the least.

Mr. Manager James B. Perkins, of New York, said:

Mr. President, if I may make a suggestion to the Presiding Officer in reference to the suggestion made by the Senator from North Dakota, I will say that the suggestion just made entirely corresponds with what I suggested yesterday, when I asked a somewhat similar question of one of the witnesses. It is the view of the managers, as it is of the Senator, that this evidence is immaterial. The statute says, as the Senator has properly stated, that if the judge does not reside within his district it shall be a high misdemeanor, and whether convenience or inconvenience resulted is, in our judgment, wholly immaterial.

However, in the answer of the respondent, it is alleged that in his belief his absence from his district caused no inconvenience to suitors. To meet that, not knowing what the views of the Senate might be; not knowing but that some one might say, "Ah, well, this judge was absent, but it did no harm, and there was no inconvenience and no suitors suffered," we thought it might be well to offer some evidence on this subject.

But we are entirely content to take the ruling of the Chair that the evidence is immaterial and to offer no more of it, although we have other witnesses whom we could call. As the Senator has suggested, this is a branch on which indefinite evidence might be given if we saw fit to subpœna a sufficient number of lawyers.

Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for respondent, said:

Mr. President, counsel for the respondent fully agree with the position stated by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCumber] and also the position as acquiesced in by the managers. We do not believe this testimony is material or relevant. We did, however, in framing our answer have in mind the fact that before the committee of the House great stress had apparently been laid in the examination of witnesses upon testimony which they claimed tended to show that Judge Swayne's temporary absences from Florida had caused inconvenience to suitors and attorneys. Therefore we thought we were compelled to meet what had appeared in a previous investigation to be, in the theory of the managers, material. We do not believe it is.

We believe that the question of fact before the court is this, and only this: Did Judge Swayne have a residence in the district for which he was appointed? And that question of fact is in no wise changed or modified by reason of any further situation which may involve the convenience or the inconvenience of suitors or of attorneys.

After further argument the Presiding Officer [1] said:

Unless some Senator desires to have the matter submitted to the Senate, the Presiding Officer thinks that this testimony has some bearing upon the question of residence; that so far as the question of inconvenience is concerned, that is not material to the issue.

And later, during cross-examination of the witness, the Presiding Officer said:

The Presiding Officer does not think that the evidence in relation to the inconvenience of this witness by reason of the absence of Judge Swayne from Florida or Pensacola is material or even admissible, but that so much of his testimony as proves the fact that the judge was absent from Florida at Guyencourt, Del., at certain times is admissible for what it is worth.

2224. A question being raised in the Swayne trial that certain evidence was immaterial, the pleadings were examined to determine whether or not the issue involved was raised.—On February 10, 1905,[2] in the Senate sitting for the trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, one of the managers, called Payne W. Chase, a witness, to prove the charge that the respondent had made false certificates of expenses.

Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, a Senator from Texas, said:

Mr. President, I may be mistaken as to the pleadings, but my understanding is that there is no issue as to the receipt and expenditure as alleged by the House, and that at most all that remains for the Senate to do is to determine the effect of the respondent having drawn the maximum allowance, and to determine, upon the state of the pleadings—it being alleged that he drew the money and did not expend it—what the law in that case is.

If I am right about that, I suggest that the calling of witnesses upon this charge, which involves the question of expense and receipt, would be a useless consumption of the time of the Senate.

Mr. Olmsted replied that an examination of the pleadings would show that the proposed testimony was necessary.

The Presiding Officer [1] said:

A cursory examination of the pleadings leads the Presiding Officer to the conclusion that there is no direct admission in the answer of the respondent that the expenses were actually less than the sum charged, and it seems that evidence may be introduced to show that they were less.

2225. A certified paper, bearing only indirectly on a question at issue, was ruled out in the Swayne trial.—On February 23, 1905,[3] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. Anthony Higgins, of counsel for the respondent, offered testimony in the following words:

Mr. President, on behalf of the respondent, I make the offer of a certified copy of the proceedings of the meeting of the board of county commissioners of Leon County, Fla., December 10, 1904. It is the board which was spoken of by a witness yesterday—Milton Jackson. I have presented the paper to the learned chairman of the managers, and would ask if there is any objection to it. * * * It is that the county commissioners of Leon County, Fla., in which is situated the city of Tallahassee, adopted a resolution at that time extending to Judge Swayne as the judge of the northern district of Florida, having to make a residence within his district, an invitation to reside in the city of Tallahassee. That evidence is before the court. The matter was brought to the attention of a witness (who has been examined here) by the Judge, who told him, the witness testified, that he would not live in Tallahassee because he had taken his residence in Pensacola. It is a fact and a circumstance connected with the act of residence.

Mr. Manager Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, said:

We object to it as irrelevant, incompetent, and tending to throw no light on the subject-matter under discussion.

The Presiding Officer[1] said:

This paper is a certified copy of the action of the board of county commissioners, held in Tallahassee, being an invitation sent to Judge Swayne to make his permanent home in Tallahassee. The Presiding Officer does not see how it is evidence in this case. If any Senator desires, he will submit the question to the Senate. [A pause.] It is not admitted.

2226. In impeachment trials the rule that the best evidence procurable should be presented has been followed.

It was decided in the Belknap trial that a witness might not be examined as to the contents of an existing letter without the letter itself being submitted.

Instance wherein the President pro tempore ruled on evidence during an impeachment trial.

On April 4, 1868,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Robert S. Chew, chief clerk of the State Department, was sworn as a witness on behalf of the House of Representatives, and examined by Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler as to the practice of making temporary appointments of assistant secretaries of Departments to perform the duties of their chiefs in the absence of the latter. The witness testified that the appointments in such cases were made by the President, or by his order. Mr. Butler then asked:

Did the letter of authority in most of these cases * * * proceed from the head of the Department or from the President?

Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the President, objected that the letter of authority showed from whom it came, and was the best evidence on that point.

In the discussion which followed, the counsel for the President intimated that they did not object if the question was intended to elicit a reply as to whose manual possession the paper came from. But if it was intended to ascertain who signed the paper, then the paper itself would be the best evidence.

Mr. Butler reduced the question to writing as follows:

Question. State whether any of the letters of authority which you have mentioned came from the Secretary of State or from what other officer?

The Chief Justice[3] thereupon made an inquiry which led to this colloquy:

The CHIEF JUSTICE. "Came from the Secretary of State." Do I understand you to mean signed by him?

[2] Second session Fortieth Congress, Globe supplement, p. 118.

[3] Salmon P. Chase, of Ohio, Chief Justice.

Mr. Manager BUTLER. I am not anxious upon that part of it, sir. I am content with the question as it stands.

The CHIEF JUSTICE. The Chief Justice conceives that the question in the form in which it is put is not objectionable, but——

Mr. Manager BUTLER. I will put it, then, with the leave of the Chief Justice.

The CHIEF JUSTICE. The Chief Justice was about to proceed to say that if it is intended to ask the question whether these documents of which a list is furnished were signed by the Secretary, then he thinks it is clearly incompetent without producing them.

Mr. Manager BUTLER. Under favor, Mr. President, I have no list of these documents; none has been furnished.

The CHIEF JUSTICE. Does not the question relate to the list which has been furnished?

Mr. Manager BUTLER. It relates to the people whose names have been put upon the list; but I have no list of the documents at all. I have only a list of the facts that such appointments were made, but I have no list of the letters, whether they came from the President or from the Secretary or from anybody else.

The CHIEF JUSTICE. In the form in which the question is put the Chief Justice thinks it is not objectionable. If any Senator desires to have the question taken by the Senate, he will put it to the Senate. [To the managers, no Senator speaking.] You can put the question in the form proposed.

Mr. Manager BUTLER (to the witness). State whether any of the letters of authority which you have mentioned came from the Secretary of State, or from what other officer.

Mr. CURTIS. I understand the witness is not to answer by whom they were sent.

Mr. Manager BUTLER. I believe I have this witness.

The CHIEF JUSTICE. The Chief Justice will instruct the witness. [To the witness.] You are not to answer at present by whom these documents were signed. You may say from whom they came.

2227. On July 10, 1876,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Gen. William B. Hazen, a witness on behalf of the United States, was cross-examined by Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, counsel for the respondent. The witness testified that he had proposed in a letter to Mr. James A. Garfield, a Member of the House of Representatives, to give information as to post traders, and as a result had been subpœnaed before the Military Committee in 1872. He also testified as to writing letters to the Secretary of War, General Belknap. Then Mr. Carpenter asked:

Q. Do you recollect writing a long letter to General Belknap dated September 12, 1875?

Witness replied that he did.

Thereupon Mr. Carpenter proposed to ask:

Do you recollect using these words, or substantially these words, in that letter to General Belknap, namely: "I was summoned to Washington to give evidence upon staff organization of the French and German armies. After finishing upon these subjects I was questioned upon the subject of post traders. I at first remonstrated, on the ground that I had not reported the matter to you" (that is, the Secretary), "because I believed the Commissary Department would defeat any action in that direction?"

Mr. Manager John A. McMahon objected, saying:

You have no right to cross-examine him in regard to the contents of a letter without submitting it to him. * * * If you say it is a memorandum of a letter that was destroyed, no matter; but if you claim to have the letter you can not cross-examine him on it without putting it in his hand.

We make objection, Mr. President and Senators, to the witness being asked any question as to the contents of a letter which the counsel apparently holds in his hand. If he does not have it, the objection at any rate goes to the point that it having been addressed to the defendant, the counsel must first show it to have been destroyed.

The question being submitted, the Senate, without division, excluded the question.

Thereupon Mr. Carpenter said:

Mr. President, if the Senate will pardon me just a moment, I did not state the ground of the question, because I thought it was apparent. The witness has just sworn to a totally different state of facts; that he came here on subpœna and was examined on this matter in obedience to the subpœna. On cross-examination we got from him the fact that he wrote a letter to General Garfield from his post. Now, here is a letter, or at least I am inquiring of him now if he did not write to General Belknap, on the 12th of September, 1875, a totally different account of that transaction. * * * Senators will recollect that this witness testified here that he gave testimony before the House Military Committee, because he thought if he conferred directly with the Secretary of War he would not pay any attention to it. He then swears he did write a letter and sent it through the regular military channels, communicating everything to General Belknap that he swore to before the committee. In this letter, of which I now question him, he writes, as we claim and offer to prove by him, that he did not report the matter to the Secretary for the reason that he knew the Commissary Department would not permit it to be done.

Mr. George F. Edmunds, a Senator from Vermont, said: "The letter will show," to which Mr. Carpenter replied: "The letter I do not propose to give in evidence."

Objection being made to this debate, Mr. John H. Mitchell, a Senator from Oregon, moved to reconsider the vote whereby the evidence had been excluded.

Thereupon Mr. Montgomery Blair, of counsel for the respondent, argued:

It seems to me that the ruling of the Senate is made upon a rare misconception of the question submitted by my colleague in this case. Here is a witness upon the stand who testifies that he wrote a certain letter to the Secretary of War, semiofficial or official, he does not know which, communicating facts in relation to abuses prevailing at these trading posts in the Indian country, and that the reason why he did not go to the Secretary of War rather than go before the Military Committee to testify about these abuses was that he had written such a letter and that it had received no attention. Now, we want to ask him—and it is perfectly competent; no lawyer I think will deny the competency of it—whether he had not stated to another person on another occasion directly the contrary of that, stating the person and the time, leaving us the liberty of calling in that person, of calling for that letter, and showing that he is here stultifying himself and falsifying himself. * * * I said that I believed every lawyer in this body would recognize the principle that it was perfectly competent to ask a witness whether or not he had on a different occasion given a different account of the same subject than that he now offers. * * * I have not investigated the subject fully; but it seems to me perfectly plain that a party may be called upon to say whether he had not at a different time to a different person made a different statement; and this letter falls entirely within the common practice of showing that a witness had made on a different occasion a different statement in regard to the same subject-matter.

Mr. Manager McMahon said:

I think the Senate will discover that a while ago when I interrupted the witness when the contents of a letter were stated to him, I was right in regard to the law. I read now from an elementary book, Greenleaf on Evidence:

"§ 463. A similar principle prevails in cross-examining a witness as to the contents of a letter or other paper written by him. The counsel will not be permitted to represent, in the statement of a question, the contents of a letter, and to ask the witness whether he wrote a letter to any person with such contents, or contents to the like effect, without having first shown to the witness the letter, and having asked him whether he wrote that letter, and his admitting that he wrote it. For the contents of every written paper, according to the ordinary and well-established rules of evidence, are to be proved by the paper itself, and by that alone, if it is in existence."

That is very simple; and I was right a while ago, notwithstanding the overpowering weight of the gentlemen on the other side.

The Senate, without division, disagreed to the motion to reconsider.

2228. On July 12, 1876,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Nelson H. Davis, Inspector-General of the Army, was examined as a witness on behalf of the respondent, and was asked this question by Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent:

Q. Were you instructed by General Belknap as Secretary of War at any time to investigate into the standing and character of Durfee & Peck?

Durfee had been partner of one Evans, who was alleged to have been corruptly appointed post trader at Fort Sill by the respondent, and Mr. Carpenter explained the purpose of the question:

Mr. Durfee was Evans's partner, and Mr. Evans informed the Secretary of War of that fact. The Secretary of War had his suspicion that Durfee & Peck or Durfee himself was not the proper man to be appointed, and we propose to show that he ordered this witness to proceed there and inquire into the matter; that he did inquire into it, not at that particular post, but as to these men, and it was in consequence of that that Mr Evans, who, it was understood, would go into company with Durfee if he was appointed, was not at that time appointed. Afterwards he did not form that partnership, and he was appointed without objection.

Mr. Manager McMahon objected to the question, saying that it was first desirable to know whether the instructions were written or verbal.

Thereupon Mr. Carpenter waived the question, and asked of witness:

Did you investigate?

Mr. Manager McMahon objected on the ground that the matter was all of record, and hence that the record would be the best evidence.

The question being submitted to the Senate, the journal and record of trial show that the objection was overruled without division, but no record of an answer by the witness appears, and Mr. Carpenter at once proceeded to another matter, as if the question had been excluded.

2229. On July 12, 1876,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Maj. Gen. John Pope was examined as a witness on behalf of the respondent, and testified as to applications on the part of the post trader at Fort Sill for permits to sell liquor. The witness described the usual way in which such permits were forwarded to the War Department, and then Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, asked:

Do you know any instance while General Belknap was Secretary of War, in which he overruled recommendations of the officers through whose hands the application had come?

Mr. Manager John A. McMahon objected, saying:

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the record ought to settle that question. Everything goes officially through the departments and the action of the Secretary of War upon it, favorable or unfavorable, ought to be proved by the record and not by the mere recollection of a witness who has had so many other transactions.

The question being submitted to the Senate, the objection was sustained without objection.

[2] First session Forty-fourth Congress, Record of trial, p. 256.

Very soon after Mr. Carpenter asked, and the witness began to answer, as follows:

Q. Do you recollect any applications in regard to licenses for selling liquor at Fort Sill while General Belknap was Secretary of War?—A. I remember an application, simply because I had occasion to look it up recently, that the officers at Fort Sill——

Mr. Manager McMahon said:

We object to this. The witness himself discloses the fact that he remembers it because he has recently seen the official documents. Now, I say that the official documents must be produced.

The President pro tempore[1] said:

The manager took exception that the record should be produced, and on the prior ruling of the Senate the Chair ruled that the objection was well taken. If the counsel prefers, the Chair will submit the question to the Senate.

No request was made that the question be submitted, and the examination proceeded:[2]

Q. (By Mr. Carpenter.) Do you know anything of the extension of the reservation about Fort Sill, and when it took place?—A. Fort Sill was a post established at the time I took command of the department. My predecessor in command, General Schofield, was written to from the War Department, I think, directing him to take some steps to have the reservation extended and properly surveyed——

Mr. Manager McMahon objected, saying:

I am obliged again to say that all these are matters of record. The gentleman has a client who understands all about getting copies of them, who is thoroughly informed, and we must certainly object to having oral testimony as to what is matter of record.

The Senate, without division, sustained the objection.

In relation to these decisions, Mr. Carpenter said:

General Pope is very anxious to get away from here and get back to his post, and we are willing to accommodate in every way to reach that result; but if the managers are to pursue the present captious course of objection and require these documents to be produced, they have got to be looked up in the Department, and General Pope will have to stay and swear in view of them; and after Mr. Evans arrives we shall then want him also in regard to two or three points that we can not inquire of now. * * * What I have spoken of now are these very matters that were covered by the questions that you objected we must get the records here to show. General Pope knows just as much about the matter without looking through forty pages as he will after he does that; but still the Senate has sustained the objection; and if you insist on it General Pope must remain. That is all.

Mr. Manager McMahon said:

We certainly must try the case according to the rules of evidence. We want to see the records themselves.

2230. In the Swayne trial hearsay testimony introduced to show inconvenience to litigants from respondent's conduct was ruled out.

Instance during the Swayne trial, wherein the Presiding Officer, contrary to his usual habit, submitted a question of evidence to the Senate at once.

On February 13, 1905,[3] in the Senate sitting for the trial of Judge Charles Swayne, John S. Beard was sworn and examined.

[2] Senate Journal, pp. 975, 976.

[3] Third session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, p. 2467.

Mr. Manager James B. Perkins, of New York, asked:

Have you ever heard complaints made by counsel of inconvenience in their practice by reason of the absence of Judge Swayne from Florida?

Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for respondent, objected, saying:

We object to asking for hearsay testimony. If there are any such cases, the attorneys themselves are within call, and the honorable manager is asking this witness to state nothing more than what some other attorney may have said.

Mr. Manager Perkins said:

Well, Mr. President, how else can the matter of common reputation be proven? The answer of Judge Swayne it seems to us is immaterial. The law requires that he shall live in the district, and if he was not a resident it was a high misdemeanor. But in his answer it is alleged by way of palliation that he does not think inconvenience resulted to the bar. That we can only meet by evidence of this character.

The Presiding Officer [1] said:

The Presiding Officer will submit this question to the Senate. The manager asks the witness, having first inquired who were the lawyers who did most of the business before the district court, if this witness had heard them complain of inconvenience growing out of the absence of Judge Swayne. Objection is made. The Presiding Officer will submit that question to the Senate. Senators who think the question is a proper one will say "aye" [putting the question]; contrary, "no." In the opinion of the Chair the "noes" have it. The objection is sustained.

2231. Testimony as to what was said by the agent or coconspirator of respondent in regard to carrying out respondent's order, the said order being a ground of the impeachment, was admitted.

On March 31, 1868,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Walter A. Burleigh, Delegate in Congress from Dakota Territory, was sworn, and the examination was begun by Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler. Mr. Burleigh testified that he had known Lorenzo Thomas, Adjutant-General of the Army, for several years, and that he had called on General Thomas at his house on the evening of February 21 last, and had a conversation with him.

Thereupon Mr. Manager Butler asked a question which, on the succeeding day, was reduced to writing as follows:

You said yesterday, in answer to my question, that you had a conversation with Gen. Lorenzo Thomas on the evening of the 21st of February last. State if he said anything as to the means by which he intended to obtain, or was directed by the President to obtain, possession of the War Department? If so, state all he said as nearly as you can.

Mr. Henry Stanbery, of counsel for the President, objected to the question. In making his objection, Mr. Stanbery first reviewed the orders issued by the President to Mr. Secretary Stanton and to General Thomas, and continues:

Now, what proof has yet been made under the first eight articles? The proof is simply, so far as this question is concerned, the production in evidence of the orders themselves. There they are to speak for themselves. As yet we have not had one particle of proof of what was said by the President, either before or after he gave those orders or at the time that he gave those orders—not one word. The only foundation now laid for the introduction of this testimony is the production of the orders themselves. The attempt made here is, by the declarations of General Thomas, to show with what intent the President issued those orders; not by producing him here to testify what the President told him, but without having him sworn at all, to bind the President by his declarations not made under oath; made without the possibility of cross-examination or contradiction by the President himself; made as though they are made by the authority of the President.

Now, Senators, what foundation is laid to show such authority, given by the President to General Thomas, to speak for him as to his intent, or even as to General Thomas's intent, which is quite another question. You must find the foundation in the orders themselves, for as yet you have no other place to look for it. Now, what are these orders? That issued to General Thomas is the most material one; but, that I may take the whole, I will read also that issued and directed to Mr. Stanton himself. He says to Mr. Stanton, by his order of February 21, 1868:

"SIR: By virtue of the power and authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and laws of the United States you are hereby removed from office as Secretary for the Department of War, and your functions as such will terminate upon receipt of this communication.

"You will transfer to Brevet Maj. Gen. Lorenzo Thomas, Adjutant-General of the Army, who has this day been authorized and empowered to act as Secretary of War ad interim, all records, books, papers, and other public property now in your custody and charge."

So much for that. Then the order to General Thomas of the same day is:

"SIR: Hon Edwin M. Stanton having been this day removed from office as Secretary for the Department of War, you are hereby authorized and empowered to act as Secretary of War ad interim, and will immediately enter upon the discharge of the duties pertaining to that office.

"Mr. Stanton has been instructed to transfer to you all the records, books, papers, and other public property now in his custody and charge.

"Respectfully, yours, ANDREW JOHNSON.

"To Brevet Maj. Gen. LORENZO THOMAS,

"Adjutant-General U. S. Army, Washington, D. C."

There they are; they speak for themselves; orders made by the President to two of his subordinates; an order directing one of them to vacate his office and to transfer the books and public property in his possession to another party, and the order to that other party to take possession of the office, receive a transfer of the books, and act as Secretary of War ad interim. Gentlemen, does that make them conspirators? Is that proof of a conspiracy or tending to have a conspiracy? Does that make General Thomas an agent of the President in such a sense as that the President is to be bound by everything he says and everything he does even within the scope of his agency?

Mr. Stanbery argued at length to show that General Thomas was an officer of the Government performing his duty under order of a superior officer, and in no sense an agent. Furthermore, he argued that no foundation had been laid for the introduction of such testimony.

Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler, replying, gave a brief résumé of the actions of the President in relation to Secretary of War Stanton:

He had come to the conclusion to violate the law and take possession of the War Office; he had come to the conclusion to do that against the law and in violation of the law; he had sent for Thomas, and Thomas had agreed with him to do that by some means if the President would give him the order, and thus we have the agreement between two minds to do an unlawful act; and that, I believe, is the definition of a conspiracy all over the world.

Let me restate this You have the determination on the part of the President to do what had been declared to be, and is, an unlawful act; you have Thomas consenting; and you have therefore an agreement of two minds to do an unlawful act, and that makes a conspiracy, so far as I understand the law of conspiracy. So that upon that conspiracy we should rest this evidence under article seven, which alleges that—

"Andrew Johnson * * * did unlawfully conspire with one Lorenzo Thomas, with intent unlawfully to seize, take, and possess the property of the United States in the Department of War in the custody and charge of Edwin M. Stanton."

And also under article five, which alleges a like unlawful conspiracy not alleging that intent.

Then there is another ground upon which this evidence is admissible, and that is upon the ground of principal and agent. Let us, if you please, examine that ground for a few moments. The President claims by his answer here that every Secretary, every Attorney-General, every executive officer of this Government exists by his will, upon his breath only; that they are all his servants only, and are responsible to him alone, not to the Senate or Congress or either branch of Congress; and he may remove them for such cause as he chooses; he appoints them for such cause as he chooses; and he claims this right to be illimitable and uncontrollable, and he says in his message to you of December 12, 1867, that if any one of his Secretaries had said to him that he would not agree with him upon the unconstitutionality of the act of March 2, 1867, he would have turned him out at once.

Mr. Butler cited as authorities Roscoe's Criminal Evidence (2 Carrington and Payne, p. 232), United States v. Goding (12 Wheaton, pp. 469, 470), and Greenleaf on Evidence.

These arguments as outlined were further amplified by Mr. Benjamin R. Curtis, of counsel for the President, and by Mr. Manager John A. Bingham.

And the question being put to the Senate, it was decided, yeas 39, nays 11, that the question proposed by Mr. Manager Butler should be put to the witness.

2232. On March 31, 1868,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Hon. Walter A. Burleigh, Delegate from Dakota Territory, was sworn and examined as to a certain visit which he made to the house of Gen. Lorenzo Thomas, of the Army.

The witness having testified that he saw General Thomas at the time of that visit, Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler asked:

Had you a conversation with him?

Mr. Henry Stanbery, of counsel for the President, asked the object of the question, to which Mr. Butler replied:

The object is to show the intent and purpose with which General Thomas went to the War Department on the morning of the 22d of February; that he went with the intent and purpose of taking possession by force; that he alleged that intent and purpose; that in consequence of that allegation Mr. Burleigh invited General Moorhead and went up to the War Office. The conversation which I expect to prove is this: After the President of the United States had appointed General Thomas and given him directions to take the War Office, and after he had made a quiet visit there on the 21st, on the evening of the 21st he told Mr. Burleigh that the next day he was going to take possession by force.

Mr. Stanbery[2] thereupon entered an objection.

The Chief Justice[3] said:

The Chief Justice thinks the testimony is competent.

2233. On April 1, 1868,[4] in the Senate during the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Hon. Walter A. Burleigh, Delegate from Dakota Territory, a witness called by the managers, testified to conversation which he had had with Gen. Lorenzo Thomas, Adjutant-General of the Army, after the said Thomas had been ordered by President Johnson to supersede Secretary of War Stanton and take possession of the office.

Then Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler offered this question:

Question. Shortly before this conversation about which you have testified, and after the President restored Major-General Thomas to the office of Adjutant-General, if you know the fact that he was so restored, were you present in the War Department, and did you hear Thomas make any statements to the officers and clerks, or either of them, belonging to the War Office, as to the rules and orders of Mr. Stanton or of the office which he, Thomas, would revoke, relax, or rescind in favor of such officers and employees when he had control of the affairs therein? If so, state as near as you can when it was such conversation occurred, and state all he said as nearly as you can.

Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the President, objected to the question as irrelevant and immaterial to any issue in the cause, and as not to be brought in evidence against the President by any support given by the testimony already in.

Mr. Manager Butler argued that the question was justified, because General Thomas was a coconspirator with the President:

You will observe the question carries with it this state of facts: Thomas had been removed from the office of Adjutant-General, for many years under President Lincoln, under the administration of Mr. Stanton, of the War Office. That is a fact known to all men who know the history of the war. Just before he made him Secretary of War ad interim the President restored Thomas to the War Office as the Adjutant-General of the Army. That was the first step to get him in condition to make a Secretary of War of him. That was the first performance of the President, the first act in the drama. He had to take a disgraced officer, and take away his disgrace, and put him into the Adjutant-General's office, from which he had been by the action of President Lincoln and Mr. Stanton suspended for years, in order to get a fit instrument on which to operate; get him in condition. That was part of the training for the next stage. Having got him in that condition, he being sufficiently virulent toward Mr. Stanton for having suspended him from the office of Adjutant-General, the President then is ready to appoint him Secretary ad interim, which he does within two or three days thereafter.

We charge that the whole procedure shows the conspiracy.

To this Mr. Evarts replied:

The question which led to the introduction of this witness's statements of General Thomas's statements to him, of his intentions, and of the President's instructions to him, General Thomas, was based upon the claim that the order of the President of the 21st of February, upon Mr. Stanton for removal, and upon General Thomas to take possession of the office, created and proved a conspiracy; and that thereafter, upon that proof, declarations and intentions were to be given in evidence. That step has been gained, and, in the judgment of this honorable court, in conformity with the rules of law and of evidence. That being gained, it is similarly argued that if, on a conspiracy proved, you can introduce declarations made thereafter, by the same rule you can introduce declarations made theretofore; and that is the only argument which is presented to the court for the admission of this evidence.

So far as the statements of the learned manager relate to the office, the position, the character, and the conduct of General Thomas, it is sufficient for me to say that not one particle of evidence has been given in this cause bearing upon any one of these topics. If General Thomas has been a disgraced officer; if these aspersions, these revilings are just, they are not justified by any evidence before this court. And if, as a matter of fact, applicable to the situation upon which this proof is sought to be introduced, the former employments of General Thomas and the recent restoration of him to the active duties of Adjutant-General are pertinent, let them be proved; and then we shall have at least the basis of fact of General Thomas's previous relations to the War Department, to Mr. Stanton, and to the office of Adjutant-General.

And, now, having pointed out to this honorable court that the declarations sought to be given in evidence of General Thomas to affect the President with his intentions are confessedly of a period antecedent to the date to which any evidence whatever before this court brings the President and General Thomas in connection, I might leave it safely there. But what is there in the nature of the general proof sought to be introduced that should affect the President of the United States with any responsibility for these general and vague statements of an officer of what he might or could or would do, if thereafter he should come into the possession of power over the Department?

At the end of the debate the Chief Justice[1] said:

The Chief Justice is of opinion that no sufficient foundation has been laid for the introduction of this testimony. He will submit the question to the Senate with great pleasure, if any Senator desires it. The question is ruled to be inadmissible.

Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan, a Senator, asked that the question be taken by the Senate; and being put, Shall the question proposed by Mr. Manager Butler be put to the witness? the yeas were 28 and the nays 22.

So the question was put.

2234. An alleged coconspirator was permitted to testify as to declarations of the respondent at a time after the act, the testimony being responsive to similar evidence on the other side.—On April 10, 1868,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Lorenzo Thomas, Adjutant-General of the Army, was called as a witness on behalf of the President, and related the circumstances which occurred on February 21, 1868, when, in obedience to the direction of the President, he attempted to supersede Mr. Stanton as Secretary of War.

General Thomas having described his interview with Secretary Stanton, Mr. Henry Stanbery, of counsel for the President, proceeded with the examination:

Q. Did you see the President after that interview?—A. I did.
Q. What took place?

At this point Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler interposed an objection, as follows:

I object now, Mr. President and Senators, to the conversation between the President and General Thomas. Up to this time I did not object, as you observe, upon reflection, to any orders or directions which the President gave, or any conversation had between the President and General Thomas at the time of issuing the commission. But now the commission has been issued; the demand has been made; it has been refused; and a peremptory order given to General Thomas to mind his own business and keep out of the War Office has been put in evidence. Now, I suppose that the President, by talking with General Thomas, or General Thomas, by talking with the President, can not put in his own declarations for the purpose of making evidence in favor of himself. The Senate has already ruled by solemn vote, and in consonance, I believe, with the opinion of the Presiding Officer, that there were such evidence of common intent between these two parties as to allow us to put in the acts of each to bear upon the other; but I challenge any authority that can be shown anywhere that, in trying a man for an act before any tribunal, whether a judicial court or any other body of triers, testimony can be given of what the respondent said in his own behalf, and especially to his servant, and a fortiori to his coconspirator. A conspiracy being alleged, can it be that the President of the United States can call up any officer of the Army, and, by talking to him after the act has been done, justify the act which has been done?

Replying to this objection, Mr. Stanbery said:

But, says the learned manager, the transaction ended in giving the order and receiving the order, and you are to have no testimony of what was said by the President or General Thomas, except what was said just then, because that was the transaction; that was the res gestæ. Does the learned gentleman forget his testimony? Does he forget how he attempted to make a case? Does he forget, not what took place in the afternoon between the President and General Thomas that we are now going into, but what took place that night? Does he forget what sort of a case he attempts to make against the President, not at the time when that order was given, nor before it was given, nor in the afternoon of the 21st, but under his conspiracy counts, the managers have undertaken to give in evidence that on the night of the 21st General Thomas declared that he was going to enter the War Office by force?

That is the matter charged as illegal; and the articles say that the conspiracy between General Thomas and the President was that the order should be executed by the exhibition of force, intimidation, and threats, and to prove that what has he got here? The declarations of General Thomas, not made under oath, as we propose to have them made, but his mere declarations, when the President was absent and could not contradict him—not, as now, under oath, and all the conversation when the President was present and could contradict or might admit. The honorable manager has gone into all that to make a case against the President of conspiracy; and not merely that, but proves the acts and declarations of General Thomas on the 22d; and not only that, but as late as the 9th of March, at the presidential levee, brings a witness, with the eyes of all Delaware upon him [laughter], and proves by that witness, or thinks he has proved, that on that night General Thomas also made a declaration involving the President in this conspiracy, as a party to a conspiracy still existing to keep Mr. Stanton out of office.

Now, how are we to defend against these declarations made on the night of the 21st or the 22d, and again as late as the 9th of March? Does not the transaction run through all that time? How is the President to defend himself if he is allowed to introduce no proof of what he said to General Thomas after the date of the order? May he not call General Thomas? Is General Thomas impeached here as a coconspirator? Is his mouth shut by a prosecution? Not at all. He is free as a witness—brought here and sworn. Now, what better testimony can we have to contradict this alleged conspiracy than the testimony of one of the alleged conspirators; for if General Thomas did not conspire certainly the President did not conspire. A man can not conspire by himself.

The Chief Justice having submitted the question to the Senate, "Is the question admissible?" there appeared 42 yeas, 10 nays. So the question was admitted.

Later, in the examination of the same witness,[1] Mr. Stanbery asked this question:

Did the President at any time prior to or including the 9th of March authorize or direct you to use force, intimidation, or threats to get possession of the War Office?

Mr Manager Butler objected to the introduction of such testimony. He said that the President had been impeached on February 22, and what directions he had given after that event were not to be a subject of testimony.

Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the President, contended that, as the managers had introduced witnesses to prove what General Thomas said on March 9, it was competent to introduce evidence as to what the President had actually done.

The Senate, without division, admitted the question.

2235. In general during impeachment trials questions as to conversations with third parties, not in presence of respondent, have been excluded from evidence.—On March 8, 1803,[2] in the high court of impeachment during the trial of John Pickering, judge of the United States district court of New Hampshire, Mr. Jonathan Steele was testifying, when Mr. Joseph H. Nicholson, of Maryland, chairman of the managers for the House of Representatives, addressed the court. He said he wished in case it should be deemed proper by the court, to ask one of the witnesses whether he had conversed with the family physician of Judge Pickering, and what his opinion was as to the origination of his insanity. Mr. Nicholson observed that he had doubts of the propriety of this question, and therefore, in the first instance, stated it to the court.

The court decided the question inadmissible.

Later, on the same day, this witness, in the course of his testimony, was going on to state some conversation he had with Judge Pickering's physician at this time which he was induced to ask in consequence of solicitude to gain true information as to the reported intemperance of the Judge, when he was interrupted by the Court,[1] and informed that this species of testimony had been already decided to be inadmissible.

2236. On July 10, 1876,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Caleb P. Marsh was called as a witness for the United States. It was alleged in the articles of impeachment that Marsh, in collusion with the respondent, had effected the appointment of one Evans as post trader at Fort Sill, and that in consideration thereof Marsh had received from Evans certain sums of money which had been shared with the respondent. The witness being examined as to a contract between himself and Evans as to the payment of the above-mentioned sums of money, identified a paper presented to him as that contract. Then these questions were put and answered:

Q. Did Mr. Evans sign that paper with you?—A. He did.

Q. This agreement was reduced to writing in New York City. State whether it was agreed to before it was reduced to writing, and, if so, where. In other words, whether you came to any understanding in Washington before you went to New York City.—A. We came to an understanding as to the amount he was willing to pay, if I would allow him to hold the post and continue the business at Fort Sill.

Q. In that connection, without further questions, give us all that passed between you and Mr. Evans prior to the execution of this contract.

To the last question Mr. Matt. S. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, objected, saying:

The Senate, of course, will observe that this calls for a conversation between the witness and a third person, not in our presence, with no pretense that we know anything about it.

The President pro tempore said:

The question is on the admission of the interrogatory.

The question was decided in the negative.

2237. On July 11, 1876,[3] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Caleb P. Marsh, a witness on behalf of the United States, had been examined and cross-examined, and had testified to sending to the respondent sums of money which he had received in pursuance to his contract with one Evans, the post trader at Fort Sill. Mr. John A. Logan, a Senator from Illinois, proposed this question:

Prior to the sending of the first money, had you said anything to any person or had any person ever said anything to you on the subject of sending money to General Belknap; if so, who was it?

Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, objected to the question, but the Senate without division decided that it might be asked.

The witness replied that he had had a conversation with the present Mrs. Belknap. It was before he had sent any money to respondent, but he had sent money to her.

[3] First session Forty-fourth Congress, Senate Journal, pp. 971–973; Record of trial, pp. 238–241.

Thereupon Mr. Logan asked:

State what the conversation was.

Mr. Manager John A. McMahon objected to the interrogatory, saying:

Even if General Belknap was present, while we might have called it as against him, he can not produce it as in his favor. It is the conversation of a third party. * * * Before the vote is taken, Senators, I desire that all shall understand the precise conversation now called for. It is a conversation between the witness and the present Mrs. Belknap, occurring on the night of the funeral of the second Mrs. Belknap, between the witness and her, not in the presence of General Belknap; a conversation between the two persons on that occasion. Clearly it seems to me the defendant is not at liberty to produce that conversation in his behalf.

The question being taken on the admissibility of the question, there appeared yeas 18, nays 23. So the objection was sustained.

Mr. Henry L. Dawes, a Senator from Massachusetts, then proposed this question:

State all the knowledge or information that General Belknap had, which it is in your power to state, as to the amount of any money sent him or the source whence it came, other than what you have already stated.

Mr. Carpenter having objected, the Senate without division admitted the question.

Mr. John A. Logan proposed this question:

Did you have any agreement with any person other than General Belknap in reference to sending the money you have testified to or any part of it? If so, with whom was such agreement and what was such agreement?

Mr. Manager McMahon objected, and Mr. Manager Elbridge G. Lapham said:

Our objection is that this calls for a conversation with a third person, and is the precise question upon which the Senate has already passed. The witness having stated expressly that he had no conversation with the defendant, the question calls for some express conversation, some expression, agreement, or understanding, and not for an implied or inferential understanding from the acts of the parties.

After argument by managers and counsel, Mr. Frederick T. Frelinghuysen, a Senator from New Jersey, said:

As I understand it, the court, exercising its privilege and against the objection of the respondent, permitted it to be proven that there was a conversation which had relation in some manner to these payments. I think it is the right of the respondent that that conversation should now be given. It was the court, not the respondent, who introduced the fact that there was such conversation that had relation to these payments. I do not think we can fairly exclude the conversation.

Mr. George F. Edmunds, a Senator from Vermont, dissented from the law of the proposition made by Mr. Frelinghuysen.

The Senate, by a vote of 25 yeas, 21 nays, admitted the question.

The witness answered:

I had a conversation with Mrs. Bower, the present Mrs. Belknap, on the night of the funeral. She asked me to go up stairs with her to look at the baby in the nursery. I said to her, as near as I can remember, "This child will have money coming to it after a while." She said, "Yes; my sister gave the child to me, and told me the money coming from you I must take and keep for it." I am not certain about the rest of the conversation. I have an indistinct impression of what was said afterwards. I said, very likely, "All right; but perhaps the father ought to be consulted," and her reply was that if I sent the money to him she would get it any way for the child, or something of that kind. That is as far as I remember it; but I had some understanding; I have sometimes thought that I said something to General Belknap that night. My entire recollection is indistinct about the matter, except her relation of her sister's dying request made an impression on me more than any other part of the conversation.

2238. In the Johnson trial declarations of respondent, made anterior to the act, and even concomitant with it, were held inadmissible as evidence.

Instance wherein a decision of the Chief Justice as to the admissibility of evidence was overruled by the Senate.

The Senate, in the Johnson trial, declined to exclude evidence as to fact on the ground that it might lead to evidence as to declaration.

Leading questions were ruled out during the Johnson trial.

Citation of English precedents as to evidence during the Johnson trial.

On April 11, 1868,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Gen. William T. Sherman was called as a witness on behalf of the President. The witness had testified that between December 4, 1867, and February 4, 1868, he had several interviews with the President relating to Mr. Stanton, Secretary of War. Thereupon Mr. Henry Stanbery, of counsel for the President, asking as to a certain specified interview, propounded this question:

In that interview, what conversation took place between the President and you in regard to the removal of Mr. Stanton?

Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler objected to the question.

The Chief Justice[2] said at once, before argument:

The Chief Justice thinks the question admissible within the principle of the decision made by the Senate relating to a conversation between General Thomas and the President;[3] but he will put the question to the Senate, if any Senator desires it.

The managers, having persisted in objection, an argument arose, Mr. Stanbery saying:

When a prosecution is allowed to raise the presumption of guilt from the intent of the accused by proving circumstances which raised that presumption against him, may he not rebut it by proof of other circumstances which show that he could not have had such a criminal intent? Was anything ever plainer than that?

Why, consider what a latitude one charged with crime is allowed under such circumstances. Take the case of a man charged with passing counterfeit money. You must prove his intent; you must prove his scienter; you must prove circumstances from which a presumption arises; did he know the bill was counterfeit? You may prove that he had been told so; prove that he had seen other money of the same kind, and raise the intent in that way. Even when you make such proof against him arising from presumptions, how may he rebut that presumption of intent from circumstances proved against him? In the first place, by the most general of all presumptions—proof of good character generally. That he is allowed to do to rebut a presumption—the most general of all presumptions—not that he did what was right in that transaction, not that he did certain things or made certain declarations about the same time which explained that the intent was honest, but going beyond that through the whole field of presumptions, for it is all open to him, he may rebut the presumption arising from proof of express facts by the proof of general good character, raising the presumption that he is not a man who would have such an intent. * * * Now, what evidence is a defendant entitled to who is charged with crime where it is necessary to make out an intent against him where the intent is not positively proved by his own declarations, but where the intent to be gathered by proof of other facts, which may be guilty or indifferent, according to the intent? What proof is allowed against him to raise this presumption of intent? Proof of those facts from which the mind itself infers a guilty intention. But while the prosecution may make such a case against him by such testimony, may he not rebut the case by exactly the same sort of testimony? If it is a declaration that they rely upon as made by him at one time, may he not meet it by declarations made about the same time with regard to the same transaction? Undoubtedly. They can not be too remote, I admit that; but if they are about the time, if they are connected with the transaction, if they do not appear to have been manufactured, then the declarations of the defendant, from which the inference of innocence would be presumed, are, under reasonable limitations, just as admissible as the declarations of the defendant from which the prosecution has attempted to deduce the inference of criminal purpose.

Mr. Stanbery proceeded to cite from the State trials, p. 1065, the trial of Hardy. Replying, Mr. Manager Butler said:

The learned gentleman from Ohio says what? He says "in a counterfeiter's case we have to prove the scienter." Yes, true; and how? By showing the passage of other counterfeit bills? Yes; but, gentlemen, did you ever hear, in a case of counterfeiting, the counterfeiter prove that he did not know the bill was bad by proving that at some other time he passed a good bill? Is not that the proposition? We try the counterfeit bill, which we have nailed to the counter, of the 21st of February; and, in order to prove that he did not issue it, he wants to show that he passed a good bill on the 14th of January. It does not take a lawyer to understand that That is the proposition.

We prove that a counterfeiter passed a bad bill—I am following the illustration of my learned opponent. Having proved that he passed a bad bill, what is the evidence he proposes? That at some other time he told somebody else, a good man, that he would not pass bad money, to give it the strongest form; and you are asked to vote it on that reason. I take the illustration. Is there any authority brought for that? No.

What is the next ground? The next is that it is in order to show Andrew Johnson's good character. If they will put that in testimony I will open the door widely. We shall have no objection whenever they offer that. I will take all that is said of him by all good and loyal men, whether for probity, patriotism, or any other matter that they choose to put in issue. But how do they propose to prove good character? By showing what he said to a gentleman. Did you ever hear of good character, lawyers of the Senate? Laymen of the Senate, did you ever hear a good character proved in that way? A man's character is in issue. Does he call up one of his neighbor's and ask what the man told him about his character? No; the general speech of people in the community, what was publicly known and said of him, is the point, and upon that went Hardy's case.

* * * * * * *

But, then, look at the vehicle of proof. What is the vehicle of proof? They do not propose to prove it by his acts. When they are offered, I shall be willing to let them go in. Let them offer any act of the President about that time, either prior or since, and I shall not object, although the Senate ruled out an act in Cooper's case. But how do they propose to prove it? "What conversations took place between the President and you?" I agree, gentlemen of the Senate—I repeat it even after the criticisms that have been made—that you are a law unto yourselves. You have a right to receive or reject any testimony. All the common law can do for you is, that being the accumulation of the experience of thousands of years of trial, it may afford some guide to you; but you can override it. You have no right, however, to override the principles of justice and equity, and to allow the case of the people of the United States to be prejudiced by the conversations of the criminal they present at your bar, made in his own defense before the acts done, which the people complain of. That I may, I trust, without offense say, because there is a law that must govern us at any and all times, and the single question is—I did not mean to trouble the Senate with it before, and never will again on this question of conversation—what limit is there? If this is allowable, you may put in his conversations with everybody; you may put in his conversations with newspaper reporters—and he is very free with those, if we are to believe the newspapers. If he has a right to converse with General Sherman about this case and put that in, I do not see why he has not a right to converse with Mack, and John, and Joe, and J. B., and J. B. S., and T. R. S., and X. L. W., or whoever he may talk with, and put all that in.

I take it there is no law which makes a conversation with General Sherman any more competent than a conversation with any other man.

Mr. William M. Evarts, of the President's counsel, said:

And now I should like to look first to the question of the point of time as bearing upon the admissibility of this evidence. Under the eleventh article, the speech of the 18th of August, 1866, is alleged as laying the foundation of the illegal purposes that culminated in 1868, to point the criminality, that is what made the subject of accusation in that article. Proof, then, of the speeches of 1866 is made evidence under this article eleven, that imputes not criminality in making the speech, but in the action afterwards pointed by the purpose of the speech. So, too, a telegram to Governor Parsons, in January, 1867, is supposed to be evidence as bearing upon the guilt completed in the year 1868.

So, too, the interview between Wood, the office seeker, and the President of the United States, in September, 1866, is supposed to bear in evidence upon the question of intent in the consummation of the crime alleged to have been completed in 1868. I apprehend therefore that on the question of time this interview between General Sherman and the President of the United States, in the very matter of the public transaction of the President of the United States changing the head of the War Department, which was actually completed in February, 1868, is near enough to point intent and to show honest purpose, if these transactions, thus in evidence, are near enough to bear upon the same attributed crimes.

There remains, then, only this consideration, whether it is open to the imputation that it is a mere proof of declarations of the President concerning what his motives and objects were in reference to his subsequent act in the removal of Stanton. It certainly is not limited to that force or effect. Whenever evidence of that mere character is offered that question will arise to be disposed of; but as a part of the public action and conduct of the President of the United States in reference to this very office, and his duty and purpose in dealing with it, and on the very point, too, as to whether that object was to fill it by unwarrantable characters tending to a perversion or betrayal of the public trust, we propose to show his consultations with the Lieutenant-General of the armies of the United States to induce him to take the place.

On the other question of whether his efforts are to create by violence a civil war or bloodshed, or even a breach of the peace, in the removal of the Secretary of War, we show that in this same consultation it was his desire that the Lieutenant-General should take the place in order that by that means the opportunity might be given to decide the differences between the Executive and Congress as to the constitutional powers of the former by the courts of law. If the conduct of the President in relation to matters that are made the subject of inculpation, and of inculpation through motives attributed through designs supposed to be proved, can not be made the subject of evidence, if his public action, if his public conduct, if the efforts and the means that he used in the selection of agents are not to be received to rebut the intentions or presumptions that are sought to be raised against him, well, indeed, was my learned associate justified in saying that this is a vital question. Vital in the interests of justice, I mean, rather than vital to any important considerations of the cause.

Mr. Manager James F. Wilson, quoted the Hardy case, over which a dispute had arisen:

My principal purpose is to get before the minds of Senators the truth in the Hardy case as it fell from the lips of the Chief Justice, when he passed upon the question which had been propounded by Mr. Erskine and objected to by the attorney-general. The ruling is in these words:

"Lord Chief Justice Eyre. Mr. Erskine, I do not know whether you can be content to acquiesce in the opinion that we are inclined to form upon the subject, in which we go a certain way with you. Nothing is so clear as that all declarations which apply to facts, and even apply to the particular case that is charged, though the intent should make a part of that charge, are evidence against a prisoner and are not evidence for him, because the presumption upon which declarations are evidence is, that no man would declare anything against himself unless it were true; but every man, if he was in a difficulty, or in the view to any difficulty, would make declarations for himself. Those declarations, if offered as evidence, would be offered therefore upon no ground which entitled them to credit. That is the general rule. But if the question be— as I really think it is in this case, which is my reason now for interposing—if the question be, what was the political speculative opinion which this man entertained touching a reform of Parliament, I believe we all think that opinion may very well be learned and discovered by the conversations which he has held at any time or in any place.

"Mr. ERSKINE. Just so, that is my question; only that I may not get into another debate, I beg your lordship will hear me a few words.

"LORD CHIEF JUSTICE EYRE. I think I have already anticipated a misapprehension of what I am now stating, by saying that if the declaration was meant to apply to a disavowal of the particular charge made against this man that declaration could not be received; as for instance, if he had said to some friend of his: When I planned this convention, I did not mean to use this convention to destroy the king and his Government, but I did mean to get, by means of this convention, the Duke of Richmond's plan of reform, that would fall within the rule I first laid down; that would be a declaration, which being for him, he could not be admitted to make, though the law will allow a contrary declaration to have been given in evidence. Now, if you take it so, I believe there is no difficulty "

And upon that ruling the question was changed as read by my associate manager, and correctly read by him, and all that followed this ruling of the chief justice and the subsequent discussion was read by my associate manager. The lord chief justice further said:

"You may put the question exactly as you propose."

That is, after discussion had occurred subsequent to the ruling of the chief justice to which I have referred, and in which a change in the character of the original question was disclosed.

"I confess I wished by interposing to avoid all discussion, because I consider what we are doing, and whom we have at that bar, and in that box, who are suffering by every moment's unnecessary delay in such a cause as this.

"Mr. ERSKINE. I am sure the jury will excuse it; I meant to set myself right at this bar; this is a very public place."

Then follows the question—

"Mr. DANIEL STUART examined by Mr. ERSKINE:

"Did you before the time of this convention being held, which is imputed to Mr. Hardy, ever hear from him what his objects were, whether he has at all mixed himself in that business?

"I have very often conversed with him, as I mentioned before, about his plan of reform; he always adhered to the Duke of Richmond's plan."

* * * * * * *

And which declaration came within the exception to the rule laid down by the chief justice. The final question was then put:

"From all that you have seen of him, what is his character for sincerity and truth?

"I have every reason to believe him to be a very sincere, simple, honest man "

To which the attorney-general said:

"If this had been stated at first to the question meant to be asked, I do not see what possible objection I could have to it."

* * * * * * *

That remark applies to the last question. The remark was made after the last question was put; but, as I understand it the two questions are substantially the same and are connected, and the remark of the attorney-general applied to both, as the first was but the basis, the inducement to the last.

* * * * * * *

Now, what is the question which has been propounded by the counsel on the part of the President to General Sherman? It is this:

"In that interview what conversation took place between the President and you in regard to the removal of Mr. Stanton?"

Now, I contend that that calls for just such declarations on the part of the President as fall within the rule laid down by the chief justice in the Hardy case, and therefore must be excluded. If this conversation can be admitted, where are we to stop? Who may not be put upon the witness stand and asked for conversations had between him and the President, and at any time since the President entered upon the duties of the presidential office, to show the general intent and drift of his mind and conduct during the whole period of his official existence?

We certainly must insist upon the well known and long established rule of evidence being applied to this particular objection, for the purpose of ending now and forever, so far as this case is concerned, these attempts to put in evidence the declarations of the President, made, it may be, for the purpose of meeting an impeachment by such weapons of defense.

It is offered to be proved now, as the counsel inform us, that the President told General Sherman that he desired him to accept an appointment of Secretary for the Department of War to the end that Mr. Stanton might be driven to the courts of law for the purpose of testing his title to that office.

At the conclusion of the arguments the Chief Justice said:

Senators, the Chief Justice has expressed the opinion that the question now proposed is admissible within the vote of the Senate of yesterday. He will state briefly the grounds of that opinion. The question yesterday had reference to a conversation between the President and General Thomas after the note addressed to Mr. Stanton was written and delivered, and the Senate held it admissible. The question to-day has reference to a conversation relating to the same subject-matter, between the President and General Sherman, which occurred before the note of removal was written and delivered. Both questions were asked for the purpose of proving the intent of the President in the attempt to remove Mr. Stanton. The Chief Justice thinks that proof of a conversation shortly before a transaction is better evidence of the intent of an actor in it than proof of a conversation shortly after the transaction. The Secretary will call the roll.

The question being put, "Is the question admissible?" there appeared yeas 23, nays 28. So the question was ruled out.

Mr. Stanbery next asked:

General Sherman, in any of the conversations of the President while you were here, what was said about the department of the Atlantic?

Mr. Manager Butler objected that this question fell within the ruling just made. Thereupon Mr. Stanbery proposed the question in this form:

What do you know about the creation of the department of the Atlantic?

Mr. Manager Butler said:

We have no objection to what General Sherman knows about the creation of the department of the Atlantic, provided he speaks of knowledge and not from the declarations of the President. All orders, papers, his own knowledge, if he has any, if it does not come from declarations, we do not object to.

The Chief Justice said:

The counsel for the President will be good enough to state whether in this question they include statements made by the President.

To this Mr. Stanbery replied:

Not merely that; what we expect to prove is in what manner the department of the Atlantic was created; who defined the bounds of the department of the Atlantic; what was the purpose for which the department was arranged.

It was also developed by a question from the Chief Justice that the conversation referred to was prior to the attempted removal of Mr. Stanton.

The question being put, the Senate decided[1] without division that the question was not admissible.

Mr. Stanbery then asked this question:

Did the President make any application to you respecting the acceptance of the duties of Secretary of War ad interim.

Mr. Manager Butler said:

I am instructed, Mr. President, to object to this, because an application can not be made without being either in writing or in conversation, and then either would be the written or oral declaration of the President, and it is entirely immaterial to this issue.

[1] Senate Journal, p. 888; Globe Supplement, p. 157.

Mr. William M. Evarts said:

Mr. Chief Justice and Senators, the ground, as we understand it, upon which the offer, in the form and to the extent in which our question which was overruled sought to put it, was overruled, was because it proposed to put in evidence declarations of the President as if statements of what he was to do or what he had done. We offer this present evidence as executive action of the President at the time and in the direct form of a proposed devolution of office then presently upon General Sherman.

Mr. Butler objected that under the guise of proving an act it was proposed to get in a conversation.

The question being put, the Senate decided without division that the question was admissible.[1]

The question having been put, and General Sherman having testified that the President had tendered him the office of Secretary of War ad interim on two occasions, Mr. Stanbery then asked:

At the first interview at which the tender of the duties of the Secretary of War ad interim was made to you by the President did anything further pass between you and the President in reference to the tender or your acceptance of it?

In response to a question by Mr. Manager Butler as to the scope of the question, Mr. Stanbery stated that the question was intended to draw out the declarations concomitant with the act.

Mr. Butler thereupon entered an objection to the question on the ground that it contemplated an evasion of the principles of the ruling heretofore made. He said:

My proposition is, objecting to this evidence, that the evidence is incompetent and is based upon first getting in an act which proved nothing and looked to be immaterial, so that it was quite liberal for Senators to vote it in, but that liberality is taken advantage of to endeavor to get by the ruling of the Senate and put in declarations which the Senate has ruled out.

Mr. Evarts argued:

The tender of the War Office by the Chief Executive of the United States to a general in the position of General Sherman is an Executive act, and as such has been admitted in evidence by this court Like every other act thus admitted in evidence as an act, it is competent to attend it by whatever was expressed from one to the other in the course of that act to the termination of it. And on that proposition the learned manager shakes his finger of warning at the Senators of the United States against the malpractices of the counsel for the President. Now, Senators, if there be anything clear, anything plain in the law of evidence, without which truth is shut out, the form and features of the fact permitted to be proved excluded, it is this rule that the spoken act is a part of the attending qualifying trait and character of the act itself.

The question being submitted to the Senate, "Is the question admissible?" there appeared yeas 23, nays 29. So the question was ruled out.[2]

Mr. Stanbery then asked:

In either of these conversations did the President say to you that his object in appointing you was that he might thus get the question of Mr. Stanton's right to the office before the Supreme Court?

Mr. Manager Butler objected to this question as leading in form, and as inadmissible within the decisions already made.

[2] Senate Journal, p. 888; Globe Supplement, p. 158.

The Senate, by a vote of yeas 7, nays 44, decided that the question was not admissible.[1]

Mr. Stanbery then asked:

Was anything said at either of those interviews by the President as to any purpose of getting the question of Mr. Stanton's right to the office before the courts?

Mr. Stanbery explained that the preceding question seemed to have been overruled because of its form, and he now changed the form as he did not want it thrown out on a technicality.

Mr. Manager Butler objected to the question on the ground that it was incompetent under the rules of evidence to offer in another form a question ruled out as leading, saying:

I had the honor to say to the Senate a little ago that all the rules of evidence are founded upon good sense, and this rule is founded on good sense. It would do no harm in the case of this witness; but the rule is founded on this proposition that counsel shall not put a leading question to a witness, and thus instruct him what they want him to say, and then have it overruled and withdraw it, and put the same question in substance, because you could always instruct a witness in that way. Of course, that was not meant here, because I assume it would do no harm in any form, and the counsel would not do it; but I think the Senate should hold itself not to be played with in this way.

The Senate without division decided that the question should not be admitted.[2]

Thereupon Mr. John B. Henderson, of Missouri, a Senator, proposed this question in writing:

Did the President, in tendering you the appointment of Secretary of War ad interim, express the object or purpose of so doing?

Mr. Manager John A. Bingham, on behalf of the House of Representatives, objected to the question as both leading and incompetent.

The question being submitted to the Senate, "Is the question admissible?" there appeared yeas 25, nays 27. So the question was ruled out.[3]

Mr. Stanbery then proposed this question:

At either of these interviews was anything said in reference to the use of threats, intimidation, or force to get possession of the War Office, or the contrary?

Mr. Manager Butler objected to the question, as falling within the rule already established.

The Senate, without division, sustained the objection.[4]

2239. Evidence as to statements of Judge Swayne to prove intention as to residence and made before impeachment proceedings were suggested was the subject of diverse rulings during the trial.

Instance during the Swayne trial wherein the Presiding Officer, contrary to his usual habit, submitted a question of evidence to the Senate at once.

On February 22, 1905,[5] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Milton Jackson, a witness for the respondent, was examined by Mr. Anthony Higgins, of counsel for the respondent, as to a conversation which he had with Judge Swayne several years previous to the impeachment in reference to the latter's place of residence, and this question was asked:

Q. (By Mr. Higgins.) What did the Judge state at that time about the subject of his residence?

To that I object, Mr. President, The statement of Judge Swayne, which we offered to prove, were excluded, of course, for a different reason, but certainly there is no rule of law which allows the statements of the respondent to be put in evidence in his own behalf. That, of course, is fundamental. No man can prove what he has done or what he has not done by his own statements as to what he did or purposed to do. There is no more fundamental rule of evidence than that the respondent's statements can not be proved in his favor. If that were so, all Judge Swayne would have to do would be to state that he resided in Florida, and that would make him a resident of Florida, or be evidence of his residence there.

Mr. Higgins replied:

I submit to the Senate that this question is eminently proper as a verbal fact, an act of the judge, ante litem motam, before this matter was mooted, years before, in the announcement to his nearest of kin as to his residence at that time. In order to make clear to the Senate the question upon which it is asked to pass, I will say that the authorities of Leon County, Fla., in which is the city of Tallahassee, gave an invitation to Judge Swayne, written and engrossed, to make his residence and home there, and that this was shown to this witness, and that the Judge gave them reasons why he could not accept that offer, because of where he had elected to live. If that is not fair testimony and within the rule, I do not know what is. It was long before this question was ever raised, not with any view of the possibility of any such proceeding as this. The statement is admissible for a double reason—that he was not going to accept that offer; that the offer was made very shortly after the act of Congress was passed, and therefore the question arose at that time; and in rejecting that invitation he did it because he had elected to reside, as the witness will state, elsewhere in his district and with reference to the requirements of that act.

Now, we have made that statement in answer as a substantive part of the defense, that he announced at that time his intention as to where he expected to live as a proper thing for him to do, and it is an act which I submit it is eminently proper for us to be able to prove.

In reply Mr. Manager Perkins argued:

In other words, Mr. President, the offer of the counsel is this when we analyze it: The question being whether Judge Swayne as a matter of fact became a resident of the northen district of Florida, they can prove that by showing by another witness that Judge Swayne said he intended to become a resident. You can prove a fact. You can prove what a man did; what he was bound to do; that he became a resident. How—by showing what he did? No; but by proving that he said to some one else he intended to become a resident.

Mr. Manager Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, said:

I find that in the trial of Andrew Johnson, page 207 of the proceedings, as reported in the Globe, it was offered for the counsel by the respondent to prove in these words:

"We offer to prove that the President then stated that he had issued an order for the removal of Mr. Stanton and the employment of Mr. Thomas to perform the duties ad interim; that thereupon Mr. Perrin said: 'Supposing Mr. Stanton should oppose the order?' The President replied: 'There is no danger of that, for General Thomas is already in the office,' etc."

Mr. Manager Butler having objected, Mr. Manager Wilson said:

Mr. President, as this objection is outside of any former ruling of the Senate and is perfectly within the rule laid down in Hardy's case—the celebrated English impeachment case—and cited this ruling from that case, which may be found in 24 State Trials, page 1096.

"Nothing is so clear as that all declararations which apply to facts, and even apply to the particular case that is charged, though the intent should make a part of that charge, are evidence against a prisoner, and are not evidence for him, because the presumption upon which declarations are evidence is that no man would declare anything against himself unless it were true; but every man, if he was in a difficulty, or in the view to any difficulty, would make declarations for himself."

The Chief Justice submitted the question to the Senate whether it should be admitted, and the vote was, yeas 9 and nays 37. So the question was rejected. There you have precedent both English and American.

The Presiding Officer[1] said:

The Presiding Officer will state the question. Counsel for the respondent offered to prove, as affecting the question of his residence, statements made by the respondent to the witness in the year 1894 or 1895 as to where it was his intention to reside. That it the question which is submitted to the Senate.

Mr. HIGGINS. I wish further to say that I intend also to put to the witness the question as to where the Judge stated at the time he did reside.

Mr. Manager OLMSTED. That would be equally objectionable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And, further, the statements made by Judge Swayne at that time as to where his residence was. Senators in favor of the admission of such testimony will say "aye," opposed "no." [Putting the question.] In the opinion of the Presiding Officer the "ayes" have it. The "ayes" have it. The counsel will ask the question.

On February 23[2] a witness, Charles F. Warwick, was examined by Mr. Anthony Higgins, of counsel for the respondent, who asked:

Q. Do you know Judge Charles Swayne?—A. Very well.

Q. How long have you known him?—A. Ever since I came to the bar. I think I knew him before that intimately.

Q. Intimately, you say?—A. Intimately.

Q. Do you remember the fact of the act of Congress curtailing his district?—A. I do.

Q. Will you please state whether on or about or after that time, and fix the time yourself, you had any conversation with him, and he with you, concerning where he would make his residence in Florida?

Mr. Manager Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, said:

We object to that testimony as being irrelevant and incompetent. The declaration of the respondent as to where he intended to reside is, in our judgment, not evidence in this case.

Mr. Porter J. McCumber, a Senator from North Dakota, said:

Mr. President, before submitting the matter to the Senate, I wish counsel would inform the Senate on what principle of law he justifies a proposition to introduce in evidence a self-serving declaration of a party defendant in a criminal proceeding.

Mr. Higgins said:

Mr. President, I had the honor to submit some remarks upon that question yesterday. We contend that such an assertion made before the present impeachment proceedings were mooted or expected, or as the maxim of the law has it ante litem motam, is itself essentially a verbal fact. Residence is made up of two elements—intention and action. Intent without action is futile to make a residence, but intention becomes a most important part of the proposition in the end as to what constitutes residence. As I have said and admitted, alone it will not make it, but it is a part of a whole in which it takes its own due proportion.

Now, if this were a self-serving assertion, made after the fact, if it came into the case in such a way it would be so clearly objectionable that it never would be presented by counsel for the respondent. But we submit it is a most important thing. When the good faith of the conduct of the respondent is in dispute, we bring here a witness of the highest character and standing to prove what at that time was the expressed intention of the respondent in respect to establishing his residence. I think therefore that, while admitting the principle upon which the distinguished Senator raises his question, we have brought this within an exception thereto. If we had expected that this question would be raised again to-day, after it had been disposed of yesterday, we would have come prepared with authorities to submit.

[1] Orville H. Platt, of Connecticut, Presiding Officer. [2] Record, pp. 3145, 3146.

Mr. Manager James B. Perkins, of New York, said:

Mr. President, just a word. I did not again object to-day because the Senate yesterday, I must confess somewhat to my surprise, allowed a similar question to be answered. Doubtless it was that the legal question involved was not presented by me with the clearness with which it has now been stated by the Senator from North Dakota. The gentleman on the other side misstates the question and avoids the inquiry made by the Senator. It is not can Judge Swayne's intention be proved? His intention is a question that perhaps can be proved, but Judge Swayne's intention, no more than any other thing in Judge Swayne's behalf, can be proved by Judge Swayne's own statement.

It is offered to prove here, what? Judge Swayne's intention, by the fact that Judge Swayne said it was his intention. As the Senator from North Dakota properly says, it is an endeavor to prove something in behalf of the defendant by his own statement. There is the inherent vice of the question, and I think the failure perhaps to catch that point yesterday was the reason the ruling was made by the Senate.

Mr. Higgins replied:

Only a word in reply. The learned manager who would confine the evidence of intention to acts, when from the very great case in 3 Washington Report down it is the established law as to citizenship, as to residence, as to domicile, that they are each and every one of them made up of two articles—of intent and of action—and that if you can not prove anything by words you are confined merely in your evidence to acts. That is not the law, with all due respect to my learned friend.

Mr. Manager Olmsted said:

I again call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this precise question was before the Senate of the United States in the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, where his counsel offered to prove, for the purpose of showing the intent of the President of the United States, his statements to other parties. There was then cited the celebrated English case of Hardy, reported in 24 State Trials, page 1096, where it was held by the House of Lords:

"Nothing is so clear as that all declarations which apply to facts, and even apply to the particular case that is charged, though the intent"—

Mark the words—

"though the intent should make a part of that charge, are evidence against a prisoner, and are not evidence for him, etc."

Upon the citation of that authority and the argument of the case the United States Senate decided, by a vote of nearly 4 to 1, that such a statement made by the respondent could not be proved by the party to whom he made it.

Mr. Higgins said:

I have not had a chance to reply to that. I agree to that law, for that was not a case of residence, nor of domicile nor of citizenship. It was a case of ordinary criminal conduct, where the intent is inferred from the act. But the difference is laid down in the law, that residence is a mixed question of law and fact; that it is made up of action plus intent, and intent plus action, and therefore it is to be differentiated entirely from Hardy's case, and goes back to another class of authorities entirely.

The Presiding Officer said:

Shall the witness be permitted to answer the question. [Putting the question.] In the opinion of the Presiding Officer the "noes" have it. The "noes" have it, and the answer is excluded.

Later, on the same day,[1] Henry G. Swayne was sworn and examined by Mr. Higgins:

Q. Do you recall the time of the passage of the act of Congress curtailing the northern district of Florida?—A. Yes, sir.

[1] Record, p. 3153.

Q. July, 1894. Where were your father and family residing at that time?—A. St. Augustine, Fla.

Q. You were not there that year?—A. I was there at that time; that summer.

Q. State what you know as to any facts or acts of Judge Swayne with reference to making his residence at Pensacola.—A. Immediately after the passage of the act, or within a few days thereafter, he left the home in St. Augustine and went to Pensacola, declaring that he was——

Mr. Manager Perkins having interposed, Mr. Higgins said:

I offer to prove by this witness what the judge declared at the time; and I should like to know if the manager objects.

Mr. Manager PERKINS. We object. That is easily answered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Presiding Officer understands that counsel propose to prove the declaration of Judge Swayne made at the time when he left his home in St. Augustine as to where he was going to make his home. * * * The Presiding Officer thinks that may be done. If any Senator desires, he will submit the question to the Senate. * * * This is a declaration made at the time he left his home in St. Augustine as to where he intended to take up his home on leaving the St. Augustine home. * * * If any Senator desires, the Presiding Officer will submit the question to the Senate. [A pause.] The Presiding Officer thinks it part of the res gestæ. The Presiding Officer understands that the witness is about to testify to a statement made by Judge Swayne at the time he was giving up his home in St. Augustine; and that the Presiding Officer thinks the witness may state.

Mr. HIGGINS. Please proceed.

A. The statement in full which was made by Judge Swayne at the time, as I recollect it, was that the bill dividing the district or redistricting the State, whichever it was, had just passed Congress and been signed by the President, and that he would be compelled to make his residence within the boundaries of his district, and that he was going to go to Pensacola; and with that declaration he left St. Augustine that summer in the month of July. I was there, having gone down after my collegiate year was over, from Philadelphia, and I, with the other members of the family——

2240. By a majority of one the Senate, in the Johnson trial, sustained the Chief Justice's ruling that evidence as to respondent's declaration of intent, made at the time of the act, was admissible.—On April 13, 1868,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Reverdy Johnson, a Senator from Maryland, asked for the recall as a witness of Gen. William T. Sherman, and General Sherman having taken the stand, Mr. Johnson proposed in writing this question:

When the President tendered to you the office of Secretary of War ad interim on the 27th of January, 1868, and on the 31st of the same month and year, did he, at the very time of making such tender, state to you what his purpose in so doing was?

Mr. Manager John A. Bingham objected to the question as incompetent, in accordance with the rulings of the Senate heretofore made.

The question being taken without argument, "Is the question admissible?" there appeared yeas 26, nays 22. So the question was admitted.

And the witness replied, "Yes."

Thereupon Mr. Reverdy Johnson proposed this question:

If he did, state what he said his purpose was.

Mr. Manager Bingham objected to the question, since it was incompetent for the accused to make his own declarations evidence for himself.

The Chief Justice[1] said:

The Chief Justice has already said upon a former occasion that he thinks that, for the purpose of proving the intent, this question is admissible; and he thinks, also, that it comes within the rule which has been adopted by the Senate as a guide for its own action. This is not an ordinary court, but it is a court composed largely of lawyers and gentlemen of great experience in the business transactions of life, and they are quite competent to determine upon the effect of any evidence which may be submitted to them; and the Chief Justice thought that the rule which the Senate adopted for itself was founded on this fact; and in accordance with that rule, by which he determined the question submitted on Saturday, he now determines this question in the same way.

Messrs. Managers Bingham and Butler asked if this was not the same question ruled on Saturday, April 11.

The Chief Justice said:

The Chief Justice does not say that. What he does say is, that it is a question of the same general import, to show the intent of the President during these transactions. The Secretary will read the question again.

* * * * * * *

Senators, you who are of opinion that the question just read, "If he did, state what he said his purpose was," is admissible, and should be put to the witness, will, as your names are called, answer yea; those of a contrary opinion, nay. The Secretary will call the roll.

And the vote being taken, there appeared yeas 26, nays 25. So the question was admitted.

2241. Declarations of the respondent made during the act were admitted to rebut evidence of other declarations, made also during the act, but on a different day.

Instance wherein, during the introduction of evidence, an objection withdrawn by a manager was renewed by a Senator.

On February 15, 1805,[2] in the high court of impeachments during the trial of the case of United States v. Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, William Marshall was sworn as a witness on behalf of the respondent. During the examination of this witness Mr. Robert G. Harper, counsel for the respondent, asked a question to which objection was made by Mr. Joseph H. Nicholson, of Maryland, one of the managers.

After consultation Mr. Nicholson withdrew the objection, whereupon it was renewed by a member of the court.

Thereupon Mr. Harper, in behalf of the respondent, made the following motion:

Testimony on the part of the prosecution, tending to show from the declarations of the respondent that he had a corrupt intention to pack a jury for the trial of Callender, having been given, he offers in evidence other declarations of his, made during the proceedings, but on a different day, for the purpose of rebutting the former testimony, and of showing that his intentions, in that respect, were pure and even favorable to Mr. Callender.

Thereupon the President[3] said:

This evidence is consented to by the managers. The question is, "Shall it be, on such consent, examined by the court?"

And the question was determined in the affirmative, yeas 32, nays 2.

2242. In the Johnson trial the Senate sustained the Chief Justice in admitting as showing intent, on the principle of res gestæ, evidence of respondent's verbal statement of the act to his Cabinet.—On April 17, 1868,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Gideon Welles, Secretary of the Navy, was sworn and examined as a witness by counsel for the respondent, and testified that he attended a meeting of the Cabinet on the afternoon of February 21 last. At this meeting, after the departmental business had been concluded, and as they were about to separate, the President made a statement.

Objection as to testimony of what the President said being intimated by the managers for the House of Representatives, Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the respondent, made this offer of proof:

We offer to prove that on this occasion the President communicated to Mr. Welles and the other members of his Cabinet, before the meeting broke up, that he had removed Mr. Stanton and appointed General Thomas Secretary of War ad interim, and that upon the inquiry by Mr. Welles whether General Thomas was in possession of the office the President replied that he was; and upon further question of Mr. Welles whether Mr. Stanton acquiesced the President replied that he did; all that he required was time to remove his papers.

Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler at once objected.

Mr. President and Senators, as it seems to us, this does not come within any possible proposition of law to render it admissible. It is now made certain that this act was done without any consultation of his Cabinet by the President, whether that consultation was to be held verbally, as I think is against the constitutional provision, or whether the theory is to be adopted that the President has a right to consult with his Cabinet upon questions of his conduct.

Mr. Manager Butler proceeded to discuss the constitution and functions of the President's Cabinet, holding that strictly the President might only require written opinions of the heads of Departments.

Continuing as to the competency of the evidence, Mr. Butler said:

Now, the question is, after he has done the act, after he has thought it was successful, after he thought Mr. Stanton had yielded the office, can he, by his narration of what he had done and what he intended to do, shield himself before a tribunal from the consequences of that act? It is not exactly the same question which you decided yesterday by almost unexampled unanimity in the case of Mr. Perrin and Mr. Selye, the Member of Congress, on that same day, a few minutes earlier or a few minutes later? They offered in evidence here what he told Mr. Perrin and what he told Mr. Selye; they complicated it by the fact that Mr. Selye was a Member of Congress; and the Senate decided by a vote which indicated a very great strength of opinion that that sort of narration could not be put in.

Now, is this any more than narration? It was not to take the advice of Mr. Welles as to what he should do in the future, or upon any question; it was mere information given to Mr. Welles or to the other members of the Cabinet after they had separated in their Cabinet consultation, and while they were meeting together as any other citizens might meet. It would be as if, after you adjourned here, some question should be attempted to be put in as to the action of the Senate because the Senators had not left the room. Again, I say it was simply a narration, and that narration of his intent and purposes, his thoughts, expectations, and feelings.

I do not propose to argue it further until I hear something showing why we are to distinguish this case from the case of Mr. Perrin, on which you voted yesterday. Mr. Perrin tells you that on the 22d he waited for the Cabinet meeting to break up, and as soon as it broke up he went in with Mr Selye, and then the President undertook to tell him. You said that was no evidence. Now, when he undertook to tell Mr. Welles is that any more evidence? I can not distinguish the cases, and I desire to hear them distinguished before I attempt an answer to any such distinction.

* * * * * * *

It is said that it is an official act. I had supposed up to this moment—aye, and I suppose now—that there is no act that can be called an official act of an officer which is not an act required by some law or some duty imposed upon that officer. Am I right in my ideas of what is an official act? It is not every volunteer act by an officer that is official. Frequently such acts are officious, not official. An official act, allow me to say, is an act which the law requires, or a duty which is enjoined upon the officer by some law, or some regulation, or in some manner as a duty. Will the learned counsel tell the Senate what constitutional provision, what statute provision, what practice of the Government requires the President at any time to inform his Cabinet or any member of them whatever that he has removed one man and put in another, and that that other man is in office? If there is any such law, it has escaped my attention. I am not aware of it.

* * * * * * *

Now, then, what is offered? Stanton has been removed by the act of the President; and thereupon, without asking advice—because that is expressly waived by the learned counsel last addressing us—not as a matter of advice, the President gives information. Now, how can that information be evidence? How can he make it evidence? The information is required by no law, was given for no purpose to carry out any official duty, was the mere narration of what the President chose to narrate at that time.

Mr. Evarts, in behalf of the respondent, argued:

Now, then, it stands thus: That at a Cabinet meeting held on Friday, the 21st of February, when the routine business of the different Departments was over, and when it was in order for the President to communicate to his Cabinet whatever he desired to lay before them, the President did communicate this fact of the removal of Mr. Stanton and the appointment of General Thomas ad interim, and that thereupon his Cabinet officers inquired as to the posture in which the matter stood, and as to the situation of the office and of the conduct of the retiring officer. Here we get rid of the suggestion that it is a mere communication to a casual visitor which made the staple of the argument yesterday against the introduction of the evidence as to the conversation with Mr. Perrin and Mr. Selye. We now present you the communication made by the President of the United States while this act was in the very process of execution, while it was yet, as we say in law, in fieri, being done.

It being in fieri, the President communicates the fact how this public transaction has been performed and is going on, and we are entitled to that as a part of the res gestæ in its sense of a governmental act, with all the benefit that can come from it in any future consideration you are to give to the matter as bearing upon the merits and the guilt or innocence of the President in the premises. It bears, as we say, directly upon the question whether there had been any other purpose than the placing of the office in a proper condition for the public service according to the announcement of the President as his intention when he conversed with General Sherman in the January preceding; and it negatives all idea that at the time that General Thomas to Mr. Wilkeson or to the Dakota Delegate, Mr. Burleigh, was saying or suggesting anything of force, the President was the author of, or was responsible for, his statements. The truth is, it presents the transaction as wholly and completely an orderly and peaceful movement of the President of the United States, as, in fact, it was, and no evidence has been given to the contrary, of any occurrence disturbing that peaceful order and as the situation in which its completion left the matter in the mind of the President up to that point of time.

Mr. Benjamin R. Curtis, also of counsel for the respondent, added:

We are anxious that this testimony now offered should be distinguished in the apprehension of the Senate, as it is in our own, from an offer of advice, or from the giving of advice by the Cabinet to the President. We do not place our application for the admission of this evidence upon the ground that it is an act of giving advice by his councilors to the President. We place it upon the ground that this was an official act done by the President himself when he made a communication to his councilors concerning this change which he had made in one of their number; that that was strictly and purely an official act of the President, done in a proper manner, the subject-matter of which each of those councilors was interested in in his public capacity, and which it was proper or the President to make known to them at the earliest moment when he could make such a communication.

Mr. Curtis further reviewed the constitutional history of the Cabinet to show that the practice was for the President to rely on the Cabinet, both for consultation and decision, finally saying as to his remarks in making this review:

They are pertinent to the question now under consideration, for they go to show that under the Constitution and laws of the United States as practiced on by every President, including General Washington and Mr. Adams, Cabinet ministers were assembled by them as a council for the purposes of consultation and decision, and of course, when thus assembled, a communication made to them by the President of the United States concerning an important official act which was then in fieri, in process of being executed and not yet completed, is itself an official act of the President, and we submit to the Senate that we have a right to prove it in that character.

The Chief Justice [1] said at the conclusion of the arguments:

Senators, the Chief Justice thinks that this evidence is admissible. It has, as he thinks, important relation to the res gestæ, the very transaction which forms the basis of several of the articles of impeachment, and he thinks it also entirely proper to take into consideration in forming an enlightened judgment upon the intent of the President. He will put the question to the Senate if any Senator desires it.

Mr. Aaron H. Cragin, a Senator from New Hampshire, asked that the evidence excluded in the case of Witness Perrin [2] be read. This having been done, Mr. Jacob M. Howard, a Senator from Michigan, proposed this question:

In what way does the evidence the counsel for the accused now offer meet any of the allegations contained in the impeachment?

How does it affect the gravamen of any one of the charges?

To this Mr. Evarts responded:

The Senators will perceive that this question anticipates a very extensive field of inquiry—first as to what the gravamen of all these articles is, and, secondly, as to what shall finally be determined to be the limits of law and fact that properly press upon the issues here; but it is enough to say, probably, as we have every desire to meet the question with all the intelligence that we can command, at the present stage of the matter, without going into these anticipations, that it bears upon the question of the intent with which this act was done, as being a qualification of the act in the President's mind at the time he announces it as complete. It bears on the conspiracy articles and it bears upon the eleventh article, even if it should be held that the earlier articles, upon the mere removal of Mr. Stanton and the appointment of General Thomas, are to cease in the point of their inquiry, intent, and all with the consummation of the acts.

The Chief Justice thereupon said:

The Chief Justice will restate to the Senate the question as it presents itself to his mind. The question yesterday had reference to the intention of the President, not in relation to the removal of Mr. Stanton, as the Chief Justice understood it, but in relation to the immediate appointment of a successor by sending in the nomination of Mr. Ewing. The question to-day relates to the intention of the President in the removal of Mr. Stanton; and it relates to a communication made to his Cabinet after the departmental business had closed, but before the Cabinet had separated. The Chief Justice is clearly of opinion that this is a part of the transaction and that it is entirely proper to take this evidence into consideration as showing the intent of the President in his acts The Secretary will call the roll.

The question being taken, there appeared, yeas 26, nays 23. So the evidence was admitted.

[2] See sec. 2244 of this work.

2243. It was decided in the Chase trial that declarations of the respondent after the act might not be admitted to show the intent.—On February 15, 1805,[1] in the high court of impeachment, during the trial of the case of United States v. Samuel Chase, an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, Mr. Joseph Hopkinson, counsel for the respondent, asked of Edward J. Coale, the witness under examination, the following question:

At the time Judge Chase desired you to make the copy in your hand, did he, or did he not, explain to you his reasons or motives for drawing up the paper from which this copy was made? If yes, what were they?

Mr. Joseph H. Nicholson, of Maryland, one of the managers, objected to the question.

At the suggestion of the President[2] the question was reduced to writing.

Mr. Hopkinson said he thought such questions perfectly legal when they went to show the intention of the accused. "We have heard," said he, "much of the quo animo, and it is perfectly clear that the intention constitutes the guilt of the offense."

Mr. Nicholson said:

The quo animo is to be collected from the acts of the party. The evidence of his declaration may be shown to prove the quo animo. But I do not consider it to be correct that Judge Chase shall be permitted to give in evidence declarations made at any other time than that when we have stated he made them; otherwise it will always lay in the discretion of the party accused to state declarations made at another time by him for the purpose of justifying any acts he may have committed.

Mr. Luther Martin, counsel for the respondent, said he had ever considered the declaration of the party at the time he was charged with committing a criminal act as competent evidence to show his innocence.

Mr. Nicholson said there was no doubt of it, but that he was not charged with drawing out the paper as a criminal act. Any declaration made by Judge Chase at the time he delivered the opinion of the court may be given in evidence, but any other declarations have nothing to do with the case.

The President said:

Where was the conversation between the judge and yourself?
Mr. COALE. At the judge's lodgings.

The question was then taken—

Is it competent for the counsel for the respondent to put said question to the witness?

And it was determined in the negative, yeas 9, nays 25.

2244. In the Johnson trial the Senate ruled out evidence as to respondent's declarations of intent made after the act.

Comment of the Chief Justice on the Senate's decisions on evidence as to respondent's declarations at or near the time of the act.

On April 16, 1868,[3] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Edwin O. Perrin was sworn and examined by counsel on behalf of the respondent. Mr. Perrin testified to an interview which he had with the President in company with Mr. Selye, a Congressman, on the evening of February 21, 1868.

Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the respondent, asked:

Did you then hear from the President of the removal of Mr. Stanton?

Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler at once entered an objection, which caused the counsel for respondent to submit in writing the following:

We offer to prove that the President then stated that he had issued an order for the removal of Mr. Stanton and the employment of General Thomas to perform the duties ad interim; that thereupon Mr. Perrin said: "Supposing Mr. Stanton should oppose the order." The President replied: "There is no danger of that, for General Thomas is already in the office." He then added: "It is only a temporary arrangement; I shall send in to the Senate at once a good name for the office."

Mr. Manager Butler said:

I find it, Mr. President and Senators, my duty to object to this. There is no end to declarations of this sort. The admission of those to Sherman and to Thomas was advocated on the ground that the office was tendered to them and that it was a part of the res gestæ. This is mere narration, mere statement of what he had done and what he intended to do. It never was evidence and never will be evidence in any organized court, so far as any experience in court has taught me. I do not see why you limit it. If Mr. Perrin, who says that he has heretofore been on the stump, can go there and ask him questions, and the answers can be received, why not anybody else? If Mr. Selye could go there, why not everybody else? Why could he not make declarations to every man, aye, and woman, too, and bring them in here, as to what he intended to do and what he had done to instruct the Senate of the United States in their duties sitting as a high court of impeachment?

And Mr. Manager James F. Wilson added:

Mr. President, as this objection is outside of any former ruling of the Senate, and is perfectly within the rule laid down in Hardy's case, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to that rule again, not for the purpose of entering upon any considerable discussion, but to leave this objection under that rule to the decision of the Senate:

"Nothing is so clear as that all declarations which apply to facts, and even apply to the particular case that is charged, though the intent should make a part of that charge, are evidence against a prisoner, and are not evidence for him, because the presumption upon which declarations are evidence is that no man would declare anything against himself unless it were true; but every man, if he was in a difficulty, or in the view to any difficulty, would make declarations for himself." (24 State Trials, p. 1096.)

If this offer of proof does not come perfectly within that rule, then I never met a case within my experience that would come within its provisions. I leave this objection to the decision of the Senate upon that rule.

In behalf of the admission of the evidence Mr. Evarts said:

It will be observed that this was an interview between the President of the United States and a Member of Congress, one of "the grand inquest of the nation," holding, therefore, an official duty and having access, by reason of his official privilege, to the person of the President; that at this hour of the day the President was in the attitude of supposing, upon the report of General Thomas, that Mr. Stanton was ready to yield the office, desiring only the time necessary to accommodate his private convenience, and that he then stated to these gentlemen: "I have removed Mr. Stanton and appointed General Thomas ad interim," which was their first intelligence of the occurrence; that upon the suggestion, "Will there not be trouble or difficulty?" the President answered (showing thus the bearing on any question of threats or purpose of force as to be imputed to him from the declarations that General Thomas was making at about the same hour to Mr. Wilkeson) that there was no occasion for or "no danger of that, as General Thomas was already in." Then, as to the motive or purpose entertained by the President at the time of this act of providing anybody that should control the War Department or the military appropriations, or by combination with the Treasury Department suck the public funds, or to have,

though I regret to repeat the words as used by the honorable manager, a tool or a slave to carry on the office to the detriment of the public service, we propose to show that at the very moment he asserts, "This is but a temporary arrangement; I shall at once send in a good name for the office to the Senate."

Now, you will perceive that this bears upon the President's condition of purpose in this matter, both in respect to any force as threatened or suggested by anybody else being imputable to him at this time, and upon the question of whether this appointment of General Thomas had any other purpose than what appeared upon its face, a nominal appointment, to raise the question of whether Mr. Stanton would retire or not, and determined, as it seemed to be for the moment, by the acquiescence of Mr. Stanton, was then only to be maintained until a name was sent in to the Senate, as by proof hitherto given we have shown was done on the following day before 1 o'clock.

At the conclusion of argument the Chief Justice[1] said:

Senators, the Chief Justice is unable to determine the precise extent to which the Senate regards its own decision as applicable. He has understood the decision to be that, for the purpose of showing intent, evidence may be given of conversations with the President at or near the time of the transaction. It is said that this evidence is distinguishable from that which has been already introduced. The Chief Justice is not able to distinguish it; but he will submit directly to the Senate the question whether it is admissible or not.

The question being taken on the admission of the testimony, there appeared, yeas 9, nays 37. So the evidence was excluded.

2245. In the Johnson trial the Chief Justice ruled that an official message transmitted after the act was not admissible as evidence to show intent.—On April 15, 1868,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, during the presentation of evidence on behalf of the respondent, Mr. Benjamin R. Curtis, of counsel, offered a message of the President to the Senate of the United States, bearing date February 24, 1868.

Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of the managers for the House of Representatives, objected to the admission of the message as evidence, since it was virtually a declaration of the President after he was impeached, and that could not be evidence Mr. Butler stated that the record as to the impeachment was:

That on the 21st of February a resolution was proposed for impeachment and referred to a committee, on the 22d the committee reported, and that was debated through the 22d and into Monday, the 24th, and the actual vote was taken on Monday, the 24th.

Arguing in support of the objection, Mr. John A. Bingham, of Ohio, one of the managers, said as to the message:

Is it any more than a volunteer declaration of the criminal, after the fact, in his own behalf? Does it alter the case in law? Does it alter the case in the reason or judgment of any man living, either within the Senate or out of the Senate, that he chose to put his declaration in his own defense in writing? The law makes no such distinctions. I undertake to assert it here, regardless of any attempt to contradict my statement, that there is no law that enables any accused criminal, after the fact, to make declarations, either orally or in writing, either by message to the Senate or a speech to a mob, to acquit himself or to affect in any manner his criminality before the tribunals of justice, or to make evidence which shall be admitted under any form of law upon his own motion to justify his own criminal conduct.

I do not hesitate to say that every authority which the gentlemen can bring into court regulating the rule of evidence in procedures of this sort is directly against the proposition, and for the simple reason that it is a written declaration made by the accused voluntarily, after the fact, in his own behalf.

[2] Second session Fortieth Congress, Senate Journal, p. 898; Globe supplement, pp. 175–178.

Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the President, argued that as the managers had been permitted to put in evidence a resolution of the Senate passed on February 21, and declaring that the President had exceeded his powers, the counsel for the respondent should be permitted to put in the message, which was an answer to that resolution. Mr. Evarts said:

Now, if the crime [the removal of Secretary Stanton] was completed on the 21st of February, which is not only the whole basis of this argument of the learned managers, but of every other argument upon the evidence that I have had the honor of hearing from them, I should like to know what application or relevancy the resolution passed by the Senate on the 21st of February, after the act of the President had been completed, and after that act had been communicated to the Senate, has on the issue of whether that act was right or wrong? And if the fact that it is an expression of opinion relieves the testimony from the possibility of admission, what was this but an expression of the opinion of the Senate of the United States in the form of a resolution regarding a past act of the President? There could be, then, no single principle of the law of evidence upon which this fact put in proof in behalf of the managers could be admitted, except as a communication from this branch of the Government to the President of the United States of its own opinion concerning the legality of his action; and in the same line and in immediate reply the President communicates to the Senate of the United States, openly and in a proper message, his opinions concerning the legality of the act. What would be thought of the Government that, in a criminal prosecution, by way of inculpating a prisoner, should give in evidence what a magistrate or a sheriff had said to him concerning the crime imputed, and then shut the mouth of the prisoner as to what he had said then and there in reply? Why, the only possibility, the only argument for affecting the prisoner with criminality for what had been said to him, was that, unreplied to, it might be construed into admission or submission; and to say that the prisoner when told, "You stole that watch," could not give in evidence his reply, "It was my own watch, and I took it because it was mine," is precisely the same proposition that is being applied here by the learned managers to this communication back and forth between the Senate and the President.

The arguments being concluded, the Chief Justice[1] said:

There is, perhaps, Senators, no branch of the law in which it is more difficult to lay down precise rules than that which relates to evidence of the intent with which an act is done. In the present case it appears that the Senate, on the 21st of February, passed a resolution, which I will take the liberty of reading:

"Whereas the Senate have received and considered the communication of the President stating that he has removed Edwin M Stanton, Secretary of War, and had designated the Adjutant-General of the Army to act as Secretary of War ad interim: Therefore,

"Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That under the Constitution and laws of the United States the President has no power to remove the Secretary of War and to designate any other officer to perform the duties of the office ad interim."

That resolution was adopted on the 21st of February, and was served, as the evidence before you shows, on the evening of the same day The message which is now proposed to be introduced was sent to the Senate on the 24th day of February. It does not appear to the Chief Justice that the resolution of the Senate called for an answer, or that there was any call upon the President to answer from the Senate itself, and therefore he must regard the message which was sent to the Senate on the 24th of February as a vindication of the President's act addressed by him to the Senate; and it does not appear to the Chief Justice to come within any of the rules which have been applied to the introduction of evidence upon this trial. He will, however, take pleasure in submitting the question to the Senate if any Senator desires it. [After a pause.] If no Senator desires that the question be submitted to the Senate, the Chief Justice rules the evidence to be inadmissible.

[1] Salmon P. Chase, of Ohio, Chief Justice.

2246. The Chief Justice was sustained in admitting during the Johnson trial evidence of an act after the fact as showing intent.

Evidence of declarations of respondent after the fact was excluded in the Johnson trial, although related to an act admitted in proof to show intent.

On April 16, 1868,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Walter S. Cox, an attorney at law residing in the District of Columbia, was called as a witness on behalf of the respondent. The witness having stated that he was connected professionally with the case of Gen. Lorenzo Thomas, who had been arrested on a warrant based on an affidavit of Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, Mr. Benjamin R. Curtis, of counsel for the respondent, asked:

When and under what circumstances did your connection with that matter begin?

To this question Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler objected on the ground of irrelevancy.

The Chief Justice[2] said:

The Chief Justice sees no objection to the question as an introductory question, but will submit it to the Senate if it is desired. [After a pause, to the witness.] You can answer the question.

The witness stated that he was sent for on February 22, and went to the President's House, where he saw the President about 5 p. m. Witness was about to relate what the President said, when Mr. Manager Butler interposed an objection.

This produced from the counsel for the respondent the following written offer:

We offer to prove that Mr. Cox was employed professionally by the President, in the presence of General Thomas, to take such legal proceedings in the case that had been commenced against General Thomas as would be effectual to raise judicially the question of Mr. Stanton's legal right to continue to hold the office of Secretary for the Department of War against the authority of the President, and also in reference to obtaining a writ of quo warranto for the same purpose; and we shall expect to follow up this proof by evidence of what was done by the witness in pursuance of the above employment.

Mr. Manager Butler at once objected.

In the course of the arguments Mr. Manager James F. Wilson thus stated the substance of the objection:

Now, I submit to this honorable body that no act, no declaration of the President made after the fact, can be introduced for the purpose of explaining the intent with which he acted. And upon this question of intent let me direct your minds to this consideration—the issuing of the orders referred to constitute the body of the crime with which the President stands charged. Did he purposely and willfully issue an order to remove the Secretary of War? Did he purposely and willfully issue an order appointing Lorenzo Thomas Secretary of War ad interim? If he did thus issue the orders, the law raises the presumption of guilty intent, and no act done by the President after these orders were issued can be introduced for the purpose of rebutting that intent. The orders themselves were in violation of the terms of the tenure of office act. Being in violation of that act, they constitute an offense under and by virtue its provisions, and the offense thus being established must stand upon the intent which controlled the action of the President at the time that he issued the orders. If, after this subject was introduced into the House of Representatives, the President became alarmed at the state of affairs, and concluded that it was best to attempt by some means to secure a decision of the court upon the question of the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of the tenure of office act, it can not avail him in this case. We are inquiring as to the intent which controlled and directed the action of the President at the time the act was done; and if we succeed in establishing that intent, either by proof or by presumption of law, no subsequent act can interfere with it or remove from him the responsibility which the law places upon him because of the act done.

Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the respondent, argued:

Mr. Chief Justice and Senators, we have here the oft-repeated argument that the crime against the act of Congress was complete by the papers drawn and delivered by the President; that the law presumes that those papers were made with the intent that appears on their face, which, it is alleged, is a violation of that act; and as that would be enough in an indictment against the President of the United States to affect him with a punishment, in the discretion of the judge, of six cents fine, so by peremptory necessity it becomes in this court a complete and perfect crime under the Constitution, which must require his removal from office, and that anything beyond the intent that the papers should accomplish what they tend to accomplish is not the subject of inquiry here. Well, it is the subject of imputation in the articles; it is the subject of the imputation in the arguments; it is the subject, and the only subject, that gives gravity to this trial, that there was a purpose of injury to the public interest and to the public safety in this proceeding.

Now, we seek to put this prosecution in its proper place on this point, and to show that our intent was no violence, no interruption of the public service, no seizure of the military appropriations, nothing but the purpose by this movement either to procure Mr. Stanton's retirement, as was desired, or to have the necessary footing for judicial proceedings. If this evidence is excluded, then, when you come to the summing up of this cause, you must take the crime of the dimensions and of the completeness that is here avowed, and I shall be entitled before this court and before this country to treat this accusation as if the article had read that he issued that order for Mr. Stanton's retirement, and that direction to General Thomas to take charge ad interim, with the intent and purpose of raising a case for the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States between the Constitution and the act of Congress; and if such an article had been produced by the House of Representatives and submitted to the Senate it would have been a laughingstock of the whole country.

The gentlemen shall not make their arguments and escape from them at the same breath. I offer this evidence to prove that the whole purpose and intent of the President of the United States in his action in reference to the occupancy of the office of Secretary of War had this extent and no more—to obtain a peaceable delivery of that trust from one holding it at pleasure to the Chief Executive, or, in the absence of that peaceable retirement, to have a case for the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States; and if the evidence is excluded you must treat every one of these articles as if the intent were limited to an open averment in the articles themselves that the intent of the President was such as I propose to prove it.

At the conclusion of the arguments, the Chief Justice[1] said:

Senators, the counsel for the President offer to prove that the witness, Mr. Cox, was employed professionally by the President in the presence of General Thomas to take such legal proceedings in the case that had been commenced against General Thomas as would be effectual to raise judicially the question of Mr. Stanton's legal right to continue to hold the office of Secretary for the Department of War against the authority of the President, and also in reference to obtaining a writ of quo warranto for the same purpose, and they state that they expect to follow up this proof by evidence of what was done by the witness in pursuance of the above employment. The first article of impeachment, which may, perhaps, for this purpose, be taken as a sample of the rest relating to the same subject, after charging that "Andrew Johnson, President of the United States," in violation of the Constitution and laws, issued the order which has been so frequently read for the removal of Mr. Stanton, proceeds:

"Which order was unlawfully issued with intent then and there to violate the act entitled 'An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices,'" etc.

The article charges, first, that the act was done unlawfully, and then it charges that it was done with intent to accomplish a certain result. That intent the President denies, and it is to establish that denial by proof that the Chief Justice understands this evidence now to be offered. It is evidence of an attempt to employ counsel by the President in the presence of General Thomas. It is the evidence so far of a fact; and it may be evidence also of declarations connected with that fact. This fact and these declarations, which the Chief Justice understands to be in the nature of facts, he thinks are admissible in evidence. The Senate has already, upon a former occasion, decided by a solemn vote that evidence of the declarations by the President to General Thomas and by General Thomas to the President, after this order was sent to Mr. Stanton, were admissible in evidence. It has also admitted evidence of the same effect, on the 22d, offered by the honorable managers. It seems to me that the evidence now offered comes within the principle of those decisions; and, as the Chief Justice has already had occasion to say, he thinks that the principle of those decisions is right, and that they are decisions which are proper to be made by the Senate sitting in its high capacity as a court of impeachment, and composed, as it is, of lawyers and gentlemen thoroughly acquainted with the business transactions of life and entirely competent to judge of the weight of any evidence which may be submitted. He therefore holds the evidence to be admissible, but will submit the question to the Senate, if desired.

Mr. Charles D. Drake, of Missouri, having asked for a vote, on the question "shall the proof offered be admitted?" there appeared yeas 29, nays 21. So the proof was admitted.

The witness then testified as to directions which he received from the President to institute legal proceedings to test General Thomas's right to the office of Secretary of War.

Mr. Curtis, of counsel for the respondent, then asked:

What did you do toward getting out a writ of habeas corpus under the employment of the President?

Mr. Manager Butler having objected, the question was referred to the Senate and decided to be admissible; yeas 27, nays 23.[1]

The witness proceeded to describe his efforts in court, saying finally:

But the counsel who represented the Government, Messrs. Carpenter and Riddle, applied to the judge then for a postponement of the examination——

Mr. Manager Butler having questioned this statement, the Chief Justice said:[2]

It is an account of the general transaction, as the Chief Justice conceives, and comes within the rule. The witness will proceed.

The witness, having related how General Thomas was discharged from court, proceeded:

Immediately after that I went, in company with the counsel whom he had employed, Mr. Merrick, to the President's House, and reported our proceedings and the result to the President. He then urged us to proceed——

Here Mr. Manager Butler interposed an objection, and Mr. Manager John A. Bingham called attention to the fact that this was asking for the President's declarations on February 26, two days after his impeachment.

Mr. Evarts, of counsel for the respondent, explained:

If it is to turn on that point, which has not been discussed in immediate reference to this question, we desire to be heard. The offer which the Chief Justice and Senators will remember was read, and upon which the vote of the Senate was taken for admission, included the efforts to have a habeas corpus proceeding taken, and also the efforts to have a quo warranto. The reasons why, and the time at which, and the circumstances under which, the habeas corpus effort was made, and its termination, have been given. Thereupon the efforts were attempted at the quo warranto. It is in reference to that that the President gave these instructions. We suppose it is covered by the ruling already made.

The Chief Justice said:[1]

The Chief Justice may have misapprehended the intention of the Senate; but he understands their ruling to be in substance this: That acts in respect to the attempt and intention of the President to obtain a legal decision, commencing on the 22d of February, may be pursued to the legitimate termination of that particular transaction; and, therefore, the Senate has ruled that Mr. Cox, the witness, may go on and testify until that particular transaction came to a close. Now, the offer is to prove conversations with the President after the termination of that effort in the supreme court of the District of Columbia. The Chief Justice does not think that is within the intent of the previous ruling; but he will submit the question to the Senate, Senators, you who are of the opinion that this testimony should be received will please say "aye;" those of the contrary opinion, "no." [Putting the question.] The question is determined in the negative. The evidence is not received.

Thereupon Mr. Curtis propounded this question:

After you had reported to the President the result of your efforts to obtain a writ of habeas corpus, did you do any act in pursuance of the original instructions you had received from the President on Saturday, to test the right of Mr. Stanton to continue in the office? And if so, state what the acts were.

The Chief Justice at once intimated that under the last vote of the Senate this question was inadmissible; but Mr. John Sherman, a Senator from Ohio, asked that the fifth article of impeachment be read:

That said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, unmindful of the high duties of his office and of his oath of office, on the 21st day of February, in the year of our Lord 1868, and on divers other days and times in said year, before the 2d day of March, in the year of our Lord 1868, at Washington, in the District of Columbia, did unlawfully conspire with one Lorenzo Thomas, and with other persons to the House of Representatives unknown, to prevent and hinder the execution of an act entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices," passed March 2, 1867, and in pursuance of said conspiracy did unlawfully attempt to prevent Edwin M. Stanton, then and there being Secretary for the Department of War, duly appointed and commissioned under the laws of the United States from holding said office, whereby the said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, did then and there commit and was guilty of a high misdemeanor in office.

Counsel for the respondent stated that the question had reference to this article.

The Chief Justice, having had the original offer of proof on the part of counsel for respondent read, said:

The discussion and the ruling of the Chief Justice in respect to that question was in reference to the first article of the impeachment. Nothing had been said about the fifth article in the discussion, so far as the Chief Justice recollects. The question is now asked with reference to the fifth article and the intent alleged in that article to conspire. The Chief Justice thinks it is admissible with that view under the ruling upon the first offer. He will, however, put the question to the Senate if any Senator desires it.

Mr. John Conness, a Senator from California, having asked for a vote, there appeared in favor of admitting the question 27 yeas, and against it 23 nays.[2] So the question was admitted.

ney at law, was called as a witness on behalf of the respondent. Witness testified that he had been counsel for Gen. Lorenzo Thomas when the latter was arrested on complaint of Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, at the time of the President's attempt to remove Mr. Stanton and place General Thomas in the office; and that after the action of the chief justice of the supreme court of the District in discharging General Thomas, he saw the President and communicated to him what had transpired.

Then Mr. Benjamin R. Curtis, of counsel for the respondent, proposed a question which, after objection, was presented in an offer of proof:

We offer to prove that about the hour of 12 noon, on the 22d of February, upon the first communication to the President of the situation of General Thomas's case, the President or the Attorney-General in his presence gave the attorneys certain directions as to obtaining a writ of habeas corpus for the purpose of testing judicially the right of Mr. Stanton to continue to hold the office of Secretary of War against the authority of the President.

Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler objected that the witness had been General Thomas's counsel and had not been employed by the President. Therefore this witness's testimony could not be considered evidence of the President's acts or declarations after impeachment.

The Chief Justice [1] said:

The Chief Justice thinks this evidence admissible within the rule already determined by the Senate. He will submit the question to the Senate if any Senator desires it. [After a pause.] The witness may answer the question.

Mr. Curtis then proposed this question:

What, if anything, did you and Mr. Cox do in reference to accomplishing the result you have spoken of?

Mr. Manager Butler having objected, the Chief Justice said:

The Chief Justice thinks it is competent, but he will put the question to the Senate if any Senator desires it. [After a pause, to the witness.] Answer the question.

2248. In impeachment trials witnesses are ordinarily required to state facts, not opinions.

In the Johnson trial a witness was not permitted, as a matter of proof of intent, to state that he had formed and communicated an opinion to respondent.

On February 11, 1805,[2] in the high court of impeachments during the trial of the case of United States v. Samuel Chase, and while one Henry Tilghman was under examination, Mr. John Randolph, jr., of Virginia, one of the managers on behalf of the House of Representatives, proposed this question:

You say that when the written opinion of the court was thrown on the table, it produced considerable agitation among the gentlemen of the bar. What did you conceive to be the cause of that agitation?

Mr. Philip B. Key, counsel for the respondent, objected.

[1] Salmon P. Chase, of Ohio, Chief Justice.

[2] Second session Eighth Congress, Senate Impeachment Journal, p. 518; Annals, p. 180.

The President[1] having required the question to be reduced to writing it was read by the Secretary.

Thereupon Mr. James A. Bayard, of Delaware, a Senator, moved that the Senate should withdraw. This motion was then disagreed to.

The question was then put: "Is it competent for the managers to put the said question to the witness?"

It was determined in the negative, yeas 0, nays 34.

2249. On February 12, 1805,[2] in the high court of impeachments during the trial of the case of United States v. Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, a witness, George Hay, being under examination, the following occurred:

The WITNESS. Finding that the judge had made up his mind on that subject, and that the law of Virginia was not considered as obligatory, I had no idea of making any motion to the court founded on the doctrine which he had thus denounced. My opinion before, at that time, and at the present time, the opinion which I expressed officially on a late occasion, is, that where the laws of the United States do not otherwise require or provide——

Mr. Luther Martin, counsel for the respondent, said that he apprehended this testimony was of no kind of consequence.

The WITNESS. I was only about to state the reasons why nothing more was said on that subject, or a motion founded on it.

The PRESIDENT.[3] The Senate object to that sort of testimony. You will please to confine yourself as much as possible to facts.

2250. On April 13, 1868,[4] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Gen. William T. Sherman was called as a witness on behalf of the President, and Mr. Henry Stanbery, of counsel for the President, asked this question:

After the restoration of Mr. Stanton to office, did you form an opinion whether the good of the service required a Secretary of War other than Mr. Stanton; and if so, did you communicate that opinion to the President?

Mr. Manager John A. Bingham at once objected to the question:

Mr. President and Senators, we desire to state very briefly to the Senate the ground upon which we object to this question. It is that matters of opinion are never admissible in judicial proceedings, but in certain exceptional cases, cases involving professional skill, etc.; it is not necessary that I should enumerate them. It is not to be supposed for a moment that there is a Member of the Senate who can entertain the opinion that a question of the kind now presented is competent under any possible circumstances in any tribunal of justice. It must occur to Senators that the ordinary tests of truth can not be applied to it at all; and in saying that, my remark has no relation at all to the truthfulness or veracity of the witness. There is nothing upon which the Senate could pronounce any judgment whatever. Are they to decide a question upon the opinions of forty or forty thousand men what might be for the good of the service? The question involved here is a violation of the laws of the land. It is a question of fact that is to be dealt with by witnesses; and it is a question of law and fact that is to be dealt with by the Senate.

Now, this matter of opinion may just as well be extended one step further, if it is to be allowed at all. After giving his opinion of what might be requisite to the public service, the next thing in order would be the witness's opinion as to the obligations of the law, the restrictions of the law, the prohibitions of the law. We can not suppose that the Senate will entertain such a question for a moment. It must occur to the Senate that by adopting such a rule as this it is impossible to see the limit of the inquiry or the end of the investigation. If it be competent for this witness to deliver this opinion, it is equally competent for forty thousand other men in this country to deliver their opinions to the Senate; and then, when is the inquiry to end? We object to it as utterly incompetent.

Mr. Stanbery explained the object of the question:

Mr. Chief Justice and Senators, if ever there was a case involving a question of intention, a question of conduct, a question as to acts which might be criminal or might be indifferent according to the intent of the party who committed them, this is one of that class. It is upon that question of intent (which the gentlemen know is vital to their case, which they know as well as we know they must make out by some proof or other) that a great deal of their testimony has been offered, whether successfully or not I leave the Senate to determine; but with that view much of their testimony has been offered and has been insisted upon. That is, it has been to show with what intent did the President remove Mr. Stanton. They say the intent was against the public good, in the way of usurpation, to get possession of that War Office and drive out a meritorious officer, and put a tool, or as they say in one of their statements a slave, in his place.

Upon that question of conduct, Senators, what now do we propose to offer to you? That the second officer of the Army—and we do not propose to stop with him—that this high officer of the Army, seeing the complication and difficulty in which that office was, by the restoration of Mr. Stanton to it, formed the opinion himself that for the good of the service Mr. Stanton ought to go out and some one else take the place. Who could be a better judge of the good of the service than the distinguished officer who is now about to speak?

But the gentlemen say what are his opinions more than another man's opinions, if they are merely given as abstract opinions? We do not intend to use them as abstract opinions. The gentlemen did not read the whole question. It is not merely what opinion had you, General Sherman; but having formed that opinion, did you communicate it to the President, that the good of the service required Mr. Stanton to leave that Department; and that in your judgment, acting for the good of the service, some other man ought to be there.

This is no declaration of the President we are upon now. This is a communication made to him to regulate his conduct, to justify him, indeed to call upon him to look to the good of the service, and to be rid, if possible, in some way of that unpleasant complication. Anyone can see there was a complication there that must in some way or other be got rid of; for look at what the managers have put in evidence!

During the arguments Mr. Roscoe Conkling, a Senator from New York, submitted in writing this question:

Question. Do the counsel for the respondent offer at this point to show by the witness that he advised the President to remove Mr. Stanton in the manner adopted by the President, or merely that he advised the President to nominate for the action of the Senate some person other than Mr. Stanton?

Mr. Stanbery replied that counsel for the President did not propose either, but proposed to show that General Sherman gave his opinion for the good of the service, and for that good thought that somebody else ought to be in the office.

The question being submitted to the Senate, "Is the question admissible?" there appeared yeas 15, nays 35. So the question was excluded.

2251. On July 10, 1876,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Gen. William B. Hazen, a witness on behalf of the United States, testified that he had communicated to the Military

[1] First session Forty-fourth Congress, Record of trial, pp. 229, 230.

Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives certain facts in regard to the post tradership at Fort Sill. Thereupon Mr. Manager John A. McMahon asked:

There has been a criticism made upon your communicating this matter to the Military Committee instead of communicating it through the regular channels to the Secretary of War. State your views of that question.

Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, objected, on the ground that it might swear away an argument of the defense; but when the managers stated that a similar question had been put to another witness by Mr. Carpenter and admitted by the court the objection was withdrawn.

Thereupon Mr. George F. Edmunds, a Senator from Vermont, said:

I object to that question myself, if counsel do not. I do not think the time of the court ought to be wasted with that sort of evidence.

Thereupon Mr. Manager McMahon withdrew the question.

2252. It was decided in the Belknap trial that a question to a witness might not be so framed that the answer might imply an opinion.

Instance wherein a President pro tempore ruled on evidence during an impeachment trial.

On July 11, 1876,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Caleb P. Marsh, a witness on behalf of the United States, was examined by Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, who asked this question:

Was there any corrupt agreement or any agreement between you and Mr. Belknap in regard to being appointed post trader at Fort Sill?

Mr. Manager John A. McMahon said:

We object to the word "corrupt." Say "any agreement." I think by using the word "corrupt" you are asking an opinion of the witness. The objection we make is that the question calls for an opinion as to the character of the agreement instead of calling for the agreement itself.

The President pro tempore[2] said:

The Chair sustains the objection.

2253. In the Swayne trial the opinions of witnesses, including answers to questions of mixed law and facts, were excluded.—On February 11, 1905, in[3] the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, a witness, A. H. D'Alemberte, was under examination, when Mr. Manager James B. Perkins, of New York, asked this question:

I ask the witness if Judge Swayne, to his knowledge, was in 1900 to 1903 a resident of the county of which he was collector and in which Pensacola is situated?

Mr. Anthony Higgins, of counsel for respondent, objected, saying:

It is a question of law. We have no objection to the witness stating, but desire to have him state, every fact he knows about the movements or the residence of Judge Swayne, or where he actually or bodily was, but to ask a mere conclusion of law is, we think, improper.

[2] T. W. Ferry, of Michigan, President pro tempore.

[3] Third session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, p. 2394.

The Presiding Officer[1] said:

The question is, Was the respondent, to the witness's knowledge, a resident of Pensacola? The witness may answer the question.

The WITNESS. To my knowledge, he was not.

Q. (By Mr. Manager PERKINS). Was Judge Swayne a resident of Pensacola during that time?

Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, objected, saying:

Mr. President, we are not objecting to their asking this witness whether or not in any particular year, month, week, or day Judge Swayne was in Pensacola. That would be a proper question. It would ask for a fact. But they are asking for a conclusion which can only result from the consideration of many facts related to the law.

The Presiding Officer said:

The witness is asked really for his opinion whether Judge Swayne was a resident at a certain place. If this witness can be so asked, any number of witnesses can be asked the question, and the decision of it would then depend upon the opinion of witnesses.

The question of residence is one of mixed law and fact, and must be determined, as the Presiding Officer thinks, by the Senate upon the proved circumstances and facts of the case and not upon the opinion of witnesses resident in that part of the country. So the question is excluded.

2254. On February 21, 1905,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, a witness, William A. Blount, was under examination by Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, when this question was propounded by Mr. Charles A. Culberson, a Senator from Texas:

Q. What was the manner of Judge Swayne as to anger or resentment in imposing sentence in the contempt proceedings?—A. That depends entirely upon the viewpoint of the man who was listening to him. I believed that he was right. It seemed to me——

Mr. Manager David A. De Armond, of Missouri, said:

Mr. President, I object to that. It is not an answer to the question. The witness is giving an opinion.

The Presiding Officer[1] said:

The witness may state how he regarded the appearance of the judge in imposing this sentence. * * *

The Presiding Officer was about to say that he did not think the witness should make any comment in answering any question as to whether he thought the judge was right or not.

2255. On February 22, 1905,[3] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, a witness for the respondent, Thomas F. McGowin, was examined by Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent:

Q. You heard all that was said?—A. I did; all that the judge said.

Q. Yes; all that the judge said. What was the general appearance of Judge Swayne in the delivery of these remarks?—A. As I recall it, I thought the judge spoke with a little more than ordinary deliberation and calmness and firmness, and the impression that was created on my mind was that——

Mr. Manager Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, said:

Mr. President, I object to the impression created on the witness's mind. What he is entitled to testify to are facts that occurred there at that time.

The Presiding Officer[1] said:

Let the last phrase be stricken out. The witness can not testify to the impression made on his mind.

2256. In the Belknap trial objection was successfully made to an opinion of a subordinate officer as to evidence of the character of respondent's administration.—On July 12, 1876,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Nelson H. Davis, Inspector-General of the Army, was examined as a witness on behalf of the respondent, and Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, having ascertained that witness had been in the Army during respondent's entire administration and had been holding constant official relations with him, asked:

From all you know of the subject, and from all you know of General Belknap, I ask you what has been the general character of his administration of the War Department?

Mr. Manager George A. Jenks at once objected:

The objection I make to that is that a witness must testify to character instead of to the specific acts of this man, or general acts. He must know what has been said by those who are familiar with his administration in that office, instead of how has he done the business.

Mr. Manager George F. Hoar said:

We understand also that it should be the opposite of the particular offense charged. If a man is charged with adultery, his reputation for chastity; if he is charged with perjury, his reputation for veracity. We suppose the question should be, "What is the reputation of the Secretary for official integrity?" * * * We do not understand that it is competent to prove by a subordinate officer in the Army, as an expert, the general character of the administration of a great officer of state. There is no such thing as an expert in such an administration. We object to the question unless it is limited to the reputation of the Secretary for official integrity.

Mr. Carpenter said:

We shall claim when we come to sum up this case that the general management of the War Department by General Belknap is a proper subject of consideration; that if they could establish this particular charge we could still prove the general management and official conduct of the Department, and then appeal to the Senate upon the whole record of the administration of that office whether this man shall be driven out into a little corner of his life or whether his whole conduct in the office is to be considered.

The Senate, without division, decided that the question should be admitted.

2257. A witness was permitted in the Belknap trial to give in answer a conclusion derived from a series of facts.—On July 10, 1876,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Caleb P. Marsh, a witness on behalf of the United States, was examined by the managers and testified as to payments of money to the respondent from remittances received from one Evans, who had been appointed post trader at Fort Sill through witness's efforts in collusion with respondent. The witness had testified to sending remittances to respondent by express, when Mr. Manager John A. McMahon asked:

Did General Belknap know where these moneys came from that you were sending to him?

Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, objected, saying:

I object to that question. That calls for a conclusion, not for a fact. * * * A conclusion may be drawn from a correspondence running through years, and a dozen conversations; but it is a conclusion always. If you ask him what he told General Belknap, or what Belknap ever said to him, that calls for a fact; but to ask him whether he must have known such a thing calls for conclusion.

The question being submitted to the Senate, it was held, without division, to be admissible.

2258. In the Johnson trial the Senate sustained the Chief Justice in admitting as evidence of a general practice tabular statements of documents relating to particular instances.—On April 15, 1868,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Benjamin R. Curtis, of counsel for the respondent, offered in evidence certain certified documents from the Navy Department, being in the nature of tabular statements of the results shown by the records as to appointments and removals of officers. Mr. Curtis described what was offered as follows:

The documents I offer are not full copies of any record. They are, therefore, not strictly and technically legal evidence for any purpose. They are extracts of facts from those records. Allow me, by way of illustration, to read one, so that the Senate may see the nature of the document:

"NAVY AGENCY AT NEW YORK.

"1864, June 20. Isaac Henderson was, by direction of the President, removed from the office of navy agent at New York, and instructed to transfer to Paymaster John D. Gibson, of United States Navy, all the public funds and other property in his charge."

We do not offer that as technically legal evidence of the fact that is there stated; but having in view simply to prove, not the case of Mr. Henderson, with its merits and the causes of his removal, etc., all of which would appear on the records, but the practice of the Government under the laws of the United States; instead of taking from the records the entire documents necessary to exhibit his whole case, we have taken the only fact which is of any importance in reference to this inquiry. If the Senate consider that they must apply the technical rule of evidence, we must get the records and have the records copied, and of course, for the same reason, readmitted.

There was objection on the part of the managers, but after argument the Chief Justice [2] said:

The counsel for the President propose to offer in evidence two documents from the Navy Department, exhibiting the practice which has existed in that Department in respect to removals from office. To the introduction of this evidence the honorable managers object. The Chief Justice thinks that the evidence is competent in substance, but that the question of form is entirely subject to the discretion of the Senate and of the Senate alone. The whole question, therefore, is submitted to the Senate. Senators, you who are of opinion that this evidence should be received will, as your names are called, answer "yea;" those of the contrary opinion, "nay."

And there appeared yeas 36, nays 15. So the document was admitted.

2259. A summary by counsel of the contents of documents was held to be in the nature of argument and not admissible as evidence.—On February 23, 1905,[3] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, in the course of the presentation of evidence, offered certificates from certain clerks of United States circuit courts, showing the dates at which the respondent had held court.

Then Mr. Thurston said:

For the convenience of the court and notification to the managers as to what we claim these certificates show, I will ask to have printed in the Record a list compiled by us from the certificates showing the various dates in a brief and concise form in the nature of a calendar, and also showing our computations of the number of days covered by them.

Mr. Manager Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, objected, saying:

Mr. President I submit that the certificates when printed will show what they contain, and their computation is what we object to.

The Presiding Officer[1] said:

That is a part of the argument, and the Presiding Officer thinks should be withheld until the argument is commenced.

2260. In impeachment trials public documents are admitted in evidence for what they may be worth.

Ruling by the Vice-President as to evidence in an impeachment trial.

On February 15, 1805,[2] in the high court of impeachments during the trial of the case of United States v. Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, Mr. Joseph Hopkinson, counsel for the respondent, offered in evidence a certificate of the clerk of the circuit court of Pennsylvania, to show that at the trial of Fries, in 1799, there were eighty-six civil suits depending.

Also a copy of the indictment on the first trial of Fries.

Also a part of a charge delivered by Judge Iredell at the term when Fries was tried, taken from Carpenter's report of that trial, page 14.

Mr. George W. Campbell, of Tennessee, one of the managers, intimating some objection to receiving this paper in evidence,

The President[3] said it might be read as a report of the case; but what credit it would deserve it would be for the court to determine.

2261. On January 11, 1831,[4] in the high court of impeachments during the trial of the cause of The United States v. James H. Peck, the counsel for the respondent introduced as a witness Samuel D. King, a clerk in the General Land Office, to prove certain official records of that office relating to land grants in the Province of Louisiana.

The respondent was on trial for unlawfully oppressing Luke E. Lawless, whom he had imprisoned for contempt in criticising in the public prints the action of respondent as judge in a case relating to a land grant.

Mr. James Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, chairman of the managers for the House of Representatives, objected to the introduction of the documents, alleging that they referred to land grants in a portion of the territory different from that in which the case in question had arisen, and that they did not show the practice in upper Louisiana, which was the region to which the pending trial related.

Mr. Jonathan Meredith, counsel for the respondent, said:

We produce it as a public document from the proper repository. It purports to be a genuine document, and it shows, as we shall contend, that the same regulations applied to the whole province.

On the question, "Shall these documents be given in evidence?" there appeared yeas 40, nays 0.

Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler objected:

The difficulty that I find with this message, Senators, is, that it is the message of Mr. Buchanan, and can not be put in evidence any more than the declaration of anybody else. We should like to have Mr. Buchanan brought here under oath, and to cross-examine him as to this.

The question being taken, the Senate decided, without division, that the evidence should be admitted.

2263. In the Johnson trial the managers were not required, in submitting a letter of respondent, to also submit accompanying but not necessarily pertinent documents.—On April 2, 1868,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Manager James F. Wilson, of Iowa, offered in evidence a certain letter of President Johnson to Gen. U. S. Grant, wherein were two portions referring to accompanying documents:

GENERAL: The extraordinary character of your letter of the 3d instant would seem to preclude any reply on my part; but the manner in which publicity has been given to the correspondence of which that letter forms a part and the grave questions which are involved induce me to take this mode of giving, as a proper sequel to the communications which have passed between us, the statements of the five members of the Cabinet who were present on the occasion of our conversation on the 14th ultimo. Copies of the letters which they have addressed to me upon the subject are accordingly herewith inclosed.

There were five Cabinet officers present at the conversation, the detail of which, in my letter of the 28th ultimo, you allow yourself to say, contains "many and gross misrepresentations." These gentlemen heard that conversation and have read my statement. They speak for themselves, and I leave the proof without a word of comment.

Mr. Wilson stated in introducing the letter that the special object of the managers in introducing it was to show the President's own declaration of an intent to prevent the Secretary of War, Mr. Stanton, from resuming the duties of the office, notwithstanding the action of the Senate and the requirements of the tenure of office bill.

Mr. Henry Stanbery, of counsel for the President, entered an objection which was, by direction of the Chief Justice, reduced to writing, as follows:

The counsel for the President object that the letter is not in evidence in the case unless the honorable managers shall also read the inclosures therein referred to and by the letter made part of the same.

In support of the objection, Mr. Stanbery argued:

The managers read a letter from the President to use against him certain statements that are made in it, and perhaps the whole; we do not know the object. They say the object is to prove a certain intent with regard to the exclusion of Mr. Stanton from office. In the letter the President refers to certain documents which are inclosed in it as throwing light upon the question and explaining his own views. Now, I put it to honorable Senators: Suppose he had copied these letters in the body of his letter, and had said just as he says here, "I refer you to these; these are part of my communication," could any one doubt that these copies, although they come from other persons, would be admissible? He makes them his own. He chooses to use them as explanatory of his letter. He is not willing to let that letter go alone; he sends along with it certain explanatory matter. Now, you must admit, if he had taken the trouble to copy them himself in the body of his letter, they must be read. Suppose he attaches them, makes them a part, calls them "exhibits," affixes them, attaches them to the letter itself by tape or seal or otherwise, must they not be read as part of the communication, as the very matter which he has introduced as explanatory, without which he is not willing to send that letter? Undoubtedly. Does the form of the thing alter it? Is he not careful to send the documents not in a separate package, not in another communication, but inclosed in the letter itself, so that when the letter is read the documents must be read? It seems to me there can not be a question but that they must read the whole and not merely the letter; for it was the whole that the President sent to be read to give his views, and not merely the letter unconnected with these documents.

Mr. Manager John A. Bingham argued against the objection:

We claim that we are under no obligation by any rule of evidence whatever, in introducing a written statement of the accused, to give in evidence the statements of third persons referred to generally by him in that written statement. In the first place, their statements, we say, would not be evidence against the President at all. They would be hearsay. They would not be the best evidence of what the parties affirmed. The matter contained in the letter of the President shows that the papers, without producing them here, have relation to a question of fact between himself and General Grant, which question of fact, so far as the President is concerned, is affirmed in this letter by himself and for himself, and concludes him; and we insist that if forty members of his Cabinet were to write otherwise it could not affect this question. It concludes him; it is his own declaration; and the matter of dispute between himself and General Grant, although it is referred to in this letter, is no part of the matter upon which we rely in this accusation against the President.

Mr. Bingham admitted that if the letters referred to contained a statement relating to the matter with which they charged the President, and if the letter now sought to be introduced showed a statement from them adopted by the President himself in regard to the matter, the objection of respondent's counsel would be well taken.

The question was taken, "Shall the objection of the counsel by the President to the evidence proposed to be offered be sustained?" and there appeared yeas 20, nays 29.

So the objection was overruled and the letter was admitted as presented.

2264. Instance in the Swayne case wherein a witness was permitted to testify as to the nature of a document which was on record in the trial.

Instance during the Swayne trial wherein the Presiding Officer, contrary to his usual habit, submitted a question of evidence to the Senate at once.

On February 23, 1905,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. Charles A. Culberson, a Senator from Texas, submitted a series of questions to a witness for the respondent, W. A. Blount:

Q. Were you counsel for O'Neal in the contempt proceedings against him before Judge Swayne?—A. I was.

Q. Did you raise a question of jurisdiction of the court in those proceedings? If so, please state such question fully and how it was raised.—A. I raised the question by a demurrer.

[1] Third session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, p. 3147.

Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, said:

Mr. President, while ordinarily we would have no objection to the answer which we anticipate, yet the O'Neal case is all here of record, and objection was made yesterday to our asking the witness Greenhut as to the injury he received and which was exhibited in court at the time of that trial. The objection was based upon the fact that the complete record being here we could not go outside of it. Therefore in return I make the same objection that the record of the O'Neal case shows every proceeding that was had therein, including any objection that may have been taken to the jurisdiction.

Mr. Manager Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, said:

Before that is done, may I make a suggestion? This is a very different matter from the testimony which was sought to be brought out by Greenhut. There the attempt was to prove by him the extent of his injuries in a street combat, with no evidence that the facts as to which he was to testify had been before the court. Our objection was not because of the fact that it was in the record, but that it was proposed to prove something as an excuse for the judge which had not been before him at the trial of the case, while here this witness is asked to testify to what occurred at the trial of the contempt case.

The Presiding Officer[1] said:

Shall the witness answer the question? [Putting the question.] In the opinion of the Presiding Officer the ayes have it. [A pause.] The ayes have it, and the witness will answer.

2265. Instance in the Swayne trial wherein, with the concurrence of counsel, the managers introduced without oral testimony a certified copy of a court record.

In the Swayne trial, evidently by written stipulation between managers and counsel, certified copies of records were used in the same way as the original might have been used.

On February 14, 1905,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. Manager Samuel L. Powers, of Massachusetts, said:

I offer in evidence, Mr. President, a certified copy of the court record in what is known as the "O'Neal case." This record is made up of what is known as the complaint upon which the order of attachment in this contempt case was issued, and also a demurrer to the original complaint, which appears to have been disposed of, and also the affidavit of the respondent, which is an answer to the complaint, together with other documents, showing the disposition of that case.

It has been agreed between counsel for the respondent and the managers that this record may go into evidence without being read before the court. It is very long and would occupy possibly an entire session if it were read. But I assume, Mr. President, in order to have it go into evidence without being read, it is necessary that we should have the permission of the court to do so. So I tender this record with the request that it become a part of the evidence in this case and be printed as such without first being read to the court.

After the presentation of the affidavits, Mr. Augustus O. Bacon, a Senator from Georgia, said:

Mr. President, before the manager proceeds, as he says he will call only one witness, I desire to know whether the affidavits and such other matters as were included in these answers are offered and accepted as evidence without testimony being given from the stand? I simply wish the information.

Mr. Anthony Higgins, of counsel for the respondent, said:

Mr. President, there is no objection on the part of the respondent.

I will state, Mr. President, in respect to that matter, that this is the first trial in this court that I am aware of where a stenographic record of what occurred in another court has been presented here.

[1] Orville H. Platt, of Connecticut, Presiding Officer.

[2] Third session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, pp. 2540, 2551.

In the Peck case, seventy-five years ago, the testimony of what occurred in Judge Peck's court was entirely dependent upon the oral testimony of the witnesses who were present at that trial. It has seemed to counsel for the respondent that they were fortunate in the O'Neal case that a stenographic record had been made and preserved, and that it could be presented here, so that this court would know precisely what had occurred there.

I think therefore it is better that it should go in in that form, even though without the sanction of an oath in this tribunal.

2266. On February 21, 1905,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, William A. Blount, a witness on behalf of the respondent, was under examination by Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, when these questions were asked:

Q. Of the original contempt charge. I ask you now directly as to the other defendant in it, Mr. Paquet.—A. Judge Paquet first appeared in answer to the citation with counsel, and objected to the proceeding upon the ground that Judge Swayne did not have jurisdiction, as the transaction in which counsel were engaged was not an official transaction of an officer of the court. Judge Swayne overruled that contention, and Judge Paquet asked for time in which to make an answer. Thereupon he sued out a writ of prohibition from the circuit court of appeals, which was heard before that court and denied, and then he appeared in the circuit court before Judge Swayne and filed a paper, which was an apology and a purging of the contempt, as I understood, though the paper speaks for itself.

Q. (By Mr. Thurston.) What followed that?—A. Thereupon he was discharged without punishment.

Mr. Thurston then said:

We offer in evidence a certified transcript of that portion of the record in the case, merely asking to have read the paper in which Judge Paquet confessed and purged himself of contempt.

This certified transcript was as follows:

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, NORTHERN DISTRICT OF FLORIDA, AT PENSACOLA—IN THE MATTER OF CONTEMPT PROCEEDINGS AGAINST LOUIS P. PAQUET.

Now comes Louis P. Paquet, respondent in the above-entitled matter, and says:

That upon full and mature consideration of his actions and conduct in the matter referred to in the motion, made as the basis of the above-entitled proceedings, through excessive zeal in behalf of his clients, he did so act that this honorable court was justified in believing that the said actions were committed in contempt thereof and as showing disrespect therefor. That respondent regrets exceedingly the course taken by him in this matter, and now appears in court and requests that he be permitted to apologize for his behavior and file with the records in the above-entitled cause this paper.

Filed March 31, 1902.

IN THE UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, NORTHERN DISTRICT OF FLORIDA—THE UNITED STATES v. LOUIS P. PAQUET.

This cause coming on to be heard, on the application of Louis P. Paquet to withdraw his answer in the above-entitled cause, and the submission of his explanation and apology by the said defendant—

It is now ordered that the said defendant do have leave to withdraw his answer heretofore filed and to subtract the same from the files of this court, and that this court do accept the said apology and statement filed on March 31, 1902, and the said defendant is hereby discharged from the rule to show cause, heretofore granted against him.

Done this April 1, A. D. 1902.

[1] Third session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, pp. 2983, 2984.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Northern District of Florida:

I, F. W. Marsh, clerk of the district court of the United States for the northern district of Florida, hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of an original paper or document filed in the cause therein specified in said court on the day therein set forth, as the same remains of record and on file in said court.

Witness my hand and the seal of said court at the city of Pensacola, in said district, this 3d day of February, A. D. 1905.

[SEAL.] F. W. MARSH, Clerk.

Mr. Manager Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, said:

We object to that paper. It has never appeared in evidence in this case. The original has never been seen, and whether any such paper exists we do not know. We object to this extract from the minority report, because it was never in the case. * * * The first place where that paper ever appeared is in the minority report. It has never been seen by anybody except perhaps the people who made the minority report. I say it was never offered in evidence in any place. I should like to see the original, if you have it.

Mr. Thurston replied:

This is certified to by the clerk of the court as being a part of the record, and I think, if you will permit me, I have in my pocket the stipulation with the managers that certified copies of records may be produced and used in evidence in the same manner that the original documents could be.

The Presiding Officer[1] said:

The Presiding Officer thinks an official copy of the proceedings in court is proper evidence; and as to the other question, whether this is evidence or not, three parties were proceeded against for contempt. It was one proceeding. The action of the court with regard to two of them has been introduced in evidence, and the Presiding Officer thinks that the action of the court in regard to the third of the persons complained of for contempt can properly be admitted.

Instance during the Swayne trial wherein the Presiding Officer, contrary to his usual habit, submitted a question of evidence to the Senate at once.

On February 23, 1905,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, in the course of the introduction of evidence, presented and asked to have incorporated in the Record certain extracts from the official debates of Congress. He explained:

These are the debates on three separate occasions when the provisions of law relating to the payment of expenses for travel and attendance of judges holding court outside of their districts were under consideration. We offer it as a part of the parliamentary history of the enactment of these laws and as having some bearing upon their construction.

Mr. Manager Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, objected, saying:

Mr. President, the honorable counsel for the respondent offers certain extracts from the Congressional Record purporting to contain some portions of the debates at various times upon provisions of pending bills, which subsequently became statutes, relating to the payment of expenses of district judges for the purpose, as he states, of construing those acts of Congress. To that we object, first, that it is not competent nor proper in the construction of a statute to consider the debates in Congress, and, second, that if admitted, it would require us in rebuttal to produce all the other portions of the debates, and then to call all those Members of Congress who are not present to ascertain their views upon the construction of the statute for which they then voted. Upon that I will take a very few minutes to refer the Presiding Officer and the Senate to what seems to me to be an entirely conclusive authority upon the subject.

[2] Third session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, pp. 3164–3167.

It was decided in The United States v. Freight Association (166 U. S., p. 260), as stated in the syllabus:

"Debates in Congress are not appropriate sources of information from which to discover the meaning of the language of a statute passed by that body."

Mr. Justice Peckham delivered the opinion of the court. On page 318 he said:

"Looking simply at the history of the bill from the time it was introduced in the Senate until it was finally passed, it would be impossible to say what were the views of a majority of the Members of each House in relation to the meaning of the act. It can not be said that a majority of both Houses did not agree with Senator Hoar in his views as to the construction to be given to the act as it passed the Senate. All that can be determined from the debates and reports is that various Members had various views, and we are left to determine the meaning of this act, as we determine the meaning of other acts, from the language used therein.

"There is, too, a general acquiescence in the doctrine that debates in Congress are not appropriate sources of information from which to discover the meaning of the language of a statute passed by that body. (United States v. Union Pacific R. R. Co., 91 U. S., 72; Aldridge v. Williams, 3 How., 9, Taney, Chief Justice; Mitchell v. Great Works Milling and Manufacturing Co., 2 Story, 648; Queen v. Hertford College, 3 Q. B. D., 693.)

"The reason is that it is impossible to determine with certainty what construction was put upon an act by the members of a legislative body that passed it by resorting to the speeches of individual members thereof. Those who did not speak may not have agreed with those who did, and those who spoke might differ from each other, the result being that the only proper way to construe a legislative act is from the language used in the act, and, upon occasion, by a resort to the history of the times when it passed."

Now, Mr. President, you will readily see from the few disjointed remarks in the body at the other end of the building, the bill coming before it for the first time, one Member taking an offhand view of a paragraph and saying so and so, and another saying something else, and the great body who vote for it saying nothing, it is improper—and the Supreme Court has so held, and so have the courts of England—that it is absolutely improper to look into the debates for the purpose of construing an act of assembly. You will see at once that in order to do full justice to the subject it would be necessary to call all those Members who did not vote and ascertain their views; which would amount to taking a new vote in the House of Representatives to determine upon the construction of an act of assembly, the construction of which is proper matter for the courts, and in this instance for the Senate sitting as a court.

Mr. Thurston argued:

We offer to prove that on April 24, 1896, when this provision was before the Senate of the United States, the meaning of the clause was discussed on the floor of the Senate, and growing out of that discussion, and for the avowed purpose of making its meaning explicit, an amendment was attached to the clause in the Senate declaring, in substance, that nothing but actual expenses or moneys actually expended should be allowed the judges. That amendment was put on in the Senate. It went to conference and was rejected by the conference report, thereby, as we claim, determining that it was not the sense of the Congress of the United States that this allowance should be of moneys actually expended by the judges.

We further claim that in the proceedings of the House of Representatives, while a similar provision was under consideration on January 27, 1903, an amendment was offered, the purport of which was to prohibit the allowance to these judges of any traveling expenses where they had not actually made the expenditure of money; in other words, to prohibit them from certifying under the law to their traveling expenses when they had been riding free; and that amendment, made for that specific purpose, was rejected by the House, thereby showing, as we contend, the clear intention of Congress to allow the judges to certify and receive necessary or reasonable traveling expenses whether they paid the money out or not.

We further propose to show that in the House of Representatives on January 27, 1903, while a similar provision was under consideration * * * that the House of Representatives on the date I have last named, in further consideration of this appropriation, took proceedings whereby an amendment was offered to prevent the judges of the courts of the United States from receiving free railroad transportation, which amendment by the House of Representatives was rejected, thereby attesting, as we believe, the opinion or construction of the House of Representatives that the provision of the law permitted judges to receive from the Treasury of the United States reasonable traveling expenses whether they paid their fare or rode free.

Mr. Anthony Higgins, also of counsel for respondent, argued:

Mr. President, in the first place, there are two classes of legislative proceedings incorporated in this offer, as I understand. The one referred to by my colleague in the beginning of his remarks on this offer is where we offered to show the parliamentary history of the clause in the act of June 11, 1896, which is an offer to show an amendment proposed by a Senator, and the adoption thereof in the Senate, and afterwards a conference report, in which the amendment adopted by the Senate was stricken out and a substitute for the same enacted; and in that shape the act of 1896 became a law.

Now, quite apart from the question of the admissibility of debates as to the construction of a statute is the principle that applies on this offer, for I find it laid down by the Supreme Court in the case of The United States v. Johnson (124 U. S., 237–253), which supports this proposition:

"In like manner cogent and persuasive is the construction placed by either or both of the two Houses of Congress by legislation and in debate upon the statute."

The syllabus of that case is as follows:

"The joint resolution of Congress of March 31, 1868 (5 Stat., 251) affords evidence that the practice of the Secretary of the Treasury prior to that date not to cover into the Treasury the sums received from the sale of captured and abandoned property, but to retain them in the hands of the Treasurer in order to pay them out from time to time on the order of the Secretary, was known to Congress and was acquiesced in by it, as to what had been previously done; and all this brings the practice within the well-settled rule that the contemporaneous construction of a statute by those charged with its execution, especially when it has long prevailed, is entitled to great weight, and should not be disregarded or overturned except for cogent reasons, and unless it be clear that such construction is erroneous."

In other words, Mr. President, those legislative proceedings will make plain that the construction by a Senator upon the act of Congress under which district and circuit judges are paid when absent from their homes in the one case or their districts in the other holding court—that the construction which the learned managers place upon that act was the one which was sought by a Senator in that debate to place upon that statute in express words, and the Senate passed the amendment, and the conference committee struck it out. The Senate amendment, which was virtually a proviso that no expenses should be certified other than those that were actually incurred, was stricken out, and in place of it the last section of the act of 1891, creating the circuit court of appeals, was substituted for it, which said that when these sums were paid to the judge by the marshal they should be allowed to the marshal in his accounts. That clearly comes within the case of The United States v. Johnson and of the acquiescence by Congress. It is a much stronger case; it is more than an acquiescence by Congress in the construction, for it is by legislation making the statute in terms to be what excludes the construction that was sought to be put on it by a specific amendment to that effect.

That is a different thing from the mere opinions that are expressed by Members of either House of Congress at the time when a bill is in consideration before it; it is a part of the legislative history of the act, the amendment adopted by the Senate and its being stricken out in conference, and another feature added to the law in substitution for it being a part of our offer in what we seek to prove.

Now, Mr. President, I submit to the Senate that the principle which has been adduced in the case of The United States v. Freight Association (166 U. S.) is not applicable to the case that is now before the Senate. It is not simply and merely a question as to what is the construction that would be put upon the act in question by a court; it is not a question as to the construction that will be put upon it by any member of this tribunal. The question, we respectfully submit, is whether or no this statute admits of a doubtful construction and is open to more than one opinion. If a statute is ambiguous, if it has been loosely drawn, if it is not clearly and without any uncertainty of one construction, and therefore not open to construction, then we have authority as old as Judge Story, and coming from authority as high as his, that in a case involving the accounts of an officer under such a statute any doubts are to be resolved in favor of the officer; and by a line of authority in the Supreme Court of the United States, followed frequently and numerously in the circuit courts and in the Supreme Court of the United States, we have a long line of authority that where a statute is in the least degree open to construction, and in many cases, Mr. President, where it has not been open to construction a long-continued construction of it by the executive officers of the Government has been held to be cogent, to be persuasive, to be decisive.

I had not expected to go into the presentation of that line of authority on this particular question—the question as to whether or no you would admit debates in Congress. Those debates, Mr. President, under the principle which I have now ventured to enunciate—and I do not suppose it will be disputed—go to the point that if the Congress itself in the debates placed a different construction upon this act from what the learned managers place upon it, there could be no crime in this respondent in placing a like construction upon it; that what here was said, and in another body in debate, as to what was the understanding of Congress as to the meaning of this act when Congress was in the process of enacting it, and again and again in repeated years on appropriation bills in identical terms this same statute has been brought up again and again in debate, that what was said there and then by Members of Congress as to the received construction of this act, totally different from that of the honorable managers, goes to show that this could not have been a statute that was not open to a difference of construction and opinion.

Mr. Manager Olmsted replied:

The long line of authorities which the counsel has cited seems to resolve itself down to the case of Johnson * * * in which the recitals in a joint resolution were accepted as evidence, in accordance with the well-known principle of law that the recital in the preamble of a public act of Parliament of a fact is evidence to prove the existence of the fact, not the debates in the House or in the Senate when the joint resolution was passed, but the joint resolution itself. That is the English and American doctrine.

I will simply add one more authority and rest. In the case of The United States against The Union Pacific Railroad (91 U. S., 72), Mr. Justice Davis, delivering the opinion of the court, said, on page 79:

"In construing an act of Congress we are not at liberty to recur to the views of individual Members in debate nor to consider the motives which influenced them to vote for or against its passage. The act itself speaks the will of Congress, and this is to be ascertained from the language used."

The Presiding Officer said:

The Presiding Officer will submit this question to the Senate: Counsel for the respondent propose to offer certain extracts from the Congressional Record, including debates in the House and Senate, votes in the House and Senate, for the purpose, as stated, of showing the history of the enactment by which the United States judges holding court out of their districts are entitled to expenses and as throwing light upon the true construction of the act. [Putting the question.] In the opinion of the Presiding Officer the noes have it.

Mr. John C. Spooner, a Senator from Wisconsin, demanded the yeas and nays, and the same being taken, there appeared, yeas 34, nays 33. So the evidence was admitted.

2268. The Senate declined to admit in the Belknap trial testimony taken before a House committee and published as a public document.

Instance wherein a Senator objected to evidence which was not objected to by managers or counsel.

On July 6, 1876,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, H. T. Crosby was sworn and examined by the managers and was asked if he had any recollection that General Hazen had testified before the Military Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives in regard to the post tradership at Fort Sill. The witness responded in the affirmative. Then Mr. Manager John A. McMahon asked:

Did General Belknap, to your knowledge, know that the testimony had been given by General Hazen before the Military Committee in regard to Fort Sill?

[1] First session Forty-fourth Congress, Senate Journal, p. 961; Record of trial, pp. 186–189.

To this witness replied that he thought General Belknap (the respondent) did know, but this was only an impression which rested on no facts that he could recall.

Mr. Manager McMahon then said:

We propose to show, and we now offer to test the question, the testimony of General Hazen before the Military Committee of the House on the 22d day of March, 1872, and we propose to supplement that with the orders issued from the War Department on the 25th day of March, 1872, which was a very good order, but did not quite reach the Fort Sill case. We offer it now, and desire that the testimony of General Hazen, as published in an official document, shall be read.

Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, did not object, but said:

It is testimony taken not only not in this Chamber, but taken in pais. * * * The particular point I want to suggest to the consideration of the manager only is this, that I never heard one man tried on testimony given in some other tribunal. Without proof that the witness was dead or could not be called, and that the party was present and cross-examined him, it can not be done in a civil case. I suggest to the managers that it would be remarkable if you could read a deposition taken somewhere else.

After discussion, Mr. John Sherman, a Senator from Ohio, said:

I should like to ask the witness a question through the Chair. Did General Belknap read or hear the testimony of General Hazen?

The witness said:

I do not know, sir.

Mr. Sherman also asked:

I will ask whether that testimony of General Hazen was published in the public journals and brought to the knowledge of General Belknap.

The witness replied:

I do not know.

Mr. Sherman objected to the introduction of the testimony at this stage of the proceedings.

Later, during the examination of Gen. Irvin McDowell by Mr. Manager McMahon, the following occurred:

Q. In the conversation between you and General Belknap, besides referring to this article in the New York Tribune, did you refer to the fact that General Hazen had testified before the Military Committee?—A. I think that I mentioned the fact that I learned from General Garfield that General Hazen had done so. I think General Belknap told me that General Hazen had done so and had said substantially the same thing. I think General Belknap was indignant at General Hazen having done so instead of having come to him. I think he thought he owed it to him to have made this statement to him personally instead of going elsewhere.

The managers then offered as evidence this order:

[Circular.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, March 25, 1872.

I. The council of administration at a post where there is a post trader will from time to time examine the post trader's goods and invoices or bills of sale; and will, subject to the approval of the post commander, establish the rates and prices (which should be fair and reasonable) at which the goods shall be sold. A copy of the list thus established will be kept posted in the trader's store. Should the post trader feel himself aggrieved by the action of the council of administration, he may appeal therefrom through the post commander to the War Department.

II. In determining the rate of profit to be allowed, the council will consider not only the prime cost, freight, and other charges, but also the fact that while the trader pays no tax or contribution of any kind to the post fund for his exclusive privileges, he has no lien on the soldiers' pay, and is without the security in this respect once enjoyed by the sutlers of the Army.

III. Post traders will actually carry on the business themselves and will habitually reside at the station to which they are appointed. They will not farm out, sublet, transfer, or sell or assign the business to others.

IV. In case there shall be at this time any post trader who is a nonresident of the post to which he has been appointed, he will be allowed ninety days from the receipt hereof at his station to comply with this circular or vacate his appointment.

V. Post commanders are hereby directed to report to the War Department any failure on the part of traders to fulfill the requirements of this circular.

VI. The provisions of the circular from the Adjutant-General's Office of June 7, 1871, will continue in force except as herein modified.

By order of the Secretary of War.

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

Then Mr. Manager McMahon said:

Now, if the Senate please, we propose to offer the testimony of General Hazen, as taken before the committee, for this reason and this purpose: We find from two different sources that General Belknap is advised of the fact and becomes indignant with the knowledge that General Hazen has testified to the existence of certain abuses at Fort Sill which lay directly within his province to correct.

Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, while not objecting formally, said:

You do not prove by anybody that General Belknap ever read that testimony to know what it was. The indignation arose from the fact that he had been talking before a committee when he ought to have gone through directer channels, through the Army.

Mr. Sherman having persisted in his objection, the question was submitted to the Senate.

Mr. Roscoe Conkling, a Senator from New York, asked:

Is that the testimony upon which the Senate is asked to vote that the respondent here was charged with a knowledge of this testimony so as to admit it as a declaration made to him?

Mr. Manager George F. Hoar replied:

I understand that General McDowell's testimony is that General Belknap said to him that General Hazen had testified in substance to the same matters which were contained in the New York Tribune article. * * * Therefore stating to him a knowledge of the substance of General Hazen's testimony. Now, if he had that knowledge of the substance of General Hazen's testimony, it tends to show that he knew that these periodical payments of money which came to him from Marsh were payments of money that had come to Marsh from the post trader. If I am in error as to the extent to which General McDowell's statement went, I can be corrected by referring to it. In other words, if General Belknap was receiving once every three months a sum of money from Marsh in New York, it is important for the Senate to know whether Belknap was informed that those moneys were moneys which were being improperly paid in consequence of this bargain of the post trader at Fort Sill to Marsh; in other words, that he knew where the money he was receiving came from. The article in the New York Tribune contains a distinct assertion of those payments by Evans to Marsh, and, as I understand it, the testimony of General Hazen contains in substance the same thing. It is therefore important not as proving the truth of anything that General Hazen said, but as proving that the Secretary of War was notified that such thing was said at that time.

The question being taken, the Senate declined to admit the testimony, yeas 20, nays 31.

2269. Testimony taken before a House committee and seen by respondent was admitted in the Belknap trial, not as evidence of the fact but as a partial foundation for an inference.—On July 11, 1876,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Hon. Hiester Clymer, chairman of the Committee of the House of Representatives which had reported the evidence against the respondent, was examined as a witness on behalf of the United States. The witness was shown the manuscript copy of the testimony given by one Caleb P. Marsh before his committee, and, after he had identified it, was asked by Mr. Manager John A. McMahon:

After the testimony of Mr. Marsh was taken, state what action your committee took in regard to it so far as the Secretary of War was concerned.

To this question Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, objected. Mr. McMahon explained the objects of the introduction of the testimony:

We propose to put in evidence the fact that the witness Marsh was examined; that his testimony was reduced to writing; that the Secretary of War was officially notified of the fact; that he appeared; that the testimony was read over to him; that he took time to consult; that he finally came in and presented his resignation to the committee, from which we shall draw our inferences as far as the situation permits. That is all. * * *

Mr. George G. Wright, a Senator from Iowa, asked of the manager:

Do I understand that the managers propose to introduce this testimony and follow it by the single proposition that thereupon the Secretary of War resigned, and thereby ask the Senate to draw a conclusion, or that there was anything said by him or done by him other than the mere resignation?

To this Mr. McMahon replied:

I have already stated that we expect to show that the investigation was continued from one hour in the day until another and then continued until the next day, and that while they were waiting for the matter the resignation was brought in and handed to the committee; and I accept the statement of the distinguished counsel, if he desires it in, for the express purpose of preventing his being impeached. If he desires to prove that fact, I have not any objection certainly.

Mr. Roscoe Conkling, a Senator from New York, asked of the manager:

Shall I understand the managers to propose either to read at large the testimony of Marsh or to have that testimony received here and go upon the record, all for the purpose of proving that after it was delivered the respondent resigned his office? Is that the scope of this proposal, or is it intended to put into the case what Marsh testified in another form on another occasion, that that testimony may speak in this trial?

Mr. Manager McMahon replied:

Mr. President, I will answer the honorable Senator. It is offered in part only for the purpose which the honorable Senator from New York has eliminated from my remarks. The entire purpose is to show that substantially the same testimony as has been given here, not a different statement, but substantially the same statement as has been made here, was read over to the Secretary of War as a charge by one of the coordinate branches of the Government, to which he made no statement under oath or otherwise, and that the substantial facts therein stated having been brought to his knowledge and read without dispute, we are entitled to draw two inferences, the one from his resignation and the other from his failure to deny the facts therein stated, whatever they may have been.

Thereupon Mr. Jeremiah S. Black, of counsel for the respondent, said:

That is, you want to use it as a confession.

[1] First session Forty-fourth Congress, Senate Journal, p. 974; Record of trial, pp. 245–249.

To this Mr. McMahon replied:

If you put it in that severe light, probably yes.

Mr. Montgomery Blair, of counsel for the respondent, said:

I ask the attention of the Senate to the scope of the question which is now to be acted upon, and I put it to this body to say whether any legitimate conclusion such as the counsel for the Government seeks to draw from the conduct which he seeks to prove here would be authorized by the proof. The whole object of the gentleman is to show that in consequence of similar proof being offered before the Committee on War Expenditures and being made known to the defendant in this case he thereupon resigned his commission as Secretary of War, and he admits that at the time this resignation was put in it was done in consequence of an understanding which then was had that thereby impeachment or an action of this kind which is now here pending would be avoided.

Mr. Manager McMahon here interposed:

You misunderstand me. I say if you can prove that, I have no objection.

Mr. Blair continued:

Well, I understand that that is the proof which is to be offered, and is the nature of the case to which the managers now invite this court. Now, I ask the court to consider the state of proof to which the managers invite your attention, and to say whether or not any such conclusion as they seek to have you draw from it could be legitimately drawn. They ask you to draw a conclusion from the fact that the Secretary of War on seeing the proof resigned his office. I ask this court if that is a confession of guilt, or whether anybody in his senses could draw such a conclusion from it, even if it were not accompanied with the facts which we intend to prove if the matter is gone into. We intend to show that the reason of the resignation was that we wanted to avoid this trial, and had reason to believe that the committee before whom this testimony was taken concurred with us in the belief that that would be an avoidance of this trial. Now, take the whole scope of the case, because here is voluminous testimony to be offered and to be considered, and I ask the Senate to consider now before we go into it whether or not any such conclusion as the managers seek to draw from that can be legitimately drawn.

The question being taken, the Senate without division decided to admit the question.

The witness then answered the question, stating that the respondent was shown the testimony of Marsh, that he did not reply to it, and that he sent to the committee information of his resignation as Secretary of War.

Then Mr. Manager McMahon said:

Now we offer in evidence the testimony, the original paper, that was taken before the committee. * * * I offer it in evidence because, of course, it is impossible for this court to know to what extent the defendant was implicated by this testimony unless we know just exactly what the testimony was; and the strength of the inference, or its weakness, must of course be determined by the strength or weakness of the charges and the directness of the testimony.

Mr. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, having intimated but not formally made an objection, Mr. Roscoe Conkling, a Senator from New York, said:

Shall I understand that it is now proposed to offer here for any purpose the testimony delivered by Marsh before the committee of the House? If it is, if nobody else does, I raise an objection to that, on the ground that it is incompetent; and I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. Francis Kernan, a Senator from New York, asked:

Is the object to have it read as evidence in this case, or read as a communication made to Mr. Belknap?

Mr. Manager McMahon replied:

To have it read precisely upon the principle that the article in the New York Tribune of February 15, 1872, was read, as a charge of certain matters therein stated, but not as evidence of the truth of anything therein stated. Every lawyer, I think, can see the difference.

Mr. Thomas F. Bayard, a Senator from Delaware, asked:

What is the object and intent of this offer?

Mr. Manager McMahon replied:

I think the honorable Senator from Delaware will remember that in my answer to the remark of the Senator from New York who sits farthest from me [Mr. Kernan] I stated distinctly the object and purpose of this offer, not as evidence to this court of the truth of any fact therein stated, but simply for the purpose of showing that at a particular time certain charges from an authorized source were made against the defendant, which were read to him for the purpose of ascertaining what action he took after this was communicated to him.

Mr. Bayard asked further:

Is it the object of the present inquiry to corroborate or discredit the testimony of Marsh, the witness, or to establish any fact therein referred to, or solely to prove what was the action or conduct of Mr. Belknap when the fact that such charges had been made against him was so made known to him?

Mr. Manager McMahon replied:

Mr. President, the question put to the managers is as follows: "Is it the object of the present inquiry to corroborate or discredit the testimony of Marsh?" In the first place, I will answer in detail that it is to corroborate Mr. Marsh in just this far, not as evidence of any facts stated therein, but when the charge was made by Marsh the Secretary of War by his conduct admitted the truthfulness of it.

Secondly, "Or to establish any fact therein referred to." Not as evidence of any fact therein referred to except in this way, when the fact is charged against the defendant, to draw a conclusion as to its truthfulness or untruthfulness by the action of the Secretary of War in regard to it.

"Or solely to prove what was the action or conduct of Mr. Belknap when the fact that such charges had been made against him was so made known to him." It is solely for that purpose; but from that we draw our conclusion as to the truthfulness or untruthfulness of the charge there stated, but do not seek to establish any minor details on that point.

Mr. Carpenter, arguing against the admission of the evidence, said:

If it is competent to introduce this testimony given by Marsh before the House committee simply because Belknap did not say anything in reply to it, is it not competent to introduce here every newspaper article that has charged him, from Maine to California, with being guilty of this offense, and with being a thief and all that sort of thing, to which he has, under direction of counsel, never opened his mouth, to which he has never written a reply, of which he has never taken the slightest notice? Upon what principle could you introduce the deposition of this witness simply because it was read to the defendant and he said nothing, and exclude a newspaper article which you could show he had seen and to which he had said nothing? We did not care when the article from the New York Tribune was offered to object for certain reasons. It was very doubtful in our mind whether that was legal testimony; but we did not care to object to it. But here is an offer made now the result of which, if sustained, is that if they can show that a newspaper has published an article charging him with being a thief in this particular, calling him all the hard names they can think of in consequence of these charges made here, and that he read it and threw it down, making no remark, that would be as competent as this testimony. It must be borne in mind that that committee had no jurisdiction over Mr. Belknap. Mr. Belknap could have no trial before that committee. A few things may be mentioned in a political trial that would not be proper in a court of law. It was well known that that committee was of an opposite political faith, and it was not expected that much justice would be done to Mr. Belknap or any other Republican; and any lawyer, I think, who had been consulted by Mr. Belknap would have given him the advice which he did receive, and that was to let the committee alone till they got through, and then see what their charges amounted to. But if the managers can introduce this evidence upon the ground that it was read to him and he said nothing, I submit that every newspaper article which can be shown to have been seen by him is evidence if they can also show that he read it and made no reply.

The question on the admission of the testimony being taken, the Senate decided, yeas 24, nays 14, that it should be admitted.

On July 19[1] John S. Evans, post trader at Fort Sill, was examined as a witness, and was asked this question by Mr. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent:

Mr. Evans, after you went back to Fort Sill with your appointment would you have reduced your prices but for the contract made with Marsh?

Mr. Manager McMahon objected, and the Senate, without division, excluded the question.

Mr. Carpenter then said:

Now, Mr. President, following the example of the managers, I offer here in partial corroboration of this witness his examination before the committee of the House, in which he swore distinctly that he would not have made the change of a shilling and that he never would have put prices down until he was compelled by the commission of officers that had jurisdiction.

Mr. Manager McMahon said:

This matter is considered to be ruled out under the decision already made, I take it. If the Senate will not let him swear to it here in open court, they certainly will not allow you to corroborate him in that way.

After argument, during which Mr. Carpenter quoted the words of Mr. Manager McMahon as to the Marsh testimony, wherein he stated that the object was to corroborate Marsh's oral testimony to a qualified extent, the question was taken, and the Senate, without division, excluded the testimony.

2270. Although Judge Swayne had been a voluntary witness before the House investigating committee, the Senate decided that the record of his testimony was prohibited by statute from use in the trial.

Discussion as to the status of the Senate as a court during an impeachment trial.

An argument that an impeachment trial is not a criminal proceeding.

As to whether or not there is a distinction between a misdemeanor and a high misdemeanor.

Instance of an appeal from the decision of the Presiding Officer on a question of evidence during the Swayne trial.

On February 14, 1905,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. Manager Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, made the following offer of testimony in support of the articles relating to respondent's alleged improper use of a railway car:

The managers offered to prove that the respondent on the 28th day of November, 1904, at the city of Washington, D. C., voluntarily appeared before a subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee, not having been summoned as a witness or otherwise, and voluntarily made the following statement.

[1] Senate Journal, p. 982; Record of trial, p. 281.

[2] Third session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, pp. 2536–2540.

Mr. John M. Thurston, of Nebraska, objected to the introduction of this evidence, claiming that it was prohibited by section 859 of the Revised Statutes:

No testimony given by a witness before either House, or before any committee of either House of Congress, shall be used as evidence in any criminal proceeding against him in any court, except in a prosecution for perjury committed in giving such testimony.

Mr. Thurston said:

Judge Swayne did appear; he was examined and cross-examined, and, speaking a little outside of the record, I know that these questions the managers propose to ask him relate mostly, if not wholly, to his answers made on his cross-examination. But, Mr. President, the law of Congress does not distinguish between a man who comes before Congress or a committee of his own volition and a man who is haled there by process. The prohibition of the statute is as broad as human language can make it. It was designed for a wise and beneficent purpose, and no thought, in our judgment, ought to be had here by the managers in this case against our objection of attempting to override that statute of the Congress of the United States. * * * Mr. President, just a word or two in reference to this last suggestion, which is one which I had not expected to hear—that this trial is not a criminal proceeding. What is it, Mr. President? It has been held through all the history of impeachment trials to be in accordance with trials of persons charged with crimes. The verdict to be rendered in the case is one of "Guilty" or "Not guilty"—a verdict which is only appropriate in a criminal proceeding. Punishment is not of life, or limb, or liberty, but, sir, it is a far graver one, in my judgment, than any of those would be. It is a punishment of so grave a character that it can only be inflicted, under the Constitution of the United States, on being found guilty of high crimes or misdemeanors, and yet the gentleman says, with apparent sincerity, that this is not a criminal proceeding. You are trying this man here on a charge that he is guilty of a high crime or a high misdemeanor, and yet you say it is not a criminal proceeding.

Now, Mr. President, Charles Swayne, as the record shows, appeared before the House subcommittee and was sworn as a witness, and testified there. Afterwards, at another session of the committee, he again appeared, and was again examined and cross-examined before the same tribunal on another day. Did you ever hear in any court of justice the theory, when a man has been sworn as a witness on one day, that you needed to swear him again on the next day in the same case?

Mr. Manager Palmer said:

The offer is to prove that Judge Swayne voluntarily appeared before a subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee and made a voluntary statement in his own defense. He was not a witness; he was not summoned; and his statement was entirely voluntary. * * * On this occasion he read a typewritten statement, which occupies thirteen pages of the record. After his statement was read certain questions were asked him based on allegations that were made in his statement; and the questions that were asked him, that we now offer to prove, were based on suggestions made in his statement. The questions were asked by members of the committee to clear up some things that Judge Swayne had stated in his written statement. Now, we offer this testimony in entire good faith. * * * I say we offer this testimony in entire good faith. We are not pettifogging; we are not endeavoring to get before the Senate testimony which is not testimony; but we offer it because we believe it is testimony, because it is competent testimony, and because it is the admission of the respondent here, a judge of a Federal court, who, in his own defense, made a voluntary statement, and he ought not to be objecting to it now here, as we believe. * * * No, sir; it was not under oath. To state the fact exactly as it is, Judge Swayne appeared before the committee, and this conversation occurred. On a previous occasion this testimony was given, or at least this statement was made on the last hearing that was had. On a previous hearing, several months before, Judge Swayne appeared and raised some question about some testimony that was given as to his residence. It was said to him by a member of the committee, "There is one man in the United States who knows all about this subject," and Judge Swayne said: "Do you mean me?" The committeeman said: "Yes; I mean you." Judge Swayne said: "Do you wish to have me sworn?" It was said to him: "That is entirely voluntarily with you; you can be sworn if you desire to be sworn." Then he held up his hand, and was sworn.

That was at the hearing some months before. At the last hearing he appeared and read this typewritten statement, which, I say, occupies thirteen pages of the record, and that statement led to the inquiry made by a committeeman, which elicited the information which we now ask to give here. He was not sworn at that time. He had been sworn some months before on a different proposition at his own request or on his own volition.

Now, the reason for this statute is plain. It protects a witness who is compelled to testify to matters which might criminate him. In this case the offer is to show that Judge Swayne appeared voluntarily before the committee—and that is admitted—that he was not a witness summoned to appear, but that he appeared voluntarily, and made a statement and argument in his own defense. Something he said in that argument attracted the attention of a member of the committee who interrogated him and elicited the matter contained in the offer.

The statement is evidence here, first, because this is not a criminal proceeding against the respondent. If he has committed any crime, he can be punished for it in another proceeding. This is a proceeding in which, if Judge Swayne were convicted, he would not be punished as for a crime, but the extent of the punishment would be removal from office. It is a proceeding calculated to keep the judiciary unsullied and pure. It is the only method by which a judge who violates the tenure on which his office is held can be removed. His commission runs that he is to hold this office "during good behavior;" and the only tribunal on earth in which that question can be settled is this august tribunal.

We are here to ascertain whether Judge Swayne has behaved himself well, and whether he is fit to hold this office. This is not a criminal trial; it is not a criminal prosecution; it is not followed by a sentence of any court. All that you can do under the Constitution is to deprive him of his office. If he has committed any offense the Constitution provides that he can be tried for that in another proceeding, and punished if he is found guilty.

The second reason why this is evidence is because he was not summoned to testify before the House committee, but appeared voluntarily to make a statement in his own defense. * * * Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the section of the Constitution of the United States under which this proceeding is had. I said that this was not a criminal prosecution. Did anybody ever hear that a man could be twice tried and convicted for the same offense? If the first trial is a criminal prosecution, then, of course, he could not be tried and convicted again. The provision of the Constitution is this:

"Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law."

Now, I say that is an amazing proposition that this judge who appeared and made a voluntary statement in his own defense should be objecting here now on the ground that it might incriminate him.

The Presiding Officer[1] ruled:

The general proposition that the admissions of a defendant may be proved does not seem to the Presiding Officer to apply to this case. The statute is that—

"No testimony given by a witness before either House, or before any committee of either House of Congress, shall be used as evidence in any criminal proceeding against him in any court, except in a prosecution for perjury committed in giving such testimony."

Now, without deciding technically whether this is testimony which was given by a witness before a committee, or whether it is proposed to use it in a criminal proceeding, or in a court, the Presiding Officer thinks that the intention of the statute is such as to make this evidence inadmissible.

Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, a Senator from Texas, asked that the question be submitted to the Senate.

[1] Orville H. Platt, of Connecticut, Presiding Officer.

Mr. Bailey said:

If the court please, section 103 of the Revised Statutes provides that—

"No witness is privileged to refuse to testify to any fact, or to produce any paper, respecting which he shall be examined by either House of Congress, or by any committee of either House, upon the ground that his testimony to such fact or his production of such paper may tend to disgrace him or otherwise render him infamous." (See sec. 859.)

Plainly the purpose of that statute was to enable the committees of either House, or either House itself, to compel the attendance and the testimony of any witness, and it provides, contrary to the rule of law not obtaining in the courts, that the witness shall not be permitted to decline to testify upon the ground that it might disgrace him or tend to render him infamous. Having deprived him of the privilege which he would enjoy before the courts of this country, and having compelled him to testify before its committees, even to his own infamy or disgrace, Congress very wisely then provided that such testimony should not be adduced against him in any criminal proceeding in any court.

But, Mr. President, this is not a criminal proceeding within that statute, and this, in my opinion, is not a court within the meaning of that statute. The Constitution may seem to contemplate that we shall sit as a court when we try the President, because it provides that the Chief Justice of the United States shall preside at such a trial. Whether that was intended, as has been suggested by some, to protect the President against the rulings of the Vice-President, who might succeed to the Presidency in the event of the President's conviction and removal, or whether it was intended, as has been suggested by others, to secure a more certain and a more correct interpretation of the law, I do not undertake at this time to decide.

My own opinion is that the reason which prevailed upon the framers of the Constitution to provide that the Chief Justice shall preside over the Senate when it tries the President on impeachment charges was that the Vice-President might be suspected of having a deep and peculiar personal interest in the result of such a trial. But whether one or the other was the reason, it can not be successfully contended that this is a court within the meaning of section 859, or if it shall be held that this is a court, then it can not be contended that this is a criminal proceeding within that section.

The very provision of the Constitution under which we are proceeding negatives the idea that this is a criminal action, because it expressly provides that no matter what our judgment may be, it only excludes the incumbent against whom it may be pronounced from the honorable office which he holds, and it leaves to the ordinary administration of the criminal jurisprudence of the country the punishment for his criminal acts. * * * Mr. President, a judge, in my opinion, may be impeached without being guilty of a crime. He holds his office by a different tenure from that under which other civil officers of the Government enjoy. He holds his office during good behavior, and more than one of the charges in this very case are not a crime. No penalty is denounced against the violation of that provision of the statute which provides that a judge shall reside in the district for which he is appointed, and that his failure to do so shall be a high misdemeanor.

That term is new in legal vernacular. I know of no law books which furnish a distinction between a misdemeanor and a high misdemeanor. Certainly the Constitution does not. Congress has not seen fit to affix a penalty of any criminal nature to this very provision itself, and obviously the whole purpose that Congress had in mind when it declared that a failure to reside in the district for which the judge had been appointed was a high misdemeanor, was that his failure to do so should be an impeachable offense.

I put this case to the court and all the honorable members of it. Suppose there should be nothing before this body but the naked question, Does the honorable judge reside in his district? The law says that if he does not, he is guilty of a high misdemeanor. Does any member of the court doubt that if counsel for the respondent or the respondent himself were to rise in this court and say, "I do not reside in my district," there would be the slightest hesitancy in finding him guilty on that charge? Yet, sir, that charge is not a crime, and no Senator will contend that he could be prosecuted in the courts and punished for his failure to reside in his district. It is declared by law, it is true, to be a high misdemeanor, but it is not a crime, because there is no penalty attached to it by the law. Again, sir, suppose a judge should arbitrarily and maliciously disbar an attorney, does any Senator doubt that he could be, and ought to be impeached? And yet, sir, there is no criminal statute in that behalf provided.

The respondent was not a witness, within the meaning of the statute, when examined before the committee of the House. As has well been suggested by my learned brother near me, whenever a party to a proceeding voluntarily takes the stand, he must be presumed to know the nature of it, and when he volunteers his testimony everything he says can be used. There are States under whose system of criminal jurisprudence the defendant himself may testify. He can not be called by the State; he can not be compelled to take the witness stand in his own behalf, and if he fails or refuses to do so it is error, and reversible error, for the prosecuting attorney to refer to that fact. But when the accused does take the witness stand in his own behalf, then he is not simply permitted to testify to what he thinks may be to his own benefit. He can be cross-examined, and all he says must be received and considered by the jury as testimony in the case.

When the respondent in this case voluntarily appeared before a committee of the House, with a full knowledge of the nature of its inquiry, and proceeded to state any of the facts, it was within the power and duty of that committee to interrogate him as to all the facts, and when he had made his statement there it does not lie with him to claim immunity under this statute.

I believe that the protection afforded by section 859 was made necessary and proper by section 103.

Having deprived the witness of a privilege as ancient almost as courts of justice, it was just and proper that he should not be exposed to prosecution and conviction upon his own testimony, which he had been compelled to give.

I do believe, further, that this is a court within the meaning of that statute. I am sure that this is not a criminal proceeding within the meaning of the statute, because the respondent might be found guilty of a charge that would terminate his office, although he were guilty of no crime.

I am further sure that the respondent in delivering his testimony before the committee of the House was not a witness within the reason or the protection of the statute, and I am still more certain that if he shall be deemed a witness he must be treated as a witness who came voluntarily to testify and whose testimony may be used against him.

Further discussion having been prevented by reference to the rules, the Presiding Officer put the question: "Is the evidence admissible?" and there appeared yeas 28, nays 45. So the evidence was not admitted.

On February 16, 1905,[1] as the managers were about to conclude the presentation of testimony, Mr. Manager David A. De Armond, of Missouri, referred again to the subject of the respondent's statements before the House committee, and suggested a reconsideration of the former decision of the Senate:

Mr. President, if it can be shown, and it appears of record, so that the showing is not difficult if it exists, that Judge Swayne made any statement before the House committee before the oath was administered to him by that committee as a witness, we shall interpose no objection to such statement. But we do object to any statement that he made before that committee after he was sworn as a witness. * * * I do not desire to add anything to the argument I made the other day on this same question, except to call the attention of the Senate to one provision of the Constitution of the United States. It was urged here the other day that this is not a criminal proceeding, and that Judge Swayne is not charged with or being tried for a crime. I wish simply to call attention to a section of the Constitution, it being the last portion of section 2 of Article III. I read:

"The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury."

On motion of Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, a Senator from Texas, and by a vote of yeas 53, nays 18, the doors were closed for consideration of the admissibility of the evidence heretofore ruled out.

On February 20[2] the Presiding Officer announced in the Senate sitting for the trial:

Before the reading of the Journal the Presiding Officer will announce that at the last session of the Senate in the trial of the impeachment the question of evidence was decided, namely, the proposal of the managers to introduce statements by Judge Swayne made before the committee of the House of Representatives, and it was decided that such statements were inadmissible. The vote by which it was decided will appear upon the reading of the Journal.

[2] Record, p. 2899.

The Journal being read, it appeared that on the question—

Are the statements made by Judge Swayne before the committee of the House of Representatives admissible as evidence?

it was determined in the negative—yeas 29, nays 47.

2271. In proving the contents of lost letters the Senate, in the Belknap trial, permitted the witness to be interrogated generally as to the import of a series of letters.

Instance of a ruling by the President pro tempore on a question of evidence during an impeachment trial.

On July 10, 1876,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Caleb P. Marsh was called as a witness for the United States, and was questioned as to sums of money which he had sent to the respondent, and as to letters that had passed between them. He testified that he had destroyed all letters and telegrams, although he had received such from the respondent, directing how the money should be forwarded. After this testimony Mr. Manager John A. McMahon said to the counsel for the respondent:

Gentlemen, we have served a notice upon you to produce the letters which have passed between these parties, and, of course, we are ready now to receive them, or to offer evidence of their contents.

The notice was read as follows:

All letters, telegrams, and communications from said Caleb P. Marsh to you in regard to the appointment of post trader at Fort Sill or elsewhere.

All letters from said Marsh to you concerning the management, conduct, or removal of the post trader at Fort Sill.

All letters or telegrams from said Marsh to you in any way connected with the forwarding to you of money, certificates of deposits, drafts, etc.

All letters from said Marsh to you informing you of the state of accounts between him and yourself, particularly the letter informing him of a change in the amount of the annual payment to be made to you by him some time in the spring of 1872.

The time covered by this notice is from June 1, 1870, to March 2, 1876. The dates more particularly referred to are those specified in the seventeenth specification set forth in the fourth article of the impeachment articles filed against you.

Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, said:

This notice, as far as it calls for letters touching the management of affairs at Fort Sill, calls for what were official letters, and may be found at the War Department. We have no other letters called for by the notice.

Thereupon Mr. Manager McMahon proceeded to ask questions to elicit proof as to the contents of the letters from witness to respondent, finally asking:

Now, give us the contents, as near as you can remember, or the substance, of one of these letters, without the date?

To this Mr. Carpenter objected, saying:

The rule is perfectly well settled that if an instrument is called for and not produced they may prove the contents of it. There is no doubt about that; but to ask the witness what was the general substance of letters without regard to date is not proving any instrument whatever. I deny that you can take a witness up here and pull a drag-net over the correspondence of business men for years and ask "what was the general purport of your correspondence?" That will not do. That is too indefinite. They will have to introduce the particular letter, and if they do not have it they must account for its loss, either by them or by us, and they may then prove the contents of that particular paper; but having shown that a particular paper is lost they can not ask the witness upon the general tenor of all these letters without regard to their date. When the question was put distinctly to this witness as to what were the contents of the letter which accompanied the first remittance, he said he did not remember. Now, if there is any other particular letter which they can locate in the mind of the witness and prove by him its contents, that of course is not objected to; but the question, "what is the general substance of letters," without regard to their dates, is not proving a particular paper; it is proving at large what was the substance of a general correspondence. That can not be done. You must prove it by introducing every letter by itself. If you have not got the letter, then you must account for its loss and prove its contents, not by proving what was the general tenor of 40 papers. It is for the court to say what the general tenor of them is, after they know each letter, and we are to have the substance of each letter as near as the witness can give it.

Mr. Manager McMahon's argument was:

What we desire to prove is this: We may call his attention to the particular date, but we go further and ask, Was there a general form in which you sent them, or was there any particular letter of which you may remember the substance? The idea is that we have got to go through these 14 different occasions when money was sent, and if he does not remember the contents of a particular letter, therefore it is not competent to testify to the contents of all of them as to his best impression! I understand that the rules of evidence are based upon a knowledge of human nature, upon a knowledge of the infirmities of human nature, and that a witness who has transacted business of this kind, when the documents are in the possession of the defendant, when he undertakes to state here the substance of their contents, is entitled to state it without saying that it was the contents of the letter of the 1st of November or the 6th of October or the 9th of October, 1874. I think I have said all upon this question that the occasion demands.

The President pro tempore having submitted the question to the Senate, it was decided without division that the interrogatory should be admitted.

The witness having, in response to the question, stated the general tenor of one of these letters, this question was asked:

Q. (By Mr. Manager McMahon.) After you had dispatched a letter like that, what letter would you get in return? Give us the contents of one of his letters that you can remember.

Mr. Carpenter said:

I want formally to make the same objection. I suppose, of course, it will be overruled, but I want to make the same point here as upon the former question.

The President pro tempore[1] said:

The Chair will take it as the sense of the Senate that the objection is overruled.

The question having been answered, another question was asked:

Q. (By Mr. Manager McMahon.) State whether, after shipping the money to him by express, you informed him of that fact; and if so, how.

Mr. Carpenter having objected, the President pro tempore submitted the question to the Senate.

Mr. Simon Cameron, a Senator from Pennsylvania, demanded the yeas and nays, which were refused.

Thereupon, without division, the Senate decided the evidence admissible.

Witness having stated that he sent the express receipt by mail when he sent the remittance, Mr. Manager McMahon asked:

State whether you received any reply; and if so, in what shape.

[1] T. W. Ferry, of Michigan, President pro tempore.

Mr. Carpenter, having ascertained that the question did not relate to a specific transaction, objected.

The Senate admitted the question.

Later Mr. Manager McMahon asked:

When you inclosed one of these certificates of deposit to him, state what was the substance of the letter which you did send to him accompanying the certificate.

Mr. Carpenter having objected unless a particular certificate was specified, the President pro tempore said:

The Chair overrules the objection. The witness will answer the question.

Soon after, Mr. Manager McMahon asked:[1]

When you delivered the money to him [the respondent] you stated that you at first delivered him $1,500 quarterly, and after the lapse of one and a half or two years $1,500 semiannually. State now whether you failed to deliver to him exactly at the time the amount that you were to deliver to him; and if so, why.

Mr. Carpenter said:

I want to object to that question, Mr. President. It is as disagreeable to me to seem to be captious about objections as it is disagreeable to the Senate to have me captious, but the insidious manner in which the facts of this case are sought to be kept out of view, while some deductions and conclusions are forced in as their substitute, is, although very ingenious and very artful and very gradual, yet perfectly apparent. We ought to have the questions so put to the witness that he will understand and that we shall understand precisely what transaction is being referred to. Now, you call his attention to no particular transaction at all; you do not name a place and do not fix a date; you do not determine any particular transaction; and yet you are trying in that way to float him over all of them, when in the only instance in which you put the question direct you did not get what you wanted to get, and I suppose that is the reason why the manager is now seeking to generalize. But it is an improper way, as I believe, to lead this witness. The manager knows perfectly well how to put the proper questions in a direct examination, not fix him between this bowlder and that rock, and lead him from step to step and over gulch and gulf, as he is doing by this method of examination. This is too big a thing to be played on a small mere game. Let us have it out; let us have the facts. This is too big a court to be trifled with by that method of examination. Here is a man put on the stand to swear to we all know what. Why do not they let him swear to it? Why do not they put him right straight forward and let us have these facts in their natural order, and not dragged out one after the other in this indirect and, as I think, improper way?

Mr. Manager McMahon said:

Mr. President, it is a matter of great deprivation to the House of Representatives, no doubt, that the able gentleman (and I say it in all seriousness and earnestness) does not sit here to conduct the case of the Government for it, but that is one of those accidents which we can not prevent, for the simple reason that he fails to be a Member of the House. The House has selected us to try this case, and while we concede to the gentleman (and we concede it honestly, not in any other except the fairest meaning) great ability in his profession and a full understanding of all the points of law and a full knowledge of all the details of practice and a full aptitude in all the details of nisi prius trials, yet we most respectfully submit to the Senate that we, however humble, appear here trying this case on our side, and if the gentleman will but possess his soul in patience for a little while the time will come when he can double this witness up all over four or five times with his unusual skill, and he can bring out all this truth that we are now so insidiously suppressing. He can then make it appear that his client is innocent, and that all this that we are introducing as testimony has nothing whatever to do with this case. A little patience now, a little of that which we have exercised, and the time will come when all these material facts in this case, all this hidden truth, can be brought out in the full sunlight that we have had in the last three or four days. Now, we propose, and we must be allowed that privilege, to put the questions to the witness. I never knew that right interfered with before.

The Senate, without division, decided that the question should be put to the witness.

2272. In the Johnson trial the Chief Justice was sustained in admitting as evidence the warrant and papers in a legal proceeding to which respondent was related, but not a party directly.—On April 13, 1868,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. R. J. Meigs, clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, was called on behalf of the respondent and testified that on February 22 he affixed the seal of the court to a warrant for the arrest of Lorenzo Thomas. The said Thomas was Adjutant-General of the Army and had been arrested on complaint of Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, who made affidavit that Thomas had been appointed by respondent to take illegal possession of the office of Secretary of War.

The testimony as to the issuance of the warrant having been read, Mr. Henry Stanbery, of counsel for the President, proposed to introduce as evidence the warrant and affidavit on which the warrant was issued.

To this Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler objected.

I have the honor to object, Mr. President, to the warrant and affidavit of Mr. Stanton being received as evidence in this cause. I do not think Mr. Stanton can make testimony against the President by any affidavit that he can put in, or for him by any proceedings between him and Lorenzo Thomas. I do not think the warrant is relevant to this case in any form. The fact that Thomas was arrested has gone in, and that is all. To put in the affidavit upon which he was arrested certainly is putting in res inter alios. It is not a proceeding between Thomas and the President; but this is between Thomas and Stanton, and in no view is it either pertinent or relevant to this case or competent in any form, so far as I am instructed.

Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the President, said:

Mr. Chief Justice and Senators, the arrest of General Thomas was brought into testimony by the managers and they argued, I believe in their opening, before they had proved it, that that was what prevented General Thomas using force to take possession of the War Office. We now propose to show what that arrest was in form and substance by the authentic documents of it, which are the warrant and the affidavit on which it was based. The affidavit, of course, does not prove the facts stated in it; but the proof of the affidavit shows the fact upon which, as a judicial foundation, the warrant proceeded. We then propose to follow the opening thus laid of this proceeding, by showing how it took place and how efforts were made on behalf of General Thomas by habeas corpus to raise the question for the determination of the Supreme Court of the United States in regard to this act.

* * * * * * *

It has already been put in proof by General Thomas that before he went to the court upon this arrest he saw the President and told him of his arrest, and the President immediately replied "that is as it should be;" or "that is as we wish it to be, the question in court." Now, I propose to show that this is the question that was in the courts, to wit, the question of the criminality of a person accused and this civil-tenure bill. And I then propose to sustain the answer of the President, and also the sincerity and substance of this his statement already in evidence, by showing that this proceeding, having been commenced as it was by Mr. Stanton against General Thomas, was immediately taken hold of as the speediest and most rapid mode, through a habeas corpus, in which the President or the Attorney-General, or General Thomas acting in that behalf, would be the actor, in order to bring at once before this court, the supreme court of the District, the question of the validity of his arrest and confinement under an act claimed to be unconstitutional, with an immediate opportunity of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States then in session, from which at once there could have been obtained a determination of the point.

At the conclusion of the argument the Chief Justice [1] said:

The Chief Justice thinks the affidavit upon which the arrest was made is competent testimony, as it relates to a transaction upon which Mr. Thomas has already been examined, and as it may be material to show the purpose of the President to resort to a court of law. He will be happy to put the question to the Senate if any Member desires it. [No Senator being heard to speak.] Read the affidavit.

But before the reading began, Mr. John Conness, a Senator from California, demanded that the question be put to the Senate. This being done, there appeared, yeas 34, nays 17. So the reading of the warrant and affidavit in evidence was permitted.

2273. On April 13, 1868,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, R. J. Meigs, clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, had testified as to the issuance of the warrant for the arrest of Lorenzo Thomas on the affidavit of Edwin M. Stanton, and the warrant and affidavit had been admitted as evidence.

Then Mr. Henry Stanbery, of counsel for the President, asked:

Have you got the docket entries as to the disposition of the case of The United States v. Lorenzo Thomas, and if so will you produce and read them?

Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler objected to the evidence as incompetent.

The Chief Justice [1] said:

The Chief Justice thinks that this is a part of the same transaction, and is competent evidence; but he will put the question to the Senate if any Senator desires it. [After a pause.] The witness will answer the question.

2274. Instance in the Belknap trial wherein a document not pertinent on its face was admitted to prove the negative of a pertinent proposition.—On July 8, 1876,[3] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. John A. McMahon, of the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, proposed the introduction as evidence of this letter, as bearing on the charge that the respondent had a corrupt arrangement with Marsh and Evans, who were interested in the post tradership at Fort Sill:

General Orders, No. 89.] WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
"Washington, October 12, 1872.

The opinion of the Acting Attorney-General upon the following questions is published for the information and guidance of all concerned:

"DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
"Washington, October 3, 1872.

"SIR: I have duly considered the questions which you ask the Attorney-General in your letter of the 11th instant, and which are as follows:

"Where persons such as post traders, contractors, and others have been allowed by proper authority to erect buildings to facilitate their business upon a military reserve, with no restriction as to the term during which they shall be allowed to remain—

"1. Are such buildings, after the removal of the trader, contractor, or other person from the reserve, still his personal estate, and as such has he the right to dispose of them by rent, lease, or sale to other persons?

"2. Does not such property become part of the realty after the appointment of a trader is revoked or a contractor has fulfilled his contract, or any event happens which dissolves their business connection with the reserve?

"By the order of the Secretary of War of June 17, 1871 (a copy of which you inclose to me), it is provided that 'post traders appointed under the authority given by the act of July 15, 1870, will be furnished with a letter of appointment from the Secretary of War, indicating the post to which they are appointed.'

"They will be permitted to erect buildings for the purpose of carrying on their business upon such part of the military reservation or post to which they may be assigned as the commanding officer may direct, such buildings to be within convenient reach of the garrison.

"They will be allowed the exclusive privilege of trade upon the military reserve to which they are appointed, and no other person will be allowed to trade, peddle, or sell goods, by sample or otherwise, within the limits of the reserve.

"They are under military protection and control as camp followers.

"Buildings erected by post traders on a military reserve, in conformity to this order, are erected for the mutual benefit of the Government and the trader, and are not to be regarded as buildings would be erected by trespassers, or even by tenants under leases, in which no provision is made therefor; but they are erected under a license from the Government and for the mutual benefit of both parties. Under these circumstances I am of opinion that by the proper construction of the license these buildings were not intended to become a part of the realty after their erection; but were to continue the property of the traders, and, lest therefore when a trader is removed from his post, I have no doubt that he has a right to remove the building from the place where it was erected; and that when removed he can dispose of the materials as his own property. But it is very clear that the license to erect such buildings is a purely personal one, and is granted for one purpose only. Therefore, under such licenses, the person so erecting the building would have no right to rent or lease the same or even to sell it to another post trader without permission of the military authorities, but his rights are confined solely to that of removing the building from the reserve. Undoubtedly the property in such a building might, with the approval of the commanding officer, be transferred to another post trader, and such permission would have the same force as a license to a new post trader to erect such a building at that spot.

"I return you the papers inclosed.

"I have the honor to be, sir, your very obedient servant,

"CLEMENT HUGH HILL,
"Acting Attorney-General.

"Hon. WILLIAM W. BELKNAP,
"Secretary of War."

Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, objected to the letter as without relevancy and having no possible bearing on the case.

Mr. Manager McMahon said:

We have asked the Adjutant-General for a copy of every order that has been issued since the Grierson complaint in regard to post traders for the purpose of proving a negative, but a very important negative in this case, and that is for the purpose of proving that every order that the Secretary of War issued, by a coincidence of good luck, failed to hit the case of Marsh and Evans.

The President pro tempore having submitted the question to the Senate, the evidence was admitted without division.

2275. In the Belknap trial testimony cumulative as to the fact but not as to the intent of respondent was admitted.—On July 8, 1876,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. Manager John A. McMahon proposed the introduction as evidence of certain letters wherein a complaint had been made through the Solicitor of the Treasury that Evans, the post trader at Fort Sill, was clandestinely selling spirituous liquors, and the following letters in reply thereto:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, November 2, 1871.

SIR: I have the honor to reply to your letter of the 28th ultimo on the subject of the illegal introduction of spirituous liquors, etc., into the Indian country by Evans & Co., and other parties, that previous to the 28th ultimo, on which date Evans, post trader at Fort Sill, was authorized to take to that post monthly ten gallons of brandy and ten gallons of whisky for the use of the officers there, no permit had been given him or the other parties referred to to introduce any liquors into that country.

Very respectfully, etc.,

W. W. B.,
Secretary of War.

The SOLICITOR OF THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

WAR DEPARTMENT, November 8, 1871.

SIR: In further response to your letter of the 28th ultimo on the subject of the alleged illegal introduction of liquors, etc., into the Indian country by certain persons, among others Evans & Co., of Fort Sill, I have the honor to inform you that Mr. John S. Evans, post trader at Fort Sill, through his friends, denies having taken liquor into the Indian country without authority. Mr. Evans was appointed to the post tradership on October 10, 1870, and holds it in his own name and not in that of Evans & Co., and no complaint has ever been made against him by the military authorities at Fort Sill, he having been regarded a good and law-abiding business man.

I therefore request that no proceedings be commenced against him without a thorough investigation of the charges that he has been engaged in such practices shows they were well founded.

Very respectfully, etc.,

W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

To the SOLICITOR OF THE TREASURY.

The respondent was charged in the articles of impeachment with having appointed Evans corruptly and with sharing in connection with one Marsh in a tribute paid by Evans in consideration of the appointment.

Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, said:

I object to all that proof. It does not go, so far as I can ascertain, to sustain any charge made in these articles at all, nor is it evidence of anything necessary for them to prove so far as I can see. They certainly do not state any reason why this should be received. One of the managers says he wants to prove by it that Evans was there acting as post trader and that Belknap knew it. As they have shown the fact that Belknap appointed him, it is pretty good evidence that he knew that Evans was appointed. There is no question made here that Belknap did not know that he was the post trader there; not the slightest. * * * You have proved by the only testimony which can prove it—to wit, the record of his appointment—that he was appointed. After you have proved the record of a judgment in a court of record, you can not call witnesses to prove that the judgment was rendered, because that is cumulative. You have introduced conclusive evidence, and I have said to you that we do not deny it; we make no point upon it. Of course the Secretary knew that Evans was post trader.

Mr. Manager McMahon said:

The letters which we now offer by way of introduction to subsequent letters are letters which make certain specific charges against the post trader, John S. Evans. The theory of this prosecution is, and up to this point tolerably well sustained, that John S. Evans was appointed through the influence of Caleb P. Marsh and in pursuance of a corrupt bargain between them, the profits of which were equally divided between Marsh and the Secretary of War; that the Secretary of War did actually and personally receive his share of the fruits of this arrangement no man who has any regard for testimony can doubt. The great question for this tribunal is whether he received it knowingly, under such circumstances that any officer of honesty and integrity ought to have known where this money was coming from.

The particular point, therefore, to be investigated is the conduct of the Secretary of War. Whenever this particular post trader is affected, from whom he is receiving his gains, the particular point is to discover how the Secretary of War acts. What he may say is very direct and positive testimony, but it is not any more direct and positive than what he may do. * * * We have introduced conclusive evidence that John S. Evans was, in fact, the post trader, but whether the Secretary of War had forgotten the fact in the multitude of his different appointments is another important fact in this case which we propose to show had not occurred; that he had not forgotten that Jonh S. Evans was the post trader, but, on the contrary, that he was receiving testimony as to John S. Evans's good character, supporting and sustaining John S. Evans all along.

The President pro tempore submitted the question to the Senate, who decided without division that the evidence should be admitted.

2276. The Senate in the Belknap trial declined to admit evidence of a fact occurring after respondent had ceased to hold the civil office.

Instance of a ruling by the President pro tempore on a question of evidence in an impeachment trial.

On July 8, 1876,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, E. D. Townshend, a witness on behalf of the United States, was cross-examined by Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, when the latter proposed to offer in evidence a certain circular general order, issued March 7, 1876, from the War Department, and sent to every post in the United States directing the officers to examine whether the post traders were satisfactory; and, if not, to state that fact or to have them removed; and that in pursuance of the order, at Fort Sill on the 11th of April, 1876, there was a meeting of the officers and every one of them recommended the reappointment of Mr. Evans.

Mr. Manager William P. Lynde said:

We object to the introduction of that circular in evidence. It bears date, I think, 7th of March, after the resignation of Mr. Belknap, and has nothing whatever to do with the case now before the court so far as we can see. * * * It seems that this investigation was not had until Mr. Belknap had sent in his resignation and vacated the office of Secretary of War. He had made the appointment previously, it is true, on the recommendation of the officers at Fort Sill, when he was Secretary of War; but he refused to make it until Mr. Marsh threw in his interest and influence with the Secretary of War, who had informed Mr. Evans that he had already promised this appointment to Mr. Marsh. That the officers at Fort Sill found no fault with Mr. Evans and excused him of the high charges which he made for the goods which he sold to the officers and soldiers on the ground that he was paying $12,000 a year bonus we are informed by the letters of the commanding officers at the post and by the other evidence we have introduced in the trial. Therefore that these same officers should, subsequent to the resignation of the Secretary of War, when this matter was under investigation and when Mr. Evans was no longer called upon to pay this bonus of $12,000, have sufficient confidence in his integrity to recommend his continuance in that position, makes nothing in favor of the accused in this case. We therefore claim that it has no pertinency to the issue before the Senate, and ask that it may be excluded.

Mr. Montgomery Blair, of counsel for the respondent, said:

Mr. President and Senators, the court will observe that there are two theories here; one by the prosecution and one by the defense, and they recur at every stage of this case. Yesterday we had this battle with the managers, they assuming that we knew of these arrangements, of the existence of this contract, and were receiving knowingly this money. Of course they think that theory is true, and of course they think there is no other theory in the case. But there is another which we mean to make good to this court, and it is that we knew nothing of the consideration whatever; that this appointment was made in perfect good faith; that so far as we knew the law was being executed, and when failure of its execution was called to our attention we got the advice of our officers, those who were most familiar with this case, and got their remedies and applied them. They would think the argument to be on their side that we ought to have immediately removed this man, broken up his establishment, and turned him out, as the President did when the fact was finally brought to his attention and it was published that this contract existed. Let the Senate assume, as we infer they will assume, that the Secretary of War knew nothing of this transaction between these other parties; and that this man executed his duties faithfully. That he did execute them faithfully and that he was a good officer, we think is proved by the unanimous recommendation of the officers and soldiers at this post. We want now to show to the court that this officer, notwithstanding all the charges which were made, was recognized as a good and proper officer, and did his duty so satisfactorily that every officer at the post recommended his reappointment. We think this competent proof. We think this proper to go before the Senate as a circumstance to weigh in their judgment upon this case.

The President pro tempore having submitted the question, "Shall the circular be admitted?" the question was determined in the negative without division.

Thereupon Mr. Carpenter offered the recommendation made by the council of administration, which convened at Fort Sill on March 7, 1876.

Mr. Manager John A. McMahon objected.

The President pro tempore[1] said:[2]

On the same principle decided by the Senate, the Chair sustains the objection, the paper being subsequent to the resignation of the Secretary of War. * * * The Chair * * * decided it on the principle that it was subsequent to the date of resignation, and on that the Chair ruled. The Chair will, however, submit the question to the Senate, if desired, Shall this paper be admitted?

The question was determined in the negative without division.

2277. Judge Swayne being charged with submitting false certificates of expenses, evidence tending to show that other judges had submitted similar certificates was excluded.

Letters from other judges stating their construction of the law as to expenses were not admitted in behalf of Judge Swayne, charged with submitting false certificates.

[2] Record of trial, p. 211.

A statement signed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but not under seal, summarizing the contents of official documents, was objected to as evidence in the Swayne trial.

Objection that new matter in respondent's answer, not responsive to any charge in the articles, should not lay a foundation for the introduction of evidence.

On February 23, 1905,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, in the course of the introduction of testimony, made the following offer:

I now offer in evidence certified statements from the Treasury of the United States showing in detail the number of days in each year from April 1, 1895, down to March 31, 1903, during which the several circuit and district judges of the United States were attending court away from home or out of their districts, and showing the amount of expenses for travel and attendance to which each and all of them certified and received.

I make this offer as tending to show from an analysis of the certificates and accounts the contemporaneous judgment which has been placed upon the statute in question by the action of many of the judges of the courts of the United States, and also by the administrative officers of the Treasury Department.

Mr. Manager Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, objected, saying:

I desire that it be noted on the record that what this paper purports to be, as stated in the caption, is this:

"Statement showing amounts paid to United States circuit judges as expenses claimed while attending circuit courts of appeals away from their residences, and amounts paid to United States district judges as expenses claimed while holding court out of their own said courts, being in the first circuit."

And then there is one for each of the other eight circuits. * * * To that I offer the objection, which I will ask the Secretary to read:

The Secretary read as follows:

First It is not responsive to any allegation contained in any of the articles of impeachment.

Second. If the subject-matter of the offer in any way relates to averments contained in the answers of respondent to the first, second, and third articles of impeachment, nevertheless, the said averments are not responsive to any charge contained in the articles of impeachment and present no issue for determination in this cause.

Third. The offer of respondent is only to show that the judges named did receive for their expenses an amount equal to $10 a day in the aggregate, but does not include an offer to prove that they did not actually expend as much as, or more than, the amount charged by the honorable judges to the Government as their said expenses of travel and attendance in holding court, and the evidence is therefore immaterial and irrelevant.

Fourth. That it is not averred in the answer nor offered to prove that the respondent, either at the time of or prior to the alleged false certification of his expenses in 1897, had consulted or conferred with or taken the opinion or had knowledge of the action of any of the judges referred to in the offer.

Fifth. It is not competent for respondent, in his own defense, to prove the usage or practices of other judges in other courts, particularly as it is not offered to show that he had knowledge thereof.

Sixth. If respondent has been guilty, as charged, of falsely certifying his expenses and collecting upon his own certificate an excessive amount from the Government, it is no justification for him to show that he subsequently ascertained that others had been guilty of the same offense.

Seventh. The certificates offered from the Treasury Department are not under its seal as required by the statute to make them admissible in evidence.

Eighth. The statements offered are not copies of any official papers or records remaining in the Treasury Department, but consist of some figures and data purported to have been made up after the consideration of such papers and records. They do not purport to show the amounts of expenses certified by the judges named therein, nor whether they were more or less than $10 a day. They show merely the amounts alleged to have been paid in each instance, without stating whether the said amount was more or less than the amount certified by the judge to have been expended. They do not include the certificate of the judge nor the account of the marshal who paid him. They are partial and incomplete, and not authorized by any statute to be used as evidence.

Ninth. The offer contains an unwarranted insinuation that other judges have collected from the Government for expenses sums greater than they actually expended, but without showing or offering to show what amounts they actually did expend, or certified as having been expended, and if received, will necessitate the calling of all of the said judges, as a matter of justice to them and to all the people of the United States, for the purpose of rebutting the said insinuation contained in the offer.

Mr. Manager Olmsted then said:

Mr. President, if I may be permitted to speak upon this point, there is nothing in any article of impeachment making any reference whatever to any Federal judge save only this respondent, who is himself charged in the first article with having in 1897 falsely certified to the amount of his expenses and received the money upon his said certificate. In his answer, after admitting that he did make that certificate, but denying in rather a vague way its falsity, he says, on page 27 of this record—it is the last paragraph on the page—

"respondent says that he is fortified and confirmed in his honest belief that the construction so placed by him, etc., was and is right * * * by the fact that he is informed"—

Now, in 1905, nine years after he made that certificate, he is informed—

"and verily believes, and as the records of the Treasury Department will show, that many of the circuit judges of the United States and district judges did the same thing."

That, I submit, Mr. President, is new matter, not responsive to anything in the charge and having no proper place in the respondent's answer, and evidence under it is inadmissible upon the ruling of the Presiding Officer and of the Senate made upon the 14th instant upon our offer to prove the inconvenience to suitors and counsel of the absence of the respondent from his district. It was ruled inadmissible. That evidence was responsive to new matter inserted in the answer of the respondent, but the answer itself in that particular was not responsive to any averment in the articles of impeachment.

I want, just at this point, Mr. President, to state that the honorable counsel for the respondent took us to task for making a written offer embracing an admission made by the respondent, to which they objected. He took us to task in terms of great indignation for trying to get before the Senate matter in an improper way. I call your attention to these three exhibits attached to their answer, and ask what words of condemnation are strong enough to apply to the introduction in that manner of what is intended to be evidence in advance of the hearing of the case for the purpose of influencing the court in its decision? Upon the ruling I have already cited, and upon every authority, this evidence would have to be rejected for that reason.

But next, Mr. President, the offer is only to show that the judges named in those papers did, in certain instances, receive for their expenses as much, or a sum equal to $10 for each day if divided by the number of days. But it is not offered to show—the statement offered does not even refer to the subject, and respondent makes no offer to show—that those judges, nor any of them, did not actually expend that sum, and this is, I say, a cowardly insinuation against honorable judges—the dragging of their names in the mire without any attempt to prove that they have been guilty of any offense whatever.

Of course, Mr. President, if a judge is holding court in New Orleans, where, as I know from very recent experience, people may reasonably expend a good deal more than $10, or in New York, or in Chicago, or in San Francisco, and if his expenses amounted to $12.50 to $15 a day, he could get not to exceed $10; and so, of course, this statement would show that what he got amounted to $10. That is the maximum fixed by the law, but it is not the slightest evidence that he did not expend the money. They do not offer to introduce the certificates showing what his actual expenses were. So I say, that, lacking that essential element, it is not evidence at all in this case.

It is not pretended that this respondent at the time of making his certificate in 1897 knew the opinion of or consulted any other judge in the United States.

In regard to the fifth objection, Mr. President, it is not competent for the respondent in his own defense to prove the usage or practice of other courts or other counties. I propose to submit a very high authority. In the celebrated trial of Prescott in Massachusetts, made notable by the eminent array of counsel and managers involved, Judge Prescott, the probate judge, entitled upon one side of the court to take fees, was charged with taking more than the law permitted him.

In one case the excess was $1.98, and in another article some $39 of excessive fees were involved. He was convicted upon both charges. He offered to prove the usage of other courts and other counties throughout the State for the purpose of showing his intent to have been an honest one and in accordance with the practice throughout the State. That offer was made by Mr. Samuel Hoar and supported by himself and Daniel Webster, but they were completely overthrown in their argument by Mr. Manager Shaw—the same Mr. Shaw who afterwards became chief justice of the supreme court of Massachusetts, and, in the opinion of many men, secured a place in the history of the jurisprudence of this country second only to that of Chief Justice Marshall. I ask that the court will hear the offer which was made by Mr. Hoar in that case:

The Secretary read as follows:

The counsel for the respondent read the motions when put into writing, as follows, viz:

"1. And now the counsel for the respondent move that, in order to rebut the charge of willful and corrupt misconduct, they may be permitted to prove that at the time of the respondent's appointment to office there did exist, and continually since has existed, in the probate offices of the several counties in this Commonwealth a practice according to which, in cases of application for administration, certain official papers are prepared and executed and certain official acts done and performed which are not particularly enumerated in the statute called the 'fee bill,' and fees paid therefor, and to show the usual amount of such fees.

"2. And now the counsel for the respondent move that, in order to rebut the charge of willful and corrupt misconduct, they may be permitted to prove that at the time of the respondent's appointment to office there did exist, and continually since has existed, in the probate offices of the several counties of this Commonwealth a practice according to which, in cases of application for administration, certain official papers are prepared and executed and certain official acts done and performed which are not particularly enumerated in the statute of the Commonwealth, commonly called the 'fee bill.'"

Mr. President, to make this as brief as possible, that offer having been elaborately argued by those eminent gentlemen, was rejected by a vote of more than 2 to 1. Judge Prescott was convicted and removed from office upon those two articles. If this respondent has been guilty of any offense it is no excuse for him to say that somebody else did the same thing in later years, and in some other court; and in any event his offer does not include anything tending to show improper conduct by any other judge.

But again, that paper is not offered under the seal of any Department. It is not so authenticated as to be admissible in evidence. It does not purport to be a copy of any record in any Department. It is simply a lot of figures made up by somebody purporting to have been abstracted or extracted from certain documents, we know not what. It certainly does not show that any other judge ever certified to $10 of expenses when his actual expenses were less.

Now, when we offered the three certificates showing Judge Swayne's certificates and the action thereon we were required by the honorable counsel for the respondent to put in the whole record, the marshal's account, the action of the Treasury Department—every paper on file. These papers which they offer are not evidence in any proceeding on earth and would not be received in any court in Christendom.

Mr. Anthony Higgins, of counsel for the respondent, said:

Mr. President, I must confess to my surprise at the last objection raised by the learned manager. It is true, I find, that the certificate to these statements is not attested by the seal of the Treasury Department, but it is signed by the Secretary of the Treasury; and the only effect of that objection would be to require us to have the seal put to this paper between this time and the next meeting of this body. I hardly suppose that the learned managers will stand on that. An objection which merely goes to the authentication and which does not dispute its genuineness, it seems to me, is hardly worthy of either this tribunal or this grave proceeding. Nor have I supposed that either side in the prosecution of this case would undertake to put unnecessary tasks upon the other or lengthen the proceedings.

The learned manager said that the counsel for the respondent had compelled the managers to put in evidence certain certificates of the judge when they put in their Treasury statements in support of the articles against Judge Swayne—the first, second, and third. We put no compulsion upon them that I remember. They took their own course, and a very proper course. They rely upon their allegation of the untruthfulness of the certificate, and of course they put in the certificate. It would have been open to us to have loaded up this record with all of these papers from the Treasury Department and to have brought the originals here to the extreme disturbance of the public business. But, as we supposed, contributing to the need of dispatch of the Senate under its present conditions, we have got a succinct statement which gives all the material facts; for, Mr. President, behind the certificate here, as to every item, it is presumable, and there certainly is in the Treasury Department, certain other evidence. The course of proceeding in this case, as shown by the very certificate put in by the managers, is that at the end of a session of court held by a judge away from his home, at the circuit court of appeals, or away from his district in the district court, he presents his certificate to the marshal, stating the number of days and the amount of expenses, which he certifies to, and on that the marshal pays to him the amount and takes his receipt, which, under the form prescribed by the Department of Justice, is at the bottom of the certificate. A form of that was presented by my colleague only a few moments ago and admitted without objection

That certificate is by the statute made the voucher upon which the marshal is reimbursed for his payment to the judge; and, as I shall call attention to, the statute requires that he shall be repaid—that he shall be allowed his account. The marshal then presents such item with the other items going to make up his account, his entire account, under the act of 1875, which we put in evidence here this afternoon, to the United States judge for that court. In the particular cases, we have an object lesson here in the certificate introduced by the managers in condemnation of Judge Swayne, that there the marshal of Texas in two instances presented that account before the local judge, Judge Bryant, who did not sit in two certain trials growing out of the failure of a bank because he was interested in the matter in some way, and Judge Swayne held two long trials, one in one year and the other in another year, and made these certificates.

Now, the marshal presented his account to Judge Bryant, and, under the statute, the United States attorney for that district was at that time required to be present and his presence to be noted upon the record. The marshal's account had to be sworn to. The judge's certificate is prescribed, and the statute prescribes that he shall approve or disapprove of that account, as shall be according to law and as may be just.

So you have now the act of the marshal in paying the judge, and the act of the local judge in approving the account in the presence of the district attorney, who is there when he approves it in order to protect the United States. All that happens in the very district where the expenditures are made and where the judge knows and the district attorney knows and the marshal knows, each of their own knowledge, as to what is the amount of expenses that would be involved in a residence there. The account then goes with the marshal's to the Department of Justice, under the terms of the act which will be printed in the Record to-morrow, and is there audited, in the first instance, by the Auditor of the Department of Justice. From there, after the lapse of sixty days, it goes to the Treasury Department and is audited by the Auditor for the State and other Departments. It is then subject to the disallowance of the Comptroller, either of his own motion or upon its being brought before him.

You have, therefore, Mr. President, in this case the act in succession of six executive officers in confirmation or disallowance of such accounts. These certificates show that there has not been a single account disallowed by all of these officers; that from the beginning to the end there has been no objection made under the terms of this statute to the construction placed upon it by Judge Swayne, namely, that the certificate under which the payments were made were those that allowed a certificate of $10 a day irrespective of the fact as to whether that amount was actually expended or not. * * * I ask the learned manager if this fraud, which is a fraud before this Senate, was not such a fraud when it was brought before Judge Bryant? If it is a fraud now, it was a fraud then; and was there anything that has been proved by these witnesses that Judge Bryant did not know of his own knowledge? Did he reside in Tyler? I do not care. If he did, he knew it because he lived there. Did he reside elsewhere? Then he had to go away from his home, though in his district, to be sure, when he held court in Tyler, and he knew what it cost him just as much as Judge Swayne knew. Did not the district attorney know it? Did not the marshal know it? And does the learned counsel pretend to say that because of the terms of this certificate, as prescribed by the acts of 1891 and 1896, if that was a crime, it was not the duty of that district attorney to present Judge Swayne to his grand jury and have him indicted; that it was not the duty of Judge Bryant to bring it to the attention of the district attorney; that it was not the duty of the marshal to protest? Is it possible that there is any fraud that can exist within the jurisdiction of the Auditor of the Department of Justice, of the Auditor of the Treasury Department, of the Comptroller of the Treasury that they can not unkennel and uncover, and that it is not their duty to do it?

No, Mr. President, it can not be held in the face of that that any such construction could be put by them upon the act of 1891 and the act of 1896 as to these fees. They did not abandon their duty; they do not stand here as convicted of any such absence or lack of it. What they did do was to say, "We are concluded by the certificate because we can not go behind it; we are concluded by the certificate because the statute intended to make it an allowance when the judge certified it, irrespective of what the actual expenses were."

The Senate will perceive, Mr. President, therefore, that the admissibility of these certificates rest upon something else than the mere act of the circuit and district judges of the United States in their several and respective actions in the amounts they certified under this statute. It brings up as a ground of admissibility of these certificates the cotemporary construction placed by the executive officers upon the certificates of the judges as made from time to time. The form in which we have presented it is compendious. It is stripped of every unnecessary matter of evidence, which would merely load it up with lumber. It is brought down to the naked skeleton of facts of what is vital; but it puts before the Senate all of the evidence, coupled with the acts of Congress, that is necessary, and is in no sense unfair to the managers, because it apprises them of everything that they might desire to know.

Mr. President, I had hoped that this discussion would be left to the final argument; and for my colleague and myself we are willing that that course should be pursued now. I would stop at once any further discussion of this subject and leave it until the final argument to complete then what I have already said, so as not to take up the time of the Senate; but that offer does not seem to meet with the views of the learned managers, and I am compelled, therefore, to go into the discussion of the case—I say of the case—as made now by this objection to our certificates.

What we contend, Mr. President, is that the proper construction of these acts of Congress of 1891 and 1896 as to judges holding court away from their homes or out of their districts, is the one placed upon it by Judge Swayne; and that is they were authorized to certify their expenses at $10 a day as an allowance or compensation for such services. I shall endeavor to be very brief. The act is:

"That any justice or judge who, in pursuance of the provisions of this act, shall attend the circuit court of appeals held at any place other than where he resides"—

And, mutatis mutandis, it is the same in the case of a district judge when he holds court out of his district—

"shall, upon his written certificate, be paid by the marshal of the district in which the court shall be held his reasonable expenses for travel and attendance, not to exceed $10 per day, and such payments shall be allowed the marshal in the settlement of his accounts with the United States."

The prior state of the law was that the Judge for such service was paid his actual expenses upon vouchers filed with his accounts. This will not be disputed, I presume, and I have assumed that there is no doubt as to the state of the law.

The true construction of these statutes is that Congress intended that a judge rendering such service should be paid $10 a day as an allowance for compensation for the service. That such is the true construction of the act will appear from its provisions, as shown by its language, and from the changes wrought thereby.

What is meant by "reasonable expenses" as used in the act? It was changed, Mr. President, from "actual expenses" and, therefore, presumably on its face does not mean "actual expenses." * * * Understand, Mr. President, I am arguing that this evidence is admissible because of the contemporary construction placed upon the statute by the officers, and that the statute is one which will bear construction, that it is open to construction. If it is not open to construction, if it is so clear, as the managers contend, that there is no doubt about it, in such case as that the authorities would not apply.

I must therefore make a case where it is apparent upon the face of the statute that it is doubtful and is uncertain, and hence I am compelled to go to that task if this question is to be determined on its merits. I regret it very much.

All the expenses must not merely be reasonable. The term "expenses incurred in travel" is easily defined, but it is difficult to place limits upon the term "attendance." Certainly it can reasonably be held to include (1) many expenses which might not be included under the word "actual" as construed by the accounting officers of the Government; (2) many expenses not incurred in attendance, but caused by attendance, and (3) the expenses are "not to exceed $10 a day."

What light does this provision taken in connection with the words "for travel and attendance," throw upon the true construction of the words "reasonable expenses?" If a judge spends $13 one day and $7 another, shall he certify $20 for the two days, or only $10 for the one day and $7 for the other, and $17 in all? * * * I had very nearly completed, Mr. President, the argument I was submitting about the fact that contemporary construction applies because the statute itself is one that is loosely drawn. If the words "not to exceed $10 a day" are given a hard and fast interpretation, then it must be held to mean in the case to which I have already referred that it is not to exceed $10 for any one day, and so in this instance supposed the judge would certify $17 and lose $3. That is, if he expended $7 one day and $13 another, he could only certify to the $7 that he spent that day, and only $10 for the day he spent $13; but even the learned managers will not contend that that is the construction. Why? Because it is "for travel and attendance." Oh, they say, going about large districts, you have got to have traveling expenses, and a man will spend $20 or $30 a day sometimes in traveling and all that; but what becomes, then, of your construction that it is $10 from day to day?

But, again, Mr. President, did the word "reasonable" mean an amount not as fixed by the judge's certificate, but as determined by the personal habits of the judge, and, indeed, the state of his health, or the individual limitations of his physical needs?

But light is shed upon the meaning of the words "reasonable expenses," as used in the act, by its provisions fixing who shall determine what expenses are reasonable.

That takes me to what I have already submitted, namely, a cotemporary construction, in which it is said that the amounts shall be allowed to the marshal in his accounts, and the sum on the certificate shall be paid by the marshal.

I assume, again, in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Daniel], that it is by no means clear. On the contrary, I think it is clearly the other way; that under this act the certificate of the judge is conclusive; that is, that it is irrebuttable and irreversible, because the statute makes it so. I submit to the Senate, as a most serious matter, that it is not irreversible where there is knowledge that a fraud has been committed; and I can add nothing to what I have already said as to the case where the district attorney, the marshal, and the judge all have knowledge of it.

Mr. President, not detaining the Senate longer on that, I appeal to a case that is higher authority, I submit, than the one cited by the learned manager from an impeachment trial in Massachusetts; and that is the case of The United States v. Hill, where the doctrine of cotemporary construction was applied to a statute nothing like as ambiguous and loosely drawn and uncertain as the one now under consideration here. That case was where a clerk of the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts had not returned in his emoluments his fees for naturalization papers.

Mr. Manager Olmsted concluded the argument—

In the first place, the act itself does not vest any power or discretion in Judge Bryant, or the marshal, or anybody else except the judge who certifies, for it provides:

"For reasonable expenses for travel and attendance of district judges directed to hold court outside of their districts, not to exceed $10 per day each, to be paid on written certificates of the judges, and such payment shall be allowed the marshal in settlement of his account with the United States."

Provided the judge certified to a sum not to exceed $10 a day, what marshal had the right to sit on the account? I would not like to be that marshal. He would have been in jail for contempt inside of thirty minutes. What judge had a right to pass upon it? What Treasury official had a right to pass upon it? No one. The judge makes a certificate as to his expenses; and if it does not exceed $10 a day it is paid without question, and must be.

Now, in this offer of evidence there is not a word about the amount expended by any other judge. It is not pretended in there that any judge did not expend every dollar for which he was reimbursed by the Government. There is not anything in there about the construction of any official. We do not know whether their expenses exceeded $10 or not. We only know they did not get more than $10 for any one day.

Now, one word more about the absence of the seal from that paper. Of course there is no seal on it, and it is not a question of waiting until to-morrow for them to get a seal on it. There can not be a seal on it. The Department can only put the seal on certified copies of papers or documents in the Department, which that is not. The act of Congress provides.

"Copies of any books, records, papers, or documents in any of the Executive Departments authenticated under the seals of such Departments, respectively, shall be admitted in evidence equally with the originals thereof."

That is not a copy of any record or any document or any book. It is some figures taken off by somebody, and we do not know who, and it simply shows the amounts paid to the judges therein named. There is no insinuation, except by counsel, that any one of these honorable judges charged or certified to any amount in excess of his actual expenses. There is nothing upon which to base the insinuation that a judge, having expended two or three or five dollars a day, certified that the expenses were $10 and collected the money from the Government.

On the same day, at the evening session, the question of the admissibility of the evidence was put by the Presiding Officer:[1]

The Presiding Officer thinks it becomes the duty of the Presiding Officer again to submit to the Senate the question with regard to the admission of evidence offered by counsel for respondent, which was submitted when a quorum of the Senate was not present, but when a quorum of the Senators sworn in the impeachment trial was present.

Counsel for the respondent offer in evidence certain statements of the Secretary of the Treasury, not under seal, purporting to show amounts paid to United States circuit judges as expenses claimed while attending circuit courts of appeals away from their residences and amounts paid to United States district judges as expenses claimed while holding court out of their own districts or while attending circuit courts of appeals away from their residences.

The question is, Shall the statement referred to be admitted in evidence? [Putting the question.] The "noes" appear to have it. The "noes" have it, and the statement is not admissible.[2]

Mr. Thurston then said:

Mr. President, I should like to have the Reporter read my two previous offers, which I desire to remake in the same terms I did before, and let the ruling be had upon them.

The Reporter read as follows:

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. President, we offer and ask to have incorporated in the record the opinion of the three circuit judges of one circuit, construing the law under which articles 1, 2, and 3 are framed. To be perfectly fair, I will state that this is in the shape of a letter, and has been written recently. On the question of offering it, I do not care to state to whom it is addressed or what judges sign it, but I offer it as an opinion of those judges on this question. The date of it is February 6, 1905.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Presiding Officer will exclude that paper.

Mr. THURSTON. I ask to have my second offer read.

The Reporter read as follows:

Mr. THURSTON. We offer in addition thereto similar opinions contained in letters of about the same date, signed by fifteen members of the Federal judiciary. They are all the same.

Mr. Manager PALMER. If they are similar——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. For what purpose?

Mr. THURSTON. For the same purpose that I offered the single letter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. For what purpose?

Mr. THURSTON. For the purpose of showing the construction placed by these judges on the statute under which articles 1, 2, and 3 are framed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Presiding Officer will exclude those papers.

[2] A short time previously the yeas and nays had been taken on this question, showing 10 votes for admission and 34 for exclusion. This vote showed the absence of a quorum, and therefore was of no effect, except as indicating the division of opinion.

2278. The Senate in the Belknap trial admitted evidence of an act which, in substance, amounted only to a refusal of respondent to confess culpability.—On July 8, 1876,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, E. D. Townshend, Adjutant-General of the Army, a witness for the United States, was cross-examined by Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, and asked what the finding of the court-martial was in the case of Capt. George T. Robinson, of the Tenth Cavalry, and especially for a letter addressed by the said Robinson to W. W. Belknap, Secretary of War, and dated St. Louis Barracks, Mo., April 2, 1875. Mr. Carpenter explained the purpose of this evidence:

This man Robinson was, as I understand, court-martialed and sentenced by the court to be dismissed the service. He was at the St. Louis Barracks at the time; and after the finding by the court was sent on to Washington to be approved by the Secretary of War he wrote a letter to the Secretary substantially stating the allegations which are now made in these articles and by the testimony offered by the managers, and containing what we regard as a blackmailing appeal to the Secretary of War, that he must disapprove of the findings of that court or the writer would take steps to disclose what he says existed in regard to the tradership at Fort Sill. (It was for transactions in connection with this tradership that the respondent was impeached.) Thereupon General Belknap examined the papers in the case, found that the proceedings were regular, that the court was justified in its finding, and he approved the finding and cashiered the captain, and filed this of record.

Mr. Manager George F. Hoar objected to the evidence:

Mr. President, it seems to me that that act of the Secretary of War affords no evidence or presumption of his innocence. A blackmailing officer, himself convicted by court-martial, sent to the Secretary a certain threat and demanded certain action. If the Secretary of War had acceded to his demand, he would have put himself in the power of that officer forever; and the acceding to that demand or concealing the letter from the persons about him in the War Department would have been a confession of guilt. On the contrary, the exhibition of the letter and the going on with the court-martial was denial. All, therefore, that it is offered to show from the conduct of the Secretary of War is that in April, 1875, being charged with this offense, he denied it and did not confess it; in other words, he seeks to make evidence for himself by proving a denial, which is the substance of his own conduct.

The question on the admission of the paper being submitted to the Senate, they decided, yeas 21, nays 18, that it should be received. So the objection was overruled.

2279. In the Belknap trial the Senate, by a bare majority, admitted, to show intent, evidence that respondent had not inquired into newspaper charges reflecting on his subordinates.—On July 10, 1876,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Mr. Whitelaw Reid, editor of the New York Tribune, was called as a witness for the United States, and examined as to a certain article which appeared in the Tribune as to the relations of the respondent with the post tradership at Fort Sill. In the course of the examination Mr. Manager John A. McMahon asked:

You can state now whether at any time, personally or by letter, the Secretary of War addressed you any communication to find out your authority for the statements in that article.

Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, objected that the testimony sought was wholly immaterial and irrelevant to the case.

[2] First session Forty-fourth Congress, Senate Journal, p. 967; Record of trial, pp. 218, 219.

Mr. Manager McMahon argued:

We do not know at this stage of the objection whether the witness will say "yes" or will say "no," and therefore the argument must be directed on the hypothesis that he may answer either way, and at this stage of the inquiry, if it is admissible in case he should answer either way, it is, of course, competent, and I think it is competent no matter how it may be answered. Why? Here is an article charging the existence of a grievance at Fort Sill, the payment of a tribute by one man to another for being kept in the place. We have already called Mr. Smalley, who wrote the article, and proved by him that no inquiry was made of him as to the authorship of that article, and that there was no general conversation had in regard to it. We now propose to go to the headquarters, to the fountain, and inquire whether anything was said to the editor of the paper in regard to this matter; and for this purpose I do not care what the answer may be. If the answer is "yes," we desire the communication, whatever it may have been; if the answer is "no," our argument will be, in my judgment, equally strong, if not stronger, than it would be if we had the direct communication.

Now, I will put it on the hypothesis that the witness will answer "yes." Are we not entitled to know what the Secretary of War said when such a thing as this was published? I need not argue that question. Suppose now that he will answer "no;" are we not entitled to a knowledge of the fact as we propose to prove it here that, although these charges were publicly made in regard to the management of affairs at Fort Sill, the names having been given, the parties being specified, and one of the parties specified being, as we shall show, at that time an intimate personal friend of the Secretary of War, at no stage of the proceedings was any inquiry made by the Secretary of War from any person who would have any right to speak in regard to the source of the information of the facts stated in that communication? We draw our argument from that, and I have no objection to stating it. Our argument is this, that his conduct in that matter is the conduct of a guilty man; it is the conduct of a man who knows that the facts exist; of a man who knows all about the statements in the New York Tribune article, and he does not care to go to anybody to find out the authority.

Mr. Carpenter said:

The rule, of course, must be the same here as it would be in the trial of any criminal case in a court of law, and is this Senate to establish the rule that, as often as a newspaper contains a libel upon an individual, that individual must go and shoot the editor, or must sue him for libel, or demand his authority for the article, or stand convicted of the charge? That is the question. They propose to convict this man of everything said in that article because he did not go and make a row about it, because he did not go and demand the authority upon which it was published, bring a libel suit, or shoot the editor. The man who is perfectly conscious of integrity in the matter never runs after such articles—at least there is no law that compels him to do so, and there is no law of presumption against him if he refuses to do it. I should be surprised to see any judicial court establish such a rule, and I should be anxious and curious to see how many of the Senators now sitting in the view of the Chair would be on their way for about five hundred editors within the next twenty-four hours. If it is a good rule against the Secretary of War, it is a good rule against any public man or any private citizen, and as often as any one of you Senators see a libel upon you in regard to any subject you must "jump for" the editor or you confess your guilt.

The President pro tempore having submitted the question, "Shall the managers be permitted to propound said interrogatory to the witness?" it was decided in the negative without division.

Then this question was asked:

Q. (By Mr. Manager McMahon.) Did you receive any communication from General McDowell in regard to this article in the New York Tribune?

Mr. Carpenter objected to the question.

Mr. Manager McMahon said:

Mr. President, I simply propose to show that at the time this thing occurred a communication was addressed, and to call for that and have it handed to me. Then I propose to have General McDowell recalled, and to refresh his recollection by the contents of that letter. I do not propose to offer it now. * * * Am I not entitled to prove a certain letter which I desire to use in the progress of this case, and to identify it as the letter which the witness has received from a certain person in due course of mail?

The question being submitted to the Senate, they decided without division that the interrogatory might be propounded.

Later, during the same day,[1] Gen. William B. Hazen was called as a witness on behalf of the United States, and Mr. Manager McMahon asked:

State, if you know, who furnished the information upon which the New York Tribune article was published.

This question was later modified to this form:

After the publication of this article in the New York Tribune, state whether the Secretary of War, officially or otherwise, made any inquiry of you in regard to the truth of the statements contained in that article.

Mr. Carpenter objected.

Mr. McMahon explained:

From our own standpoint, assuming the testimony which we have already given to be correct, which we have a right to do, we have heretofore proven that the article in the New York Tribune was brought to the knowledge of General Belknap. We have to-day proven that General Belknap had ascertained that the authority for those charges was General Hazen, who had Fort Sill within his lines and who had troops stationed there. We have had from another source that General Belknap was exceedingly indignant * * * because General Hazen had represented it to a committee instead of to him. Now, this is the inference we want to draw from it: There is no libel in the New York Tribune article upon Secretary Belknap; on the contrary, if you will read that article you will find that it expressly excludes the Secretary from participation in this matter, and says that he knows nothing about it It is no libel upon him in a newspaper, which is a subject upon which my friend is so sensitive, and upon which the counsel made the point, and very properly, that a man should not every time run and see the author of a newspaper article; but here are charges put in this article, coming from an officer whose name is not given, but then at the bottom of it is stated that these charges are made on the authority of a high officer under the Government in the Army. Here is the Secretary of War not charged, not implicated, no libel put upon his character, no stain upon him, but a grievance, a monstrous grievance, is called to his attention, one that demanded the immediate arm of the Government to remedy if it were true. While I submit to the decision that was made a while ago in regard to the testimony of Mr. Whitelaw Reid, and did not propose to argue it at that time, I say that it is the very highest kind of testimony upon a question like this, that when these charges are made in a public newspaper, not against this gentleman who is upon trial, but against certain other individuals, and public attention is called to them, an extract from a letter quoted with quotation marks to indicate that it is an extract from an officer at that point, and then that is fathered by a leading officer in the Army—I say we have a right to show, as we propose now to show, that instead of hunting up whether these things are true or not, instead of endeavoring as an officer of the Army to correct these evils, he cloaks them, does not inquire even when he knows the officer who is the authority for this statement, or the officer commanding this particular post. He shuts his eye to the transaction and goes nowhere for information. He goes neither to Mr. Smalley, who wrote the article, nor to Mr. Reid, who published it, nor to General Hazen, who was the authority for it, and as we shall show hereafter, he neither goes to Evans nor to Caleb P. Marsh to learn anything about it.

Are there no inferences to be drawn from these facts? Is it not the best kind of testimony when we have got the peculiar case that we have here? Then what are your relations, Mr. Secretary, or what were your relations to this man? Was Mr. Marsh privately milking him and dividing with you and you knew it? The inference is almost irresistible that he was aware of all these facts. He knew that General Hazen was the man who was responsible for this statement, and yet he neither corrects the abuses nor calls upon General Hazen in any shape or form.

Mr. Carpenter argued:

The testimony has already shown that Belknap was indignant at Hazen because he had violated the regulations of the Army and had not communicated what he pretended to know as a fact through the military channels, as it was his duty to do, but poured it out into the bosom of a congressional committee. The testimony also shows that Belknap did go to work investigating this matter through the proper channels. He wrote a letter to Grierson, who was in command of the post, and to Evans, and to others there, in regard to the matter. The letter of Mr. Grierson making his report is on the 18th of February. It was received about ten days after that, and the order correcting the whole thing was made on the 25th of March.

Is it possible that Mr. Belknap is to be condemned here because he did not select that particular method of investigation which the managers wish he had selected? He went to work regularly and efficiently. He did not wish to imitate the irregular conduct of General Hazen. Because Hazen had violated his duty and the regulations of the Army, it was not necessary that Belknap should also violate his duty, nor was it necessary that he should chase the newspaper or chase any correspondent of a newspaper; but he set immediately to work investigating through the regular military channels, where officers made their reports upon their character as officers and where if they were untrue they could be court-martialed for their untruth; not anonymous correspondence in newspapers, but regular official investigation, and on the 25th of March the whole matter was cured by the order of that date.

That is the state of facts. The question put to the witness is, Did General Belknap go to you about this matter? They might as well call any other man in Washington and ask, "Did he go to you about it." Belknap was under no obligation to go to General Hazen. He went through the regular channel to the commander of the post. General Hazen was not the commander of that post, and if General Hazen had known anything of irregularities there while he was in command of the post the regulations of war made it his duty to communicate it through the military authorities, not through political and congressional channels, but to make it directly through the official military channels. Then it could be corrected according to the discipline of the Army.

The question being put, "Shall the managers be permitted to propound the said interrogatory?" there appeared ayes 19, noes 18. So the interrogatory was propounded.

2280. In the Peck trial a witness was not permitted to testify to general public opinion on a subject not closely related to respondent's act.

Instance wherein, during an impeachment trial, the respondent personally examined a witness.

On January 11, 1831,[1] in the high court of impeachment, during the trial of the cause of The United States v. James H. Peck, a witness, Robert Walsh, was under examination, when this question was asked by the respondent himself:

Do you or not know that at and before the time of the publication there was a general belief in the State of Missouri that many claims to lands in that State, under Spanish grants, were fraudulent?

The publication referred to was an opinion by Judge Peck in a case relating to Spanish grants, the case of Soulard's heirs, published in a newspaper in St. Louis. The impeachment arose from the fact that Judge Peck had punished for contempt one Lawless, who had published a criticism of the opinion.

Mr. James Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, chairman of the managers for the House of Representatives, objected to the question. It was argued in behalf of the objection that in the trial of a district judge for the imprisonment of a citizen without law and unjustly, the high court of impeachment might not be led off to the trial of fraudulent land claims in Missouri, and to the trial of them by common rumor. There would be no end to such an inquiry.

In opposition to the objection it was urged by Mr. Jonathan Meredith, counsel for the respondent, and by the respondent himself, that they were prepared to prove fraud in particular cases, and especielly fraud by Soulard. It was proper to show what facts the court had in mind when the proceedings against Lawless was had. If the judge believed that the publication by Lawless contained a misrepresentation of the opinion as to the grants, and tended to show them of a fair character, might he not have rightly considered it his duty to repress such an attempt.

Arguing for the managers Mr. Henry R. Storrs, of New York, asked if rumor was evidence in any cause. Suppose, moreover, that it could be proved that there were ten thousand fraudulent land claims in Missouri. What bearing had that on the question of the impeachment. The question was whether Mr. Lawless fairly represented the opinion delivered by the judge, or whether the judge might commit him for a contempt in publishing such an article. Admit even that the claim of Soulard was fraudulent, that claim was not in issue now and the high court was not trying its merits.

The question being put: "Shall this interrogatory be put to the witness?" there appeared yeas 14, nays 27.

2281. In the Peck trial the person alleged to have been oppressed by respondent was required to testify as to acts of his own implying malice against the respondent after the said alleged oppression.—On January 11, 1831,[1] in the high court of impeachment, during the trial of the cause of The United States v. James H. Peck, a witness on behalf of the managers, Luke E. Lawless, was under cross-examination by counsel for the respondent. The respondent was on trial for unlawfully oppressing Lawless by imprisoning him for contempt for criticising in the public prints a decision by respondent as judge in a case relating to a claim of Soulard's heirs.

Lawless had been imprisoned for an article signed "A Citizen" and published in a St. Louis paper in 1826. Mr. Jonathan Meredith, counsel for the respondent, now produced several newspaper articles published after the publication of 1826, and some published as late as 1830, and proposed this question:

Are you the author of all or either of the articles contained in the newspapers now handed to you relating to the respondent?

Mr. James Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, chairman of the managers on behalf of the House of Representatives, objected to the question, on the ground that a witness on cross-examination might not be compelled, if the publications were reprehensible, to accuse himself. It was also urged by Mr. George McDuffie, of South Carolina, one of the managers, that the letters were wholly external to the case, for it could not be supposed that Judge Peck, in imprisoning Lawless, could have had foresight of these publications. They had nothing to do with the question as to whether or not Judge Peck was guilty of illegally imprisoning a citizen.

[1] Second session Twenty-first Congress, Senate Impeachment Journal, p. 334; Report of trial of James H. Peck, pp. 275–277.

Mr. Meredith contended that in a case of libel or slander subsequent words or libels might be given in evidence to show quo animo the words were spoken or the libel written. He referred in support of this to Second Saunders on Pleading and Evidence, page 382.

On behalf of the managers it was urged that the authority cited might be applicable if Mr. Lawless were on trial for a libel, but could any authority be produced to prove that a witness under examination might be called on to establish his own guilt, if there be any, by his own testimony? Was not this directly in face of the constitutional provision that no person should be compelled to be a witness against himself? Should a judge be permitted to drive a man by oppression into the public newspapers for redress and then be allowed to use those very publications for the purpose of proving the existence of malice in the author previous to the date of his punishment.

Mr. Meredith said:

I am perfectly aware that we are not now trying Mr. Lawless for a libel. The argument and the authority were merely analogical—they both apply to this case. The principle is the same as in a case of libel. One of the great questions in this cause is the question of misrepresentation. After we have shown the misrepresentation it may be necessary, perhaps, to go a step further and show that it was intentional. We take that step when we show subsequent attacks upon the respondent, of which Mr. Lawless was the author. Is not this the object of such evidence in the case of a libel? and why should it not be as competent in a case of this kind, where intention is the question? It matters not at what subsequent period these publications were made. * * * They relate back to the original publication, and show the design and intention of the author. Again, does the lapse of time at all affect the second view with which this testimony is offered? Mr. Lawless is a witness in this cause. He has testified before this court, and one inquiry, and a main inquiry, is with what temper is he here as a witness? And do not these publications, if he be the author of them, go to evince that temper and feeling?

On the question, "Shall this interrogatory be put to the witness?" there appeared, yeas 28, nays 13.

2282. The witness having testified that a report of a speech was made partially by others as well as by himself, the report was not admitted in evidence.

Instance of a ruling by the Chief Justice on a question of evidence during the Johnson trial.

On April 3, 1868,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler offered in evidence a report of a speech of the President printed in a newspaper.

Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the President, objected to the admission of the report as evidence on the ground that the reporter Hudson, who had been examined, had testified that a portion of the speech had been printed from notes taken by another reporter.

After discussion the Chief Justice[2] said:

The managers offer a report made in the Leader newspaper of Cleveland as evidence in the cause. It appears from the statement of the witness Hudson that the report was not made by him wholly from his own notes, but from his own notes and the notes of another person whose notes are not produced, nor is that person himself produced for examination. Under these circumstances the Chief Justice thinks that that paper is inadmissible. Does any Senator desire a vote of the Senate on the question?

[2] Salmon P. Chase, of Ohio, Chief Justice.

Mr. Charles D. Drake, of Missouri, having asked for a vote of the Senate, the question was taken on admitting the paper as evidence, and there appeared, yeas 35, nays 11. So the report was admitted.

2283. Judge Swayne being charged with wrongfully committing persons for contempt, testimony as to the condition of the jail was ruled out as immaterial.—On February 16, 1905,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, Charles M. Coston, a witness on behalf of the managers, was questioned by Mr. Manager David A. De Armond, of Missouri, as to the acts of the respondent in committing certain persons for contempt, and this question was asked:

Q. Well, where were they in the county jail?—A. They were in a room next to what they call "the prisoner department of the jail." This jail is a brick building, two stories in height. There is an entrance——

Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, here intervened, objecting:

Mr. President, is Judge Swayne, this respondent, to be answerable for the manner in which the imprisonment was conducted in the absence of any testimony tending to show that he gave any directions with respect to it? If not, we object to this feature of the testimony.

Mr. Manager De Armond said:

Mr. President, the object of the inquiry was to ascertain where they were confined and how they were confined—something about the jail and the accommodations, or the lack of accommodations, that they had in the jail, in a general way, and the punishment that they endured under this sentence of the court. * * * We think it is material to the issue to show what the punishment inflicted upon them was, and to leave the court, in passing upon the matter with all the testimony upon the subject before the court, to determine how far the judge knew that such accommodations or lack of accommodations would be their lot in sentencing them—whether it was a proper sentence as to the amount of punishment or whether it was excessive. We are getting at the animus of the judge. * * * I think upon the question whether the sentences were excessive or not—as to that branch of it—it would be competent for the respondent to show, if he could show, that the imprisonment was not for an unusually long time; that the punishment was not excessive, if, as a matter of fact, the persons sentenced to the jail were taken to quarters which were commodious and clean and if there were no especially contaminating influences from the low class of criminals confined in the same jail at the same time; if they were the only occupants, for instance, and were in the rooms or apartments of the sheriff or keeper of the jail, instead of being in with the common criminals—I believe that would be competent for the respondent to offer in the case. It seems to me it is competent for those prosecuting the case to show the kind of confinement, the kind of place to which he sentenced them, bearing upon the question whether he had the right to send them there at all, and whether the punishment was excessive in sending them there for that length of time. That is all I wish to say about that.

For information, I ask the President whether I am to understand the ruling to be that all questions in regard to the jail are to be excluded? I do not wish to ask questions simply for the sake of asking them, of course.

The Presiding Officer[2] said:

The Presiding Officer does not see that the question as to the character of the jail or the way in which the persons sentenced for contempt were confined there is proper. It can not be said that Judge

[1] Third session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, pp. 2718, 2719.

[2] Orville H. Platt, of Connecticut, Presiding Officer.

Swayne is responsible for that without some evidence is adduced showing that the judge directed something to be done which was improper. * * * The Presiding Officer thinks that it is not material to this issue to prove the condition of the jail. If any Senator so desires, the Presiding Officer will submit the question to the Senate.

On February 20,[1] during examination of a witness, Simeon Belden, by Mr. Manager De Armond, the following occurred:

Q. What was done with you?—A. I was locked up in the jail.

Q. What part of the jail—in a cell or not?

Mr. THURSTON. Wait a moment. We interpose the same objection that we made the other day. Nothing that possibly happened in and about that jail or the manner or method of the confinement of the witness could be chargeable to Judge Swayne.

Mr. Manager DE ARMOND. Mr. President, when the matter was up before, what we were trying to show was the general condition of the jail and the general way in which the prisoners were handled or cared for there. Now, I am asking simply a narrative. There was a sentence pronounced against this gentleman and Mr. Davis, and I am asking what was done in the carrying out of that sentence. I suppose, if the sentence had not been carried out at all, it would be competent for the respondent to show it, and I think it is certainly competent for us to show whether it was carried out and how it was carried out. I do not mean in the way of going into the details or description about the jail, but what was done with these men.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Anything more than that they were imprisoned for a certain length of time?

Mr. Manager DE ARMOND. Well, I desire to show where they were put, where they were changed to—without going into the matter of details—and how long they were kept there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (to the witness). Answer the question.

A little later,[2] while Mr. Manager De Armond was examining a witness, Michael Murphy, the following occurred:

Q. State whether or not you were in charge of the jail when General Belden and Mr. Davis were brought there by the United States marshal or deputy marshal.—A. Yes, sir; I was in charge of the jail.

Q. Was there a commitment brought with them?—A. To the best of my knowledge; yes, sir.

Q. State what you did with them.—A. I——

Mr. THURSTON. One moment. We object to this. We did not insist very hard on our right to this objection while Mr. Belden was testifying, but it is certain that what took place in that jail, its condition, the way the prisoners slept, the way they were fed, the way they were treated, could not be used to prejudice the court against Judge Swayne unless they first laid the foundation for it by showing that he was responsible for it or directed it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That was the opinion of the Presiding Officer on a former day, but the questions which were asked Mr. Belden were allowed on the ground that they were a narrative of what occurred. The Presiding Officer does not think that evidence showing that the condition of the jail was an improper one is admissible unless it be shown that it was known to Judge Swayne and that that was part of his motive in committing them there.

Mr. Manager DE ARMOND. I was not going to ask the witness about the general condition of the jail. I was going to ask questions practically the same as those asked General Belden; about what was done with them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the purpose of the questions?

Mr. Manager DE ARMOND. To show the punishment they endured.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unless there is something unusual in the character of the jail which was known to Judge Swayne, the Presiding Officer thinks the evidence is inadmissible.

2284. Decisions as to relevancy of testimony during the Peck trial.—On December 23, 1830,[1] in the high court of impeachment, during the trial of the cause of The United States v. James H. Peck, a witness, Luke Edward Lawless, was under cross-examination by Mr. William Wirt, counsel for the respondent. The witness, in a communication signed "A Citizen," and published in a St. Louis paper, had criticised an opinion delivered by Judge Peck in the case of Soulard's heirs. The judge was now on trial for punishing Lawless for contempt.

Mr. Wirt asked a question, reduced to writing, as follows: The witness is asked to refer to such parts of the opinion of the respondent in Soulard's case as support the first specification in the article signed "A Citizen."

Mr. James Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, of the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, objected that the question was irrelevant. The court had before them, he said, the publication of the witness, in which he had placed his assumptions in one column, and the passages in the opinion from which they were deduced in another column.

Mr. Wirt responded that the managers in opening the case had argued that there had been no misrepresentation of the opinion in the letter; and the question which he had asked was useful in determining the truth or lack of truth in the claim of the managers.

The question having been read to the court, the Vice-President put the question: "Shall this interrogatory be put to the witness?" and it was determined in the affirmative, yeas 32, nays 10.

2285. On December 22, 1830,[2] in the high court of impeachment during the trial of the cause of The United States v. James H. Peck, while a witness, Luke Edward Lawless, was under cross-examination, Mr. Jonathan Meredith, counsel for the respondent, put the following interrogatory:

What was your contract for professional compensation in the case of Soulard's heirs?

It was for criticism of Judge Peck's decision in the case of Soulard's heirs that the witness had been punished by Judge Peck, and it was because of this punishment that the impeachment proceedings had been instigated.

The question being objected to by the witness and also by the managers for the House of Representatives, the question was put: "Shall this interrogatory be put to the witness?" and decided in the negative, yeas 19, nays 23.

2286. On January 10, 1831,[3] in the high court of impeachment during the trial of the cause of The United States v. James H. Peck, a witness, Josiah Spalding, was asked the following question by Mr. Jonathan Meredith, counsel for the respondent:

What are the terms in which Mr. Lawless, according to general reputation, is in the habit of speaking of courts, both in their presence and out of court?

Judge Peck was on trial for the punishment of Mr. Lawless for contempt of court in criticising in a newspaper an opinion by the judge.

Mr. James Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, chairman of the managers, objected to the portion of the question contained in the words "and out of court."

Mr. Meredith admitted that he should not have asked the question had he not thought he had the assent of the managers.

The court, by a vote of yeas 3, nays 39, sustained the objection.

2287. General decisions during the Johnson and Belknap trials as to relevancy of testimony.

Instances of decisions by the Chief Justice on questions of evidence during the Johnson trial.

On April 15, 1868,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Benjamin R. Curtis, of counsel for the respondent, offered in evidence a letter of McClintock Young, Acting Secretary of the Treasury, removing Richard Coe from the office of appraiser at Philadelphia.

Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler objected to the proposed evidence as irrelevant. The letter, it was true, showed the direction of the President that the act be done; but if it were admitted it would be necessary to investigate whether or not the Acting Secretary or even the President might make the removal without consent of the Senate.

Mr. Curtis argued as to the act of Mr. Young:

He says that he proceeds by the order of the President, and I take it to be well settled judicially and practically that wherever the head of a Department says he acts by the order of the President he is presumed to tell the truth, and it requires no evidence to show that he acts by the order of the President. No such evidence is ever preserved, no record is ever made of the direction which the President gives to one of the heads of Departments, as I understand, to proceed in a transaction of this kind. But when a head of a Department says "by order of the President I say so and so" all courts and all bodies presume that he tells the truth.

The Chief Justice[2] ruled:

The Chief Justice thinks that this evidence is admissible. The act of a Secretary of the Treasury is the act of the President unless the contrary be shown. He will put the question to the Senate, however, if any Senator desires it. [After a pause.] The evidence is admitted.

2288. On April 20, 1868,[3] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler, in the course of the examination of Alexander W. Randall, Postmaster-General, proposed certain questions which were objected to. As a result of this the Chief Justice[2] said:

The honorable manager appears to the Chief Justice to be making a statement of matters which are not in proof, and of which the Senate has as yet heard nothing. He states that he intends to put them in proof. The Chief Justice therefore requires that the nature of the evidence that he proposes to put before the Senate shall be reduced to writing as has been done heretofore. He will make the ordinary offer to prove, and then the Senate will judge whether they will receive the evidence or not.

Thereupon Mr. Manager Butler submitted this offer:

We offer to show that Foster Blodgett, the mayor of Augusta, Ga., appointed by General Pope, and a member of the constitutional convention of Georgia, being, because of his loyalty, obnoxious to some portion of the citizens lately in rebellion against the United States, by the testimony of such citizens an indictment was procured to be found against him; that said indictment being sent to the Postmaster-General, he thereupon, without authority of law, suspended said Foster Blodgett from office indefinitely, without any other complaint against him and without any hearing and did not send to the Senate the report of such suspension, the office being one within the appointment of the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; this to be proved in part by the answer of Blodgett to the Postmaster-General's notice of such suspension, being a portion of the papers on file in the Post-Office Department upon which the action of the Postmaster-General was taken, a portion of which have been put in evidence by the counsel of the President, and that Mr. Blodgett is shown by the evidence in the record to have always been friendly to the United States and loyal to the Government.

Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel for the respondent, objected to this evidence as wholly irrelevant to this case. The evidence concerning Foster Blodgett was produced on the part of the managers, and on their part was confined to his oral testimony that he had received certain commissions under which he held the office of postmaster at Augusta; that he had been suspended in that office by the Executive of the United States in some form of its action, and there was a superadded negative conclusion of his that his case had not been sent to the Senate. In taking up that case the defense offered nothing but the official action of the Post-Office Department, coupled with the evidence of the head of that Department that it was his own act, without previous knowledge or subsequent direction of the President of the United States. In that official order, thus a part of the action of the Department, it appears that the ground of it was an indictment against Mr. Blodgett. A complaint was made that that indictment was not produced. The managers having procured it, having put it in evidence, they now propose to put in evidence his answer to that indictment or to the accusation made before the Postmaster-General.

After argument Mr. Manager Butler modified the question so as to stand as follows:

The defendant's counsel having produced from the files of the Post-Office Department a part of the record showing the alleged causes for the suspension of Foster Blodgett as deputy postmaster at Augusta, Ga., we now propose to give in evidence the residue of said record, including the papers on file in the said case, for the purpose of showing the whole of the case as the same was presented to the Postmaster-General before and at the time of the suspension of the said Blodgett.

Mr. Evarts said:

Our objection to that offer, as we have already stated, is that it does not present correctly the relation of the papers.

The Chief Justice said:

The Chief Justice will submit the question to the Senate. The original offer to prove has been withdrawn. The offer which has just been read has been substituted. Senators, you who are of opinion that the evidence now proposed to be offered should be received will say aye; contrary opinion, no. [Putting the question.] The noes have it. The evidence is not received.

2289. On July 11, 1876,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Gen. William. B. Hazen, a witness on behalf of the United States, was recalled, and in the course of cross-examination, Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for respondent, asked:

Is it according to discipline in the Army for an officer to publish scandal of the President which he knows nothing about except from hearsay?

[1] First session Forty-fourth Congress, Senate Journal, pp. 973, 974; Record of trial, p. 245.

Mr. Manager John A. McMahon said:

I must at this point enter an objection. It seems that my friend here is pursuing the old line, having the old misapprehension that every now and then crops out in this case. The misapprehension is that he is trying General Hazen and not General Belknap.

Mr. Carpenter argued:

Mr. President, this witness has been laboring for months to get up this impeachment for his own vindication. He comes back here to-day for explanation, and I am doing everything in my power to assist his purpose. I want to show what his motives have been; I want to show that they are utterly groundless; I want to show that he has violated all the proprieties and all the duties of his official station by the hand he has taken in this matter and his anxiety to fan public sentiment against General Belknap, who has never done him an injury in his lifetime, and who had shown him so many favors that General Sherman objected to his giving him another; and that is the man who repeats gossip against the President and against the then Secretary of War, and publishes it in letters over his own name.

The Senate, without division, decided the question inadmissible.

2290. On January 12, 1876,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Hon. Hiester Clymer, chairman of the committee of the House of Representatives which had taken the testimony on which the impeachment was based, was examined as a witness for the United States, and then was cross-examined by Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent. Mr. Carpenter asked:

How long has the committee been engaged in investigating the affairs of the War Department?

Mr. Manager John A. McMahon objected, saying:

I only want to understand how far this is to go. If any inference is be drawn from any investigation held there that there is nothing else in this matter but what has been charged, we shall claim to put in the testimony which has been taken, which we shall certainly claim throws a good deal of light on other transactions and on this. We have carefully excluded them up to this point.

The question being put to the Senate, the interrogatory was admitted without division.

Very soon thereafter, the witness was reexamined by the managers, and Mr. Manager McMahon asked:

Had your committee taken any other testimony except Mr. Marsh's at the time that the House ordered the impeachment of Mr. Belknap and notified the Senate to that effect?

Mr. Carpenter having challenged the question, Mr. McMahon stated that it was put to rebut the presumption raised by the former question. If that was pertinent, this was.

After discussion the question was put: "Shall this interrogatory be admitted," and there appeared, ayes 11, noes 16, no quorum.

Thereupon, to save time, Mr. McMahon withdrew the question.

2291. On July 11, 1876,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, Caleb P. Marsh, a witness for the United States, was under examination, when the following questions were asked, and the following colloquy took place between Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, and Messrs. Managers John A. McMahon and Elbridge G. Lapham:

[2] First session Forty-fourth Congress, Senate Journal, p. 973; Record of trial, p. 243.

Q. (By Mr. Manager McMahon). Your wife has been subpœnaed as a witness to attend this tribunal?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. I desire you to state now whether she is able to attend.

Mr. CARPENTER. What is the object of that?

Mr. Manager MCMAHON. We want to know from the witness whether she is able to attend.

Mr. CARPENTER. We object. What has that to do with this case whether she is well or sick?

Mr. Manager MCMAHON. We have a right to send for her if she is able to come. Let the objection be passed upon by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The counsel object to the question propounded by the managers. Shall the question be admitted?

The question was determined in the affirmative.

Q. (By Mr. Manager McMahon.) State whether your wife is able to be present in court to be examined as a witness.—A. She is not; she is very ill.

Q. Have you the certificate of a surgeon to that effect?—A. I have.

Q. Whose certificate is it?—A. Dr. Alfred L. Loomis.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the managers state now what the object of that testimony is?

Mr. Manager LAPHAM. It is to inform the Senate the reason why we do not call Mrs. Marsh.

Mr. CARPENTER. Is it proposed to raise any presumption against the defendant?

Mr. Manager LAPHAM. We shall argue that hereafter.

Mr. CARPENTER. We will take her testimony that was given before the committee if the managers want that, or consent to have her deposition taken. We want to completely repel the presumption that Mrs. Marsh being ill is any evidence of our guilt.

Mr. Manager MCMAHON. The managers here decline to do that. I do not agree with them in that matter. The counsel will make his application to the Senate personally.

2292. Testimony admitted in the Swayne trial as material, although objected to as not bearing directly on the issues.—On February 21, 1905,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, William A. Blount, a witness called on behalf of the respondent, was examined by Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, and was questioned as to a suit known as the Florida McGuire case, the following being one of the questions:

During the first week of the court what steps did you take, if anything, to inform yourself as to the probability of the case being tried and as to when it might be reached upon the docket?

Mr. Manager David A. De Armond, of Missouri, objected:

We think it is an immaterial matter what steps he took to ascertain when the case would be for trial and what he did about it. He is not a party to the record nor a party to the proceeding that we are trying.

Mr. Thurston said:

Mr. President, we propose to show that the defendants in that case prepared themselves for trial, got out their list of witnesses, were ready for trial when the case was reached, and that they had a right to demand from the judge that he should not grant any postponement of that trial unless upon legal cause shown.

Mr. Manager DE ARMOND. I suggest in regard to that matter that the persons upon the other side are the persons whose conduct should be inquired about. What the defendants in that Florida McGuire case did or what they thought certainly are not matters for which the attorneys upon the other side could be held responsible. It is not inquiring anything about the attorneys of Florida McGuire—the parties who are proceeded against for contempt—but it is inquiring about what the attorneys upon the other side did, and what the attorneys upon the other side thought, and why the attorneys upon the other side did or thought certain things.

[1] Third session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, p. 2980.

The Presiding Officer said:[1]

Does the Presiding Officer understand that that was stated in the trial of that case?

Mr. THURSTON. Yes, Mr. President. I also propose to show it for another purpose. It is part of the res gestæ of this proceeding that has been gone into in detail and in such a manner that we might have objected at every step, but which, in deference to the desire of this court to proceed as rapidly as possible, we did not take advantage of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Presiding Officer thinks the question may be asked.

2293. On February 21, 1905,[2] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Charles Swayne, William A. Blount, a witness on behalf of the respondent, was examined as to a suit known as the Florida McGuire case by Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent:

Q. On that trial were there any witnesses called by Florida McGuire or her counsel or examined on her side who did not live in Pensacola, either upon or in the immediate vicinity of the Rivas tract?—A. So far as I know, not. I have to answer that this way: That a good many of these witnesses are known to me only in a general way, and I know generally where they reside. I do not know them personally, but I think that they all reside within a mile of the court-house in Pensacola.

Q. How long, in your judgment, would it have taken the United States marshal to have subpœnaed them all as witnesses?—A. If they had all been at home at the time they could have been subpœnaed in an hour and a half or two hours.

Mr. THURSTON. We offer this original præcipe for witnesses in that case. It is the original document which was identified the other day, and we ask, for the purpose of making up the record, that the certified copy may go in instead.

Mr. Manager David A. De Armond, of Missouri, said:

We ask what is the object of offering this paper? What is it for? What do counsel expect to prove by it?

Mr. THURSTON. The object is to disprove the testimony of Judge Belden, who was very clearly brought to state that the only reason they decided to discontinue the Florida McGuire case was that they needed forty or fifty witnesses, many of them living at a distance, and that they could not possibly secure them from the time of Saturday afternoon, when court adjourned, to Monday morning, when the case was to be called. * * * I have now shown that upon the reincarnation of the Florida McGuire case the same case between the same parties was tried out in full in the same court, and that on that trial they only asked on behalf of Florida McGuire for twelve witnesses by subpœna, and that they all lived, and that all the witnesses they produced lived, right there. It is in line with our insistence that here was a conspiracy against the dignity and the honor of the court by its officers; and that it is a mere subterfuge in their testimony to claim that they discontinued that case because they had a multitude of witnesses who could not be obtained, when the fact was, as we propose to show and insist, that their discontinuance of that case resulted solely and alone because they were held and taken to task for their conspiracy and for their contempt.

Mr. Manager DE ARMOND. Mr. President, the statement of the witness, Belden, was that they had forty or fifty witnesses for the trial, which was expected to take place in November, and that it would be impossible to get them for Monday, with notification upon the Saturday preceding.

This, now, is a paper which purports to be a list of some of the witnesses called for and used upon a trial which took place some time the next year in the suit brought over again—in another suit. It does not at all follow from the fact that this paper contains a list of twelve names that they did not have forty or fifty witnesses for the trial before, nor does it follow that the names of all the witnesses are contained upon the paper, or that they did not need or did not use any other witnesses upon the second trial. So it is an immaterial sort of paper, we think.

The Presiding Officer[1] said:

The Presiding Officer thinks the paper bears on the question, although it is not conclusive.

2294. The impeachment of William Blount, a United States Senator, in 1797.

The proceedings of the Blount impeachment were set in motion by a confidential message from the President of the United States.

In the Blount case the House voted to impeach on the strength of the matter contained in a letter proved to be in respondent's handwriting.

In the Blount impeachment case it was ruled that evidence should be taken before the House, and not before the Committee of the Whole.

In the Blount impeachment case the House seems to have distrusted its power to authorize the Speaker to administer oaths.

The House excused one of its Members from voting on any question connected with the impeachment of a brother.

Forms of the resolutions impeaching William Blount and directing the carrying of the impeachment to the bar of the Senate.

The Blount impeachment was carried to the bar of the Senate by a single Member of the House.

On July 3, 1797,[1] a confidential message was received in the House from the President of the United States, who transmitted a letter purporting to have been written by William Blount, a Senator of the United States for the State of Tennessee, to one James Carey, interpreter for the United States to the Cherokee Nation of Indians, for the purpose of seducing him from his duty and trust, in furtherance of certain unlawful designs. The message and papers were referred to a committee composed of Messrs. Samuel Sitgreaves, of Pennsylvania; Abraham Baldwin, of Georgia; Samuel W. Dana, of Connecticut; John Dawson, of Virginia, and William Hindman, of Maryland.

On July 6 [1] Mr. Sitgreaves reported from the committee the following resolution:

Resolved, That William Blount, a Senator of the United States from the State of Tennessee, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors.

This report was on the same day considered in a Committee of the Whole House. Mr. Sitgreaves stated that the President had been advised by the law officers of the Government that the letter was evidence of crime; that the crime was of the denomination of a misdemeanor; and that William Blount, being a Senator, was liable to impeachment. In conformity with this opinion, the letter had been transmitted to the House. There was debate as to whether or not a legislator was an officer liable to impeachment, after which Mr. Sitgreaves made a statement [2] as to the forms of procedure:

As to the form of proceeding necessary to be taken on this occasion, he would state what the opinion of the committee was as to this matter. They supposed it would be first proper for that House to determine that the gentleman in question should be impeached. This being done, that a Member of that House should go to the bar of the Senate and impeach the person, in the name of the House and of the people of the United States, and state that the House of Representatives will proceed to draw out specific articles of charge against him. According to the case, they require that he shall be sequestered from his seat, be committed, or be held to bail. When this is done, a committee will be appointed to draw articles of impeachment.

The reason, Mr. S. said, why some steps should be taken at present was that means should be taken to secure the person of the offender, either by confinement or by bail, since it was the opinion of the law officers of Government that he could not be arrested by ordinary process. He could not be arrested by the Senate; they could send for him (as he understood they had done) by the Sergeant-at-Arms, to take his seat in the House; but when the House adjourned, they had no further power over him until an impeachment was made against him.

Gentlemen said there was no danger of escape. If it were not improper to state what had taken place out of doors, it might be said that there had already been an attempt at an escape. Besides, if no investigation were now to take place, how were they to come to a knowledge of the plot which gentlemen seemed so desirous to come to a knowledge of? When they had determined to make the impeachment, and an oral declaration was made of it to the Senate, when they were ready to go home, they might go, and exhibit the charges at the next session, when they should have leisure fully to consider the subject.

Mr. John Rutledge, jr., of South Carolina, who had attended the trial of Warren Hastings, approved the form of procedure, but suggested that the handwriting of Mr. Blount should be proven, and submitted a motion to that effect.

The chairman [3] suggested that the proof should be taken in the House, and this opinion prevailed, it being urged that the Committee of the Whole did not have the power of taking evidence. The committee accordingly arose.

[1] Journal, p. 70; Annals, pp. 448–458. [2] Annals, p. 455. [3] George Dent, of Maryland, Chairman.

In the House the Speaker [1] suggested the propriety of calling in a magistrate, as the Speaker had no power to administer an oath except in the case of qualifying the Members of the House. A motion to authorize the Speaker to administer the oath was disagreed to, 29 yeas, 53 nays.[2]

Then it was [3]

Ordered, That William Barry Grove, Abraham Baldwin, Joseph McDowell, and Nathaniel Macon, Members of this House, be examined upon oath, at the bar of this House, touching their knowledge of the handwriting of William Blount, a Senator of the United States for the State of Tennessee; and that Reynold Keene, esq., one of the judges of the court of common pleas for the county of Philadelphia, and also one of the aldermen of the city of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, administer the said oath.

The said Members were then sworn, and, being interrogated by the Speaker, severally answered that they believed the letter to be in the handwriting of William Blount.

It was then

Ordered, That the testimony of the said Members be reduced to writing by the Clerk, and that the same be referred to the Committee of the Whole House, to whom was committed the report of the committee to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States of the 3d instant.

On July 7 [4] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from Thomas Blount, a Member from North Carolina, and brother of William Blount, praying that he might be excused from voting on any question arising in the course of the impeachment proceedings. Thereupon it was Ordered, That the said Thomas Blount be excused from voting on any question relating to the impeachment, now pending in this House, of William Blount, a Senator of the United States for the State of Tennessee.

On July 7,[5] also, the Committee of the Whole reported and the House agreed to the resolution that William Blount be impeached.

Then Mr. Sitgreaves moved an order which, with modification, was agreed to as follows:

Ordered, That Mr. Sitgreaves do go to the Senate, and, at the bar thereof, in the name of the House of Representatives, and of all the people of the United States, impeach William Blount, a Senator of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors; and acquaint the Senate that this House will in due time exhibit particular articles against him, and make good the same.

In the Blount impeachment, following the precedent of the Hastings trial, the House did not send the articles to the Senate with the impeachment.

In the first impeachment the House followed English precedents to the extent of requiring the sequestration of the respondent from his seat in the Senate.

It was suggested by Mr. Albert Gallatin, of Pennsylvania, that the articles of impeachment should be prepared and presented with the impeachment. To this the reply was made: [1]

Mr. Sitgreaves said that the mode which he proposed was the same which was practiced in the case of Mr. Hastings. Mr. Burke went up to the House of Lords and impeached him in words similar to those now proposed to be used. Some time afterwards, the articles of impeachment having been drawn, Mr. Burke again went up to the House of Lords and exhibited them. Mr. S. spoke also of a work lately published, in continuation of Judge Blackstone's Commentaries, which had a chapter on parliamentary impeachment, and pointed out this as the proper mode of procedure. He had also looked into the proceedings on the trial of the Earl of Macclesfield, and found the same course was taken. It was true that in the case of a public officer of the State of P[illegible]sylvania, which perhaps his colleague might have in his eye, the articles of impeachment were exh[illegible]ed at the same time that the impeachment was made.

On motion of Mr. Sitgreaves it was:

Ordered, further, That Mr. Sitgreaves do demand that the said William Blount be sequestered from his seat in the Senate, and that the Senate do take order for the appearance of the said William Blount to answer to the said impeachment.

It was objected that it was not necessary to follow so closely the English precedents, since capital punishment could not follow a conviction on impeachment in this country. Therefore it would be unnecessary to confine the one impeached. But the House agreed to the order, ayes 41, noes 30.[2]

Form used in delivering the Blount impeachment at the bar of the Senate.

Upon the impeachment of William Blount the Senate took him into custody and required bonds for his appearance, and informed the House thereof.

Form of report to the House of an impeachment carried to the bar of the Senate.

On July 7,[3] while the Senate was engaged in proceedings for the expulsion of the said William Blount for the offense set forth in the message of the President, Mr. Sitgreaves appeared with the following message from the House:

Mr. President, I am commanded, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States, to impeach William Blount, a Senator of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors, and to acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles against him and make good the same.

I am further commanded to demand that the said William Blount be sequestered from his seat in the Senate, and that the Senate do take order for his appearance to answer the said impeachment.

Thereupon the Senate agreed to the following:

Pursuant to a message from the House of Representatives of the United States by Samuel Sitgreaves, esq., a Member of that House, that they, in their own name, and in the name of all the people of the United States, have impeached William Blount, a Member of the Senate, of high crimes and misdemeanors; and that, in due time, they will exhibit articles against him and make good the same; and they having demanded that the said William Blount be sequestered from his seat in this House, and that the Senate take order for his appearance to answer to the said impeachment:

Resolved, That the said William Blount be taken into custody of the messenger of this House until he shall enter into recognizance, himself in the sum of $20,000, with two sufficient sureties in the sum of $15,000 each, to appear and answer such articles of impeachment as may be exhibited against him.

Whereupon Mr. Blount named his sureties, and they were satisfactory to the Senate.

The President then named Mr. Blount and his sureties, who arose while the recognizance was read, and, being approved by the Senate, it was executed in their presence.

On the same day Mr. Sitgreaves returned to the House and reported:[1]

That, in obedience to the order of this House, he had been to the Senate, and in the name of this House and of all the people of the United States, had impeached William Blount, a Senator of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors, and had acquainted the Senate that this House will, in due time, exhibit particular articles against him and make good the same.

And, further, that he had demanded that the said William Blount be sequestered from his seat in the Senate, and that the Senate do take order for his appearance to answer to the said impeachment.

On July 8[2] it was ordered by the Senate:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate notify the House of Representatives that, in consequence of their message of yesterday, by the Hon. Mr. Sitgreaves, one of their Members, they have caused William Blount to recognize, in the sum of $20,000 principal, with two sureties in the sum of $15,000 each, to appear and answer to the impeachment mentioned in their message.

In the Blount impeachment the drawing up of the articles was confided to a select committee, with power to procure testimony.

In the Blount impeachment the House, after discussion, empowered the committee drawing the articles to sit during the recess of Congress.

On the same day and succeeding day, in the House, the following resolutions appear to have been agreed to:[3]

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report articles of impeachment against William Blount, a Senator of the United States, impeached by this House of high crimes and misdemeanors, and that the said committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Resolved, That the committee appointed to prepare and report articles of impeachment against William Blount, a Senator of the United States, impeached by this House of high crimes and misdemeanors, be authorized to sit during the recess of Congress.

Resolved, That the said committee be instructed to inquire, and by all lawful means to discover, the whole nature and extent of the offense whereof the said William Blount stands impeached, and who are the parties and associates therein.

The privilege of sitting during the recess was the subject of considerable debate, but precedents from English practice and from trials in South Carolina and Pennsylvania were cited.

Messrs. Sitgreaves, Baldwin, Dana, Dawson, and Robert Goodloe Harper, of South Carolina, were appointed to prepare and report articles of impeachment.

After his expulsion from the Senate William Blount was surrendered by his bondsmen, and gave bonds anew to answer to the impeachment.

On July 8,[4] in the Senate, the trial of William Blount terminated with his expulsion.

On this, Mr. Butler, in behalf of himself and Mr. Thomas Blount, the other surety, surrendered the person of William Blount, the principal, to the Senate, and requested to be discharged from their recognizance. Whereupon, it was Ordered, That they be discharged from their recognizance, and that the Secretary enter an indorsement on the back of the bond as follows:

"And now, to wit, on this 8th day of July, 1797, the Hon. Thomas Blount and Pierce Butler, esqs., came into the Senate and surrendered William Blount, esq., for whom they became bound yesterday.

On motion,

Resolved, That William Blount be taken into the custody of the Messenger of this House until he shall enter into recognizance, himself in the sum of $1,000, with two sufficient sureties in the sum of $500 each, to appear and answer such articles of impeachment as may be exhibited against him by the House of Representatives on Monday next.

A message was sent informing the House of Representatives of this action.[1]

On July 10 the Senate Journal records:[2]

Agreeably to the order of the Senate the within-mentioned William Blount having entered into recognizance, I have returned the same into the office of the Secretary of the Senate.

Ordered, That it be entered on the Journal of the Senate that William Blount failed making his appearance this day, agreeably to the recognizance entered into on the 8th instant.

A recess of Congress intervened between the impeachment of Blount and the framing of the articles of impeachment.

On July 10,[3] in the House, it was:

Ordered, That Mr. Dana be excused from serving on the committee appointed to prepare and report articles of impeachment against William Blount, a Senator of the United States, and that Mr. Bayard be appointed of the said committee in his stead.

On July 10 the Congress adjourned until the second Monday in November next.

The committee appointed to prepare articles of impeachment in the Blount case reported the evidence, and later the articles.

The articles of impeachment in Blount's case were considered by the House and not by the Committee of the Whole.

After considering English precedents the House chose the managers of the Blount impeachment by ballot.

In choosing managers by ballot the House guarded against complications in case more than the required number should have a majority.

A manager in impeachment proceedings is excused from service by authority of the House.

The managers carry the articles of impeachment to the Senate in accordance with a resolution agreed to by the House.

On December 4, 1797,[4] at the second session of Congress, Mr. Sitgreaves from the committee appointed to prepare articles of impeachment, submitted a report from which the injunction of secrecy was removed, and which was read in the House on December 5 and ordered to lie on the table. This report did not embody the articles of impeachment, but simply set forth the facts, documents, subpœnas, etc., resulting from the investigation.[1]

On January 18 and 22, 1798,[2] Mr. Sitgreaves submitted supplementary reports, one presenting an additional deposition and the other two letters received by the committee. They were read to the House and ordered to lie on the table.

On January 25, 1798,[3] Mr. Sitgreaves, from the committee, reported the articles of impeachment, which were considered in Committee of the Whole, and on January 29 were agreed to by the House.

Thereupon, on motion of Mr. Sitgreaves:

Resolved, That eleven managers be appointed, by ballot, to conduct the said impeachment on the part of this House.

As to the method of appointment there was some debate.[4]

Mr. Sitgreaves said, with respect to the manner of appointing managers, he left it to the discretion of the House. The British House of Commons appointed their managers of impeachment by ballot, as they did all their large committees. In this House a different course was taken with respect to committees; they were always appointed by the Speaker, except specially ordered otherwise. The former committee on this business was appointed by the Speaker. He was not disposed to deviate from the usual practice. If, however, any gentleman wished to move that they be appointed by ballot, such a motion, he supposed, would be in order.

Mr. Albert Gallatin, of Pennsylvania, thought the rule directing the appointment of committees did not apply in the present case. It was true that managers of conferences of the Senate were thus chosen, but he thought there was an essential difference between the two cases. Managers of conferences reported to the House similarly with committees, and in fact they were a committee, though called by a different name. But managers of an impeachment on the part of this House appeared to him to be quite a different thing. They were not to make a report to the House which might be affirmed or negatived; they were the representatives of the House, and what they did would be final. Under this impression, in order to take the sense of the House upon the business, he moved that the managers be elected by ballot.

The motion that the managers be appointed by ballot was agreed to by the House.

On January 30[5] Mr. Sitgreaves, in view of the fact that the House should determine whether the choice should be determined by majority or plurality, offered the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That in the ballot for managers to conduct the impeachment against William Blount, on the part of this House, a majority of the whole number of votes shall be necessary to a choice; and if it should happen that more than eleven members shall have a majority, that, in that case, the eleven highest in votes shall be considered as chosen; and if any two or more having a majority of votes should be equal in number, so as that the plurality can not be determined among them, the same shall be decided by a new ballot, subject to the preceding rules.

Proceeding to ballot, the House, on this and the succeeding day, chose the following managers:

Messrs. Sitgreaves; James A. Bayard, of Delaware; Harper; William Gordon, of New Hampshire; Thomas Pinckney, of South Carolina; Dana; Samuel Sewall, of Massachusetts; Hezekiah L. Hosmer, of New York; John Dennis, of Maryland; Thomas Evans, of Virginia; and James H. Imlay, of New Jersey.

Mr. Baldwin, who had been elected a manager, was excused by the House.

On February 2[1] it was—

Resolved, That the articles agreed to by this House, to be exhibited in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States against William Blount, in maintenance of their impeachment against him for high crimes and misdemeanors, be carried to the Senate by the managers appointed to conduct the said impeachment.

The ceremonies of presenting to the Senate the articles of impeachment of William Blount in 1797.

Rules established by the Senate to prescribe ceremonies for receiving House managers presenting articles in Blount's case.

Form of proclamation made in the Senate on attendance of House managers to present articles of impeachment against William Blount.

Upon receiving notice from the House that the managers would present articles against William Blount, the Senate set a time and informed the House thereof.

The managers who presented the articles impeaching William Blount were attended by some Members of the House.

Announcement of the chairman of the House managers in presenting to the Senate the articles against William Blount.

The manager having read the articles impeaching William Blount, the Sergeant-at-Arms received them and laid them on the Senate table.

Form of declaration of Vice-President upon presentation of articles of impeachment in Blount's case.

On February 5,[2] in the Senate, the following rules were agreed to:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the Senate be, and he is hereby, invested with the authority of Sergeant-at-Arms, to hold said office during the pleasure of the Senate, whose duty it shall be to execute the commands of the Senate, from time to time, and all such process as shall be directed to him by the President of the Senate.

Resolved, That for regulating the proceedings of the Senate in cases of impeachment the following rule be adopted, viz:

When the House of Representatives, or managers by them appointed for that purpose, shall attend the Senate to present articles of impeachment, the President of the Senate shall cause proclamation to be made in the form following, viz:

All persons are commanded to keep silence while the Senate of the United States are receiving articles of impeachment against —— ——, on pain of imprisonment.

And shall then signify to the managers that the Senate are ready to receive the articles of impeachment, which, having been read by one of the managers, shall be received by the Secretary; and the managers shall thereupon be informed by the President that the Senate will take proper order on the subject, of which due notice will be given to the House of Representatives.

After which the Secretary shall read said articles of impeachment and enter the same on the Journals of the Senate.

On February 7,[1] in the Senate, a message, ordered to be sent by the House, was received from the House by its clerk, who said:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have resolved that articles agreed by the House to be exhibited by them, in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, against William Blount, in maintenance of their impeachment against him for high crimes and misdemeanors, be carried to the Senate by the managers, Messrs. Sitgreaves, Bayard, Harper, Gordon, Pinckney, Dana, Sewall, Hosmer, Dennis, Evans, and Imley, appointed to conduct the said impeachment.

On motion,

Resolved, That the Senate will, at 12 o'clock this day, be ready to receive articles of impeachment against William Blount, late a Senator of the United States from the State of Tennessee, to be presented by the managers appointed by the House of Representatives.

This was the same day communicated to the House by a message borne from the Senate by its Secretary.[2]

Mr. Sitgreaves having stated that it was usual on all solemn occasions like this for the House to give sanction to its managers by an attendance at the time, the managers of the impeachment, accompanied by some of the Members of the House, accordingly went up to the Senate for the purpose of exhibiting the articles of impeachment against William Blount.[3]

Later, in the Senate,[4] a message was announced from the House of Representatives by the above-mentioned managers, who, being introduced, and all but the chairman being seated,[5] Mr. Sitgreaves, their chairman, addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. Vice-President: The House of Representatives having agreed upon articles in maintenance of their impeachment against William Blount for high crimes and misdemeanors, and having appointed on their part managers of the said impeachment, the managers have now the honor to attend the Senate for the purpose of exhibiting the said articles.

The Vice-President then ordered the Sergeant-at-Arms to proclaim silence, after which he notified the managers that the Senate was ready to hear the articles of impeachment; whereupon,

The chairman of the managers read the articles of impeachment, and they were received from him at the bar by the Sergeant-at-Arms and laid on the table.

The Vice-President[5] then said:[3]

Gentlemen, managers on the part of the House of Representatives: The Senate will take such order on the articles of impeachment which you have exhibited before them as shall seem to them proper, of which due notice will be given to the House of Representatives.

Upon which the managers and Members attending then retired.

The articles in impeachment of William Blount.

The articles in the Blount impeachment were signed by the Speaker and attested by the Clerk.

The articles of impeachment in the Blount case appear in the House Journal on the day of their adoption, and in the Senate Journal on the day of their presentation.

The Secretary of the Senate then read the articles of impeachment, as follows:

ARTICLES EXHIBITED BY THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES, IN THE NAME OF THEMSELVES AND OF ALL THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES, AGAINST WILLIAM BLOUNT, IN MAINTENANCE OF THEIR IMPEACHMENT AGAINST HIM FOR HIGH CRIMES AND MISDEMEANORS.

ARTICLE 1. That, whereas the United States, in the months of February, March, April, May, and June, in the year of our Lord 1797, and for many years then past, were at peace with His Catholic Majesty, the King of Spain; and whereas, during the months aforesaid, His said Catholic Majesty and the King of Great Britain were at war with each other; yet the said William Blount, on or about the months aforesaid, then being a Senator of the United States, and well knowing the premises, but disregarding the duties and obligations of his high station, and designing and intending to disturb the peace and tranquillity of the United States, and to violate and infringe the neutrality thereof, did conspire, and contrive to create, promote, and set on foot, within the jurisdiction and territory of the United States, and to conduct and carry on from thence, a military hostile expedition against the territories and dominions of His said Catholic Majesty in the Floridas and Louisiana, or a part thereof, for the purpose of wresting the same from His Catholic Majesty, and of conquering the same for the King of Great Britain, with whom His said Catholic Majesty was then at war as aforesaid, contrary to the duty of his trust and station as a Senator of the United States, in violation of the obligations of neutrality, and against the laws of the United States, and the peace and interests thereof.

[Then follows article 2, reciting that the said William Blount "did conspire and contrive to excite the Creek and Cherokee nations of Indians then inhabiting within the territorial boundary of the United States, to commence hostilities against the subjects and possessions of His Catholic Majesty," and article 3, reciting that the said Blount did "further conspire and contrive to alienate and divert the confidence of the said Indian tribes or nations from the said Benjamin Hawkins, the principal temporary agent aforesaid, and to diminish, impair, and destroy the influence of the said Benjamin Hawkins with the said Indian tribes, and their friendly intercourse and understanding with him, contrary to the duty of his trust and station as a Senator of the United States, and against the ordinances and laws of the United States, and the peace and interests thereof;" and article 4, reciting a similar attempt to seduce James Carey from his duty; and article 5, reciting similar efforts to foment disaffection among the Cherokee Indians toward the Government of the United States.]

And the House of Representatives, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter, any further articles, or other accusation, or impeachment, against the said William Blount, and also of replying to his answers, which he shall make unto the said articles, or any of them, and of offering proof to all and every the aforesaid articles, and to all and every other articles of impeachment, or accusation, which shall be exhibited by them, as the case shall require, do demand that the said William Blount may be put to answer the said crimes and misdemeanors, and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments may be thereupon had and given, as are agreeable to law and justice.

Signed by order and in behalf of the House.

JONATHAN DAYTON, Speaker.

Attest:

JONATHAN W. CONDY, Clerk.

These articles of impeachment appear in full in the Journals of both the House and Senate, in the House Journal on January 29,[1] the day of their adoption, and in the Senate Journal on February 7,[2] the day they were presented and read.

Form of oath administered to Senators sitting for the impeachment of William Blount.

The Senate decided in the Blount impeachment that the oath might be administered by the Secretary and President without authority of law.

The Senate decided in the Blount impeachment that the Secretary should administer the oath to the President, and the President to the Senators.

On February 9[1] the Senate considered the report of a committee appointed to determine the mode of administering oaths in cases of impeachment. This committee reported the following:

Resolved, That the oath or affirmation required by the Constitution of the United States to be administered to the Senate, when sitting for the trial of impeachment, shall be in the form following, viz:

"I, A B, solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be), that in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of —— —— I will do impartial justice, according to law."

Which oath or affirmation shall be administered by the Secretary to the President of the Senate, and by the President to each member of the Senate.

On motion that the report be amended by adding thereto these words "and that a bill be brought in conformable thereto," there were yeas 8, nays 20. Then, by a vote of 22 yeas to 6 nays, the resolution was agreed to as reported. On February 14[2] the Senate postponed a bill regulating certain proceedings in case of impeachment, and on February 20 the bill failed to pass.

Form of the writ of summons issued for the appearance of William Blount to answer articles of impeachment.

Rule of the Senate prescribing method of service of writ of summons on William Blount.

In the Blount impeachment the Secretary was directed to serve the summons sixty days before the return day.

The Senate in its writ of summons in the Blount impeachment fixed respondent's appearance at the next session of Congress.

The Senate communicated to the House its form of summons in the Blount impeachment, and it was entered in the House Journal.

In the Blount impeachment the House, in conference, asked of the Senate an earlier return day of the summons, but the request was denied.

Instance of a conference on a subject of procedure in an impeachment.

On March 1[3] the Senate concluded consideration of the report made on February 27 by Mr. Samuel Livermore,[4] of New Hampshire, from the committee to whom the subject had been recommitted on February 23, and, by a vote of yeas 22, nays 5, agreed to it as follows:

The committee to whom was recommitted the report of the committee appointed to prepare rules of proceeding in the case of the impeachment against William Blount, report, in part, that a writ of summons issue, directed to the said William Blount, in the form following:

"UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, ss:

"The Senate of the United States of America to William Blount, late a Senator of the United States for the State of Tennessee, greeting: Whereas the House of Representatives of the United States of America did, on the 7th day of July last past, in their own name, and in the name of all the people of the United States, impeach you, the said William Blount, of high crimes and misdemeanors before the Senate of the United States: And whereas the said House of Representatives did, on the 7th day of February, of the present year, exhibit to the Senate their articles of impeachment against you, the said William Blount, charging you with high crimes and misdemeanors, therein specially set forth (a true copy of which articles of impeachment is annexed to this writ), and did demand that you, the said William Blount, should be put to answer the said crimes and misdemeanors; and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments might be thereupon had as are agreeable to law and justice—you, the said William Blount, are therefore summoned to be and appear before the Senate of the United States of America, at their Chamber, in the city of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, on the third Monday of December next, at the hour of 11 of that day, then and there to answer the said articles of impeachment, and then and there to abide by, obey, and perform such orders and judgments as the Senate of the United States shall make in the premises, according to the Constitution and laws of the said United States. And hereof you are in nowise to fail. Witness, the honorable Thomas Jefferson, esq., Vice-President of the United States of America, and President of the Senate thereof, at the city of Philadelphia, the 1st day of March, in the year of our Lord 1798, and of the independence of the United States the twenty-second.

"Which summons shall be signed by the Secretary of the Senate.

"That the said summons shall be served on the said William Blount by the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House, or a special messenger, who shall leave a true copy of the writ and the articles annexed with the said William Blount, if he can be found, showing him the original; or at the usual place of residence of the said William Blount, if he can not be found. Which messenger shall make return of the writ of summons, and of his proceedings in virtue thereof, to the Senate, on the appearance day therein mentioned.

"And that a message be sent to the House of Representatives, giving information that the Senate have directed the said writ to be issued, and of the day mentioned therein for the appearance of the said William Blount."

It was then

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate do issue the summons hereinbefore directed, and that service thereof be made sixty days at the least before the return day mentioned in the said writ of summons.

This report was communicated to the House by message and appears in full on the Journal of that body.[1] The following order was then agreed to:

Ordered, That the said proceedings of the Senate be referred to the managers appointed on the part of this House to conduct the said impeachment against William Blount, with instructions to inquire and report whether any, and, if any, what, provisions are necessary to be made by law for regulating proceedings in cases of impeachment.

On April 6[2] Mr. Sitgreaves, from the managers, reported the following resolutions, which were agreed to:

Resolved, That a conference be desired with the Senate on the subject of their resolution of the 1st of March last, relative to the impeachment of William Blount, and that the managers appointed to conduct the said impeachment be the managers for this House at the proposed conference.

Resolved, That the managers of this House do request, at the said conference, that the Senate will appoint a day, during the present session of Congress, for the return of the summons directed by their resolution of the 1st of March aforesaid, to be issued to the said William Blount.

On April 9,[1] in the Senate,

Resolved, That they do agree to the proposed conference, and that Messrs. Ross and Livermore be managers at the same on the part of the Senate.

On April 13,[2] Mr. Bayard, from the managers appointed on the part of the House, submitted the following report, which was laid on the table:

That they laid before the conferees appointed by the Senate the resolution of the 6th instant, requesting the appointment of a day during the present session of Congress for the return of the summons against the said William Blount, the reasons upon which the said resolution was founded; and were assured by the conferees that the said request and the reasons for making it, suggested by the managers, should be reported and submitted to the Senate.

This report was ordered to lie on the table.

In the Senate, on April 16,[3] Mr. Ross, from the conferees, made a report; whereupon, it was Resolved, That it is not, at this time, expedient to alter the return day of the summons directed to be issued to William Blount, so as to make it returnable in the present session of Congress as requested by the managers of the House of Representatives, there being no certainty that it will continue long enough to afford reasonable time for a proper service and return of this process.

On April 16[4] this resolution was communicated to the House by message, and was read and ordered to lie on the table.

In Blount's impeachment the return of service of the summons was filed in the Senate before the day set for the appearance.

In the Blount impeachment a letter from respondent's attorneys announcing their readiness to attend was filed in the Senate before the day set for appearance.

In the Senate on December 6, 1798,[5] in the next and third session of the Congress, "the return of service on the summons to William Blount, made by the Sergeant-at-Arms, pursuant to the resolution of the Senate of the 1st of March last, was read." This is the entry of the Senate Journal, which does not give the return in full.

Then the President communicated a letter from Jared Ingersoll, esq., stating that he, together with A. J. Dallas, esq., were employed as counsel for William Blount, and that they were ready to attend the trial when ordered by the Senate. This letter does not appear in full in the Senate Journal.

In the House, on December 13,[1] Mr. Harper, in the absence of Mr. Bayard, "the present chairman" of the managers,[2] offered the following, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That another Member be appointed, by ballot, as one of the managers to conduct the impeachment against William Blount, in the room of Mr. Sitgreaves, appointed a commissioner of the United States, under the sixth article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, with Great Britain.

The Senate, by message, informed the House that the summons had been served on William Blount and a return made thereon to the Secretary's office.

Rules adopted by the Senate for reading the return, calling the respondent, and entering appearance or default in the first impeachment.

In the first impeachment the Senate by rule described itself as a court of impeachment.

Form used by the Sergeant-at-Arms in calling William Blount to appear and answer articles of impeachment.

Form of return of writ of summons in Blount impeachment.

William Blount appeared neither in person nor by attorney to answer the articles of impeachment.

The House did not attend the return of summons to William Blount to appear and answer articles of impeachment.

In the Senate on December 13:[3]

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the summons issued by order of the Senate of the United States against William Blount, on the 1st day of March last, to appear at their bar on the third Monday of December instant and answer to the impeachment made by the House of Representatives, for high crimes and misdemeanors, has been duly served on the said William Blount by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and a return thereon is made to the office of the Secretary of the Senate.

This message was received in the House on the same day.

On December 17,[4] in the Senate, Messrs. James Ross, of Pennsylvania; Jacob Read, of South Carolina, and Samuel Livermore, of New Hampshire, were appointed to report rules for conducting the trial of impeachment and reported—

That the legislative and executive business of the Senate be postponed, and that the Senate form itself into a court of impeachment by taking the oath prescribed by a resolution of this House on the 9th of February, last.

After the oath has been administered to the President and Senate, the process which, on the 1st of March last, was directed to be issued and served upon William Blount, and the return made thereupon, shall be read. The officer who served the process shall be sworn to the truth of the return thereof. The defendant, William Blount, shall be called to appear and answer the articles of impeachment exhibited against him. If he appears, his appearance shall be recorded. If he does not appear, his default shall be recorded.

The House of Representatives shall be notified of the appearance or default of the defendant, William Blount, and that the Senate will be ready at 12 o'clock to-morrow to receive the managers appointed by that House, and to take further order in this trial.

The report was adopted, and the Senate "formed itself into a court of impeachment accordingly." The daily Journal of the Senate does not record the proceedings of the court of impeachment,[1] but they were as follows on this day:[2]

On this day the Senate formed itself into a high court of impeachment, in the manner directed by the Constitution, and the oath prescribed was administered to the Senators present. The process issued on the 1st of March last against William Blount, together with the return made thereon, was read, and the return was sworn to as follows:

"James Mathers, Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate of the United States, maketh oath that, in obedience to the within summons, he did repair to the usual place of residence of the within-named William Blount, at Knoxville, in the State of Tennessee, and on the 27th day of August, in the present year, did then leave a true copy of the said writ of summons, and of the articles of impeachment annexed, with the wife of the said William Blount, he not being to be found; and that, on the next day, meeting with the said William Blount at the Blue Springs, the deponent showed and read the said original writ to the said William Blount, and informed him that he had left a copy at the usual place of his residence.

"JAMES MATHERS."

The doors of the court were then opened by order of the President, and by his order the Sergeant-at-Arms called the said William Blount three several times, in the words following, to appear and answer:

"Hear ye! Hear ye! Hear ye!

"William Blount, late a Senator from the State of Tennessee, come forward and answer the articles of impeachment exhibited against you by the House of Representatives."

William Blount not appearing, the court adjourned till 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The House being informed that William Blount had failed to appear and answer the articles, instructed the managers to ask of the Senate time to prepare proceedings.

After William Blount had failed to appear and answer, counsel were admitted on his behalf.

William Blount having failed to appear and answer, the House, after discussing English precedents, declined to ask that he be compelled to appear.

The House declined to instruct its managers as to further proceedings after William Blount had failed to appear and answer.

In the House on December 18,[3] a message was received from the Senate notifying the House that William Blount, impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors before the Senate, by this House, though he had been duly summoned, had not appeared at the bar of the Senate at the time appointed; and that the Senate would be ready to receive the managers at 12 o'clock this day, to take further order in this trial.

On motion of Mr. Harper, this message was referred to the managers of the impeachment, who had leave to sit during the session of the House.

Later, on the same day, Mr. Harper reported, and in accordance therewith it was—

Resolved, That the said managers do attend before the Senate, at 12 o'clock this day, and request a further day for preparing their proceedings in the said impeachment.

In the Senate, on December 18,[1] Messrs. Ross, Livermore, and Stockton were appointed a committee to take into consideration and report what rules were necessary to be adopted on the trial of the impeachment.

On the same day the Senate resolved itself into a court of impeachment, wherein occurred the following proceedings:[1]

The President communicated a letter, signed "Jared Ingersoll and A. J. Dallas," praying to be admitted to appear as counsel for the defendant. It was accordingly so ordered, and that the House of Representatives be informed thereof.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives and the defendant's counsel appeared at the bar.

On motion of Mr. Harper (in the absence of Mr. Bayard, the chairman), in behalf of the managers, that further time be allowed them to prepare their proceedings in the case, it was,

"Ordered, That they have time till Monday next, at 12 o'clock, for that purpose."

The court adjourned till that time.

In the House, on December 20,[2] Mr. Harper submitted the report of the managers, which was as follows:

That, pursuant to the resolution of this House, of the 18th instant, they did attend before the Senate of the United States, and request a further day for preparing their proceedings in the said impeachment; whereupon, a further day was granted till Monday next, at 12 o'clock.

That the managers, having carefully considered the subject, are of opinion that it is neither consistent with the solemnity which ought to attend this high constitutional proceeding, nor with the principles, which, as far as they have been able to discover, have invariably obtained in impeachments, and all other trials of a criminal nature, to proceed to trial against the defendant in this case in his absence; and that the said William Blount, having failed to make personal appearance, as has been notified to the House by the above-mentioned message from the Senate, the next step, on the part of this House, ought to be a motion before the Senate that further order be taken by them for compelling his personal appearance at their bar, to answer to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him by this House.

The managers, however, do not think it proper for them to take a step involving so important a principle without the direction of the House, for the purpose of obtaining which, they beg leave to submit to its consideration the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the managers appointed, on the part of this House, to conduct the impeachment against William Blount, late a Senator of the United States, be instructed to request, at their next attendance before the Senate, that further order be taken for compelling the personal appearance of the said William Blount, to answer to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him on the part of this House."

[1] Annals, p. 2245.

[2] House Journal, pp. 416, 417; Annals, pp. 2469–2487.

On the next day the House debated the report at length. It appeared that the managers were nearly unanimous in favor of their report, but it was vigorously assailed in the House. Mr. Harrison G. Otis, of Massachusetts, opposed:

Mr. Otis said he did not know what had been the rule observed in similar cases in England; he had not had leisure to examine; nor did he think we ought to be bound by British precedents in a case of this kind. It is, said he, a new case, and he saw no difficulty in determining to prosecute this man to conviction, and in obtaining for him the punishment which he deserves. There is some analogy between this process and a process (well known in common law) against a man's property, distinct from his person. Every one knows that such a prosecution is a prosecution of forfeiture. For instance, we libel a vessel, and notice is given to all the parties to defend. If they do not appear, judgment and execution are obtained.

The present process is against the office of William Blount; it has nothing to do with his person; he is afterwards liable to a prosecution at common law for any crime which he may have committed.

Mr. Samuel W. Dana, of Connecticut, also supported this view:

Let gentlemen who say that a person, in a case like the present, should be required to appear, answer, if a sentence can neither affect a man's person nor his property, why he should appear in person? If a man were liable to be punished with imprisonment, fine, or ransom, his person ought to be secured; and it is because courts will have security, that in such cases persons are either imprisoned or held by efficient bail is refused, it is where it does not afford a sufficient security. Is any such security required in this case? asked Mr. Dana. There is not. The process would be a rare one if the party were required to appear.

The Constitution, continued Mr. Dana, has proceeded on a different principle. The process in cases of impeachment in this country is distinct from either civil or criminal—it is a political process, having in view the preservation of the Government of the Union. Impeachments under the British Government are wholly different from impeachments carried on under this Government. The Constitution proceeds on the high authority of public opinion and of the high value of reputation to every man who is a candidate for public office, and that the declaration of public reprobation, expressed by the constitutional organ, is one of the severest punishments. It considers that the punishment of fine and imprisonment may be endured, but that public abhorrence is not to be borne.

The punishment in this case therefore is wholly a declaration of public opinion, not only that the person receiving it has proved himself unworthy of his present office, but that there is such a baseness attached to his character as to render him unfit for any office in future. Taking the matter up in this view, the propriety of not considering the offense as criminal will clearly appear. Were the offense to be considered as a crime merely, the judgment of the court should involve the whole punishment; whereas, it has no connection with punishment or crime, as, whether a person tried under an impeachment be found guilty or acquitted, he is still liable to a prosecution at common law. This process therefore is perfectly sui generis—equally unknown to the British Government or to this country.

Upon this view of the subject, Mr. Dana said his opinion was, that the House ought to instruct the managers, but in a way directly opposite to that proposed by the resolution under consideration.

Mr. Dana also cited the case of Robert Tresylliam and others, tried before the British House of Lords in 1388, in support of his opinion, but it was alleged in opposition that this precedent had been highly censured by English law writers.

Mr. Harper defended the report of the managers:

It had been the practice, from the earliest records of our jurisprudence to the present time, that a man shall never be tried in his absence for a criminal offense. Gentlemen say the reason of this is, that he may be ready to receive judgment. If so, it would be foolish, because the court might direct the person of a criminal to be brought before them to receive sentence as well as they could do it it before his trial. What, then, said he, is the reason? Ask the great sages of the English law, and they will give an answer very different from his learned friends. They will say that it is because a man ought always to be face to face with his judges and accusers; that no witness ought to be heard against a man, or his life or property put in jeopardy, without his personal presence; and so sacred is the principle held that a man is not permitted to depart from it. This is not a solitary instance in which personal convenience is sacrificed to natural convenience; this is frequently the case, in order to make sure the barriers which protect individual security. It is in this respect that our jurisprudence is chiefly distinguished from the inquisitorial proceedings of former times, where a man might be found guilty of the highest crimes without knowing who were his accusers, witnesses, or judges. It is by this sacred maxim that no man can be put in jeopardy without being confronted by his accusers. And shall we, said he, depart from this principle? Why shall we do this? Because the judgment to be awarded in this case does not extend to person or property? Is the judgment less than if it affected person of property? Gentlemen will not say so. They will say that a man's reputation is the dearest possession which he can enjoy; and certain he was that gentlemen who are opposed in opinion to him on this subject would sooner be deprived of their property or personal liberty than lose their fame and reputation. It was, in his opinion, the highest punishment that could be inflicted upon a man of worth.

The House disagreed to the resolution proposed by the managers, yeas 11, nays 69.

Mr. Samuel Sewall, of Massachusetts, one of the managers, in order that there might be positive instructions from the House, proposed this resolution:

Resolved, That the managers appointed on the part of this House for conducting the impeachment against William Blount proceed in the prosecution of the said impeachment, although William Blount should not appear in person to answer to the same.

It was urged against this resolution that it was improper to give any instructions at all and that the Senate should be left to proceed as they should think proper.

The resolution was disagreed to, ayes 37, noes 46.

Rule adopted by the Senate for the trial of William Blount in 1797.

The rule providing for the putting in of the answer or plea in the Blount case.

The rules in the Blount case provided that respondent's answer should be communicated to the House of Representatives.

The Senate rules in the Blount case required that respondent's answer should be spread on the journal.

The Senate rules in the Blount case provided that all questions arising should be decided in secret session and by yeas and nays.

Form of oath and mode of examination of witnesses prescribed in the Blount impeachment.

It was provided in the Blount case that Senators called as witnesses should be sworn and testify standing in their places.

The Senate communicated to the House its rules for the trial of William Blount; and they appear in the House Journal.

The Senate decided that the counsel for William Blount need not file any warrant of attorney or other written authority.

During proceedings in impeachment before the Senate the President pro tempore presides during temporary absence of the Vice-President.

In the Senate, on December 20,[1] Mr. Ross, from the committee appointed to prepare rules, made a report which, after amendment, was on December 21 agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That at the next opening of the court of impeachment the President shall inquire whether the managers have any request to make before the counsel of the defendant are called on to put in his answer.

[1] Senate Journal, p. 566, Annals, p. 2197.

If no motion or request is made, the defendant's counsel shall be required to put in his answer or plea to the articles of impeachment.

The answer or plea shall be read by the Secretary and entered by him on the Journal.

A copy of the defendant's answer or plea shall be communicated to the House of Representatives by the Secretary.

The President shall then inform the managers that the Senate is ready to hear any reply or motion which they may think proper to make.

All questions, arising in the course of the trial, shall be decided with closed doors. The decisions shall be by ayes and noes, which shall be entered upon the Journal. When the question is decided, the doors shall be opened, the parties called in, and the result made known to them by the President.

Witnesses shall be sworn by the Secretary, and shall take the following oath:

"I, A, B, do swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that the evidence I will give to this court, touching the impeachment of William Blount, now here depending, shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. So help me God."

Witnesses shall be examined by the party producing them, and then cross-examined in the usual form. If a Senator wishes any question to be asked, it shall be put by the President.

If Senators are called as witnesses, they shall be sworn, and give their testimony standing in their places.

It was also—

Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate, taking into their care the ordering of the trial of William Blount, late a Senator of United States from the State of Tennessee, on Monday, the 24th of December instant, have prepared some rules to be observed at said trial, which they have thought fit to communicate to the House of Representatives.

The message was accordingly delivered in the House, and the rules appear in full in the House Journal of December 21.[1]

On December 24[2] the Senate resolved themselves into a court of impeachment whereupon the proceedings were as follows:

The managers and counsel attended as on the 18th instant.

On the motion of Mr. Harper, in behalf of the managers, that the counsel exhibit and file the power, or powers, by which they are authorized to appear in behalf of William Blount, and that the managers be furnished with a copy thereof.

Mr. Dallas, one of the counsel, exhibited sundry letters to the President, which, he alleged, contains the powers and also the confidential instructions of Mr. Blount to his counsel.

The court was cleared in order to take into consideration the motion made by the managers of the impeachment; and, on the motion that it be ruled,

"That the court having, on the 18th day of the present month, admitted Jared Ingersoll and A. J. Dallas, esqs., to appear and plead for William Blount, to the impeachment now pending against him, and the court having then been satisfied that the said counsel were duly authorized to appear for the said William Blount, are of opinion that it is not necessary that any warrant of attorney, or other written authority, be now filed in this court."

It was determined in the affirmative, 20 to 2.

The managers and counsel being again admitted, the President[3] stated to them the opinion of the court on the motion of the managers, and returned to Mr. Dallas the letters by him exhibited, unopened.

The President then asked the managers if they had further motion to make prior to permission to the counsel for the defendant to file a plea on his behalf.

To which the managers replied in the negative.

The plea filed by counsel of William Blount in answer to the articles of impeachment.

William Blount, in his plea, demurred to the jurisdiction of the Senate to try him on impeachment charges.

William Blount pleaded that he was not, at the time of pleading, a Senator; and that a Senator was not impeachable as a civil officer.

The plea of William Blount being received by the House of Representatives, was referred to the managers.

Whereupon the President notified to the counsel that they were permitted to file their plea, which was done by Mr. Ingersoll and read by the Secretary as follows:

UNITED STATES v. WILLIAM BLOUNT.

Upon impeachment of the House of Representatives of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, December 24, 1798.

The aforesaid William Blount, saving and reserving to himself all exceptions to the imperfections and uncertainty of the articles of impeachment, by Jared Ingersoll and A. J. Dallas, his attorneys, comes and defends the force and injury, and says, that he, to the said articles of impeachment preferred against him by the House of Representatives of the United States, ought not to be compelled to answer, because he says that the eighth article of certain amendments of the Constitution of the United States, having been ratified by nine States, after the same was, in a constitutional manner, proposed to the consideration of the several States of the Union, is of equal obligation with the original Constitution, and now forms a part thereof, and that by the same article it is declared and provided, that "In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, to be confronted with the witnesses against him, to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense."

That proceedings by impeachment are provided and permitted by the Constitution of the United States, only on charges of bribery, treason, and other high crimes and misdemeanors, alleged to have been committed by the President, Vice-President, and other civil officers of the United States, in the execution of their offices held under the United States, as appears by the fourth section of the second article, and by the seventh clause of the third section of the first article, and other articles, and clauses contained in the Constitution of the United States.

That although true it is, that he, the said William Blount, was a Senator of the United States, from the State of Tennessee, at the several periods in the said articles of impeachment referred to; yet, that he, the said William, is not now a Senator, and is not, nor was at the several periods, so as aforesaid referred to, an officer of the United States; nor is he, the said William, in and by the said articles, charged with having committed any crime or misdemeanor, in the execution of any civil office held under the United States, or with any malconduct in civil office, or abuse of any public trust, in the execution thereof.

That the courts of common law, of a criminal jurisdiction, of the States, wherein the offenses in the said articles recited are said to have been committed, as well as those of the United States, are competent to the cognizance, prosecution, and punishment, of the said crimes and misdemeanors, if the same have been perpetrated, as is suggested and charged by the said articles, which, however, he utterly denies. All which the said William is ready to verify, and prays judgment whether this high court will have further cognizance of this suit, and of the said impeachment, and whether he, the said William, to the said articles of impeachment, so as aforesaid preferred by the House of Representatives of the United States, ought to be compelled to answer.

JARED INGERSOLL.
A. J. DALLAS.

On request of Mr. Harper, in behalf of the managers, that they be allowed a further delay, to wit, until Thursday sennight, to file their replication, it was allowed and the court adjourned to that time.

On December 26[1] a message from the Senate, by their Secretary, announced:

Mr. Speaker, the counsel in behalf of William Blount, by permission of the Senate, having filed their plea, I am directed to communicate a copy thereof to the House of Representatives.

This plea, as above given, appears in full in the Journal of the House. It does not appear from the Senate Journal that the Senate itself ordered this message sent. If the court of impeachment ordered it sent, the fact is not noted in the proceedings. But under the rule the Secretary would send it without further order of the Senate or court.

The House:

Ordered, That the said message be referred to the managers appointed on the part of this House to conduct the impeachment against William Blount, with instructions to proceed thereon as they shall deem advisable.

The House sent to the Senate a replication to respondent's plea; and his counsel presented a rejoinder.

The replication of the House was signed by the Speaker and attested by the Clerk.

In the Blount impeachment the rejoinder on behalf of respondent was signed by his attorneys.

In the Blount impeachment the replication was presented by the House managers, but was read by the Secretary of the Senate.

In the Blount impeachment the Senate dispensed with the requirement for yeas and nays on questions of adjournment and on allowing further time for the parties.

On December 31,[2] in the House, Mr. Bayard, from the managers appointed on the part of this House to conduct the impeachment against William Blount, to whom was referred, on the 26th instant, a message from the Senate communicating a copy of the plea filed by the counsel in behalf of the said William Blount, with instructions to proceed thereon, as they shall deem advisable, made a report, which he delivered in at the Clerk's table, where the same was twice read and agreed to by the House, as follows:

That the replication annexed be put into the said plea on behalf of this House, and that the managers be instructed to proceed to maintain the said replication at the bar of the Senate, as such time as shall be appointed by the Senate:

"The replication of the House of Representatives of the United States, in their own behalf, and also in the name of the people of the United States, to the plea of William Blount, to the jurisdiction of the Senate of the United States, to try the articles of impeachment exhibited by them to the Senate against the said William Blount:

"The House of Representatives of the United States, prosecuting, on behalf of themselves and the people of the United States, the articles of impeachment exhibited by them to the Senate of the United States against the said William Blount, reply to the plea of the said William Blount, and say, that the matters alleged in the said plea are not sufficient to exempt the said William Blount from answering the said articles of impeachment, because they say that, by the Constitution of the United States, the House of Representatives had power to prefer the said articles of impeachment, and that the Senate have full and the sole power to try the same: Wherefore, they demand that the plea aforesaid of the said William Blount be not allowed, but that the said William Blount be compelled to answer the said articles of impeachment."

It does not appear from the Journals of either the Senate or House that this replication was transmitted to the Senate by message before it was presented in the court of impeachment by the managers.

In the Senate, on January 3, 1799,[1] it was

Resolved, That in all questions of adjournment of the court of impeachment, as also in all questions on a motion that further time be allowed to the parties, the taking the question by yeas and nays be dispensed with.

Also on January 3 the Senate resolved itself into a court of impeachment, the proceedings of which are recorded:[2]

The court being opened, and the managers and counsel being present,

Mr. Bayard, chairman of the managers, in behalf of the House of Representatives, offered a replication, which was read by the Secretary as follows:

"The replication of the House of Representatives of the United States, in their own behalf. [Here follows the text of the replication as given above.]

"Signed by order, and in behalf of the House.

"JONATHAN DAYTON, Speaker.

"Attest

"JON. W. CONDY, Clerk."

Mr. Ingersoll, counsel for the defendant, thereupon presented a rejoiner, which was read by the Secretary, as follows:

"UNITED STATES v. WILLIAM BLOUNT.

"In the Senate of the United States.

"And the aforesaid William Blount, by Jared Ingersoll and Alexander J. Dallas, his attorneys, says that the matter by him before alleged, which he is ready to verify, is sufficient reason in law to show that this court ought not to hold jurisdiction of the said impeachment, and the articles therein set forth; which said matter so as aforesaid by him alleged, the said House of Representatives not having denied or made answer thereto, he prays the judgment of this honorable court, whether they will hold further jurisdiction of the said impeachment or take cognizance thereof, and whether the said William Blount shall make further answer thereto.

"JARED INGERSOLL.
"A. J. DALLAS.

"JANUARY 3, 1799."

It does not appear that this rejoinder was transmitted by message to the House.

In the Blount impeachment it was arranged that the managers should open and close in arguing respondent's plea in demurrer.

Mr. Bayard, the chairman, having communicated with Mr. Ingersoll, the leading counsel for the defendant, it was agreed between them that the managers should proceed in the argument first on the part of the prosecution, and that the right to reply should belong to the managers, whereupon,

Mr. Bayard rose and proceeded.

[1] Senate Journal, p. 568; Annals, p. 2199.

[2] Annals, p. 2248.

At the conclusion of his address Mr. Ingersoll, on behalf of the defendant, moved[1] for further time to reply, and it was allowed until 11 o'clock the next day to which time the court adjourned.

On January 4,[1] the court having convened, Mr. Dallas, in behalf of the defendant, spoke during that day's sitting.

On January 5[2] the court convened again, Mr. Ingersoll speaking further in defense. Mr. Ingersoll having concluded, Mr. Harper,[3] of the managers, closed.

After Mr. Harper had closed his observations, the Vice-President inquired of the managers if they had any further observations to offer, on which Mr. Bayard, in their behalf, requested permission to withdraw for a few moments; and, returning into the court, he replied in the negative.

The argument touched upon five points, although on two of these little stress was laid.

Discussion as to the right to demand a trial by jury in a case of impeachment.

(1) The plea of the respondent had set forth that the power of impeachment as established in the original Constitution had been limited by the eighth amendment. Mr. Bayard, of the managers, answering this, contended that it had no bearing on the question of jurisdiction in this case, whatever it might have should there be a trial. But he further urged that if the contention of the plea were well founded there would be an end of the judicial character of the Senate and it must part with the power expressly given it by the Constitution to try all impeachments. The same rule of construction would require jury trials in courts-martial.[4]

In reply on this point Mr. Dallas, speaking for the respondent, said:

The honorable manager had misunderstood the object of the plea when he supposed it asserted a right to a trial by jury in cases properly impeachable, since the clause to which he referred was merely inserted to show that, unless this was a case in which an impeachment would lie, the party was entitled to a trial by jury in the ordinary courts having cognizance of the matters charged.

Argument that impeachment should not fail simply because the offense may be within jurisdiction of the courts.

(2) The plea that the courts of law were competent to try the cause was answered by Mr. Bayard[1] by calling attention to the fact that no court at common law could give judgment of disqualification; and that was the just punishment for the offenses alleged.

He also said:

In the second place, if the suggestion were true it would not be effectual, because by the seventh clause of the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution delinquents shall be liable both to the punishment upon impeachment and that inflicted in the courts of common law. It is no objection to say that the courts have cognizance of the offense, because it is expressly provided that the one punishment shall not be an exemption from the other.

2315 Blount's impeachment continued.

In the Blount impeachment the managers contended, although in vain, that all citizens of the United States were liable to impeachment.

The law of Parliament was referred to in 1797 in discussing the power of impeachment.

(3) The first point of essential importance in the contending arguments of managers and counsel related to the nature of the power of impeachment. Mr. Bayard showed that in no places had the Constitution defined the cases or described the persons who should be objects of impeachment.[1] This, like other portions of the Constitution, left one to seek in the common law the answer to the questions.

The question,[2] therefore, is, what persons, for what offenses, are liable to be impeached at common law? And I am confident, as to this point, the learning and liberality of the counsel will save me the trouble of argument, or the citation of authorities, to establish the position that the question of impeachability is a question of discretion only, with the Commons and Lords. Not that I mean to insist that the Lords have legal cognizance of a charge of a capital crime against a commoner, but simply that all the King's subjects are liable to be impeached by the Commons, and tried by the Lords, upon charges of high crimes and misdemeanors. And this, sir, goes to the extent of the articles exhibited against William Blount. And for my part I do not conceive it would have been sound policy to have laid any restriction as to person upon the power of impeaching.

It is not difficult to imagine a case in which the punishment it imposes would be the most suitable which could be inflicted. Let us suppose that a citizen not in office, but possessed of extensive influence, arising from popular arts, from wealth or connections, actuated by strong ambition, and aspiring to the first place in the Government, should conspire with the disaffected of our own country, or with foreign intriguers, by illegal artifice, corruption, or force, to place himself in the Presidential chair. I would ask, in such a case, what punishment would be more likely to quell a spirit of that description than absolute and perpetual disqualification for any office of trust, honor, or profit under the Government; and what punishment could be better calculated to secure the peace and safety of the State from the repetition of the same offense?

Mr. Dallas, counsel for the respondent, combated this proposition at length. It was contrary to the "principles of the Federal compact:" [3]

For although it is in some of its features Federal, in others it is consolidated; in some of its operations it affects the people as individuals; in others it applies to them in the aggregate as States; yet, in every view, all the powers and attributes of the National Government are matters of express and positive grant and transfer; whatever is not expressly granted and transferred must be deemed to remain with the people, or with the respective States, and as the motive for establishing the Federal Constitution arose from the want of a competent national authority in cases in which it was essential for the people inhabiting the different States to act as a nation, so far the people gave power to the Federal Government; but the delegation of that power is evidently limited by the reason which produced it.

Mr. Dallas asserted that the United States, as a nation distinguished from the States, had no common law, and that it would be unwise to apply the theory of impeachments taken "from the dark and barbarous pages of the common law" to the existing situation, since it would render the Government dependent upon the laws and usages of a foreign country. The same doctrine would also give the Federal courts jurisdiction beyond the enumerated cases. The doctrine was also inconsistent with the general policy of the law of impeachments, which was to afford a means of reaching offenders who could not be reached by the ordinary tribunals. The doctrine was also inconsistent with a fair construction of the terms of the Constitution itself:

The operative words[1] are express: "The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."—Art. 2, sec. 4. The previous clauses are only descriptive of the power and distributive of its exercise; declaring that the sole power to institute and the sole power to try impeachments shall belong to the branches of the Legislature respectively. They contain no description of the persons liable to impeachment, nor of the offenses for which the impeachment may be brought. To suppose that they include a jurisdiction over all persons, for all offenses, is to annihilate the trial by jury where a punishment more severe than death to an honorable mind may be inflicted; it is to overthrow all the barriers of criminal jurisprudence; for every petty rogue may be tried by impeachment before this high court for every offense within the indefinite classification of a misdemeanor.

The reason of the thing, as well as the expression, shows, however, that the offender must be a civil officer to vest the jurisdiction of impeachment. For every other offender a competent punishment is provided in the ordinary tribunals; but, in the case of a public officer, no sentence strictly judicial, in any common law court, can affect the tenure of his office. In the business of offices, to appoint, to reappoint, or to abstain from reappointing are attributes and exercises of Executive authority; the ordinary judicial authority can not exercise them, nor restrain or regulate their exercise by the proper magistrate. Hence arose the necessity of the judgment in case of a conviction on impeachment, which, by declaring that the delinquent officer shall be removed, and that he shall never be reappointed, affixes, in effect, a check or limitation to the general power of the Executive.

But, if civil officers are not exclusively contemplated, why limit the judgment on impeachment simply to a removal and disqualification? The common law maxim says that no man shall be twice tried for the same offense; and if the Senate may, on any charge against any offender, try the whole merits of the accusation and defense, why restrain them from pronouncing the whole judgment? Why multiply trials, and parcel out jurisdictions, when one trial, one jurisdiction, would accomplish every purpose of justice? There is an appearance of absurdity in the doctrine that can not be overlooked. A private citizen who holds an office may be impeached on the speculation that, at some period of his life, it is possible he should be appointed a public officer. And if any sentence is pronounced it must, in his case, be a perpetual disqualification; whereas, in the case of a man actually in office, the sentence may only extend to a present removal.

Again, if the bare designation of the party who should impeach, and of the party who should try impeachments, creates a jurisdiction over all persons for all offenses, why should the subsequent clause specially name the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States? They would certainly be included in the general authority; and it can be no answer to say that it was with a view, imperatively, to command their removal on conviction, because the restricted judgment of the Senate points emphatically at their case—a removal from office and a perpetual disqualification. Would not those officers be removed or disqualified for any offense for which a private citizen might be disqualified on impeachment, though it is not one of the enumerated offenses? It is here, likewise, to be remarked that the persons subject to removal are to be "civil officers of the United States," excluding all idea of affecting the station of State officers; and yet State officers as well as private citizens are liable to impeachment before this Senate, according to the present claim of jurisdiction.

Mr. Ingersoll also argued on this point in support of the contention of his colleague.

In concluding for the managers, Mr. Harper replied:[2]

The learned counsel who first replied to my colleague took great pains and displayed much ability to show the pernicious and absurd consequences which would result from adopting the penal common law of England, or the penal code of any State, as a rule of conduct for the Federal Government. But this was merely fighting a phantom; for my colleague contended for no such thing, nor is it in the least necessary for our purpose. We do not wish the Federal Government to adopt the penal laws of England or of any particular State in the Union, but we contend that when a term, borrowed from the law of England, is introduced without comment or explanation into our Constitution or our statutes, every question respecting the meaning of that term must be decided by a reference to the code from whence it was drawn in the same manner as a term in chemistry, or any other science, being introduced into one of our statutes or constitutions, must be explained by a reference to the writers on that science. Surely this is a different thing from adopting the penal code of England or of any particular State as a rule of conduct for the Federal Government.

Mr. Harper further said:[1]

Nor can I conceive how the universal extent of the power of impeachment, contended for by my honorable colleague, is contrary to the spirit, the objects, or the policy either of the law of impeachment or of the Federal Constitution. The use of the law of impeachment is to punish, and thereby prevent, offenses which are of such a nature as to endanger the safety or injure the interests of the United States; and the object of the Federal Constitution was to provide for that safety and to protect those interests. Such offenses may be committed as well by persons out of office as by persons in office; and although the punishment can go no further than removal and disqualification, which restriction was, perhaps, wisely introduced in order to prevent those abuses of the power of impeachment which had taken place in another country, yet it may often be extremely important to prevent such offenders from getting into office, as well as to remove them when they are in; and it is, therefore, as consistent with the policy of impeachments and the principles of the Federal compact to punish them in the one case as in the other. This doctrine, it is further said, would enable Congress to interfere with the State governments by impeaching their officers. But those impeachments must be founded on offenses against the United States; and if such offenses were committed by State officers, I can not see why they ought not to be punished as well as in any other case. Surely they would not be less dangerous. If the convictions in such impeachments could remove men from State offices, or disqualify them for holding such offices, there might be something in the objection; but that could not be the case, since the removal and disqualification apply to offices under the General Government alone. * * * But the learned counsel for the defendant have told us that the power of impeachment is limited in the Constitution itself by the restriction which it imposes on the power of punishment. The power of punishment on conviction by impeachment is restricted, say they, to "removal from office and disqualification to hold or enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States;" and it would be absurd to impeach, try, and convict a man who held no office from which he could be removed, and could, of consequence, be not otherwise affected than by a disqualification to hold in future offices which he, perhaps, never had a prospect of obtaining. Of this absurdity the Constitution can not be supposed to be guilty; and therefore it could not have intended to subject to the power of impeachment any persons except those who actually hold offices and may be punished by removal.

But where, Mr. President, did the honorable counsel for the defendant learn that disqualification to hold any office of trust, honor, or profit under the Government of our country is no punishment? Would either of those honorable gentlemen think it no punishment in his own case ?

Elaborate argument of the question whether or not a Senator is a civil officer within the meaning of the impeachment clause of the Constitution.

(4) The fourth branch of the discussion involved an inquiry as to whether or not—it being assumed that only officers of the United States might be impeached—a Senator was an officer within the meaning of the Constitution.

Mr. Bayard, for the managers, contended that he acted as a legislator, an executive magistrate, and a judge. The ordinance of Congress for establishing a government for the Northwest Territory, passed in 1787, had contemplated members of the legislature as officers. This use of the word "office" was contemporaneous with the formation of the Constitution.

[1] Annals, p. 2299.

Furthermore, he contended that a Senator was not only an officer, but was an officer within the meaning of the Constitution itself. He then discussed the following portions as confirmatory of this view:

Article I, section 3, clause 7; Article I, section 6; Article 1, section 9, clause 7; Article II, sections 3 and 4.

As to two of these provisions he said:[1]

The first of these is the third section of the second article, which declares that the President shall commission all officers of the United States; and as it is clearly not designed that he should commission a Senator, it will be inferred that a Senator is not to be considered as an officer.

I humbly trust I can show, that it was not the intention of the Constitution that these words should take effect in their full extent; and I shall submit that they ought to be understood according to the subject to which they apply.

A commission is simply an evidence of authority delegated to a particular person. And surely it is proper that that evidence should show from the same source from which the appointment is derived. By the Constitution the President is made the fountain of office. The officers, properly speaking, under the United States are all appointed by him; and it was right, therefore, as the general power of appointing was given to him, that he should also have the general power of commissioning.

It is certain that it was intended that the power of commissioning should not exceed that of appointing, because the President does not commission anyone whom he does not appoint. The provision in question was not intended to define who should be considered as officers, but to introduce a plain and just rule of policy that the power of appointing and commissioning should reside in the same person. The practice under this constitutional regulation, explains its meaning and extent. It is clearly not true that he commissions all officers of the United States. He is an officer himself, and so expressly denominated throughout the second article, and yet he has no commission. It is equally clear that the Vice-President is an officer, and yet not commissioned. Again, the Speaker of the House of Representatives is an officer, as I shall have occasion to show hereafter, but has no commission. And there are also a variety of subordinate officers, appointed by heads of Departments and courts of justice, whom the President does not commission. I am therefore justified in concluding that it does not follow, because a person has no commission from the President, that therefore he is not to be considered as an officer.

There is another objection of a similar nature, arising from the provision in the sixth section of the first article, of which it is probable much use will be made. That section declares that no person holding an office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office. It will therefore be said, if the place of a Senator is an office, this clause is repugnant and absurd.

This provision, I humbly apprehend, has the same limits with the one which I have just adverted to. The intention of it was to erect a barrier between the Executive and legislative departments; to prevent Executive patronage from influencing legislative councils. It was designed therefore to apply solely to the officers of Executive appointment. I am not much disposed, sir, to place reliance in an argument upon so great a subject, upon nice distinctions or verbal criticism; but I think I shall be excused for paying some attention to the peculiar language of the clause in question. The regulation is that no person holding an office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office. The United States here means the Government of the United States, for the United States grants no office but through the Government. Now, it is clear that a Senator is not an officer under the Government. The Government consists of the President, the Senate, and House of Representatives, and they who constitute the Government can not be said to be under it. Besides, a Senator does not derive his authority from the Government. The Senatorial power is an emanation of the State sovereignties; it is coordinate with the supreme power of the United States; in its aggregate, it forms one of the highest branches of the Government. Giving every effect to this section, it would only prove that a Senator is not an officer under the Government of the United States, but still he may be an officer of the United States; and give me leave to say that the distinction which I have here taken is supported by the variance of language to be found in another part of the Constitution.

Mr. Bayard also cited the law of March 1, 1792, enacting that in case of vacancy in the office of President the Speaker of the House of Representatives should exercise the office, as showing that in legislative interpretation the Speaker is an officer.

Mr. Dallas, in replying, discussed the articles of the Contsitution referred to by Mr. Bayard, especially to show that a distinction could not be drawn between "officers of" and "officers under" the United States. The two terms, in his view, were used indiscriminately.

There were no words in the Constitution extending the impeaching power to a Senator:[1]

The second section of the second article provides, that "the President shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law." The President having then power to appoint all the officers of the United States, including military as well as civil officers; the third section of the same article, declaring that "he shall commission all the officers of the United States;" and the fourth section, providing for the removal of all civil officers excluding military officers, on impeachment and conviction; it would seem inevitably to result that no man is an officer of the United States unless he has been appointed and commissioned by the President; and that, therefore, unless he is so appointed and commissioned, he can not be an object of impeachment. Here Mr. Dallas requested that it might be remembered that the provision respecting impeachments was a part of the Executive article of the Constitution; and was immediately connected with the arrangements for making appointments, and issuing commissions, under the authority of the President.

Then Mr. Dallas proceeded to inquire, Does the President nominate or commission Senators or Representatives? No; nor does the Constitution, in any part of it, term them officers, or call their representative station an office. But the honorable manager has said that the latitude to which this position extends would render it necessary that the President should issue a commission to himself, to the Vice-President, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, since they are all expressly denominated officers. The Constitution, however, is not chargeable with this absurdity. The President and Vice-President have their commissions from the Constitution itself, and the speaker of the House of Representatives is emphatically an officer of the House, not of the United States. But the objection affords an opportunity to illustrate the meaning of the Constitution. It is provided that the President shall commission all officers, and that all civil officers shall be removed on impeachment and conviction; but the President does not commission himself and the Vice-President, and therefore as it was intended to affect them by the impeachment power, it became necessary expressly to name them. The President does not commission Senators and Representatives; but it was not intended to affect them by the impeachment, and therefore they are not named.

Mr. Dallas continued to analyze various parts of the Constitution, and argued from the operation of them that a legislator never was considered as an officer of the United States, in the ordinary or constitutional acceptation of the term. The sixth section of the first article contains the following passage: "No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office." Nothing could more strongly mark the discrimination between a legislator and an officer than the language which is here used. It is declared that no member holding any office shall be a member of either House while he continues in office. If a member was deemed an officer, the phraseology would doubtless have been, "no member holding any other office." Again let it be supposed that previously to the amendment of the Constitution (which merely provides that no law varying the compensation for the services of Senators and Representatives shall take effect until an election of Representatives has intervened) the pay of Senator had been increased by an act of Congress, could not a Representative, who had assisted in passing the act, be chosen a Senator before the expiration of the two years for which he was originally elected?

Again let it be supposed that a new State was erected and admitted into the Union; if a Senator is an officer, the office of Senator for the new State would be created during the time for which Congress, who created it, was elected; and yet might not a member of that Congress be chosen a Senator for the new State, before the expiration of the time for which he was elected a Representative? When, for instance, Kentucky was separated from Virginia, and erected into a State, was not a Representative elected for Virginia, residing within the boundaries of Kentucky, eligible immediately as a Senator of Kentucky, though he resigned his Representative seat before the term of his election had elapsed?

The first section of the second article likewise pointedly distinguishes between a legislator and a public officer, declaring "that no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector." If Senators or Representatives were considered as persons holding offices of profit or trust under the United States, it was superfluous to specify them at all; or, if named, it would have been correct to say, "no Senator or Representative, or person holding any other office of trust or profit," etc. But it is important also to remark that here, where the Constitution intends to work a disqualification, as to Senators and Representatives, they are expressly named; and no sound reason can be offered why they should not have been equally named, if the Constitution had intended to subject them to impeachment. * * * But, Mr. D. contended, that, independent of all precedent and authority, the distinction was founded upon the very nature of a free Government. The legislature is, in theory, the people; they do not themselves assemble, but they depute a few to act for them; and the laws which are thus made are the expressions of the will of the people. Over their Representatives the people have a complete control, and if one set transgress they can appoint another set, who can rescind and annul all previous bad laws. But the power of the people is only to make the laws; they have nothing to do with executing them; they have nothing to do with expounding them; and hence arises the diversity in the modes of remedying any grievance which they may suffer from the conduct of their Representatives or agents. If a legislator acts wrong, he may be expelled before the term for which he was chosen has expired; he may be rejected at the next periodical election; and the laws which he has sanctioned may be repealed by a new representation. But if an executive, or a judicial magistrate, acts wrong, the people have no immediate power to correct; prosecution and impeachment are the only remedies for the evil. Then, it is manifest, that, by the power of impeachment, the people did not mean to guard against themselves, but against their agents; they did not mean to exclude themselves from the right of reappointing, or pardoning; but to restrain the Executive magistrate from doing either with respect to officers whose offices were held independent of popular choice.

The argument that every person who executes an authority is in fact an officer was, in Mr. Dallas's opinion, too broad. The Speaker of the House of Representatives was an officer of the House, but not of the United States. And it was only on being chosen to the chair that he acquired the denomination of officer, contradistinguished from the character of Member.

Mr. Dallas continued further:[1]

From a just consideration of the principles of our Government, it was thus manifest that the moment there was a departure from the immediate choice of the people, the law of impeachment became necessary to secure them from the favoritism, or perverseness of the Executive Magistrate. Impeachment, he observed, is, with respect to executive and judicial officers, what expulsion is with respect to the members of the legislature. As expulsion enables the people to decide whether they will restore the evicted Member to their service, a conviction on impeachment enables the Representatives of the people to decide whether the delinquent shall be partially or totally excluded from the honors and emoluments of public office. But the very circumstance of declaring that a pardon shall not avail in cases of impeachment, though a reelection shall avail in cases of expulsion, demonstrates (as was before intimated) that the people did not mean to guard against the exercise of their own sovereignty, but against an abuse of the power delegated to their agents.

Mr. Ingersoll, speaking also in behalf of the respondent, discussed the extent of the power of impeachment under the Constitution, which, as he claimed,[2] was restricted to the President, Vice-President, and civil officers of the United States, for malconduct in office. He stated that he should afterwards endeavor to make it appear that Senators were not the objects of this power, not being comprehended under the designation of civil officers of the United States.

[2] Annals, p. 2282.

After discussing the limited powers granted by the Constitution, he said:[1]

My position is that the clause in question was intended and operates for the purpose of designating the extent of the power of impeachment, both as to the offenses and the persons liable to be thus proceeded against. It will be of use here to recollect that the Constitution had previously provided for the purity of the legislature in the second clause of the fifth section of the first article by empowering each House to punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, to expel a Member. No clause similar to that which is introduced into some of the State constitutions (that a member expelled and then returned is not liable to be expelled again for the same offense) is to be met with in the Constitution of the United States; and therefore the Senate has an unlimited power to expel any Member they shall deem unworthy their society.

Here, then, I flatter myself, the dispute admits of a clear solution— is reduced within a narrow compass, and brought to a point.

It is a rule of construction that every part of an instrument be, if possible, made to take effect and every word operate in some shape or other.

There are but two constructions suggested as possible—the one for which the honorable managers contend, to wit: That the fourth section of the second article was intended as an imperative injunction upon the Senate that when judgment was rendered against a civil officer of the United States it should be for removal from office; the other, that for which we, as counsel for the defendant, insist—that is, that it was intended to designate the extent of the practice of proceeding by impeachment, specifying who are the persons to be proceeded against, and for what offenses. If, then, I am able to show that the words of the fourth section of the second article will not have any effect or operation at all, unless they receive the construction for which I contend; if I establish these premises, the inference will necessarily follow that the construction for which the honorable managers contend is not well founded, and that the construction for which we contend is the true meaning of the Constitution in this particular. To this fair, short, and decisive test be the appeal.

He then proceeded to give emphasis to the word "further" in the Constitution, and to show that disqualification for office necessarily implied removal:[2]

It is impossible to pronounce a judgment that a man shall be incapable of holding an office and not remove him. The incapacity takes effect immediately. It is coeval with the judgment. There is not any interval between the judgment pronounced and the disqualification and incapacity. It is of course ridiculous to say that the fourth section of the second article was introduced to make it imperative upon the Senate to remove from office on conviction, when it was previously made so imperative that it was impossible to avoid pronouncing a judgment that would operate a removal from office. As it is thus clear beyond the possibility of doubt that the fourth section of the second article was not introduced for the purpose suggested by the honorable managers, which I have considered, and as no third construction has been attempted on either side, I infer that the construction contended for by the counsel for the defendant is well founded, to wit: That the fourth section of the second article was intended for the purpose of designating the extent of the power of proceeding by impeachment, at least so far as respects the persons liable to be thus proceeded against.

Further, if anything further be necessary upon a matter so very plain, if, as the honorable managers insist, all persons are within the extent of this mode of proceeding, why make it imperative on the Senate to remove civil officers only? Why make it absolutely imperative to remove the marshal of a district, whose sphere of influence is comparatively inconsiderable, and leave a general at the head of an army or an admiral in the command of a navy? Would not the public security be much more endangered by leaving a man convicted of high crimes and misdemeanors in these situations than those of many civil offices? It may be said that these military characters are liable to be proceeded against by courts-martial. Be it so; that consideration is a good reason why they should not be considered as within the power of impeachment, as we assert to be the case; but none at all for not removing them on conviction, if they are within the provision of the Constitution in this particular. And if Senators were within the power of proceeding by impeachment, would it not also have been made imperative upon the Senate to remove them, who have a veto upon every bill proposed to be passed into a law and every nomination for appointment to office?

I add, that I conceive the proceedings by impeachment are restricted not only to civil officers, but that the only causes cognizable in this mode of proceeding are malconduct in office.

Proceeding to consider whether or not Senators are "civil officers of the United States," after quoting Blackstone's definition, "a right to exercise a public or private employment, and to take the fees and emoluments thereunto belonging," Mr. Ingersoll called attention to the fact that an officer excluded from his office might obtain admission by mandamus proceedings. Might a Senator avail himself of these remedies? This question he answered in the negative.

To be an officer of the Government one must receive a commission from the Executive. A Senator was not such an officer. Nor was there force in the argument that a Senator had a judicial as well as an executive character. All those qualities of his position emanated from the same source as his legislative qualities.

He said on another point:[1]

Senators and Members of the House of Representatives have one set of words appropriated to them in the Constitution—civil officers, other terms; as thus, "office," "appointment," "commission," "removal;" Senator, or one of the House of Representatives, "Member," "election," "expulsion," "seat vacated."

What interpretation shall we give to the sixth section of the fourth article? "No person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office;" and yet a Senator is, ipso facto, it is said, an officer of the United States. Identity is incompatibility. The exception of a Senator is implied, say the honorable managers; but how do they show it? Is not this section to be understood as importing that the character of a Member of either House and that of an officer of the United States are, by the Constitution, distinct and incompatible? The distinction is observed throughout. Can the Clerk of this House, or the Clerk of the other House, be proceeded against by impeachment? I conceive not; because they are not appointed nor commissioned by the United States Government, or by the Executive thereof, but by the respective Houses. I believe that not an instance can be found in the Constitution of the United States in which a Senator is classed under the denomination of an officer, or civil officer of the United States.

Some observation was made on the ninth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, "that no person holding any office of profit or trust under the United States should, without the consent of Congress, accept of any present from any king, prince, or foreign state." Might a Senator, one in so important a public situation, accept of a present from a foreign state? No, I answer. The power of expulsion is a sufficient check. The impropriety of the measure would be a sufficient guard. The laws, in consonance with the Constitution of the United States, distinguish between the Members of the legislature and the officers of the United States, and also of the several States.

In the first volume of the laws of the United States, page 18, section 3, it is provided "that all members of the State legislatures, and the executive and judicial officers of the several States, shall take an oath to support the Constitution;" and by section 2 it is provided "that the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives," and by section 4, "that all officers of the United States" shall take the same oath, distinguishing between the Members of either House and the officers of the United States. In the constitution of the State of Pennsylvania, of New York, of Massachusetts, and of New Hampshire the same distinction of language is observed. The distinction is equally familiar in the English law. In the first volume of Blackstone's Commentaries, page 368, it is said "that the oath of allegiance must be taken by all persons in any office, trust, or employment;" yet members of either House are not considered as included. On page 374 of the same volume it is declared "that no denizen can be of the Privy Council, or either House of Parliament, or have any office of trust, civil or military." Such, I believe, has been the universal understanding of the expressions until the present prosecution.

It is a rule of construction that when a law is only doubtful, arguments ab inconvenienti are most powerful. The rule will apply, with equal propriety, to the construction of a constitution. If the most numerous branch, already, I repeat it, sufficiently formidable, may proceed by impeachment against a Senator—at their will doom to temporary disgrace any Member—this would form an engine of immense additional weight in their hands. I know that it is not always an objection against intrusting power that it may be abused; but when it is unnecessary to make the trust, and the danger great, the risk ought not to be incurred.

In concluding for the managers, Mr. Harper joined issue [1] with Mr. Ingersoll as to the intent of the clause relating to impeachments:

But admitting, Mr. President, that the power of impeachment is restricted by the Constitution to officers of the Government of the United States, still I contend that a Senator of the United States, a Member of this honorable body, is an officer of the Government, in the constitutional meaning of the word, and consequently liable to impeachment on the doctrine of the learned counsel themselves.

The learned counsel have, indeed, contended by their plea and in their arguments that none but civil officers are liable to impeachment by the Constitution; but in this they are plainly contradicted by the Constitution itself. They found their argument on that clause which provides "that the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." But this clause is, evidently, not restrictive, but imperative. It does not point out what persons or what officers shall be liable to impeachment, but expressly orders that such and such officers, when convicted on impeachment, shall be punished to the extent, at least, of removal from office. The former clause had declared that "judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold or enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit, under the United States," leaving the Senate to apportion the punishment, according to its discretion, within those limits. They might censure the person convicted, suspend him for a limited time, or disqualify him perpetually for certain offices, or for all offices during a certain period. But beyond absolute removal and perpetual disqualification for all offices they could not go. This was fixed as the utmost limit of their power and of their discretion.

It was judged, however, that in case of the President, Vice-President, or any civil officer the punishment ought not to be less than removal, though it might be more, according to circumstances. This provision was, therefore, inserted. Its object, manifestly, is, not to designate the persons who shall be liable to impeachment, but to prevent the Senate, in the exercise of their discretion, from retaining in a civil office a person convicted of "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." As to the distinction here made between civil officers and other officers, there is no need to examine or defend it. It may, however, be supposed to have arisen from an opinion, certainly well founded, that, under certain circumstances, there might be danger or great inconvenience in removing from his command a military officer, whom, nevertheless, it might be very proper to censure or suspend, or even to disqualify for some particular offices. As to military officers, therefore, a complete discretion was left to the Senate; but not in the case of civil officers, to whom the same reasons could not apply. They, on conviction, must be removed. Military officers may be removed or not, according to circumstances.

He further contended that a Senator was an officer in the sense of the Constitution, and after exhaustively considering the definitions of the term "office," he said: [2]

The manner in which the term "office" is used by legal writers, and their formal definitions of it, support the interpretation which I have drawn from its received and common acceptation. Without going into a detail on this point, which might be tedious, let it suffice, Mr. President, to refer to Blackstone, who has been justly relied on by the learned counsel for the defendant, as a standard authority on subjects of this kind. Speaking of "offices," in the second volume of his Commentaries, page 36, as cited by the learned counsel who preceded me, that great writer lays it down that "offices are a right to exercise a public or private employment, and to take the fees and emoluments thereunto belonging." Now, let me ask, is not a seat in this honorable body "a public employment?" Has not the Member "a right to exercise this employment, and to receive the emoluments thereunto belonging?" Surely to answer in the negative would be a strange abuse of language.

The learned counsel who immediately preceded me has contended that a Senator can not be considered as an "officer," because there could be no quo warranto to remove him from his place if he held it improperly, nor mandamus to place him in it if unjustly kept out. But surely this can not be a well-founded argument, for, if it be, it applies as well to the President, the Judges, the Secretaries, and the Commander in Chief of the Army as to a Senator. Not one of them could be removed by quo warranto or replaced by mandamus. Did anyone ever hear of a quo warranto to remove a colonel of a regiment? Was a quo warranto ever brought in England against the Chancellor of the Exchequer or a Secretary of State, or a Lord of the Admiralty? Certainly not, and yet that these are officers will not be denied. The truth is, Mr. President, that the doctrine of quo warranto and mandamus, as far as it relates to officers, is confined exclusively to certain local municipal officers of a subordinate nature, who are placed, by the common law of England, under the superintendence of the supreme court of justice; to which, from the nature of their offices, recourse could most conveniently and effectually be had for their punishment, their removal, or their reinstatement. But this reason did not extend to the great officers of the State, of the Army, or the Navy, or to any of their subordinates. They could best be punished, removed, and replaced in a different manner and by a different authority. To them, therefore, nobody ever dreamt of extending the power of the supreme courts by quo warranto and mandamus, and yet nobody ever, on this account, thought of denying that they were "officers," which, however, would be just as reasonable as to contend that a Senator of the United States is not an "officer," because he can not be removed by a quo warranto or admitted by mandamus. I admit that it would be absurd to talk of an office from which a man could not be removed, however flagitious his conduct; or into which, when entitled to it, and improperly kept out, he had no means of obtaining admission. But a Senator may be removed by a vote of expulsion, and if duly elected, but not returned, may obtain his seat by a petition to the Senate.

I conceive, therefore, that no argument can be more destitute of foundation than that which would divest a seat in this honorable body of the quality of an "office," because it is not within the scope of writs of mandamus and quo warranto.

If from Blackstone, Mr. President, we turn to our own laws, our own writers, and even our own constitutions, we shall equally find that a seat in the legislature is considered as an "office."

After discussing the legislator as an officer, especially in the light of the State and national constitutions and laws, especially discussing one clause of the National Constitution—[1]

A clause from the sixth section of the first article, in the following words, has also been relied on:

"No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased, during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office."

I am ready to admit, Mr. President, with my honorable colleague, who opened the case, that this clause wears an aspect more hostile to our construction of the term "office" than any other part of the Constitution, but I contend with him that the Constitution, like all other instruments, must be construed in each separate part of it, secundum subjectam materiem, according to the subject-matter of each part, and in such a manner as to effectuate every part and render the whole consistent. These rules of construction will not be denied. When this clause comes to be analyzed and tried by these rules, it will, I think, appear satisfactorily that our construction is not infringed by it.

What is the object of this clause? It is threefold: First, to prevent a blending of the different departments of Government—the legislative, executive, and judicial—by uniting their functions in the hands of the same individual, which would be contrary to the spirit of the Constitution; secondly, to prevent the executive from acquiring an undue influence in the legislature, by appointing its most active and able Members to offices which must be held at his pleasure, and, thirdly, to take away from aspiring or avaricious Members the temptation to create offices or increase their emoluments, which might arise from the expectation of speedily filling those offices themselves. What description of officers was it necessary to exclude from the legislature in order to effect these three objects? First, those whose duties might be incompatible with a strict and regular attendance in the legislature; secondly, those who derive their appointments from the Executive, and, thirdly, those whose offices are of a nature to be considered as lucrative—to be sought after on account of their pecuniary emoluments. It is evident that some one or other of these characteristics belongs to every description of officers, except "legislative"—to military, to executive, judicial, and diplomatic. It is to be presumed that the Constitution here used the word "office" in that sense, and that only, which was necessary in order to effectuate its intentions, and consequently that the clause extends to those officers only whom it was the intention of the Constitution to exclude from the legislature. The clause therefore is to be understood as if, instead of the general expressions, "any civil office," "any office," it had said, "any other civil office," "any other office." This will render the whole Constitution consistent with itself and with the well-established meaning of language. In the clause relative to commissions we have an instance where, in order to prevent the Constitution from pronouncing a palpable absurdity, it was necessary to explain the general term "all officers," so as to mean "all officers appointed by the President." If the general expression may be controlled by the subject-matter and intent in one case, it may in another, and certainly the subject-matter and intent could not speak more strongly against the general expression in the former, or in any other case, than in this.

If this reasoning be well founded, it follows that the clause in question proves nothing against our doctrine of a Senator being an officer in the sense of the Constitution. It only proves that the Constitution, being obliged to use the same word in application to different matters, and for different purposes, has used it generally and left it to be explained by a reference to the intent and subject-matter, instead of explaining it by express modifications. The object here was to exclude certain officers from the legislature, and the term is used generally; but it by no means follows, from thence, that Members of the legislature are not themselves officers.

Also another argument was answered:[1]

An objection has also been drawn from the supposed intention with which the power of impeachment was established by the Constitution. The sole object of this power, it is said, was to provide a remedy against the favoritism or obstinacy of the Supreme Executive Magistrate, by affording a means of removing from office improper persons, whom he might be inclined to retain in place to the detriment of the nation. This necessity does not exist, we are told, with respect to members of the legislatiure who are removable by the people themselves at stated periods, and to whom, consequently, the power of impeachment ought not to extend.

But this can not be the sole object of the power of impeachment, because the President himself is liable to be impeached, as well as the officers whom he appoints. So also is the Vice-President. And yet these two great officers are appointed by the people themselves, in a manner far more direct and immediate than Senators and removable at shorter periods. If the power of impeachment be, as the learned counsel insist, intended as an aid to the control which the people, by the right of election, have over their public servants, or to supply the place of that control where it does not exist, surely there is much stronger reason for its extending to Senators than to the President or Vice-President, for Senators are much farther removed from the power of the people and the control of elections than those officers. They are elected for a much longer period; their election being made by legislative bodies, who are chosen by the people for other purposes and, for a considerable time, is far less influenced by popular opinion or popular feelings than that of the President, who is chosen by electors elected for that sole purpose, and selected, in almost every instance, according to their known attachment to the favored candidate. The election of the President and Vice-President therefore partakes far more of the nature of a popular election than that of Senators. Indeed, of all the component members of our Government the Senate, both in the mode of its appointment and the term of its duration, is intended to be, and actually is, the most permanent and independent—the furthest elevated above the region and the influence of those storms whereby a popular government must sometimes be agitated. God forbid, Mr. President, that I should find fault with these ingredients in the composition of the Senate or do anything which could tend in the least to diminish their efficiency. I consider them as among the most valuable principles of the Constitution.

And finally he urged:[1]

But the effect of an impeachment, it is said, may be produced in another manner, more conformable to the dignity of the Senate. The same majority of two-thirds which can convict on an impeachment may also expel, and thus an improper person may be driven from the Senate. But, in the first place, he can not be thus kept out in future; for, though the Senate may expel, it can not disqualify. And if we suppose the case (which may very well happen) of a great and wicked man, supported by a strong party in the legislature of his own State, he may return again, after being expelled and may go on in the commission of "high crimes and misdemeanors," in the very station which gives him the greatest means of committing them with effect.

In the second place, an offender has a much better chance to escape from an expulsion than from an impeachment. Where the offense is of a very dark and complicated nature, consists in transactions or plots carried on at a distance or in many places at once, and of consequence can not be brought to light and fully substantiated without a laborious, long-continued and systematic inquiry, it must be admitted that the aid of a prosecutor will be necessary, and that the Senate of itself and for the mere purpose of expulsion will be little disposed to undertake so tedious and disagreeable a task.

In the Blount case it was conceded that a person impeached might not avoid punishment by resignation.

(5) As to the status of Mr. Blount at the time of the argument, Mr. Bayard said:[2]

It is also alleged in the plea that the party impeached is not now a Senator. It is enough that he was a Senator at the time the articles were preferred If the impeachment were regular and maintainable when preferred, I apprehend no subsequent event, grounded on the willful act, or caused by the delinquency of the party, can vitiate or obstruct the proceeding. Otherwise the party, by resignation or the commission of some offense which merited and occasioned his expulsion, might secure his impunity. This is against one of the sagest maxims of the law, which does not allow a man to derive a benefit from his own wrong.

Speaking for the respondent, Mr. Dallas said:[3]

It is among the less objections of the cause that the defendant is now out of office, not by resignation. I certainly shall never contend that an officer may first commit an offense and afterwards avoid punishment by resigning his office; but the defendant has been expelled. Can he be removed at one trial and disqualified at another for the same offense? Is it not the form rather than the substance of a trial? Do the Senate come, as Lord Mansfield says a jury ought, like blank paper, without a previous impression upon their minds? Would not error in the first sentence naturally be productive of error in the second instance? Is there not reason to apprehend the strong bias of a former decision would be apt to prevent the influence of any new lights brought forward upon a second trial?

The Senate decided that it had no jurisdiction to try an impeachment against William Blount, a Senator.

The Senate notified the House that it had made a decision in the Blount case and set a time for receiving the managers and rendering judgment.

The House did not attend its managers during the Blount impeachment, even at the judgment.

Form of judgment pronounced by the Vice-President in the Blount impeachment.

Judgment being given in the Blount impeachment, the managers submitted to the House a report in writing.

The Senate delivered to the managers for transmission to the House an attested copy of its judgment in the Blount case.

On January 7 [1] the Senate resolved itself into a court of impeachment, and the following resolution was offered:

That William Blount was a civil officer of the United States within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, and therefore liable to be impeached by the House of Representatives;

That as the articles of impeachment charge him with high crimes and misdemeanors, supposed to have been committed while he was a Senator of the United States, his plea ought to be overruled.

This resolution was debated in the court of impeachment until January 10,[2] when it was disagreed to, yeas 11, nays 14.

On January 11,[3] it was determined by a vote of 14 yeas and 11 nays, the division of Members being exactly as on the preceding day:

The court is of opinion that the matter alleged in the plea of the defendant is sufficient in law to show that this court ought not to hold jurisdiction of the said impeachment, and that the said impeachment is dismissed.

It was further ordered by the court of impeachment:

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate will be ready to receive the managers of the House of Representatives and the counsel of the defendant on Monday next, at 12 o'clock, to render judgment on the impeachment against William Blount.

The Journal of the Senate has no record of this order; but it was received in the House the same day as a message from the Senate.[4]

On January 14,[5] the managers alone attended, the House going on with the transaction of its business. The court being opened and silence being proclaimed, the parties attending, judgment was pronounced by the Vice-President as follows:

Gentlemen, managers of the House of Representatives, and gentlemen, counsel for William Blount: The court, after having given the most mature and serious consideration to the question, and to the full and able arguments urged on both sides, has come to the decision which I am now about to deliver.

The court is of opinion that the matter alleged in the plea of the defendant is sufficient in law to show that this court ought not to hold jurisdiction of the said impeachment, and that the said impeachment is dismissed.

Copies of the judgment were delivered to the managers and to the counsel for the defendant, respectively.

After which they withdrew; and, on motion, the court adjourned without day.

On the same day, in the House,[6] Mr. Bayard, from the managers appointed on 2319. The impeachment and trial of John Pickering, judge of the United States district court for New Hampshire, in 1803.

The impeachment proceedings against Judge Pickering were set in motion by a message from the President.

The committee recommended and the House voted the impeachment of Judge Pickering on the strength of certain ex parte affidavits.

The House decided to proceed in the Pickering impeachment, although the session and the Congress neared an end.

The Pickering impeachment was carried to the Senate by a committee of two.

Forms of resolutions for impeachment of Judge Pickering and directing the carrying of the same to the Senate.

On February 4, 1803,[1] a message was received from the President of the United States transmitting a "letter and affidavits exhibiting matter of complaint against John Pickering, district judge of New Hampshire, which is not within executive cognizance."

The message was read, and with the accompanying papers, was referred to a committee composed of Messrs. Joseph H. Nicholson, of Maryland; James A. Bayard, of Delaware; John Randolph, jr., of Virginia; Samuel Tenney, of New Hampshire, and Lucas Elmendorf, of New York.

[1] Second session Seventh Congress, Journal, p. 322; Annals, p. 460.

Accompanying the message were the following documents: (1) A letter from Albert Gallatin, Secretary of the Treasury, to the President, stating that it appeared that Judge Pickering, in a suit wherein the revenue was concerned, had "acted in a manner which showed a total unfitness for the office," and which showed "some legislative interference absolutely necessary;" (2) a letter from John S. Sherburne, United States district attorney for New Hampshire, to the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting affidavits and making a statement as to the conduct of the judge; (3) affidavits of Thomas Chadbourne, Jonathan Steele, Daniel Humphrey, John Wentworth, Joseph Whipple, and R. C. Shannon setting forth specific acts of said judge. These affidavits were taken ex parte.[1]

On February 18[2] Mr. Nicholson submitted the report of the committee:

That from the face of the said depositions it appears that the said John Pickering has been guilty of high misdemeanor in the exercise of his judicial functions, and recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That John Pickering, judge of the district court of the district of New Hampshier, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors."

On March 2[3] the report was considered by the Committee of the Whole, who recommended concurrence in the report, after a debate which is very briefly reported and during which the principal question seems to have been the advisability of proceeding in the case at so late a period in the session. A proposition to postpone the resolution to the next session was disagreed to, ayes 9, noes 43.

The House agreed to the resolution, yeas 45, nays 8.

Thereupon it was Ordered, That Mr. Nicholson and Mr. Randolph be appointed a committee to go to the Senate, and, at the bar thereof, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States, to impeach Judge Pickering, judge of the district court of the district of New Hampshire, of high crimes and misdemeanors; and to acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him and make good the same.

Ordered, That the committee do demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said John Pickering to answer to the said impeachment.

On March 3,[1] in the Senate, a message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. Nicholson and Mr. Randolph, as follows:

Mr. President, we are commanded, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States, to impeach John Pickering, judge of the district court of the district of New Hampshire, of high crimes and misdemeanors; and to acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him and make good the same.

We are further commanded to demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said John Pickering to answer to the said impeachment.

Then they withdrew.

On the same day, in the House,[2] Mr. Nicholson reported verbally:

That, in obedience to the order of the House, the committee had been to the Senate, and, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States, had impeached John Pickering, judge of the district court of the district of New Hampshire, of high crimes and misdemeanors; and had acquainted the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles against him and make good the same.

And, further, that the committee had demanded that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said John Pickering to answer to the said impeachment.

On the same day, in the Senate,[3]

Ordered, That the message received this day from the House of Representatives respecting the impeachment of John Pickering, judge of a district court, be referred to Messrs. Tracy [Uriah, of Connecticut], Clinton [De Witt, of New York], and Nicholas [Wilson C., of Virginia].

Later on this day Mr. Tracy reported from the committee the following resolution and preamble, which were agreed to by the Senate:

Whereas the House of Representatives have this day, by two of their Members, Messrs. Nicholson and Randolph, at the bar of the Senate, impeached John Pickering, judge of the district court for the district of New Hampshire, of high crimes and misdemeanors; and have acquainted the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him and make good the same,

And have likewise demanded that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said John Pickering to answer to the said impeachment: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Senate will take proper order thereon, of which due notice shall be given the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate notify the House of Representatives of this resolution.

On the same day a message announcing this resolution was received in the House.[4]

And later on the same day, March 3, 1803, both House and Senate adjourned sine die, the term of the Seventh Congress having expired.

At the beginning of the Eighth Congress the House continued the Pickering impeachment by appointing a committee to prepare articles.

The Eighth Congress met in its first session on October 17, 1803, it being the day appointed by law. The proceedings against Judge Pickering were continued from the point where they had been interrupted by the expiration of the Seventh Congress.

On October 20,[1] in the House, Mr. Nicholson stated that during the last session the House had voted an impeachment against John Pickering, judge of the district court for New Hampshire, for high crimes and misdemeanors. But the impeachment had been voted at so late a period of the session as rendered it impossible to act then finally upon it. In order that it might be now acted upon, and the impeachment proceed, he moved the adoption of the following:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report articles of impeachment against John Pickering, district judge of the district of New Hampshire, who was impeached by this House during the last session of high crimes and misdemeanors; and that the said committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

The committee were appointed as follows: Messrs. Nicholson, John Randolph, jr., Roger Griswold, of Connecticut; Peter Early, of Georgia, and Samuel Thatcher, of Massachusetts.

The Senate declined to order compulsory process to compel the appearance of Judge Pickering, but authorized a committee to examine the subject.

On October 27,[2] in the Senate, the following resolution was proposed, but was laid on the table:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare the process to compel the attendance of John Pickering to answer the charge exhibited against him by the House of Representatives at their last session.

On November 14[3] the Senate resumed consideration of the resolution above given and, having amended it, agreed to it as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire if any, and what, further proceedings at present ought to be had by the Senate respecting the impeachment of John Pickering, made at the bar of this Senate by two Members of the House of Representatives on the last day of the last session of Congress.

The following committee were appointed: Uriah Tracy, of Connecticut; Stephen R. Bradley, of Vermont; Abraham Baldwin, of Georgia; Robert Wright, of Maryland, and William Cocke, of Tennessee.

The House considered the articles of impeachment of Judge Pickering in Committee of the Whole House.

The articles of impeachment of Judge Pickering were enrolled after they were agreed to by the House.

In the Pickering impeachment the House decided that the managers should not be appointed by the Speaker or by viva voce vote, but by ballot.

The House having excused a Member elected manager in the Pickering case, another was chosen by ballot.

It does not appear that the message announcing the appointment of managers of the Pickering impeachment included their names.

On December 27[1] Mr. Nicholson, from the committee appointed to prepare articles of impeachment, presented them to the House; and having been read, the same were referred to a Committee of the Whole House.

On December 30[2] the articles were considered in Committee of the Whole and, being reported therefrom without amendment, were agreed to by the House. They appear in full in the Journal. During the proceedings[3] on the articles Mr. Samuel Tenney, of New Hampshire, called for the reading of several depositions to show that Judge Pickering had sustained a respectable character and that his recent conduct had arisen from insanity. In reply Mr. Nicholson said that the House had determined that they would impeach, and it was therefore the present duty to furnish the Senate with the articles. Mr. Nicholson further said that he was informed from respectable sources that Judge Pickering was habitually intoxicated. The articles were agreed to without division.

On motion of Mr. Nicholson, according to the Annals,[4] the articles were ordered to be enrolled, in correspondence with the practice of the House. The Journal does not mention this.

It was then ordered that eleven managers be appointed on the part of the House. A discussion arose as to the manner of selection. A motion that they be appointed by the Speaker was decided in the negative. Then it was decided that they be appointed by ballot, although several Members, notably Mr. Nicholson, urged that they should be elected by viva voce vote.

It does not appear that a special rule was made to govern the balloting, which was presumably conducted under the then existing rule of the House.

The following were chosen managers: Messrs. Nicholson, Early, Cæsar A. Rodney, of Delaware; William Eustis, of Massachusetts; John Randolph, jr., of Virginia; Roger Griswold, of Connecticut; Samuel L. Mitchill, of New York; George W. Campbell, of Tennessee; William Blackledge, of North Carolina; John Boyle, of Kentucky, and Joseph Clay, of Pennsylvania.

On motion,

Ordered, That Mr. Roger Griswold be excused from serving as one of the managers appointed to conduct the said impeachment, and that the House do now proceed, by ballot, to the appointment of another manager to serve in his stead.

Thereupon Mr. Thomas Newton, jr., of Virginia, was chosen.

On January 3, 1804,[5] it was

Resolved, That the articles agreed to by this House, to be exhibited in the name of themselves, and of all the people of the United States, against John Pickering, in maintenance of their impeachment against him for high crimes and misdemeanors, be carried to the Senate by the managers appointed to conduct the said impeachment.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate, to inform them that this House have appointed managers, on their part, to conduct the impeachment against John Pickering, and have directed the said managers to carry to the Senate the articles agreed upon by the House, to be exhibited in maintenance of their impeachment against the said John Pickering; and that the Clerk of this House do go with the said message.

On the same day in the Senate:[1]

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have appointed managers, on their part, to conduct the impeachment against John Pickering, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of New Hampshire, and have also directed the said managers to carry to the Senate the articles agreed upon by the House of Representatives to be exhibited against the said John Pickering.

It does not appear that the message announced the names of the managers.

The Senate decided, in the Pickering case, that it would take order for respondent's appearance only after articles had been exhibited.

The Senate committee concluded, in the Pickering case, that there was no impeachment before the Senate until articles were exhibited.

It was concluded by a Senate committee in Pickering's impeachment that the Senate had no power to take into custody the body of the accused.

A notification to the accused with a copy of the articles was deemed, in the Pickering impeachment, all the process necessary.

A Senate committee concluded, in the Pickering impeachment, that respondent might answer in person, by attorney, or not at all.

In the Pickering case the Senate committee concluded that after service of notice of the articles, the Senate might proceed to trial whether respondent entered appearance or not.

The Senate committee advised, in Pickering's case, that the Senate had the sole power to regulate forms, substances, and proceedings when acting as a court of impeachment.

On the same day in the Senate, after the receipt of the above message, a report submitted by Mr. Tracy, from the committee appointed to inquire as to further proceedings, was submitted as follows:[2]

That they find the following facts, which have an immediate relation to the subject committed to them, viz: "On the last day of the last session of Congress two Members of the House of Representatives came to the Senate, and in the name of the House, and of all the people of the United States, verbally impeached John Pickering, district judge of the district of New Hampshire, of high crimes and misdemeanors, without any specification; and likewise, they verbally acquainted the Senate that the said House of Representatives would in due time exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him, the said Pickering, and make good the same. And they verbally demanded that the Senate should take order for the appearance of the said John Pickering, to answer to the said impeachments," and that said verbal declaration of impeachment was committed by the Senate to a select committee, who reported thereon, in the following words, viz: "Resolved, That the Senate will take proper order thereon (that is, of the verbal impeachment aforesaid), of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives," of which resolution, the Secretary of the Senate gave information to the House of Representatives.

With these facts in view, your committee have attended to the constitutional powers vested in the Senate as a court of impeachment, and they find that "judgment in case of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States;" and that "the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law." Hence your committee suppose that no power is constitutionally vested in the Senate to take into custody, or hold the body of the person impeached for trial; but that a notification to the party of the impeachment, with a copy of the articles exhibited, is all the process requisite in the case; and that it is optional with the party to appear in propria persona, by attorney, or not at all, and that after the notice given as aforesaid, it is competent for the Senate to proceed to a trial and judgment on said impeachment, whether the party shall appear by himself, his attorney, or not at all. And although your committee would not in the smallest degree interfere with the House of Representatives, in the manner of instituting the process of impeachment, since the sole right of impeaching is vested by the Constitution in that House, yet they believe the Senate, in common with other courts, have the sole power, while acting as a court of impeachment, to regulate all forms as well as substance of impcaehments which shall be presented to them, and all proceedings to be had thereon. They therefore are of opinion that at present no further proceeding ought to be had by the Senate respecting the verbal impeachment of John Pickering, made at the bar of the Senate by two Members of the House of Representatives, on the last day of the last session of Congress; and that in strict and proper construction of the Constitution, there is no impeachment before the Senate, until exhibited to them by the House of Representatives, in written articles.

On a full view of the subject, the committee respectfully submit for the consideration and adoption of the Senate the following resolution, viz:

"Resolved, That the Senate can not with propriety take any order upon the verbal notification to them by the House of Representatives, on the last day of the last session of Congress, that they did impeach John Pickering of high crimes and misdemeanors. And that all proceedings thereon by the Senate must be deferred until written articles shall, in due form, be presented by said House of Representatives."

It does not appear that the above resolution was formally agreed to by the Senate.

Rule of the Senate prescribing forms and ceremonies for receiving managers in presenting articles of impeachment against Judge Pickering.

The Senate organized as a court before receiving the articles in the Pickering case.

The oath administered by the Secretary to the President and by him to the Senators in the Pickering impeachment.

The Senate set a day and hour for receiving the managers to exhibit articles impeaching Judge Pickering, and informed the House thereof.

The Senate appointed a committee to search the Journals for precedents for the Pickering impeachment.

The same committee further reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That, at 12 o'clock to-morrow, the Senate will resolve itself into a court of impeachment, at which time the following oath or affirmation shall be administered by the Secretary to the President of the Senate, and, by him, to each member of the Senate, viz: "I, ——, solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be), that, in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of John Pickering, judge of the district court of the district of New Hampshire, I will do impartial justice, according to law;" which court of impeachments, being thus formed, will, at the time aforesaid, receive the managers appointed by the House of Representatives to exhibit articles of impeachment, in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, against John Pickering, judge of the district court for the district of New Hampshire, pursuant to notice given to the Senate this day by the House of Representatives, that they had appointed managers for the purposes aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the House of Representatives.

It was further—

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to search the Journals and report precedents in cases of impeachments; and that Messrs. Tracy, Bradley, Baldwin, Wright, and Cocke, to whom it was referred on the 14th of November last, to consider and report, if any, what further proceedings ought to be had by the Senate, respecting the impeachment of John Pickering, by this committee.

On January 4,[1] in the House, the following message was received from the Senate:

Mr. Speaker: I am directed to inform this House that the Senate will, at 12 o'clock this day, be ready to receive articles of impeachment against John Pickering, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of New Hampshire, to be presented by the managers appointed by this House.

The Senate prescribed by rule the ceremonies for receiving the House managers to present articles of impeachment against Judge Pickering.

Form of proclamation made by the Sergeant-at-Arms, under direction of the President, when the managers presented articles in the Pickering impeachment.

Articles of impeachment being exhibited against Judge Pickering, the President of the Senate was directed by rule to state that order would be taken and the House would be notified.

On January 4,[2] in the Senate, before it resolved itself into a court of impeachment, Mr. Tracy, from the committee appointed to examine precedents, reported the following:

Resolved, That, after the managers of the impeachment shall be introduced to the bar of the Senate, and shall have signified that they are ready to exhibit articles of impeachment against John Pickering, the President of the Senate shall direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to make proclamation; who shall, after making proclamation, repeat the following words: "All persons are commanded to keep silence, on pain of imprisonment, while the grand inquest of the nation is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States, sitting as a court of impeachment, articles of impeachment against John Pickering, judge of the district court for the district of New Hampshire."

After which the articles shall be exhibited; and then the President of the Senate shall inform the managers that the Senate will take proper order on the subject of the impeachment, of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.

The resolution was agreed to.

In the Pickering trial a Senator, who as a Member of the House had voted for impeachment, was challenged, but voted.

Thereupon Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, offered the following:

Resolved, That any Senator of the United States, having previously acted and voted as a Member of the House of Representatives, on a question of impeachment, is thereby disqualified to sit and act, in the same case, as a member of the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment.

It was agreed that this motion should lie for consideration.

An appendix to the records of the court of impeachment has the following:[3]

Early in the trial a question was raised as to the propriety of those gentlemen, viz, Samuel Smith, Israel Smith, and John Smith, of New York, who were during the last session Members of the House of Representatives, and voted here upon the question for impeaching Judge Pickering, sitting and voting as judges upon the trial.

Mr. Smith, of New York, wished to be excused.

Mr. S. Smith declared that he would not be influenced from his duty by any false delicacy; that he, for his part, felt no delicacy upon the subject, the vote he had given in the other House to impeach

[1] House Journal, p. 513. [2] Senate Journal, pp. 382, 383; Annals, p. 225. [3] Annals, p. 368.

Judge Pickering would have no influence upon him in the court; his constituents had a right to his vote, and he would not by any act of his deprive or consent to deprive them of that right, but would claim and exercise it upon this as upon every other question that might be submitted to the Senate whilst he had the honor of a seat.

All these men appear as voting during the trial.

In the Pickering impeachment the Senate organized itself as a court before receiving the articles.

The Journal of the Pickering trial was kept separate from the regular Senate Journal.

Ceremonies of presenting the articles against Judge Pickering before the high court of impeachment.

In the Pickering impeachment the chairman of the managers read the articles and then delivered them at the table of the Senate.

The articles impeaching Judge Pickering, with signature of the Speaker and attestation of the Clerk.

The chairman of the managers reported verbally to the House after having presented in the Senate the articles impeaching Judge Pickering.

On this day, January 4,[1] the Senate resolved itself into a court of impeachment. The ordinary Senate Journal merely records this fact, but does not contain the record of the court's proceedings.[2]

On February 20, 1805,[3] the Senate resumed consideration of the motion for printing the Journals of their proceedings, while sitting for the purpose of trying impeachments, and agreed to it as follows:

Resolved, That the proceedings of the Senate while sitting for the purpose of trying impeachments shall be published in the same manner in which the legislative proceedings are now published; and this resolution shall have relation to all proceedings in trials of impeachments which have heretofore taken place.

The Senate having resolved itself into a court of impeachment, proceeded agreeably to its resolution to organize the court.[4]

The Secretary administered the following oath to the President:

You solemnly swear that, in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of John Pickering, judge of the district court of the district of New Hampshire, you will do impartial justice, according to law.

The President administered the oath, respectively, to Messrs. Adams, Armstrong, Anderson, Bailey, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Condit, Ellery, Franklin, Hillhouse, Jackson, Olcott, Pickering, Potter, Israel Smith, Samuel Smith, John Smith, Tracy, Venable, Wells, and Worthington; and the affirmation to Messrs. Logan, Maclay, and Plumer.

A message was received from the House of Representatives.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives, Messrs. Nicholson, Early, Rodney, Eustis, John Randolph, jr., Samuel L. Mitchill, George W. Campbell, Blackledge, Boyle, Joseph Clay, and Newton, were admitted; and Mr. Nicholson, the chairman, announced that they were the managers instructed by the House of Representatives to exhibit certain articles of impeachment against John Pickering, district judge of the district of New Hampshire.

They were requested by the President to take seats assigned them within the bar.

The Sergeant-at-Arms was directed to make proclamation, in the words following:

Oyes! Oyes! Oyes! All persons are commanded to keep silence on pain of imprisonment while the grand inquest of the nation is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States, sitting as a court of impeachments, articles of impeachment against John Pickering, judge of the district court of the district of New Hampshire.

The managers then rose, and Mr. Nicholson, their chairman, read the articles, as follows:

Articles exhibited by the House of Representatives of the United States, in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, against John Pickering, judge of the district court of the district of New Hampshire, in maintenance and support of their impeachment against him for high crimes and misdemeanors.

ARTICLE 1. That whereas George Wentworth, surveyor of the district of New Hampshire, did, in the port of Portsmouth, in the said district, on waters that are navigable from the sea by vessels of more than 10 tons burden, on the 15th day of October, in the year 1802, seize the ship called the Eliza, of about 285 tons burden, whereof William Ladd was late master, together with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, alleging that there had been unladen from on board of said ship, contrary to law, sundry goods, wares, and merchandise, of foreign growth and manufacture, of the value of $400 and upwards, and did likewise seize on land within the said district, on the 7th day of October, in the year 1802, two cables of the value of $250, part of the said goods which were alleged to have been unladen from on board the said ship as aforesaid, contrary to law; and whereas Thomas Chadbourn, a deputy marshal of the said district of New Hampshire, did, on the 16th day of October, in the year 1802, by virtue of an order of the said John Pickering, judge of the district court of the said district of New Hampshire, arrest and detain in custody for trial before the said John Pickering, judge of the said district court, the said ship, called the Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, and also the two cables aforesaid;

And whereas by an act of Congress, passed on the 2d day of March, in the year 1789, it is among other things provided that "upon the prayer of any claimant to the court that any ship or vessel, goods, wares, or merchandise so seized and prosecuted, or any part thereof, should be delivered to such claimant, it shall be lawful for the court to appoint three proper persons to appraise such ship or vessel, goods, wares, or merchandise, who shall be sworn in open court, for the faithful discharge of their duty; and such appraisement shall be made at the expense of the party on whose prayer it is granted; and on the return of such appraisement, if the claimant shall, with one or more sureties to be approved of by the court, execute a bond in the usual form to the United States for the payment of a sum equal to the sum of which the ship or vessel, goods, wares, or merchandise so prayed to be delivered and appraised and moreover produce a certificate from the collector of the district wherein such trial is had and of the naval officer thereof, if any there be, that the duties on the goods, wares, and merchandise, or tonnage duty on the ship or vessel so claimed have been paid or secured in like manner as if the goods, wares, or merchandise, ship or vessel, had been legally entered, the court shall, by rule, order such ship or vessel, goods, wares, or merchandise, to be delivered to the said claimant;" yet the said John Pickering, judge of the said district court of the said district of New Hampshire, the said act of Congress not regarding, but with intent to evade the same, did order the said ship called the Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, and the said two cables, to be delivered to a certain Eliphalet Ladd, who claimed the same, without his, the said Eliphalet Ladd, producing any certificate from the collector and naval officer of the said district that the tonnage duty on the said ship or the duties on the said cables had been paid or secured, contrary to his trust and duty as judge of the said district court, against the law of the United States and to the manifest injury of their reveune.

ART. 2. That whereas, at a special district court of the United States, begun and held at Portsmouth on the 11th day of November, in the year 1802, by John Pickering, judge of said court, the United States, by Joseph Whipple, the collector of said district, having libeled, propounded, and given the said judge to understand and be informed that the said ship Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, had been seized as aforesaid, because there had been unladen therefrom, contrary to law, 2 cables and 100 pieces of check, of the value of $400, and having prayed in their said libel that the said ship, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, might by the said court be adjudged to be forfeited to the United States and be disposed of according to law; and a certain Eliphalet Ladd, by his proctor and attorney, having come into the said court, and having claimed the said ship Eliza, with her tackle, furniture, and apparel, and having denied that the said 2 cables and the said 100 pieces of check had been unladen from the said ship contrary to law, and having prayed the said court that the said ship, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, might be restored to him, the said Eliphalet Ladd, the said John Pickering, judge of the said district court, did proceed to the hearing and trial of the said cause thus pending between the United States on the one part, claiming the said ship Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, as forfeited by law, and the said Eliphalet Ladd on the other part, claiming the said ship Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, in his own proper right; and whereas John S. Sherburne, attorney for the United States in and for the said district of New Hampshire, did appear in the said district, as his special duty it was by law, to prosecute the said cause in behalf of the United States, and did produce sundry witnesses to prove the facts charged by the United States in the libel filed by the collector as aforesaid in the said court, and to show that the said ship Eliza, with her tackle, furniture, and apparel, was justly forfeited to the United States, and did pray the said court that the said witnesses might be sworn in behalf of the United States, yet the said John Pickering, being then judge of the said district court, and then in court sitting, with intent to defeat the just claims of the United States, did refuse to hear the testimony of the said witnesses so as aforesaid, produced in behalf of the United States, and without hearing the said testimony so adduced in behalf of the United States in the trial of the said cause did order and decree the said ship Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, to be restored to the said Eliphalet Ladd, the claimant, contrary to his trust and duty as judge of the said district court, in violation of the laws of the United States and to the manifest injury of the revenue.

ART. 3. That whereas it is provided by an act of Congress, passed on the 24th day of September, in the year 1789, "that from all final decrees of the district court in cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, where the matter in dispute exceeds the sum or value of $300 exclusive of costs, an appeal shall be allowed to the next circuit court to be held in such district;" and whereas on the 12th day of November, in the year 1802, at the trial of the aforesaid cause between the United States on the one part, claiming the said ship Eliza, with her furniture, tackle, and apparel, as forfeited for the cause aforesaid, and the said Eliphalet Ladd on the other part, claiming the said ship Eliza, with her furniture tackle, and apparel, in his own proper right, the said John Pickering, judge of the said district of New Hampshire, did decree that the said ship Eliza, with her tackle, furniture, and apparel, should be restored to the said Eliphalet Ladd, the claimant; and whereas the said John S. Sherburne, attorney for the United States in and for the said district of New Hampshire, and prosecuting the said cause for and on the part of the United States, on the said 12th day of November, in the year 1802, did, in the name and behalf of the United States, claim an appeal from said decree of the district court to the next circuit court to be held in the said district of NewHampshire, and did pray the said district court to allow the said appeal, in conformity to the provisions of the act of Congress last aforesaid, yet the said John Pickering, judge of the said district court, disregarding the authority of the laws and wickedly meaning and intending to injure the revenues of the United States and thereby to impair their public credit, did absolutely and positively refuse to allow the said appeal, as prayed for and claimed by the said John S. Sherburne in behalf of the United States, contrary to his trust and duty of judge of the district court, against the laws of the United States, to the great injury of the public revenue, and in violation of the solemn oath which he had taken to administer equal and impartial justice.

ART. 4. That whereas for the due, faithful, and impartial administration of justice, temperance and sobriety are essential qualities in the character of a judge, yet the said John Pickering, being a man of loose morals and intemperate habits, on the 11th and 12th days of November, in the year 1802, being then judge of the district court in and for the district of New Hampshire, did appear on the bench of the said court for the administration of justice in a state of total intoxication, produced by the free and intemperate use of intoxicating liquors; and did then and there frequently, in a most profane and indecent manner, invoke the name of the Supreme Being, to the evil example of all the good citizens of the United States; and was then and there guilty of other high misdemeanors, disgraceful to his own character as a judge and degrading to the honor of the United States.

And the House of Representatives, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any further articles or other accusation or impeachment against the said John Pickering; and also of replying to his or any answers which he shall make to the said articles, or any of them; and of offering proof to all and every other articles, impeachment, or accusation which shall be exhibited by them as the case shall require, do demand that the said John Pickering may be put to answer the said high crimes and misdemeanors; and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments may be thereupon had and given as may be agreeable to law and justice.

Signed by order and in behalf of the House.

NATHANIEL MACON, Speaker.

He then delivered the articles at the table; whereupon,

The President notified the managers that the Senate would take proper order on the subject of the impeachment, of which due notice should be given to the House of Representatives, and they withdrew.

The court adjourned to 12 o'clock to-morrow.

In the House,[1] on the same day, Mr. Nicholson, from the managers appointed on the part of this House to conduct the impeachment against John Pickering, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of New Hampshire, reported that the managers did this day carry to the Senate the articles of impeachment agreed to by this House on the 30th ultimo, and the said managers were informed by the Senate that their House would take proper measures relative to the said impeachment, of which this House should be duly notified.

In the Pickering case the rules were reported directly to the court of impeachment and agreed to therein.

Form of summons prescribed to command appearance of respondent in the Pickering impeachment.

Form of precept prescribed by the Senate to be indorsed on the writ of summons to Judge Pickering.

In the Pickering case the Senate provided for issuing subpœnas of a specified form on application of managers or of respondent or his counsel.

In the Pickering impeachment the subpœnas were directed to the marshal of the district wherein the witness resided.

The forms of summons and subpœna in the Pickering case were communicated to the House and entered on its Journal.

Form of direction to the marshal for service of subpœnas in the Pickering trial.

[1] House Journal, p. 515; Annals, p. 802.

On January 5[1] the Senate in high court of impeachments assembled, and the President administered the oath to Mr. Jonathan Dayton, of New Jersey.

On January 9,[2] in the high court, Mr. Tracy reported from the committee appointed to examine precedents and prepare forms. The Senate Journal makes no mention of this or other proceedings of the court, although the committee was appointed by the Senate.

On January 10 and 11[3] the report was considered in the high court, and amendments were voted on and agreed to. The yeas and nays were taken, although it does not appear in what way they were ordered.

On January 12[4] the report was agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That a summons issue, directed to the said John Pickering, in the form following:

"UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, sct:

"The Senate of the United States of America, in their capacity of a court of impeachments, to John Pickering, judge of the district court for the district of New Hampshire, greeting:

"Whereas the House of Representatives of the United States of America did, on the 4th day of January, exhibit to the Senate, then sitting as a court of impeachments, articles of impeachment against you, the said John Pickering, charging you with high crimes and misdemeanors, therein specially set forth in the words following, viz: [Here insert the articles]; and did demand that you, the said John Pickering, should be put to answer the accusations of high crimes and misdemeanors as set forth in said articles; and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments might be thereupon had as are agreeable to law and justice. You, the said John Pickering, are therefore hereby summoned to be and appear before the Senate of the United States of America in their capacity of a court of impeachments, at their Chamber in the city of Washington, on the 2d day of March next, then and there to answer to the said articles of impeachment, and then and there to abide by, obey, and perform such orders and judgments as the Senate of the United States, acting in their said capacity of a court of impeachments, shall make in the premises, according to the Constitution and laws of the said United States. Hereof you are not to fail."

Witness, Aaron Burr, Vice-President of the United States of America and President of the Senate thereof, at the city of Washington, this 12th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1804, and of the Independence of the United States the twenty-eighth.

Which summons shall be signed by the Secretary of the Senate and sealed with their seal, and served by James Mathers, Sergeant-at-Arms to the Senate, who shall serve the same pursuant to the directions given in the next following resolution:

Second. Resolved, That a precept shall be indorsed on said writ of summons in the form following, viz:

"UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, ss:

"The Senate of the United States, in their capacity of a court of impeachments, to James Mathers, Sergeant-at-Arms to the Senate, greeting:

"You are hereby commanded to deliver to and leave with John Pickering, esq., district judge of the district of New Hampshire, if to be found, a true and attested copy of the within writ of summons, together with a like copy of this precept, showing him both; or in case he can not with convenience be found, you are to leave true and attested copies of the said summons and precept at his usual place of residence; and in whichever way you perform the service, let it be done at least thirty days before the appearance day mentioned in the said writ of summons. Fail not, and make return of this writ of summons and precept, with your proceedings thereon indorsed, on or before the appearance day therein mentioned in said writ of summons."

Witness, Aaron Burr, Vice-President of the United States of America and President of the Senate thereof, at the city of Washington, this 12th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1804, and of the Independence of the United States the twenty-eighth.

Which precept shall be signed by the Secretary of the Senate and sealed with their seal.

[4] Annals, pp. 323, 325.

Third. Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to pay the necessary expenses arising upon the process aforesaid, after the same shall be allowed by the President of the Senate for the time being, out of the fund appropriated to defray the contingent expenses of the two Houses of Congress, and the Secretary of the Senate is hereby authorized and directed to advance out of said fund, to said James Mathers, for his traveling expenses, the sum of two hundred dollars, to be by said James Mathers accounted for in a final settlement for his services.

Fourth. Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate do acquaint the House of Representatives of the foregoing resolutions, and deliver to them a copy of the same.

Mr. Tracy, from the committee last mentioned, further reported in part, and the report was amended, as follows:

Resolved, That whenever application shall be made to the Secretary of the Senate for a subpœna or subpœnas for witnesses by the House of Representatives, either by their managers of the impeachment or in any other proper way, or by the party impeached or his counsel, acknowledged as such by the Senate sitting as a court of impeachments, he shall issue to such applicant a subpœna or subpœnas in the following form, viz:

"To [here name the witnesses and residence] greeting: You and each of you are hereby commanded, laying aside all excuses, to appear before the Senate of the United States, in their capacity of a court of impeachments, on the —— day of ———, at the Senate Chamber, in the city of Washington, then and there to testify your knowledge in the cause which is before said court of impeachments for trial, in which the House of Representatives have impeached John Pickering, judge of the district court for the district of New Hampshire, of high crimes and misdemeanors. Fail not."

Witness, Aaron Burr, Vice-President of the United States of America and President of the Senate thereof, at the city of Washington, this —— day of ———, in the year of our Lord 1804, and of the Independence of the United States the twenty-eighth.

Which shall be signed by the Secretary of the Senate and sealed with their seal.

Which subpœnas shall be directed in every case to the marshal of the districts where such witnesses reside, to serve and return.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate do issue twelve subpœnas for witnesses in the above form for the use of the said Pickering, with blanks therein for such witnesses as he, the said Pickering, may think proper to summon, which subpœnas shall be delivered by the Sergeant-at-Arms to him at the time he shall serve the summons aforesaid on the said Pickering.

As amended, the report was agreed to, yeas 23, nays 5.

It was then—

Ordered, That the Secretary lay these resolutions before the House of Representatives.

The above resolutions were communicated to the House by message on this day,[1] and on January 13 were read and laid on the table. The resolutions of the Senate are printed in full in the House Journal.

On January 13[2] the high court appears to have agreed on a "form of direction to the marshal for the service of the subpœna:"

[L. S.] THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, SITTING AS A COURT OF IMPEACHMENTS.

To the Marshal of the District of ———:

You are hereby commanded to serve and return the within subpœna according to law.

Dated at Washington this —— day of ———, in the year of our Lord 1804, and of the Independence of the United States the twenty-eighth.

It does not appear that this form was communicated to the House of Representatives.

Returns of the Sergeant-at-Arms on the summons and a subpœna in the Pickering trial were read in the court before the return day.

On February 9,[1] in the high court, the following returns were filed:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, ss:

I, James Mathers, Sergeant-at-Arms to the Senate of the United States, in obedience to the within summons, did proceed to the house of the within-named John Pickering on the 25th day of January, in the year 1804, and did then and there leave a true copy of the said writ of summons, together with a true copy of the articles of impeachment annexed, with him, the said John Pickering.

JAMES MATHERS.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, ss:

I, James Mathers, Sergeant-at-Arms to the Senate of the United States, did, on the twenty-sixth day of January, in the year one thousand eight hundred and four, proceed to the house of the within-named Michael McClary and served this subpœna by reading the same and leaving with him a copy thereof.

JAMES MATHERS.

On February 20 these returns were read in the high court.

Rules adopted by the Senate as a court to govern the trial of Judge Pickering.

The Senate sitting as a court did not communicate to the House the rules for governing the trial.

By the rules for the Pickering trial the President of the Senate was given general authority to direct forms of proceeding not otherwise provided for.

Form of oath taken by the Sergeant-at-Arms and entered on the record, on the making of the return of service of summons on Judge Pickering.

Rule framed to govern ceremonies for appearance and answer of respondent in the Pickering impeachment.

The rules for the Pickering trial provided that a record should be made if respondent appeared in person or by counsel, or if he failed to appear.

Rule for offering motions during the Pickering trial.

In the Pickering trial a rule provided that the Senate might retire for consultation on demand of one-third.

The rule of the Pickering trial required all decisions to be in open court, by yeas and nays, and without debate.

Form of oath and method of examination for witnesses in the Pickering trial.

Rule of the Senate, in the Pickering trial, for examination of a Senator.

The rules of the Pickering trial provided that a question by a Senator should be in writing and be put by the Presiding Officer.

[1] Annals, p. 326.

On March 1[1] Mr. Tracy, from the committee appointed by the Senate to examine precedents and prepare forms, reported to the court (not to the Senate) the following resolutions, which were agreed to by the court:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate shall direct all the forms of proceeding, while the Senate are sitting as a court of impeachments, as to opening, adjourning, and all forms during the session not otherwise specially provided for by the Senate.

And that the President of the Senate be requested to direct the preparations in the Senate Chamber for the accommodation of the Senate while sitting as a court, and for the reception and accommodation of the parties to the impeachment, their counsel, witnesses, etc.

And that he be authorized to direct the employment of the marshal, or any officer or officers of the District of Columbia during the session of the court of impeachments whose services he may think requisite and which can be obtained for the purpose.

And all the expenses arising under this resolution, after being first allowed by the President of the Senate, shall be paid by the Secretary, out of the fund appropriated to defray the contingent expenses of both Houses of Congress.

Resolved, That on the 2d day of March instant, at 1 o'clock, the legislative and executive business of the Senate be postponed, and that the court of impeachments shall then be opened, after which the process, which, on the 12th day of January last, was directed to be issued and served on John Pickering, and the return thereof, shall be read, and the Secretary of the Senate shall administer an oath to the returning officer in the following form, to wit:

"I, James Mathers, do solemnly swear that the return made and subscribed by me, upon the process issued on the 12th day of January last by the Senate of the United States against John Pickering, is truly made, and that I have performed said services as there described, so help me God."

Which oath shall be entered at large on the records.

The Secretary shall then give notice to the House of Representatives that the Senate, in their capacity of a court of impeachments, are ready to proceed upon the impeachment of John Pickering in the Senate Chamber, which Chamber is prepared with accommodations for the reception of the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That counsel for the parties shall be admitted to appear and be heard upon said impeachment. And upon the attendance of the House of Representatives, their managers, or any person or persons admitted to appear for the impeachment, the said John Pickering shall be called to appear and answer the articles of impeachment exhibited against him. If he appears, or any person for him, the appearance shall be recorded, stating particularly if by himself or if by agent or attorney, naming the person appearing and the capacity in which he appears. If he does not appear either personally or by agent or attorney the same shall be recorded. All motions made by the parties or their counsel shall be addressed to the President of the Senate, and, if he shall require it, shall be committed to writing and read at the Secretary's table, and after the parties shall be heard upon such motion the Senate shall retire to the adjoining committee room for consideration, if one-third of the members present shall require it; but all decisions shall be had in open court, by ayes and noes and without debate, which shall be entered on the records.

Witnesses shall be sworn in the following form, viz: "I, A B, do swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that the evidence I shall give to this court in the case now depending shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help me God."

Witnesses shall be examined by the party producing them, and then cross-examined in the usual form.

If a Senator is called as a witness he shall be sworn and give his testimony standing in his place.

If a Senator wishes a question to be put to a witness it shall be reduced to writing and put by the President.

These rules were not communicated to the House of Representatives.

Ceremonies at the calling of Judge Pickering to answer the articles of impeachment.

The House did not accept the invitation of the Senate to accompany its managers at the return of summons in Pickering's impeachment.

On the same day, in the high court, the summons to John Pickering was read, together with the return made thereon by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and the oath prescribed was administered to the returning officer by the Secretary.

Subpœnas having been issued in the form prescribed and directed to Ebenezer Chadwick and others, the following return was made to them respectively:

NEW HAMPSHIRE DISTRICT, ss:

January 28, 1804.

Pursuant to this precept, I have served the same by reading it to the within-named Ebenezer Chadwick, etc.

MICHAEL MCCLARY,
Marshal for the New Hampshire District.

Then it was, by the high court of impeachments—

Ordered, That the Secretary give notice to the House of Representatives that the Senate, in their capacity of a court of impeachments, are ready to proceed upon the impeachment of John Pickering in the Senate Chamber, which Chamber is prepared with accommodations for the reception of the House of Representatives, and that the Secretary communicate a copy of the regulations agreed on to that House.

On March 2[1] the substance of this order was by message communicated to the House, whereupon it was—

Resolved, That the managers appointed on the 2d of January last do now attend in the Senate Chamber for the purpose of conducting the impeachment against John Pickering on the part of this House.

It does not appear that attendance by the House itself was proposed.

Thereupon the managers attended in the high court, whereupon John Pickering was three times called to answer the articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives, but came not.

No appearance was made on behalf of Judge Pickering and no answer was made to the articles of impeachment.

In the Pickering impeachment counsel for respondent's son presented a petition of the latter setting forth that his father was insane, and asking for time to show this.

In the Pickering case, against the objection of the managers, the court determined to hear the counsel of respondent's son and evidence to show the insanity of the accused.

On a question of permitting counsel for respondent's son to appear in the Pickering trial, the said counsel was not permitted to argue.

The Vice-President then submitted a petition of Jacob S. Pickering, son of John Pickering, and a letter from Robert G. Harper, inclosed to the Vice-President.

PETITION OF JACOB S. PICKERING.

At a court of impeachments holden before the honorable the Senate of the United States of America, sitting in their capacity of a high court of impeachment at the city of Washington, on the 2nd day of March, 1804:

The House of Representatives of the United States v. John Pickering, judge of the district court for the district of New Hampshire.

Jacob S. Pickering, of Portsmouth, in the district of New Hampshire, and son of the said John Pickering, against whom articles of impeachment have been exhibited by the House of Representatives of the United States, conceives it his duty most respectfully to state to this high and honorable court the real situation of the said John Pickering, the facts and circumstances relative to said articles, wherein he stands charged of supposed high crimes and misdemeanors, and to request that this court would grant him such term of time as they shall think fit and reasonable to substantiate this statement.

Your petitioner will be able to show that at the time when the crimes wherewith the said John stands charged are supposed to have been committed, the said John was, and for more than two years before, and ever since has been, and now is, insane, his mind wholly deranged, and altogether incapable of transacting any kind of business which requires the exercise of judgment, or the faculties of reason; and, therefore, that the said John Pickering is incapable of corruption of judgment, no subject of impeachment, or amenable to any tribunal for his actions.

That this derangement has been constant and permanent, every day of his life completely demonstrating his insanity; every attempt for his relief, which has been prescribed by the faculty who have been consulted on his case, has proved unavailing, and his disorder has baffled all medical aid.

Your petitioner is well aware that the most conclusive evidence of the aforegoing fact would result from an actual view of the respondent, which unfortunately, by reason of his great infirmities can not now be, but at the hazard of his life—he is wholly unable at this inclement season to support the fatigue of so long a journey; yet if the respondent's life be spared, and his health in any degree restored, it will be the endeavor of your petitioner that the said John shall make his personal appearance before this honorable court at any future day they shall think proper to assign.

Your petitioner will be able to show, any pretense to the contrary notwithstanding, that the decisions made in the cause stated in the first article of impeachment, although not the result of reflection, or grounded on any deductions of reason, were, nevertheless, correct, perfectly consonant to the principles of justice, and conformable to the laws of the land; and the refusal of the said judge to grant the appeal claimed by the said John S. Sherburne, in behalf of the United States, was not against law, or to the injury of the public revenue, as the third article of the impeachment supposes; there being no law to warrant such appeal in such a case.

While, with deep humility, your petitioner admits and greatly laments the indecorous and improper expressions used by the said judge on the seat of justice, as mentioned in the last article of impeachment, he will clearly evince the injustice of that part thereof which respects his moral character, and show abundantly, that from his youth upward, through a long, laborious and useful life, and until he was visited by the most awful dispensation of Providence, and the most deplorable of all human calamities, the loss of reason, he was unexceptionable in his morals, remarkable for the purity of his language, and the correctness of his habits, and the deviations in these particulars now complained of, are irresistible evidence of the deranged state of his mind.

When this high and honorable court shall take into their consideration the situation of this respondent, oppressed with infirmity, incapable of making arrangements for his defense, the inclemency of the season, his great distance from the place of trial, and the shortness of notice—when your honors reflect on the high and atrocious crime with which he stands charged; in the decision of which is involved, not his life (indeed his remains of life would be but a slender sacrifice), but that which, to an honest mind, is more dear than life itself, his good name—when you advert to the consequences attached to a conviction; the indelible stigma which will befall a numerous family whose only patrimony was the unsullied reputation of their parent, which they have ever cherished, and of which they fondly, perhaps too fondly, hoped, no time, or circumstance, or adverse fortune could deprive them—when your honors shall think of these things, your petitioner has strong confidence that the wisdom and justice of this court will permit a respondent, whose integrity until now has been unquestioned; who has sustained offices high and honorable, through a long life, and the general tenor of whose character and conduct has hitherto furnished him with a coat of armor against the assaults of his enemies, but who is now incapable of defending himself, to be defended by his friends.

Audi alteram partem is a maxim held in reverence wherever liberty yet remains. The Senate of America will be the last tribunal on earth that will cease to respect it; they will never condemn unheard; they will never refuse time for a full and impartial trial.

That time, that impartial trial, your petitioner prays for; the charity of the law presumes the innocence of the respondent; and your petitioner, also, respectfully entreats that, in the meantime, and more especially as the evidence on which the impeachment is founded, was taken ex parte, no unfavorable impressions may be made on the minds of this honorable court, by any report or extra-judicial representations which may have been made on the subject before them.

JACOB S. PICKERING.

LETTER OF ROBERT G. HARPER.

SIR: Mr. Jacob S. Pickering, the son of Judge Pickering, of New Hampshire, has forwarded to me, through one of his friends here, the inclosed petition, with a request that I will lay it before the court of impeachments, and will appear on his part, if permitted, and support the prayer of it. I am also furnished with several depositions, showing that Judge Pickering, from bodily infirmity and total derangement of mind, is wholly incapable of appearing before the court at this time, of making a defense, or of giving authority to any person to appear for him.

The process of subpœna heretofore issued by the court not being compulsory, and Judge Pickering's narrow circumstances not enabling his son to defray the expenses of the witnesses whose testimony it is important for him to produce, it was judged necessary to serve the subpœna. The object of the petition is to obtain a postponement of the trial, and either compulsory process, or an order to take depositions, which may be received in evidence. Be pleased, sir, to lay the petition before the court, and to inform me whether I shall be received to appear on the part of the petitioner, Mr. Jacob S. Pickering, in its support. In that case I will attend in the capacity of agent or counsel for the petitioner, and submit to the court the reasons and proofs with which I am furnished in support of his application.

With the highest respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient very humble servant,

ROBERT G. HARPER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The President inquired if Mr. Harper was in court, and invited him to a seat within the bar, which having taken, he made the following address:

Mr. President: Before I proceed to address this honorable court in the case now before it, I think it proper to repeat explicitly what is stated in the letter just now read, that I do not appear as the counsel, agent, or attorney of Judge Pickering, or by virtue of any authority derived from him, he being in a state of absolute and long-continued insanity, can neither appear himself nor authorize another to appear for him. I present myself to this honorable court, at the request of Jacob S. Pickering, son of Judge Pickering, stating his father's insanity, and praying that time may be allowed for collecting and producing complete proof of the melancoly fact. This application for postponement I am prepared to support by depositions now in my possession; and it is also my intention, if permitted, to make a further application on the part of Judge Pickering for compulsory process to compel the attendance of such witnesses as it may be necessary to produce in proof of the fact of insanity, or for an order to take their depositions in writing on interrogatories, and notice to the prosecutors. It rests with this honorable court whether it will receive such an application, and hear counsel so appearing in its support.

After a short pause, Mr. Harper again rose and inquired whether his appearance in support of the petition would be construed as the appearance of John Pickering by counsel.

The President[1] answered that he presumed that it would not be so construed.

Mr. Nicholas, on behalf of the House managers, objected to the hearing of Mr. Harper in any other capacity than as counsel of the accused, and remarked that as Mr. Harper disclaimed appearing in that capacity, he could not in his opinion be heard. Other managers spoke, especially Mr. Rodney, who said:

I understand the President as having declared that, agreeably to the rules of proceeding adopted by the Senate, no person can be heard in this case but the accused, or his agent or counsel.

The Vice-President nodded assent.

Mr. Rodney continued:

I also understand the gentleman who appeared on this occasion, as clearly and explicitly stating that he does not appear as the counsel of Mr. Pickering, nor does he wish it so to be understood. That gentleman has informed us in a very fair and candid manner of the only character in which he does appear, and has assumed very properly and correctly the only ground upon which he wishes to stand. He has in positive terms disavowed the idea of his being the agent or counsel of the accused, because he has protested against Mr. Pickering's being affected by any act done by him. On this single ground, then, I respectfully submit whether it would be proper to hear the gentleman under these circumstances, and whether it be not manifested that he does not come within the rules laid down by the Senate for the government of this high court of impeachments.

But if the gentleman is to be heard on this subject in the anomalous character in which he appears, with a view of postponing the proceedings of this court, it will first be necessary for the court to decide that the case is properly before them, agreeably to the rules which have been established. If no appearance in person or by attorney has been entered, unless proceedings have been had which they shall consider tantamount to an appearance, there is no cause regularly in court, and it would be idle for any person to talk of postponing the consideration of that which really was not before the court. A question of this kind must, from the nature of it, ever be incidental to the principal or main question. When a writ is in court according to the rules of the court, a motion for postponement may, with propriety, if the circumstances justify it, be made. This must always be a subsequent consideration, after the court are in full possession of the case. Agreeably to the correct course of proceeding in ordinary courts, until bail and appearance, there can be no case in court. The party has no day given him, because he is, until this takes place, considered to be out of court; nor would any counsel, though duly authorized, be heard in his behalf. There has, in this case, then, been no appearance in person or by agent or counsel. The accused has made default, and no agent or attorney has been recorded for him. Surely, then, his default should be first recorded, and if the court consider that after his having been duly served, and making default, they will proceed to a hearing and determination of the principal question, it will then be proper to listen to those which are necessarily incidental. It will be at this stage of the business competent for the court, if at all, to hear the gentleman. But I am decidedly of the opinion, there is no period in which it will be proper so to do unless he claims this right as the agent or counsel of the accused. In that capacity he has a right to be heard; and in that capacity alone. Our Constitution has wisely secured to every man this privilege, and I would not deprive the humblest object in the community of this inestimable benefit. I flatter myself, therefore, that this honorable court will adhere strictly to the rules which they have prescribed for themselves, and that they will for these reasons, and those which have been assigned by my colleague, refuse the present application.

Mr. Harper inquired whether it would be regular in him to reply to these remarks?

The President said it would not; and immediately after put the question to the Senate, whether Mr. Harper should be heard in support of the prayer of the petition of Jacob S. Pickering.

Whereupon the Senate retired to a private Chamber, from which they returned about 3 o'clock, when the President advised the managers that the Senate would take further time to consider the question before them, and would make them acquainted with their decision.

Finally, with open doors, the court took a vote on the question:

Will the court hear evidence and counsel respecting the insanity of John Pickering, upon the suggestion contained in the petition of Jacob S. Pickering, and the letter of R. G. Harper?

It was decided in the affirmative, yeas 18, nays 12.

It was then—

Resolved, That, on the motion made and seconded, the court shall retire to the adjoining committee room, if one-third of the Senators present shall require it.

The court adjourned to 12 o'clock the next day.

The court having determined, in the Pickering impeachment, to hear counsel of a third person on a preliminary question, the managers withdrew to consult the House.

The Senate declined to await the consultation of the managers with the House before hearing evidence as to Judge Pickering's sanity.

The House, in the Pickering impeachment, deemed it unnecessary to approve the conduct of its managers in declining to discuss in the court a matter from a third party.

In the Pickering case the Presiding Officer ruled that in presenting affidavits to show the insanity of the accused only the pertinent parts should be read.

The Presiding Officer held that counsel of the son of Judge Pickering, admitted to show the insanity of the accused, might not offer a motion to the court.

On March 6,[1] the court was opened, and the managers of the impeachment, on the part of the House of Representatives, against John Pickering, attended.

Mr. Harper also attended.

The President informed Mr. Harper that the court would hear evidence and counsel respecting the insanity of John Pickering upon the suggestion contained in the petition of Jacob S. Pickering and the letter of R. G. Harper.

Mr. Nicholson, in behalf of the managers, said he was instructed to ask for the reading of the proceedings of the court on the last day of its sitting.

The clerk having read the record, by which it appeared that John Pickering had been called three times without appearing,

Mr. Nicholson inquired at what point of time it was intended that Mr. Harper should be heard, and whether this was to be a step preliminary to the trial.

The President said he could not undertake to give an explanation of the proceedings of the Senate, adding that their meaning must be gathered from the proceedings themselves.

Mr. Nicholson then said that he begged leave to state that the managers were ready to proceed with the trial of the articles preferred by the House of Representatives.

The President said that under the decision of the Senate it had been determined in the first instance to hear Mr. Harper in support of the petition of Jacob S. Pickering.

Mr. Nicholson said he was instructed by the managers again to state that they were ready to support the articles of impeachment. They, however, not being at present under the consideration of the Senate, they did not consider themselves under any obligation to discuss a preliminary question raised by a third person unauthorized by the person charged. He was therefore instructed to state to the Senate that the managers would, under these circumstances, retire, and take the opinion of the House of Representatives respecting their further procedure.

The managers thereupon retired.

Then a propositon that the Senate retire to its private chamber was disagreed to, only six voting aye.

Mr. John Quincy Adams, apparently to second a suggestion of Mr. James Jackson, of Georgia, that proceedings should be delayed until the Senate had heard from the managers of the House of Representatives, moved an adjournment, but the motion was disagreed to, only 10 voting aye.

A motion by Mr. Robert Wright, of Maryland, that the counsel in support of the petition of J. S. Pickering be not heard until the return of the managers, or until their intention should be signified, was disagreed to, the ayes being seven.

Then Mr. Harper rose and presented affidavits, evidently ex parte, to show the insanity of Judge Pickering. One affidavit expressing the opinion that Judge Pickering could not "from his bodily infirmities" proceed on a journey to Washington, was ruled out by the President, as the order of the Senate confined the proof to the single allegation of insanity. On the presentation of another affidavit the President ruled that only the parts relating to insanity should be read.

After the reading of the affidavits,[1] Mr. Harper said this was the testimony on which he founded the application—which was to postpone the trial until such time as the court might think fit, in order to take depositions.

The President said:

It does not seem to me proper to receive any motion from you The Senate will attend to what you have said and take proper order upon it.

Mr. Harper thereupon addressed the court briefly, expressing the wish that opportunity should be allowed and the necessary facilities afforded to obtain testimony.

The court thereupon adjourned.

In the House of Representatives,[2] meanwhile, a short time after the managers returned from the court, Mr. Nicholson, in their behalf, made to the House of Representatives the following communication:

That on Friday, the 2d of March, the managers, agreeably to the directions of the House, appeared at the bar of the Senate, to support the said articles of impeachment, when John Pickering was three times solemnly called, but did not answer or appear, either in person or by counsel. The President of the Senate then stated that he had received a letter, signed R. G. Harper, accompanying a petition, signed Jacob S. Pickering, who called himself the son of the party charged. The petition being read, it was found to contain a statement of a variety of matter, particularly the insanity of Judge Pickering, upon which the prayer of the petition was founded for a postponement of the trial to some future day. Mr. Harper was called to the bar of the Senate; he entered, and stated that he wished it to be distinctly understood that he did not appear at the bar of the Senate as counsel for John Pickering, from whom he had received no authority for that purpose; but that his object was to support the facts contained in the petition of Jacob S. Pickering, and the prayer thereof. There was a short pause, when Mr. Harper rose again and inquired whether his appearance in support of the petition would be construed as the appearance of John Pickering, by counsel. The President of the Senate answered, he presumed that Mr. Harper's appearance would not be considered as the appearance of John Pickering by counsel.

[2] House Journal, pp. 625, 626; Annals, p. 343.

The managers, under these circumstances, felt themselves bound to object to Mr. Harper's being heard in any other capacity than as counsel for the party who was impeached; and briefly stated their reasons for the objection.

The Senate withdrew to a private chamber, where it is presumed the question was debated. The managers again appeared at the bar of the Senate this day, and were informed by the President that it had been resolved to hear Mr. Harper in support of the allegations contained in the petition of Jacob S. Pickering, and the prayer thereof. The managers inquired at what point of time it was intended that Mr. Harper should be heard, and whether this was to be a measure preliminary to the trial. The President of the Senate declared that he could not undertake to explain the resolutions of the Senate, but that their sense must be collected from the resolutions themselves. The managers then offered themselves ready for trial, declaring that they were prepared to open the prosecution on behalf of the House of Representatives, and that the witnesses were ready to prove the facts charged in the articles of impeachment. Upon this offer being made, the President of the Senate stated that he considered it to be the sense of the Senate that Mr. Harper was to be heard before the trial commenced.

The managers considered this as an irregular step, and not believing that they ought to discuss any petition presented to the Senate from a person who was not a party to the impeachment, and this, too, before the party charged, although duly notified, had appeared, either in person or by attorney, withdrew from the Senate Chamber. They will not feel themselves either bound or authorized to appear again until the Senate shall inform them that they are prepared to proceed in the trial, unless specially directed by this House.

Mr. John Smilie, of Pennsylvania, thereupon proposed the following:

Resolved, That this House doth approve of the conduct of the managers appointed to support the articles of impeachment in the case of John Pickering, as stated in their report of this day, and that the said managers do not appear at the bar of the Senate, until they shall be specially instructed by this House.

There was objection to the resolution on the ground that it was not necessary for the House to express its opinion of the conduct of the managers at every stage. There was so much objection that Mr. Smilie on the next day withdrew the resolution.

After hearing evidence as to the sanity of the accused, the court of impeachment notified the House of its readiness to hear the managers on the articles.

There being no appearance for Judge Pickering, witnesses presented by the managers were not cross-examined, except for a few questions by the Presiding officer.

On March 7,[1] in the high court of impeachments, it was ordered that the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the court was open and ready to receive and hear the managers in support of the articles of impeachment. This motion was agreed to by a vote of yeas 19, nays 8.

Accordingly, on March 8,[2] the court was opened, the managers attended, and one of them, Mr. Early, after opening remarks, proceeded to produce testimony in support of the first article of impeachment, and then, in order, evidence supporting the other articles. This evidence consisted of the reading of statutes of the United States, an attested copy of the record of the court, with the seal of said court annexed, and the examination of witnesses.

[2] Annals, p. 345. The Senate Journal simply records the fact of the sitting of the court of impeachments on this as on other days.

Judge Pickering not being represented by counsel, the witnesses were not cross-examined, except in certain instances[1] when the President addressed questions to a witness.

The testimony tended to substantiate the charge that the said judge was an inebriate.

Mr. Nicholson then informed the court that the managers here closed the testimony, and then the managers withdrew.

No defense being made in the Pickering impeachment, the two Senators from the State of the accused were examined at suggestion of the court.

In the Pickering case one of the managers submitted the case finally without extended argument.

The Senate declined to postpone the Pickering trial after the evidence had been submitted.

On March 9,[2] on the suggestion of Mr. Tracy, the Senator who was chairman of the committee having in charge the preparation of forms of procedure for the trial, Simeon Olcott and William Plumer, the Senators from New Hampshire, were respectively sworn and affirmed. They testified that in their opinion the troubles of Judge Pickering were not due to intemperance. Mr. Plumer thought the intemperance the result of insanity.

Four witnesses were introduced, at whose suggestion does not appear, and testified in rebuttal.

Mr. Nicholson then observed that the managers would withdraw for a few minutes. Accordingly they withdrew, and shortly returned.

Mr. Nicholson then, in their behalf, addressed the court briefly, saying that he was directed by the managers to inform the court that they submitted the articles on the evidence offered, entertaining no doubt of full justice being done by the decision of the Senate.

Thereupon the managers retired.

Mr. Tracy then offered the following motion:

Resolved, As the opinion of this court, that the proceedings on the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against John Pickering be postponed to the —— day of ——— next.

This resolution was disagreed to, yeas 10, nays 20.

Thereupon the court adjourned to the next day.

In the absence of the Vice-President a President pro tempore was chosen to preside over the court trying Judge Pickering.

The Senate informed the House of the day and hour fixed for pronouncing judgment in the Pickering impeachment.

The court of impeachment declined to postpone judgment until Judge Pickering could be brought personally before it for inspection as to sanity.

[1] Annals, p. 357.

[2] Annals, pp. 359, 362.

On March 10[1] the record of the court of impeachment shows:

Mr. Franklin was chosen President pro tem.

The Journal of the Senate for this day shows that the Vice-President was absent and that the Senate chose Mr. Jesse Franklin, of North Carolina, President pro tempore.[2]

On this day, also, the Senate, before sitting as high court of impeachments, ordered,[3] by a vote of yeas 20, nays 9—

That the Secretary do acquaint the House of Representatives that the court of impeachments will, on Monday at 12 o'clock, proceed to pronounce judgment on the articles of impeachment exhibited by them against John Pickering.

Afterwards, the high court of impeachments having convened, Mr. Samuel White, of Delaware, submitted the following:[4]

Resolved, That this court is not at present prepared to give their final decision upon the articles of impeachment preferred by the House of Representatives against John Pickering, district judge of the district of New Hampshire, for high crimes and misdemeanors, the said John Pickering not having appeared, or been heard, by himself or by counsel; and it having been suggested to the court by Jacob S. Pickering, son of the said John Pickering, that the said John Pickering, at the time of the conduct charged against him in the said articles of impeachment as high crimes and misdemeanors, was, and yet is, insane, which suggestion has been supported by the testimony of two members of the court and by the affidavits of sundry persons, whose integrity is unimpeached; and it being further suggested in the said petition that at such future day as the court may appoint the body of the said Pickering shall be produced in court, and further testimony in his behalf, which will enable the court to judge for themselves as to the insanity of the said John Pickering and to act more understandingly in the premises: but that the said John Pickering, owing to bodily infirmity, could not be brought to court at present, at so great a distance, and at this inclement season of the year, without imminent hazard of his life.

Mr. Wilson Carey Nicholas, of Virginia (not Mr. Nicholson, the House manager) and Mr. Robert Wright, of Maryland, and others, objected to the resolution as not being in order.

Mr. Joseph Anderson, of Tennessee, asked if it would be in order to move an amendment to it.

Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, said he would object to any amendment to it, as, by the rule of the court, a gentleman had a right to a vote upon any specific proposition he might please to submit connected with the trial.

Mr. Samuel White, of Delaware, called for the reading of the rule.

Mr. Anderson then moved that the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Virginia yesterday be taken up as being entitled to be acted upon first.

The President pro tempore declared that the resolution of the gentleman from Delaware was fairly before the court and must be disposed of in some way before anything else could be taken up.

A motion for postponing the further consideration of it was then made and withdrawn.

[1] Annals, p. 362; Senate Journal, p. 372.

[2] It seems hardly necessary to suppose that the court of impeachments ratified this selection of the Senate. The records of the court are not made with technical care, and the entry probably refers to action of the Senate.

[3] Senate Journal, p. 373; House Journal, p. 632. The record of the court of impeachment also shows the adoption of this order.

[4] Annals, p. 362.

Mr. Nicholas hoped it would not be permitted to go upon the journals of the court.

Mr. Jackson moved the previous question, viz: "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. White hoped that whatever question should be taken on the subject should be by yeas and nays; that his resolution and the manner in which it might be got rid of should be seen and understood.

Mr. Anderson then moved to amend the resolution by striking out the words, "not having been heard by himself or counsel," and all after the words "was, and yet is, insane" to the end of the resolution.

On motion of Mr. Jonathan Dayton, of New Jersey, the galleries were cleared and the doors closed.

At 3 o'clock the doors were opened and the question was taken upon the resolution as at first submitted—yeas 9, nays 19.

So the resolution was disagreed to.

The House attended its managers to the Senate to hear the Senate pronounce judgment in the Pickering impeachment.

The House having heard judgment in the Pickering impeachment, the managers made no report, and no record appears on the House Journal.

On March 12,[1] in the House of Representatives, it was Ordered, That this House do now attend in the Senate Chamber to hear the Senate, in their capacity of a court of impeachments, pronounce judgment on the articles of impeachment exhibited against John Pickering, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of New Hampshire, agreeably to the notification contained in a message from the Senate, by their Secretary, on Saturday last.

The Speaker, attended by the Members, accordingly withdrew to the Senate Chamber for the purpose expressed in the foregoing order; and being returned, etc., proceeded to other business. The House Journal has no record of the decision of of the court.

The court determined to confine the question in the judgment on Judge Pickering to the simple question of guilt on the charges.

The court, in the Pickering judgment, declined to permit an expression at to whether the offenses constituted high crimes and misdemeanors.

In conformity with English precedents the Senate pronounced judgment, article by article, in the Pickering case.

The final question in the Pickering judgment was on the removal of the accused from office.

Meanwhile, on the same day, the Court of Impeachment had convened, and Mr. Samuel White, of Delaware, inquired whether the question was to be taken on each article separately, as practiced in the House of Lords, or on the whole together. He hoped upon each separately, as gentlemen might wish to vote affirmatively on some and negatively on others, from which privilege they must be precluded by giving but one general vote of guilty or not guilty. He would, therefore, beg leave to submit to the consideration of the court the following as the form of the question to be put to each member upon each article of impeachment, viz:

Is John Pickering, district judge of the district of New Hampshire, guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors upon the charges contained in the —— article of impeachment or not gulity?

For this form of question, Mr. White observed, he could adduce precedent. It was nearly the same as was used in the very celebrated case of Warren Hastings, and he presumed would collect the sense of the court with as much certainty as any that could be proposed, which was his only object.

After some conversation, Mr. Joseph Anderson, of Tennessee, moved the following as the form and prayed that it might be taken up:

Is John Pickering, district judge of the district of New Hampshire, guilty as charged in the —— article of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives?

The President pro tempore declared that it would not be in order to take it up till the motion of the gentleman from Delaware was acted upon, as it was first before the court and had not yet been disposed of in any way, and was about to put the question following upon it, when—

Mr. Joseph Anderson, of Tennessee, mentioned that he had objections to the form of question proposed by the gentleman from Delaware and moved to strike out the words "of high crimes and misdemeanors."

On motion, the galleries were cleared and the doors closed. After some debate, Mr. White's form of question was lost—only 10 voting in favor of it and 18 against it.

Mr. Anderson's form was then adopted—yeas 18, nays 9.

Mr. White stated that he believed Judge Pickering had practiced much of the indecent and improper conduct charged against him in the articles of impeachment; that he had been seen intoxicated and heard to use very profane language upon the bench; that he had acted illegally and very unbecoming a judge in the case of the ship Eliza, as charged against him in the articles, but that he was very far from believing that any part of his conduct amounted to high crimes and misdemeanors or that he was in any degree capable of such an offense, because, after the testimony the court had heard, scarcely a doubt could remain in the mind of any gentleman but that the judge was actually insane at the time; and Mr. White wished to know whether it was to be understood by the two last votes just taken that the court intended only to find the facts and to avoid pronouncing the law upon them; that they could have it in view to say merely that Judge Pickering had committed the particular acts charged against him in the articles of impeachment and upon such a conviction, to remove him, without saying directly or indirectly whether those acts amounted to high crimes and misdemeanors or not; for in the several articles they are not so charged, though judgment is demanded upon them as such. Upon such a principle and by such a mode of proceeding good behavior, he observed, would be no longer the tenure of office; every officer of the Government must be at the mercy of a majority of Congress, and it would not hereafter be necessary that a man should be guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in order to render him liable to removal from office by impeachment, but a conviction upon any facts stated in articles exhibited against him would be sufficient.

Mr. Jonathan Dayton, of New Jersey, observed that the honorable gentleman from Virginia seemed to be offended at the language of his honorable friend from Delaware, who, in speaking of the proceedings on the impeachment, had called them a mere mockery of trial. To such terms, however, the ears of that honorable gentleman must be accustomed and accommodated, for, whilst either he or his friend had the honor of a seat in that body, they should designate this trial by no other character. It deserved no better appellation and would be thus characterized in all parts of the United States where these proceedings could be seen and understood.

That the conclusion of this exhibition might perfectly correspond with its commencement and progress, that the catastrophe might comport with the other parts of the piece, the Senate were now to be compelled, by a determined majority, to take the question in a manner never before heard of on similar occasions. They were simply to be allowed to vote, whether Judge Pickering was guilty as charged—that is, guilty of the facts charged in each article—aye or no. If voted guilty of the facts, the sentence was to follow, without any previous question whether those facts amounted to a high crime and misdemeanor. The latent reason of this course was, Mr. Dayton said, too obvious. There were numbers who were disposed to give sentence of removal against this unhappy judge, upon the ground of the facts alleged and proved, who could not, however, conscientiously vote that they amounted to high crimes and misdemeanors, especially when committed by a man proved at the very time to be insane and to have been so ever since, even to the present moment. The Constitution gave no power to the Senate, as the High Court of Impeachments, to pass such a sentence of removal and disqualification, except upon charges and conviction of high crimes and misdemeanors. The House of Representatives had so charged the judge and had exhibited articles in maintenance and support, as they themselves declared, of those charges. The Senate had received and heard the evidence adduced by the managers and had gone through certain forms of a trial, and they now, by a majority, dictated the form of a final question the most extraordinary, unprecedented, and unwarrantable. For himself, Mr. Dayton said, he felt at a loss how to act. He was free to declare that he believed the respondent guilty of most of the facts stated in the articles, but, considering the deranged state of intellect of that unfortunate man, he could not declare him guilty in the words of the Constitution; he could not vote it a conviction under the impeachment. Let the question be stated, as had been proposed by his honorable friend from Delaware, agreeably to the form observed in the well recollected case of Warren Hastings:

> Is John Pickering guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor upon the charge contained in the first, the second, the third, or the fourth article of the impeachment, or not guilty?

Or, if the court preferred it, he should have no objection against taking the preliminary question, whether guilty of the facts charged in each article, provided they would allow it to be followed by another most important question, viz: Whether those facts, thus proved and found, amounted to a conviction of high crimes and misdemeanors, as charged in the impeachment, and expressly required by the Constitution. Both these forms of stating the question were, it was now too evident, intended to be refused by the majority, and thus a precedent established for removing a judge in a manner unauthorized by that charter.

Mr. White asked whether, after the question now before the court—which goes merely to settle, as gentlemen themselves believe, the point whether Judge Pickering has committed the particular acts charged against him in the articles of impeachment or not—should be decided, it would then be in his power to obtain a vote of the court upon another question which, without presenting at present, he would state in his place, viz: Is it the opinion of this court that John Pickering is guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, upon the charges exhibited against him in the articles of impeachment preferred by the House of Representatives?

The President pro tempore replied that he thought such a motion could not be received after the vote had been taken.

Mr. Wright submitted the following as the final question, viz:

Is the court of opinion that John Pickering be removed from the office of judge of the district court of the district of New Hampshire?

This form was agreed to.

In the Pickering impeachment certain Senators retired from the court because dissatisfied with form of the question on final judgment.

Messrs. John Armstrong, of New York; Stephen R. Bradley, of Vermont; David Stone, of North Carolina; Jonathan Dayton, of New Jersey; and Samuel White, of Delaware, retired from the court. The two last not because they believed Judge Pickering guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, but because they did not choose to be compelled to give so solemn a vote upon a form of question which they considered an unfair one, and calculated to preclude them from giving any distinct and explicit opinion upon the true and most important point in the cause, viz, as to the insanity of Judge Pickering, and whether the charges contained in the articles of impeachment, if true, amounted in him to high crimes and misdemeanors or not.

In final judgment the court found Judge Pickering guilty in all the articles and decreed his removal from office.

Final judgment being pronounced, the court of impeachment in Pickering's case adjourned sine die.

The question was then taken in the presence of the managers and of the House of Representatives, and decided as follows:

On the question—

Is John Pickering, district judge of New Hampshire, guilty as charged in the first article of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives?

It was determined in the affirmative, yeas 19, nays 7.

The same question was put, in the same way, on the three remaining articles, and decided by a like result.

On the question—

Is the court of opinion that John Pickering be removed from the office of judge of the district court of the district of New Hampshire?

It was determined in the affirmative, yeas 20, nays 6.

The court then adjourned sine die.

The Senate Journal [1] records simply the fact of the sitting and adjournment of the court, as on other days, and makes no mention of the result of the trial.

2342. The impeachment and trial of Samuel Chase, associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, in 1804.

The investigation of the conduct of Richard Peters, United States district judge for Pennsylvania, in 1804.

The impeachment of Mr. Justice Chase was set in motion on the responsibility of one Member of the House, sustained by the statement of another Member.

In the case of Mr. Justice Chase the House, after long debate and a review of precedents, decided to order investigation, although Members could give only hearsay evidence as to the facts.

English precedents reviewed in the Chase case on the question of ordering an investigation on the strength of common rumor.

The House declined to state by way of preamble its reason for investigating the conduct of Mr. Justice Chase and Judge Peters.

Form of resolution authorizing the Chase and Peters investigation in 1804.

Two of the seven Members of the committee for the Chase investigation were from the number opposing the investigation.

Mr. John Randolph, who had moved the Chase investigation, was made chairman of the committee.

On January 5, 1804,[1] Mr. John Randolph, of Virginia, arising in his place in the House, spoke of the necessity of "preserving unpolluted the fountain of justice," and then said:

At the last session of Congress a gentleman from Pennsylvania did, in his place (on the bill to amend the judicial system of the United States), state certain facts in relation to the official conduct of an eminent judicial character, which I then thought, and still think, the House bound to notice. But the lateness of the session (for we had, if I mistake not, scarce a fortnight remaining) precluding all possibility of bringing the subject to any efficient result, I did not then think proper to take any steps in the business. Finding my attention, however, thus drawn to a consideration of the character of the officer in question, I made it my business, considering it my duty as well to myself as to those whom I represent, to investigate the charges then made, and the official character of the judge, in general. The result having convinced me that there exists ground of impeachment against this officer, I demand an inquiry into his conduct, and therefore submit to the House the following resolution:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the official conduct of Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and to report their opinion whether the said Samuel Chase hath so acted in his judicial capacity as to require the interposition of the constitutional power of this House.'

Objection being made that the House should have further information before taking a step, which would cast discredit on the character of a judge, Mr. John Smilie, of Pennsylvania, who had made the statement in the preceding Congress referred to by Mr. Randolph, arose and, in the course of his remarks, said:

A man of the name of Fries was prosecuted for treason in the State of Pennsylvania. Two of the first counsel at that bar, Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas, without fee or reward, undertook his defense. I mention their names to show that there could have been no party prejudices that influenced them. When the trial came on the judge behaved in such a manner that Mr. Lewis declared that he would not so far degrade his profession as to plead under the circumstances imposed upon him. Mr. Dallas declared that the rights of the bar were as well established as those of the bench; that he considered the conduct of the judge as a violation of those rights and refused to plead. The facts were these: The judge told the jury and the counsel that the court had made up their minds on what constituted treason; that they had committed their opinion to writing, and that the counsel must therefore confine themselves to the facts in the case before the court. The counsel replied that they did not dispute the facts, but that they were able to show that they did not constitute treason. The end of the affair was that the counsel retired from court, and the man was tried without counsel, convicted, and sentenced to death.

After this the Attorney-General wrote a letter to Messrs. Dallas and Lewis, requesting them to furnish their notes and opinions for the use of the President. They drew up an answer, in which they stated that the acts charged against Fries did not amount to treason, but were only sedition, and that they were so considered in the British courts. This letter was read to me by Mr. Dallas. After receiving the letter the President pardoned the man.

A lengthy debate ensued as to whether or not, upon the facts before it, the House would be justified in agreeing to the resolution. It was objected[2] that the statements of the Member from Pennsylviana, Mr. Smilie, were not entitled to much weight, since they were not what he knew himself, but only what he had received from others. Moreover, he had charged only what amounted at most to an error of judgment on the part of the judge. Some facts, it was argued,[3] ought to be adduced, and so important a step should not be taken hastily. It was stated[4] that the most parliamentary way would be for a gentleman to state in the form of a resolution the grounds of impeachment and then to refer such a resolution to a select committee for investigation. But it would be novel and unprecedented for the House to institute, without facts before it, an inquiry into the character of a high officer of the Government. The voting of an inquiry, so it was declared,[1] would be considered equivalent to the expression of an opinion that the House had evidence of the probable guilt of the judge. It had been urged that the House, in this case, had all the powers of a grand jury. But a grand jury had only the right to receive testimony. They might not send for it. If there was evidence in this case they might act on it, even though it be ex parte, although that would be going far. But so far there had been no statement satisfactorily showing probable cause. It was asserted[2] that the opinion of any one Member, without presentation of facts, should not avail to set in motion this proceeding. The gentleman from Pennsylvania might have misconceived the information given to him. Objection was further made[3] that the proposed form of procedure was not warranted by the precedents. The case of Bolingbroke was not in point, since that impeachment was based on disclosures made during examination of the conduct of the ministry. In the Blount and Pickering cases the Executive had transmitted documents to the House. But in this case it was proposed to appoint a committee to search in the first instance for an accusation and then to look for proofs to justify it. The assertion was made[4] that there were no precedents to justify an assertion that common fame was sufficient ground for impeachment. The precedent of the Earl of Stratford was a gloomy and terrible precedent, unsusceptible of application under a Republican form of government. It was true that a member had risen in his place in the Commons and impeached Warren Hastings, but at the same time he exhibited specific charges of misconduct. The House was the grand inquest of the nation, and its practice ought to be in many respects analogous to that of a grand jury. It should not listen to murmurs and seek for guilt. The resolution before the House did not allege a single fact. It was urged[5] that never, so far as any precedents so far cited had shown, had an inquiry been commenced in Parliament without a statement of the facts to accompany the motion, and it was objected[6] that even if common rumor had once been ground for beginning proceedings in a period of rudeness and violence, the more improved system of modern jurisprudence should discard such a doctrine.

In favor of the resolution it was urged[7] that the purpose of the inquiry was to procure evidence. If the House already had the evidence there would be no need of the inquiry. The statement of a Member in his place, even though hearsay, was sufficient to cause inquiry. It was pointed out[8] that under the rules of the House—such was the respect due to a Member of the House—the statement of a Member that he possessed information proper to be communicated to the House was sufficient to cause the doors to be closed at once; and surely the request of a Member for a committee of inquiry ought to be of equal force. It was further urged[1] that the right to move an inquiry was one of the most important pertaining to the Representative. And it was pointed out[2] that the motion to inquire should not be confounded with the motion to impeach. There was, it was urged,[3] a great difference between the inquiry and the impeachment. The analogy between the function of the House in this matter and that of a grand jury was correct and forcible. Before a grand jury it was the right of any individual to apply for and demand an inquiry into the conduct of any person within their cognizance, and it was more especially the right of any member of the jury to make such a demand. In addition to Mr. Smilie, another Member, Mr. John W. Eppes, of Virginia, stated[4] his belief that in his State a general opinion prevailed that Judge Chase had acted indecently and tyranically in a case tried there. Mr. Eppes said he was not personally present at the trial; but he related what he believed to be the facts as to the case. It was urged[5] that in England common report was considered sufficient authority for similar inquiries. In this case common report from Maine to Georgia condemned the conduct of the judge, not only in the case of Fries, but in the case of a grand jury in Delaware and in the case of Callender in Virginia. The general sentiment of the country condemned[6] the judge. Moreover, the Representatives of two States lately came forward and opposed his being assigned to circuits which embraced their States. This single fact ought to make an impression on the House. But in this case a Member in his place had impeached the judge, and it was not necessary to rely on common report. As to precedents for the proposed action, the impeachments of Strafford, Bolingbroke, Oxford, and Ormond, Eyres and Hastings were referred to in English history. From American history a case of proceedings against certain judges in North Carolina in 1796 was cited.[7]

In the course of the debate it was agreed by the House that Judge Richard Peters, who was associated in the case with Judge Chase, should be included in an inquiry, should one be made. This amendment was agreed to, yeas 79, nays 37.[8]

On January 7,[9] Mr. John Dennis, of Maryland, proposed an amendment to the resolution, by prefixing the following preamble:

Whereas information has been given to the House by one of its Members, that, in a certain prosecution for treason on the part of the United States against a certain John Fries, pending in the circuit court of the United States in the State of Pennsylvania, Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and Richard Peters, district judge for the district of Pennsylvania, by whom the said circuit court was then holden, did inform the counsel for the prisoner, that as the court had formed their opinion upon the point of law, and would direct the jury thereupon, the counsel for the prisoner must confine their argument before the jury to the question of fact only; and whereas it is represented that, in consequence of such determination of the court, the counsel did refuse to address the jury on the question of fact, and the said John Fries was found guilty of treason and sentenced by the court to the punishment in such case by the laws of the United States provided, and was pardoned by the President of the United States.

It was urged in behalf of this preamble that the Journal should show the grounds for the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. Joseph H. Nicholson, of Maryland, moved to amend the proposed preamble by striking out all after the word "whereas," where it first occurred, and inserting:

Members of this House have stated in their places that they have heard certain acts of official misconduct alleged against Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and Richard Peters, judge of the district court of the district of Pennsylvania.

A division of the motion to strike out and insert was made,[1] and on striking out there appeared yeas 79, nays 41. Then the motion to insert was agreed to without division.

Mr. Randolph and others opposed the preamble, urging that it would tend to limit the general inquiry desired.

The question being taken on the preamble as amended, it was disagreed to without a division.

The original resolution, as it had previously been amended, was then agreed to[2] as follows, the yeas being 81, the nays 40:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the official conduct of Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and of Richard Peters, district judge of the district of Pennsylvania, and to report their opinion whether the said Samuel Chase and Richard Peters, or either of them, have so acted, in their judicial capacity, as to require the interposition of the constitutional power of this House.

Thereupon the committee was appointed as follows: Messrs. John Randolph, jr., of Virginia; Joseph H. Nicholson, of Maryland; Joseph Clay, of Pennsylvania; Peter Early, of Georgia; Roger Griswold, of Connecticut; Benjamin Huger, of South Carolina, and John Boyle, of Kentucky.[3]

On January 10,[4] the House passed a resolution that the committee "be authorized to send for persons and papers."

On January 30[5] Mr. J. Randolph, in the name of the committee appointed to inquire into the conduct of Samuel Chase and Richard Peters, stated that documents had been received by them which occupied a considerable bulk, the printing of which would considerably assist their investigation, by rendering them more convenient for perusal. He added that it would probably be necessary to print these papers for the information of the House when the report of the committee was made. He therefore moved the vesting in them authority to cause to be printed such papers as they might conceive proper. It was objected that the printing of a part of the documents might prejudice the case in advance; but on the part of the committee it was replied that it was not necessary that the printed documents be made public until the report should be made. The motion of Mr. Randolph was then agreed to.

The report recommending the impeachment of Mr. Justice Chase was considered in Committee of the Whole House.

The investigation which resulted in the impeachment of Mr. Justice Chase was entirely ex parte.

The House found that Judge Richard Peters had not so acted as to require impeachment.

The impeachment of Mr. Justice Chase was carried to the Senate by a committee of two.

Form of declaration used by the committee in presenting the impeachment of Mr. Justice Chase in the Senate.

Verbal report made by the committee that had carried the impeachment of Mr. Justice Chase to the Senate.

Form of the resolution directing the carrying of the Chase impeachment to the Senate.

The committee appointed to prepare articles in the Chase case were all of those who had favored the impeachment.

The articles of impeachment in the Chase case were reported just before the close of the first session of the Congress.

On March 6[1] Mr. Randolph submitted the report of the committee; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House. On March 8[2] Mr. Randolph submitted to the House an additional affidavit, which was referred also to the Committee of the Whole House.

On March 12[3] the report of the committee was taken up in Committee of the Whole House for consideration. This report was as follows:

That in consequence of the evidence collected by them, in virtue of the powers with which they have been invested by the House, and which is hereunto subjoined, they are of opinion—

1. That Samuel Chase, esq., one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors.

2. That Richard Peters, district judge of the district of Pennsylvania, has not so acted in his judiciary capacity as to require the interposition of the constitutional powers of this House.

Accompanying this report was a volume of printed testimony. Two members of the committee, Messrs. Huger and Griswold, did not concur in the report; but as it was not the practice in the House at that time to permit minority views, their dissent appears only from the debate. Mr. Huger declared[4] that the testimony on which it was proposed to proceed was "entirely ex parte." This was not denied. Mr. Huger based his opposition to the report on this ground.

The Committee of the Whole House, after considering the report, recommended the following:

Resolved, That Samuel Chase, esq., one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors.

Resolved, That Richard Peters, district judge of the district of Pennsylvania, hath not so acted, in his judicial capacity, as to require the interposition of the constitutional power of this House.

The House agreed to the first resolution, yeas 73, nays 32. The second resolution was then agreed to without division.

Thereupon it was Ordered, That Mr. John Randolph and Mr. Early be appointed a committee to go to the Senate, and, at the bar thereof, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States, to impeach Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors; and acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him, and make good the same.

Ordered, That the committee do demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said Samuel Chase to answer to the said impeachment.

On March 13,[1] in the Senate, a message from the House of Representatives, by Messrs. J. Randolph and Early, two of their Members, was received, as follows:

Mr. President: We are ordered, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States, to impeach Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors; and to acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him, and make good the same.

We are also ordered to demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said Samuel Chase to answer to the said impeachment.

On the same day,[2] in the Senate, it was ordered that the message be referred to Messrs. Abraham Baldwin, of Georgia; Joseph Anderson, of Tennessee, and William C. Nicholas, of Virginia, "to consider and report thereon."

On March 13,[3] in the House, Mr. John Randolph, from the committee appointed on the 12th instant, reported—

That, in obedience to the order of the House, the committee had been to the Senate, and in the name of the House of Representatives, and of the people of the United States, had impeached Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors; and had acquainted the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles against him and make good the same.

And further: That the committee had demanded that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said Samuel Chase to answer to the said impeachment.

On motion it was—

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report articles of impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, who has been impeached by this House, during the present session, of high crimes and misdemeanors; and that the said committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Mr. John Randolph, Mr. Nicholson, Mr. Joseph Clay, Mr. Early, and Mr. Boyle be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

All of this committee had favored the report in favor of impeachment.

On March 26[1] Mr. Randolph reported articles of impeachment, which were ordered printed. These articles do not appear in the Journal of the House.

Then, on March 27,[2] the Congress adjourned to the first Monday in November next.

The proceedings in the Chase impeachment were continued after a recess of Congress; but in deference to the practice at that time the articles were recommitted for a new report.

The articles impeaching Mr. Justice Chase were considered article by article in Committee of the Whole.

Practice in considering and amending articles of impeachment in Committee of the Whole.

The House decided to retain in the articles of the Chase impeachment the old reservation of liberty to exhibit further articles.

The articles of impeachment in the Chase case appear in the House Journal in full at the time of their adoption.

Method by which the House amended and voted on the articles of impeachment in the Chase case.

On the second day of the next session, November 6,[3] Mr. Randolph raised a question as to the status of the articles of impeachment, it being then the practice of the House that pending business should begin anew at the first of a session.[4] As a result of this inquiry the report made at the last session was referred to a select committee, composed of the same members as the select committee of the preceding session, except that Mr. John Rhea, of Tennessee, succeeded Mr. Nicholson.

On November 30,[5] Mr. Randolph, from the select committee, reported articles of impeachment, which were nearly the same as those reported at the last session, with the addition of two new articles. The articles were referred to a Committee of the Whole House. An objection was made that the committee reporting in this case had been given no power of investigation, and yet that they had reported new articles not reported by the former committee, which had expired. This objection was not considered by the House.

On December 3,[6] the report was considered in Committee of the Whole House. The articles having been read, a question arose as to procedure, especially as to amendment; and the Chairman[7] gave it as his opinion that the proper method would be to take up the report by articles. This was done accordingly.

The first article being read, a motion was made to strike it out, whereupon the Chairman, with the approval of the committee so far as expressed, decided that, while the motion to strike out the first section of a bill would be in order, yet it seemed to him that in considering independent articles it would be preferable to take the sense of the Committee of the Whole on each article on a motion to concur with the action of the select committee which had reported the articles. This method was thereupon adopted.

Thereupon the Committee of the Whole House went through the report article by article, amending, and where an article had several paragraphs, reading by paragraphs for amendment. And on each article, after an opportunity for amendment and after reading of testimony relating to it on demand of a Member, the question was put on concurring.[1] The committee decided, ayes 40, noes 50, that the testimony should not be read as a whole on each article, but only as called for by Members.

When the last article was read, Mr. James Mott, of New Jersey, moved[2] to strike out the words, declaring that the House "saved to itself the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any further articles, or other accusation or impeachment against the said Samuel Chase," and further, that part which saved to the House "the right of replying to any such articles of impeachment or accusation which shall be exhibited to them." It seemed to him unfair that the House should reserve such a right to themselves. If there was anything more with which he ought to be charged, it ought to be now brought forward, and the accused should be informed at once how far they meant to go, in order to enable him the better to make his defense.

Mr. Randolph argued that these reservations had been made in the articles of the Blount and Pickering impeachments, and he did not wish to see the liberties of the people or the rights of the House abridged. Mr. Mott admitted the practice, which had been followed in his own State.

Mr. Mott's motion was disagreed to.

The last article having been concurred in, the Committee of the Whole House rose and reported the articles with amendments.

On December 4,[3] the articles were considered in the House, the Journal containing them in full as reported originally by the select committee. Each article was considered by itself, and after opportunity to amend the question was taken "that the House do agree" to the article. On the last article a division was demanded, as it contained both a charge against Judge Chase and the protestation whereby the House reserved to themselves the "liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any further articles." The first portion of the article was agreed to, and then the question being taken on the second portion, it was agreed to, yeas 78, nays 32. The other votes on agreeing to the several articles had ranged as follows: yeas 70 to 84, nays 34 to 45. All amendments made in Committee of the Whole had been disagreed to, and no new ones were agreed to by the House.

The question having been taken on each article, the House then voted affirmatively on the question—

> That the House do concur with the select committee in their agreement to the said articles of impeachment, as originally proposed, and hereinbefore recited.

The House appointed seven managers, by ballot, for the trial of Mr. Justice Chase.

The managers chosen for the trial of Mr. Justice Chase had each voted for a portion, at least, of the articles.

The House overruled the Speaker and decided that a manager of an impeachment should be elected by a majority and not by a plurality.

Forms of resolutions directing the managers to exhibit in the Senate the articles of impeachment against Mr. Justice Chase.

In the Chase impeachment the message notifying the Senate that articles would be exhibited does not appear to have included the names of the managers.

The Senate notified the House of the day and hour when it would receive the managers to exhibit the articles impeaching Mr. Justice Chase.

The Senate as a court adopted a rule prescribing the ceremonies at the presentation of articles impeaching Mr. Justice Chase.

On December 5,[1] it was—

Resolved, That seven managers be appointed by ballot, to conduct the impeachment exhibited against Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Thereupon the following were elected: Messrs. John Randolph, jr., of Virginia; Cæsar A. Rodney, of Delaware; Joseph H. Nicholson, of Maryland; Peter Early, of Georgia; John Boyle, of Kentucky; Roger Nelson, of Maryland, and George W. Campbell, of Tennessee.

Each of these managers had voted for a portion or all of the articles of impeachment.

On the first ballot the six first Members on the list had each a majority of the ballots; but Mr. Campbell had only a plurality.

A question arising, the Speaker,[2] after referring to the rule of the House, "In all other cases of ballot than for committees, a majority of the votes given shall be necessary to an election," held that Mr. Campbell was duly chosen.

A question arose, and after reference to precedents, which did not seem conclusive, Mr. Randolph appealed from the decision. And the question being taken, the decision of the Speaker was overruled, ayes 25, noes 50. Thereupon a second ballot was taken, at which Mr. Campbell received a majority.

Thereupon, on motion of Mr. Nicholson, it was—

Resolved, That the articles agreed to by this House, to be exhibited in the name of themselves and of the people of the United States, against Samuel Chase, in maintenance of their impeachment against him for high crimes and misdemeanors, be carried to the Senate by the managers appointed to conduct the said impeachment.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House have appointed managers to conduct the impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and have directed the said managers to carry to the Senate the articles agreed upon by this House to be exhibited in maintenance of their impeachment against the said Samuel Chase; and that the Clerk of this House do go with the said message.

On December 6[1] in the Senate the Clerk of the House delivered the message as follows:

Mr. President, I am directed to inform the Senate that the House of Representatives have appointed managers to conduct the impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and have directed the said managers to carry to the Senate the articles agreed upon by the House to be exhibited in maintenance of their impeachment against the said Samuel Chase.

On December 7[2] Mr. William B. Giles, of Virginia, from a committee appointed on November 30 "to prepare and report proper rules of proceeding to be observed by the Senate in cases of impeachment," made a report, which was read. With Mr. Giles on this committee were Messrs. Abraham Baldwin, of Georgia, John Breckenridge, of Kentucky, David Stone, of North Carolina, and Israel Smith, of Vermont.

Also on December 7[3] it was—

Resolved, That the Senate will, at 1 o'clock this day, be ready to receive articles of impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, to be presented by the managers appointed by the House of Representatives.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

Immediately thereafter, in the high court of impeachment,[4] it was—

Resolved, That when the managers of the impeachment shall be introduced to the bar of the Senate and shall have signified that they are ready to exhibit articles of impeachment against Samuel Chase, the President of the Senate shall direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to make proclamation, who shall, after making proclamation, repeat the following words: "All persons are commanded to keep silence, on pain of imprisonment, while the grand inquest of the nation is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States articles of impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States." After which the articles shall be exhibited; and then the President of the Senate shall inform the managers that the Senate will take proper order on the subject of the impeachment, of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.[5]

Ceremonies at the presentation of the articles before the high court of impeachment in the Chase case.

In presenting to the court the articles impeaching Mr. Justice Chase, the chairman of the managers read them and then delivered them at the table.

The managers having carried to the Senate the articles impeaching Mr. Justice Chase, reported verbally to the House.

On the same day the message from the Senate announcing its readiness to receive the articles of impeachment was received in the House,[6] and the managers repaired at 1 o'clock to the Senate Chamber. They were admitted,[1] and Mr. Randolph, the chairman, announced that they were—the managers instructed by the House of Representatives to exhibit certain articles of impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The managers were requested by the President to take seats assigned them within the bar, and the Sergeant-at-Arms was directed to make proclamation in the words following:

Oyes! Oyes! Oyes!
All persons are commanded to keep silence, etc. [In words as prescribed by the resolution.]

After the proclamation the managers rose, and Mr. Randolph, their chairman, read the articles of impeachment, as follows:

Articles exhibited by the House of Representatives of the United States, in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, against Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, in maintenance and support of their impeachment against him for high crimes and misdemeanors.

ART. 1. That unmindful of the solemn duties of his office, and contrary to the sacred obligation by which he stood bound to discharge them, "faithfully and impartially, and without respect to persons," the said Samuel Chase, on the trial of John Fries, charged with treason, before the circuit court of the United States, held for the district of Pennsylvania, in the city of Philadelphia, during the months of April and May, one thousand eight hundred, whereat the said Samuel Chase presided, did, in his judicial capacity, conduct himself in a manner highly arbitrary, oppressive, and unjust, viz:

1. In delivering an opinion in writing, on the question of law, on the construction of which the defense of the accused materially depended, tending to prejudice the minds of the jury against the case of the said John Fries, the prisoner, before counsel had been heard in his defense;

2. In restricting the counsel for the said Fries from recurring to such English authorities as they believed apposite, or from citing certain statutes of the United States, which they deemed illustrative of the positions upon which they intended to rest the defense of their client;

3. In debarring the prisoner from his constitutional privilege of addressing the jury (through his counsel) on the law, as well as on the fact, which was to determine his guilt or innocence, and at the same time endeavoring to wrest from the jury their indisputable right to hear argument and determine upon the question of law, as well as the question of fact, involved in the verdict which they were required to give.

In consequence of which irregular conduct of the said Samuel Chase, as dangerous to our liberties as it is novel to our laws and usages, the said John Fries was deprived of the right, secured to him by the eighth article amendatory of the Constitution, and was condemned to death without having been heard by counsel, in his defense, to the disgrace of the character of the American bench, in manifest violation of law and justice, and in open contempt of the right of juries, on which ultimately rest the liberty and safety of the American people.

ART. 2. That, prompted by a similar spirit of persecution and injustice, at a circuit court of the United States, held at Richmond, in the month of May, 1800, for the district of Virginia, whereat the said Samuel Chase presided, and before which a certain James Thompson Callender was arraigned for a libel on John Adams, then President of the United States, the said Samuel Chase, with intent to oppress and procure the conviction of the said Callender, did overrule the objection of John Basset, one of the jury, who wished to be excused from serving on the trial, because he had made up his mind as to the publication from which the words, charged to be libelous in the indictment, were extracted; and the said Basset was accordingly sworn, and did serve on the said jury, by whose verdict the prisoner was subsequently convicted.

ART. 3. That with intent to oppress and procure the conviction of the prisoner, the evidence of John Taylor, a material witness on behalf of the aforesaid Callender, was not permitted by the said Samuel Chase to be given in, on pretense that the said witness could not prove the truth of the whole of one of the charges contained in the indictment, although the said charge embraced more than one fact.

[1] Senate Impeachment Journal, pp. 509, 510.

ART. 4. That the conduct of the said Samuel Chase was marked, during the whole course of the said trial, by manifest injustice, partiality, and intemperance, viz:

1. In compelling the prisoner's counsel to reduce to writing, and submit to the inspection of the court, for their admission or rejection, all questions which the said counsel meant to propound to the above-named John Taylor, the witness.

2. In refusing to postpone the trial, although an affidavit was regularly filed stating the absence of material witnesses on behalf of the accused; and although it was manifest that, with the utmost diligence, the attendance of such witnesses could not have been procured at that term.

3. In the use of unusual, rude, and contemptuous expressions toward the prisoner's counsel; and in falsely insinuating that they wished to excite the public fears and indignation, and to produce that insubordination to law to which the conduct of the judge did at the same time manifestly tend.

4. In repeated and vexatious interruptions of the said counsel, on the part of the said judge, which at length induced them to abandon their cause and their client, who was thereupon convicted and condemned to fine and imprisonment.

5. In an indecent solicitude, manifested by the said Samuel Chase, for the conviction of the accused, unbecoming even a public prosecutor, but highly disgraceful to the character of a judge, as it was subversive of justice.

ART. 5. And whereas it is provided by the act of Congress passed on the 24th day of September, 1786, entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," that for any crime or offense against the United States the offender may be arrested, imprisoned, or bailed, agreeably to the usual mode of process in the State where such offender may be found; and whereas it is provided by the laws of Virginia that upon presentment by any grand jury of an offense not capital the court shall order the clerk to issue a summons against the person or persons offending to appear and answer such presentment at the next court; yet the said Samuel Chase did, at the court aforesaid, award a capias against the body of the said James Thompson Callender, indicted for an offense not capital, whereupon the said Callender was arrested and committed to close custody, contrary to law in that case made and provided.

ART. 6. And whereas it is provided by the thirty-fourth section of the aforesaid act, entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," that the laws of the several States, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as the rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States in cases where they apply; and whereas by the laws of Virginia it is provided that in cases not capital the offender shall not be held to answer any presentment of a grand jury until the court next succeeding that during which such presentment shall have been made, yet the said Samuel Chase, with intent to oppress and procure the conviction of the said James Thompson Callender, did, at the court aforesaid, rule and adjudge the said Callender to trial during the term at which he, the said Callender, was presented and indicted, contrary to law in that case made and provided.

ART. 7. That at a circuit court of the United States for the district of Delaware, held at Newcastle, in the month of June, 1800, whereat the said Samuel Chase presided, the said Samuel Chase, disregarding the duties of his office, did descend from the dignity of a judge and stoop to the level of an informer by refusing to discharge the grand jury, although entreated by several of the said jury so to do; and after the said grand jury had regularly declared through their foreman that they had found no bills of indictment, nor had any presentments to make, by observing to the said grand jury that he, the said Samuel Chase, understood "that a highly seditious temper had manifested itself in the State of Delaware among a certain class of people, particularly in Newcastle County, and more especially in the town of Wilmington, where lived a most seditious printer, unrestrained by any principle of virtue, and regardless of social order, that the name of this printer was"—but checking himself, as if sensible of the indecorum which he was committing, added "that it might be assuming too much to mention the name of this person, but it becomes your duty, gentlemen, to inquire diligently into this matter," or words to that effect; and that with intention to procure the prosecution of the printer in question the said Samuel Chase did, moreover, authoritatively enjoin on the district attorney of the United States the necessity of procuring a file of the papers to which he alluded (and which were understood to be those published under the title of "Mirror of the Times and General Advertiser"), and, by a strict examination of them, to find some passage which might furnish the groundwork of a prosecution against the printer of the said paper, thereby degrading his high judicial functions and tending to impair the public confidence in and respect for the tribunals of justice so essential to the general welfare.

ART. 8. And whereas mutual respect and confidence between the Government of the United States and those of the individual States, and between the people and those governments, respectively, are highly conducive to that public harmony without which there can be no public happiness, yet the said Samuel Chase, disregarding the duties and dignity of his judicial character, did, at a circuit court for the district of Maryland, held at Baltimore in the month of May, 1803, pervert his official right and duty to address the grand jury then and there assembled on the matters coming within the province of the said jury, for the purpose of delivering to the said grand jury an intemperate and inflammatory political harangue, with intent to excite the fears and resentment of the said grand jury and of the good people of Maryland against their State government and constitution, a conduct highly censurable in any, but peculiarly indecent and unbecoming in a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States; and, moreover, that the said Samuel Chase then and there, under pretense of exercising his judicial right to address the said grand jury, as aforesaid, did, in a manner highly unwarrantable, endeavor to excite the odium of the said grand jury and of the good people of Maryland against the Government of the United States by delivering opinions which, even if the judicial authority were competent to their expression on a suitable occasion and in a proper manner, were at that time, and as delivered by him, highly indecent, extrajudicial, and tending to prostitute the high judicial character with which he was invested to the low purpose of an electioneering partisan.

And the House of Representatives, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting, at any time hereafter, any further articles, or other accusation or impeachment against the said Samuel Chase, and also of replying to his answers which he shall make unto the said articles, or any of them, and of offering proof to all and every the aforesaid articles, and to all and every other articles, impeachment, or accusation, which shall be exhibited by them as the case shall require, do demand that the said Samuel Chase may be put to answer the said crimes and misdemeanors, and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments may be thereupon had and given as are agreeable to law and justice.

After the reading of the articles[1] the President notified the managers that the Senate would take proper order on the subject of the impeachment, of which due notice should be given to the House of Representatives.

The managers delivered the articles of impeachment at the table and withdrew.

Thereupon the high court of impeachments adjourned.

The managers having returned to the House, Mr. Randolph, their chairman, reported[2] that they did this day carry to the Senate the articles of impeachment agreed to by this House on the 4th instant, and that the said managers were informed by the Senate that their House would take proper measures relative to the said impeachment, of which this House should be duly notified.

Form prescribed for the writ of summons in the Chase impeachment.

Form of precept to be indorsed on the writ of summons in the Chase impeachment.

The Senate having fixed a day for the return of the writ of summons in the Chase impeachment, informed the House thereof.

On December 10[3] the high court of impeachments considered the report of the committee appointed November 30 to prepare and report proper rules of proceedings, and after consideration agreed to the following:

[1] The articles are not given in the Senate Journal (p. 510) on the day of their presentation, so the signatures of the Speaker and Clerk do not appear.

Which precept shall be signed by the Secretary of the Senate and sealed with their seal.

It was then

Resolved, That the secretary be directed to issue a summons to Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, to answer certain articles of impeachment, exhibited against him by the House of Representatives on Friday last; that the said summons be returnable the second of January next, and be served at least fifteen days before the return day thereof.

Ordered, That the secretary notify the House of Representatives of this resolution.

On the same day the message was delivered in the House,[1] and on the succeeding day was read, in form as follows:

In Senate of the United States—High Court of Impeachments, Monday, December 10, 1804.

The United States v. Samuel Chase.

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to issue a summons to Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, to answer certain articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives, on Friday last. That the said summons be returnable the second day of January next and be served at least fifteen days before the return day thereof.

Ordered, That the Secretary carry this resolution to the House of Representatives.

On December 14,[1] in the High Court of Impeachments, "Return was made by the Sergeant-at-Arms on the summons issued."

The rules agreed to by the high court of impeachment to govern the trial of Mr. Justice Chase.

On December 24[2] the High Court of Impeachments concluded its consideration of the report of the committee and the rules stood as follows:

1. Whensoever the Senate shall receive notice from the House of Representatives that managers are appointed on their part to conduct an impeachment against any person, and are directed to carry such articles to the Senate, the Secretary of the Senate shall immediately inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is ready to receive the managers for the purpose of exhibiting such articles of impeachment, agreeably to the said notice.

2. When the managers of an impeachment shall be introduced to the bar of the Senate, and shall have signified that they are ready to exhibit articles of impeachment against any person, the President of the Senate shall direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to make proclamation, who shall, after making proclamation, repeat the following words: "All persons are commanded to keep silence, on pain of imprisonment, while the grand inquest of the nation is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States articles of impeachment against ——— ———;" after which the articles shall be exhibited, and then the President of the Senate shall inform the managers that the Senate will take proper order on the subject of the impeachment, of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.

3 and 4. [As adopted on December 10—Forms of summons and precept.]

5. Subpœnas shall be issued by the Secretary of the Senate, upon the application of the managers of the impeachment, or of the party impeached, or his counsel, in the following form, to wit:

"To ——— ———, greeting:

"You, and each of you, are hereby commanded to appear before the Senate of the United States, on the —— day of ———, at the Senate Chamber, in the city of Washington, then and there to testify your knowledge in the cause which is before the Senate, in which the House of Representatives have impeached ——— ———. Fail not.

"Witness, ——— ———, Vice-President of the United States of America and President of the Senate thereof, at the city of Washington, this —— day of ———, in the year of our Lord —— and of the Independence of the United States the ———."

Which shall be signed by the Secretary of the Senate and sealed with their seal.

Which subpoenas shall be directed, in every case, to the marshal of the district where such witnesses respectively reside, to serve and return.

6. The form of direction to the marshal, for the service of the subpœna, shall be as follows:

"The Senate of the United States of America to the Marshal of the District of ———:

"You are hereby commanded to serve and return the within subpœna, according to law.

"Dated at Washington, this —— day of ———, in the year of our Lord —— and of the Independence of the United States the ———.

———— ————,

"Secretary of the Senate."

7. That the President of the Senate shall direct all necessary preparations in the Senate Chamber, and all the forms of proceeding, while the Senate are sitting for the purpose of trying an impeachment, and all forms during the trial not otherwise specially provided for by the Senate.

8. He shall also be authorized to direct the employment of the marshal of the District of Columbia, or any other person or persons, during the trial, to discharge such duties as may be prescribed by him.

9. At 12 o'clock of the day appointed for the return of the summons against the person impeached the legislative and executive business of the Senate shall be suspended, and the Secretary of the Senate shall administer an oath to the returning officer, in the form following, viz: "I, ——— ———, do solemnly swear that the return made and subscribed by me, upon the process issued on the —— day of ———, by the Senate of the United States, against ——— ———, is truly made, and that I have performed said services as therein described. So help me God." Which oath shall be entered at large on the records.

10. The person impeached shall then be called to appear and answer the articles of impeachment exhibited against him. If he appears, or any person for him, the appearance shall be recorded, stating particularly if by himself or if by agent or attorney, naming the person appearing and the capacity in which he appears.

11. At 12 o'clock of the day appointed for the trial of an impeachment the legislative and executive business of the Senate shall be postponed. The Secretary shall then administer the following oath or affirmation to the President:

"You solemnly swear, or affirm, that in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of ——— ———, you will do impartial justice according to the Constitution and laws of the United States."

12. And the President shall administer the said oath or affirmation to each Senator present.

The Secretary shall then give notice to the House of Representatives that the Senate is ready to proceed upon the impeachment of ——— ———, in the Senate Chamber, which Chamber is prepared with accommodations for the reception of the House of Representatives.

13. Counsel for the parties shall be admitted to appear, and be heard upon an impeachment.

14. All motions made by the parties or their counsel shall be addressed to the President of the Senate, and if he shall require it, shall be committed to writing, and read at the Secretary's table; and all decisions shall be had by yeas and nays, and without debate, which shall be entered on the records.

15. Witnesses shall be sworn in the following form, to wit: "You, ——— ———, do swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that the evidence you shall give in the case now depending between the United States and ——— ———, shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. So help you God." Which oath shall be administered by the Secretary.

16. Witnesses shall be examined by the party producing them, and then cross-examined in the usual form.

17. If a Senator is called as a witness, he shall be sworn, and give his testimony, standing in his place.

18. If a Senator wishes a question to be put to a witness, it shall be reduced to writing and put by the President.

19. At all times, whilst the Senate is sitting upon the trial of an impeachment, the doors of the Senate Chamber shall be kept open.

The nineteenth rule was agreed to on December 31.[1]

Form of return made and oath taken by the Sergeant-at-Arms in the Chase impeachment.

Mr. Justice Chase appeared to answer the articles of impeachment "in his own proper person."

On his appearance to answer articles of impeachment Mr. Justice Chase was furnished with a chair.

Mr. Justice Chase, in appearing, was permitted by the Vice-President, without objection of the Senate, to read a paper giving reasons for delaying his answer.

Mr. Justice Chase, in asking time to prepare his answer to the articles, was called to order by the Vice-President for expressions used.

It was decided that members of the court should be sworn before considering respondent's motion for time to answer in the Chase case.

Mr. Justice Chase's application for a time to answer was accompanied by a sworn statement of reasons.

[1] Senate impeachment, Journal, pp. 513, 514.

The Senate having fixed the day for Mr. Justice Chase to file his answer, informed the House that the trial would proceed on that day.

Neither the managers nor the House attended on the appearance of Mr. Justice Chase in answer to the summons.

On January 2, 1805,[1] the high court of impeachment having been opened by proclamation, the return made by the Sergeant-at-Arms was read, as follows:

I, James Mathers, Sergeant-at-Arms to the Senate of the United States, in obedience to the within summons to me directed, did proceed to the residence of the within-named Samuel Chase, on the 12th day of December, 1804, and did then and there leave a true copy of the said writ of summons, together with a true copy of the articles of impeachment annexed, with him, the said Samuel Chase.

JAMES MATHERS.

After which the Secretary administered to him the oath, as follows:

You, James Mathers, Sergeant-at-Arms to the Senate of the United States, do solemnly swear that the return made and subscribed by you upon the process issued on the 10th day of December last, by the Senate of the United States, against Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court, is truly made, and that you have performed said services as therein described. So help you God.

Samuel Chase was then solemnly called,[2] who appeared "in his own proper person."

The President of the Senate[3] informed him that the Senate was ready to receive any answer that he had to make.[4]

Mr. Chase requested the indulgence of a chair, which was immediately furnished. The report of the trial intimates that in accordance with the parliamentary practice of England no chair was assigned to him previously to his appearance, but that an informal intimation was made to him that, on his request, it would be furnished.

After being seated for a short time Judge Chase rose and commenced reading from a paper which he held in his hand.

After reading far enough to show that the paper was proceeding in general denial of the charges, the President reminded him that this was the day appointed to receive any answer he might make to the articles of impeachment. Thereupon Judge Chase said it was his purpose to request the allowance of further time to put in his answer.

The reading was then proceeding, when the President interrupted and asked if the paper was intended as his answer. If so, it would be put on file. If it was a prelude to a motion he meant to make praying to be allowed further time for putting in his answer, he would confine himself strictly to what had relation to that object.

Judge Chase said it was not his answer that he was reading, but that he was assigning reasons why he could not now answer, in order to show that he was entitled to further time to prepare and put in his answer.

The President replied:

You, who are so conversant in the practice of courts of law, know very well that a motion for time must not be founded on mere suggestions, but must be founded on some facts to prove the propriety of the motion.

Judge Chase said he meant to show the impracticability of his answering at this time, from the articles themselves, and it was for that purpose that he made an allusion to them.

The President said that with the caution he had given he might proceed, provided no objection were made by any gentleman of the Senate.

Judge Chase proceeded in his address.

Later in the reading the following paragraph occurred:

And acrimonious as are the terms in which many of the accusations are conceived; harsh and opprobrious as are the epithets wherewith it has been thought proper to assail my name and character, by those who were "puling in their nurses' arms" whilst I was contributing my utmost aid to lay the groundwork of American liberty, I yet thank my accusers, whose functions as members of the Government of my country I highly respect, for having at length put their charges into a definitive form, susceptible of refutation; and for having thereby afforded me an opportunity of vindicating my innocence, in the face of this honorable court, of my country, and of the world.

On using the expressions marked in italics,

The President interrupted Judge Chase and said that observations of censure or recrimination were not admissible; it would be very improper for him to listen to observations on the statements of the House of Representatives before an answer was filed.

Judge Chase said he had very few words more to add, which would conclude what he had to say at the present time.

With the permission of the President he proceeded.

The address being concluded, the President requested him to reduce to writing any motion which he wished to make.

Thereupon Judge Chase submitted the following:

I solicit this honorable court to allow me until the first day of the next session to put in my answer and prepare for my trial.

The President informed Mr. Chase that the court would take time to consider the motion.

During these proceedings incident to the return on the summons and the appearance of Judge Chase, neither the House of Representatives nor its managers were present.

After Judge Chase had submitted his motion the Senate withdrew to a private apartment, where debate arose as to whether or not the Senators should take the oath required by the Constitution before they took into consideration the motion of Judge Chase; and at the conclusion of the debate it was

Resolved, That on the meeting of the Senate to-morrow, before they proceed to any business on the articles of impeachment before them, and before the decision of any question, the oath prescribed by the rules shall be administered to the President and Members of the Senate.

On January 3[1] the high court of impeachments was duly opened with proclamation, and the oath was administered to the President and Senators in the manner prescribed by the rule.

Thereupon the President stated that he had received a letter from the defendant, inclosing an affidavit that further time was necessary for him to prepare for trial; which affidavit[2] was read, as follows:

City of Washington, ss:

Samuel Chase made oath on the Holy Evangels of Almighty God, that it is not in his power to obtain information respecting the facts alleged in the articles of impeachment to have taken place in the city of Philadelphia in the trial of John Fries; or of the facts alleged to have taken place in the city of Richmond in the trial of James T. Callender, in time to prepare and put in his answer, and to proceed to trial, with any probability that the same could be finished on or before the 5th day of March next. And, further, that it is not in his power to procure information of the names of the witnesses, whom he thinks it may be proper and necessary for him to summon, in time to obtain their attendance, if his answer could be prepared in time sufficient for the finishing of the said trial, before the said 5th day of March next; and the said Samuel Chase further made oath that he believes it will not be in his power to obtain the advice of counsel, to prepare his answer, and to give him their assistance on the trial, which he thinks necessary, if the said trial should take place during the present session of Congress; and that he verily believes, if he had at this time full information of facts, and of the witnesses proper for him to summon, and if he had also the assistance of counsel, that he could not prepare the answer he thinks he ought to put in, and be ready for his trial, within the space of four or five weeks from this time. And, further, that his application to the honorable the Senate, for time to obtain the information of facts, in order to prepare his answer, and for time to procure the attendance of necessary witnesses, and to prepare for his defense in the trial, and to obtain the advice and assistance of counsel, is not made for the purpose of delay, but only for the purpose of obtaining a full hearing of the articles of impeachment against him in their real merits.

SAMUEL CHASE.

Sworn to this 3d day of January, 1805, before

SAMUEL HAMILTON.

Whereupon the following motion was made by Mr. Stephen R. Bradley, of Vermont:

Ordered, That Samuel Chase file his answer, with the Secretary of the Senate, to the several articles of impeachment exhibited against him, by the House of Representatives, on or before the —— day ——.

A motion was made by Mr. William B. Giles, of Virginia, to amend the motion and to strike out all that follows the word "Ordered," and insert "That ——— next shall be the day for receiving the answer, and proceeding on the trial of the impeachment against Samuel Chase.

The motion to strike out was agreed to, yeas 20, nays 10. And then the motion to insert was also agreed to, yeas 22, nays 8.

The motion to fill the blank with the words "first Monday of December next" was disagreed to, yeas 12, nays 18. Then a motion to insert "the fourth day of February next" was agreed to, yeas 22, nays 8. Then the resolution as amended was agreed to, yeas 21, nays 9.

It was then

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives and the said Samuel Chase thereof.

Thereupon the high court of impeachments adjourned.

On January 4[1] the House was informed by message, which was read in form, as follows:

In Senate of the United States—High court of impeachments, January 3, 1805.

United States v. Samuel Chase.

Ordered, That the 4th day of February next shall be the day for receiving the answer, and proceeding on the trial of the impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Attest: SAM. A. OTIS, Secretary.

Ordered, That the said proceedings of the Senate do lie on the table.

A Manager of the Chase impeachment being excused, the House chose another by ballot and informed the Senate thereof.

The House determined to attend as a Committee of the Whole the proceedings of the trial of Mr. Justice Chase.

On January 25,[2] in the House—

Resolved, That Mr. Nelson be excused from serving as one of the Managers appointed on the 5th ultimo, on the part of this House, to conduct the impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.

On January 28[3] the House elected by ballot Mr. Christopher Clark, of Virginia, to succeed Mr. Nelson, and informed the Senate thereof by message, delivered as follows by the Clerk:

Mr. President, I am directed to acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives have elected Mr. Clark a manager to conduct the impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the place of Mr. Nelson, who hath been excused that service.

Mr. Clark had voted in favor of all of the articles of impeachment save one, which he had voted against.

On February 4,[4] in the House, it was Resolved, That, during the trial of the impeachment now depending before the Senate, this House will attend, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon, and proceed on the legislative business before the House until the hour at which the Senate shall appoint each day to proceed on the trial of the impeachment now pending before that body, and that the House then resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole and attend the said trial.

Attendance of the House in Committee of the Whole at the ceremonies of the beginning of Chase's trial.

Description of the arrangement of the Senate chamber for the Chase trial.

Mr. Justice Chase introduced his counsel at the time he gave in his answer.

The Senate granted the request of Mr. Justice Chase for permission to read his answer by himself and counsel.

The answer of Mr. Justice Chase to the articles of impeachment.

The answer of the respondent in the Chase trial does not appear in the journal of the court.

On request of the managers the Senate directed its Secretary to carry to the House an attested copy of Mr. Justice Chase's answer.

The answer of Mr. Justice Chase being received in the House was referred to the managers.

Form of proceedings when the House attends an impeachment trial as Committee of the Whole.

On the same day,[1] the high court of impeachments was duly opened with proclamation, and it was then—

Ordered, That the Secretary give notice to the House of Representatives that the Senate are in their public Chamber and are ready to proceed on the trial of Samuel Chase; and that seats are provided for the accommodation of the Members.

This message being received in the House,[2] that body resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, with Mr. Joseph B. Varnum, of Massachusetts, as Chairman, and proceeded to the Senate Chamber with the managers. Soon after they entered the Chamber and took their seats.

The Senate Chamber was fitted up in a style of appropriate elegance. Benches covered with crimson, on each side, and in a line with the chair of the President, were assigned to the Members of the Senate. On the right and in front of the chair, a box was assigned to the managers, and on the left a similar box to Mr. Chase and his counsel, and chairs allotted to such friends as he might introduce. The residue of the floor was occupied with chairs for the accommodation of the Members of the House of Representatives, and with boxes for the reception of the foreign ministers, and civil and military officers of the United States. On the right and left of the Chair, at the termination of the benches of the members of the court, boxes were assigned to stenographers. The permanent gallery was allotted to the indiscriminate admission of spectators. Below this gallery and above the floor of the House a new gallery was raised and fitted up with peculiar elegance, intended primarily for the exclusive accommodation of ladies. But this feature of the arrangement, made by the Vice-President, was at an early period of the trial abandoned, it having been found impracticable. At the termination of this gallery, on each side, boxes were specially assigned to ladies attached to the families of public personages. The preservation of order was devolved on the marshal of the District of Columbia, who was assisted by a number of deputies.[3]

Samuel Chase being called to make answer to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives, appeared and requested that Robert G. Harper, Luther Martin, Philip B. Key, and Joseph Hopkinson, esqs., might be admitted and considered as counsel for him, the said Samuel Chase, and thereupon submitted a motion, which was read at the table as follows:

Samuel Chase moves for permission to read his answer, by himself and his counsel, at the bar of this honorable court.

The President asked him if it was the answer on which he meant to rely? To which he replied in the affirmative.

The question being taken on the motion, it passed in the affirmative.

Then Judge Chase began the reading of his answer, and before its conclusion was assisted by Messrs. Harper and Hopkinson. The answer began as follows:[1]

This respondent, in his proper person, comes into the said court, and protesting that there is no high crime or misdemeanor particularly alleged in the said articles of impeachment to which he is or can be bound by law to make answer, and saving to himself now, and at all times hereafter, all benefit of exception to the insufficiency of the said articles, and each of them, and to the defects therein appearing in point of law or otherwise, and protesting also that he ought not to be injured in any manner, by any words, or by any want of form in this his answer, he submits the following facts and observations by way of answer to the said articles.

The answer then proceeds to answer the charges, article by article.

At the conclusion of the reading, Mr. Randolph, chairman of the managers, moved that they have time to consult the House of Representatives on a replication, and that they be furnished with a copy of the answer.

To this the President replied that the motion would be taken into consideration and the House of Representatives should be notified of the result.

Thereupon the high court of impeachments adjourned and the Members of the House of Representatives returned to their Hall, and the Committee of the Whole House rose and their Chairman reported.[2]

On February 5,[3] in the high court of impeachments—

Ordered, That the Secretary carry to the House of Representatives an attested copy of the answer of Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court, to articles of impeachment against him by the House of Representatives.

The message being delivered in the House the same day,[4] the copy of the answer was read and ordered to be referred to the managers.

The replication of the House to the answer of Mr. Justice Chase to the articles of impeachment.

In the Chase case the House refused to strike from its replication certain words reflecting on the motives of the respondent.

[2] The Journal of the House has the following entry, showing the form used while the trial progressed:

"The House then, in pursuance of a resolution agreed to this day, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, and proceeded in that capacity to the Senate Chamber to attend the trial by the Senate of the impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the committee returned into the Chamber of the House, and Mr. Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Varnum, from the said Committee of the Whole, reported that the committee had, according to order, attended the trial by the Senate of the said impeachment, and that some progress had been made therein." The replication in the Chase impeachment was signed by the Speaker and attested by the Clerk.

The replication in the Chase case was read to the Senate by the chairman of the managers.

Counsel for respondent were furnished a copy of the House's replication by direction of the Presiding Officer.

Later, on the same day, Mr. Randolph, chairman of the managers, submitted to the House the following report:

That they have considered the said answer, and do find that the said Samuel Chase has endeavored to cover the crimes and misdemeanors laid to his charge by evasive insinuations and misrepresentation of facts; and that the said answer does give a gloss and coloring, utterly false and untrue, to the various criminal matters contained in the said articles; and do submit to the judgment of the House their opinion that, for avoiding any imputation of delay to the House of Representatives, in a case of so great moment, a replication be forthwith sent to the Senate, maintaining the charge of this House; and that the committee had prepared a replication accordingly, which they herewith report to the House, as follows:

"The House of Representatives of the United States have considered the answer of Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, to the articles of impeachment against him by them exhibited, in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States; and observe—

"That the said Samuel Chase has endeavored to cover the high crimes and misdemeanors laid to his charge by evasive insinuations and misrepresentation of facts; that the answer does give a gloss and coloring, utterly false and untrue, to the various criminal matters contained in the said articles; that the said Samuel Chase did, in fact, commit the numerous acts of oppression, persecution, and injustice of which he stands accused; and the House of Representatives, in full confidence of the truth and justice of their accusation and of the necessity of bringing the said Samuel Chase to a speedy and exemplary punishment, and not doubting that the Senate will use all becoming diligence to do justice to the proceedings of the House of Representatives, and to vindicate the honor of the nation, do aver their charge against the said Samuel Chase to be true; and that the said Samuel Chase is guilty in such manner as he stands impeached; and that the House of Representatives will be ready to prove their charges against him, at such convenient time and place as shall be appointed for that purpose."

Mr. Roger Griswold, of Connecticut, moved that the report be committed to a Committee of the Whole House, which motion was disagreed to.

Mr. John Dennis, of Maryland, moved to amend the replication by striking out therefrom after the words "and observe," the following words:

That the said Samuel Chase has endeavored to cover the high crimes and misdemeanors laid to his charge by evasive insinuations and misrepresentation of facts; that the said answer does give a gloss and coloring, utterly false and untrue, to the various criminal matters contained in the said articles.

This amendment was disagreed to, yeas 41, nays 70.

Then the question being taken that the House do agree to the said replication, it passed in the affirmative, yeas 77, nays 34.

Thereupon, it was

Resolved, That the replication annexed to the report of the managers be put into the answer and pleas of the aforesaid Samuel Chase, on behalf of this House; and that the managers be instructed to proceed to maintain the said replication at the bar of the Senate, at such time as shall be appointed by the Senate.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House have agreed to a replication, on their part, to the answer of Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, to the articles of impeachment exhibited to the Senate against him by this House, and have directed the managers appointed to conduct the said impeachment to carry the said replication to the Senate; and to proceed to maintain the same at the bar of the Senate, at such time as shall be appointed by the Senate.

On February 7, 1805,[1] in the high court of impeachments, the Clerk of the House delivered the message, as above directed.

Then it was Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate will be ready to proceed on the trial of the impeachment of Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court, at half past 2 o'clock this day.

The high court of impeachments being duly opened at 2 o'clock the managers attended, and the replication was read by Mr. Randolph, in the form given above, with the following attestation:

Signed by order and in behalf of the said House.

NATH. MACON, Speaker.

Attest:

JOHN BECKLEY, Clerk.

Mr. Hopkinson requested a copy of the replication, which, the President replied, would be furnished by the Secretary.

Mr. Breckenridge moved a resolution to the following effect:

That the Secretary be directed to inform the House of Representatives that the Senate will, to-morrow, at 12 o'clock, proceed with the trial of Samuel Chase; which was agreed to without one dissenting voice, 34 members voting for it.

Whereupon the Senate withdrew to their legislative apartment.

The answer and replication being filed in the Chase impeachment, the court proceeded to hear testimony.

Proclamation made by the Sergeant-at-Arms at the opening of the Chase trial for presentation of evidence.

Witnesses on both sides were called at the opening of the Chase trial.

The managers not being ready to present testimony at the opening of the Chase trial, the court granted their motion to postpone.

On February 8[2] the high court of impeachments having met, it was Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate are ready to proceed further on the trial of the impeachment of Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court.

The managers, accompanied by the House of Representatives in Committee of the Whole House, accordingly attended.

Samuel Chase, the respondent, attended with his counsel.

Proclamation was made to keep silence, and also as follows:

Oyes! Oyes! Oyes!

Whereas a charge of high crimes and misdemeanors hath been exhibited by the House of Representatives of the United States, in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, against Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court, all persons concerned are to take notice that he now stands upon his trial, and they may come forth in order to make good the said charge.

The President informed the managers that they were at liberty to proceed in support of the articles of impeachment exhibited.

On request of Mr. Randolph the witnesses on behalf of the managers were called.

On request of Mr. Hopkinson, counsel for the respondent, his witnesses were called.

Mr. Randolph observed that various considerations, which it was unnecessary to detail, induced him, on behalf of the managers, to move a postponement of the trial till to-morrow, when they hoped to be prepared to proceed with it.

Mr. Harper said that, on behalf of Judge Chase, he would not object to the motion.

The President informed the managers that the Senate acceded to their request, and added, that the Senate would attend to-morrow at 12 o'clock, for the purpose of proceeding with the trial.

The court thereupon adjourned.

During the Chase trial the House attended daily without notice from the court, except on a special occasion, when the hour was changed.

Order of proceeding in the Chase trial during the introduction of evidence.

The journal of an impeachment trial records the names of witnesses, but not their testimony, except when it is subject of objection.

By consent, during the Chase trial, a witness for respondent was examined while the managers were presenting testimony.

In an impeachment trial the discharge of witnesses is determined by the Senate, sometimes in conformity with the consent of the parties.

Mr. Justice Chase, after attending during much of his trial, asked leave to retire, and was informed that the rules did not require his attendance.

Mr. Justice Chase did not, after reading his reply, participate personally in the conduct of his case, beyond waiving objection to one question.

The Presiding Officer of the Senate frequently put questions to witnesses during the Chase trial.

In the Chase impeachment the respondent introduced additional counsel during the trial.

On February 9,[1] and thereafter during the continuation of the trial, the high court met daily at 12 o'clock, and until February 23, near the end of the session, the House of Representatives in Committee of the Whole House attended with the managers without notice from the court. A single exception is noticed, however. On February 13[2] the two Houses met at noon to count the electoral vote. After that duty was concluded, the Secretary of the Senate presented the following message:

Mr. Speaker: I am directed to inform this House that the Senate will, at half past 2 o'clock on this day, be ready to proceed on the trial of the impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Accordingly the managers and the House attended.

The trial proceeded in this order:

On February 9,[1] Mr. Randolph, chairman of the managers, opened the cause. Then witnesses for the managers were sworn, gave testimony, and were cross-examined. The Journal states the name of each witness, but not his testimony, unless any portion was objected to and became the subject of decision by the court. On February 13,[2] while the managers were still presenting their testimony, at the request of Mr. Harper, counsel for the respondent, and with the consent of the managers, John Basset, a witness on the part of Judge Chase, was sworn and examined, in consequence of the peculiar situation of his family requiring his immediate return home.

On February 14,[3] while the managers were putting in their testimony, the respondent requested that Charles Lee, esq., might also be allowed to appear as one of his counsel.

On February 15,[4] the managers having completed their testimony, the respondent was notified that he might proceed to make his defense. Thereupon Mr. Harper, in his defense, addressed the court, and then proceeded to adduce witnesses.

On February 19,[4] on request, and with consent of parties, David Robinson, a witness, was discharged.

Also on February 19,[5] the following occurred:

Mr. HARPER. I am desired by Judge Chase to make of this honorable court the request contained in the following letter, which I will read:

"Mr. President: The state of my health will not permit me to remain any longer at this bar. It is with great regret I depart before I hear the judgment of this honorable court. If permitted to retire, I shall leave this honorable court with an unlimited confidence in its justice; and I beg leave to present my thanks to them for their patience and indulgence in the long and tedious examination of the witnesses. Whatever may be the ultimate decision of this honorable court, I console myself with the reflection that it will be the result of mature deliberation on the legal testimony in the case, and will emanate from those principles which ought to govern the highest tribunal of justice in the United States."

The President observed that the rules of the Senate did not require the personal attendance of the respondent; whereupon Judge Chase bowed in a very respectful manner and withdrew. Until this time the respondent had attended each day. Thereafter he did not attend. While in attendance he had not, after the reading of his reply, participated personally in the conduct of the defense, except in one instance to say that he had no objection to a question which his counsel had challenged.[6]

The President of the Senate frequently put questions to the witnesses as the trial proceeded.

On February 20,[7] at the conclusion of the testimony, a request was made that a certain witness, a Mr. Tilghman, be discharged, and the following took place:

Mr. Harper said the counsel for the respondent would have no objection to discharge all the witnesses, but must object to discharging part of them.

The PRESIDENT. If the gentlemen do not agree upon the discharge of the witnesses, I will take the sense of the Senate upon the point.

Mr. HARPER. The particular situation of Mr. Tilghman's family requires his return to Philadelphia. I must therefore request that his further attendance be dispensed with.

The managers consented, and Mr. Tilghman was discharged.

The question was then taken by the President on the discharge of the witnesses, and lost; there being 16 votes in the affirmative and 17 in the negative.

Mr. Rodney requested the discharge of the witnesses from Delaware; which being consented to by the respondent's counsel, they were discharged.

It may be proper here to notice that, from time to time, during the trial, witnesses were discharged with consent of the parties.

In the Chase impeachment, by agreement, the managers had the opening and close of the final arguments.

Those making the final arguments of the Chase trial were limited neither as to time nor numbers.

On February 19,[1] the following occurred as to the concluding arguments:

The PRESIDENT. Is the course of the arguments on each side understood?

Mr. NICHOLSON. We understand that the managers will open; that reply will be made by the counsel for the respondent, and that the managers will then close.

Mr. KEY. This is the usual course, and we have no objection to it.

The testimony being closed, on February 20,[2] Mr. Early commenced for the managers the argument in support of the articles, and was followed by Mr. Campbell, also in behalf of the managers, and then by Mr. Clark, also a manager.

Then Messrs. Hopkinson, Key, Lee, Martin, and Harper were severally heard for the respondent.

Finally Messrs. Nicholson, Rodney, and Randolph concluded for the managers.

The managers of the Chase impeachment resisted strenuously the argument that impeachment might be invoked only for indictable offenses.

The argument of Mr. Manager Campbell in the Chase trial on the nature of the power of impeachment.

In their arguments the managers and counsel for the respondent considered not only the evidence as tending to substantiate the charges set forth in the articles, but discussed at length the meaning and application of the Constitution in those clauses establishing the remedy of impeachment.

Mr. Campbell, of the managers, said:[3]

The first provision in the Constitution on this subject (art. 1, sec. 3,), declares that the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. Here we discover the great wisdom of the framers of the Constitution. The highest and most enlightened tribunal in the nation is charged with the protection of the rights and liberties of the citizens against oppression from the officers of Government under the sanction of law; unawed by the power which the officer may possess, or the dignified station he may fill, complete justice may be expected at their hands. The accused is called upon before the same tribunal, and in many instances, before the same men, who sanctioned his official elevation, to answer for abusing the powers with which he had been intrusted. Men who are presumed to have had a favorable opinion of him once are to be his judges; no inferior or coordinate tribunal is to decide on his case, which might from motives of jealousy or interest be prejudiced against him and wish his removal. No, sir; his judges, without the shadow of temptation to influence their conduct, are placed beyond the reach of suspicion.

The next provision in the Constitution declares that judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

Here the Constitution seems to make an evident distinction between such misdemeanors as would authorize a removal from office, and disqualification to hold any office, and such as are criminal, in the ordinary sense of the word, in courts of common law, and punishable by indictment. So far as the offense committed is injurious to society, only in consequence of the power reposed in the officer being abused in the exercise of his official functions, it is inquirable into only by impeachment, and punishable only by removal from office and disqualification to hold any office; but so far as the offense is criminal, independent of the office, it is to be tried by indictment, and is made punishable according to the known rules of law in courts of ordinary jurisdiction. As, if an officer take a bribe to do an act not connected with his office, for this he is indictable in a court of justice only. Impeachment therefore, according to the meaning of the Constitution, may fairly be considered a kind of inquest into the conduct of an officer, merely as it regards his office; the manner in which he performs the duties thereof; and the effects that his conduct therein may have on society. It is more in the nature of a civil investigation than of a criminal prosecution. And though impeachable offenses are termed in the Constitution high crimes and misdemeanors, they must be such only so far as regards the official conduct of the officer; and even treason and bribery can only be inquired into by impeachment, so far as the same may be considered as a violation of the duties of the officer, and of the oath the officer takes to support the Constitution and laws of the United States, and of his oath of office; and not as to the criminality of those offenses independent of the office. This must be inquired into and punished by indictment.

This position is strongly supported by the mode of proceeding adopted by this honorable court in cases of impeachment. You issue a summons to give notice to the accused of the proceeding against him; you do not consider his personal appearance necessary; you issue no compulsory process to enforce his personal attendance; and you pass sentence, or render judgment on him in his absence. But, in all criminal prosecutions, compulsory process must issue at some stage of it to enforce the defendant's appearance; unless outlawry in England be considered an exception, which, it is believed, is not resorted to in this country, and his personal appearance is considered absolutely necessary; and in almost every case he must be present when sentence is pronounced against him. This construction of the Constitutional provision appears to be absolutely necessary, to avoid the absurd consequence that would arise from a different construction; that of punishing a man twice for the same offense, which could not have been intended by the framers of the Constitution. The nature of the judgment which you are bound to render, and not to exceed, appears also conclusive on this head. You can only remove and disqualify an individual from holding any office of honor, trust, or profit. This can not be considered a criminal punishment; it is merely a deprivation of rights; a declaration that the person is not properly qualified to serve his country. Hence I conceive that, in order to support these articles of impeachment, we are not bound to make out such a case as would be punishable by indictment in a court of law. It is sufficient to show that the accused has transgressed the line of his official duty, in violation of the laws of his country; and that this conduct can only be accounted for on the ground of impure and corrupt motives. We need not hunt down the accused as a criminal, who had committed crimes of the deepest die; and this honorable court are not authorized to inflict a punishment adequate to such crimes, if they had been committed and could be established. With this view of the meaning of the Constitutional provision relative to impeachments, I shall proceed to examine the articles now under consideration, and the evidence given to support them. In the course of this examination, we apprehend it will clearly appear that the whole conduct of the judge in the several transactions, for which charges are alleged against him, had its origin in a corrupt partiality and predetermination unjustly to oppress, under the sanction of legal authority, those who became the objects of his resentment in consequence of differing from him in political sentiments; turning the judicial power, with which he was vested, into an engine of political oppression.

The argument of Mr. Manager Nicholson on the nature of the power of impeachment.

Mr. Manager Nicholson said:[1]

But, sir, there is one principle upon which all the counsel for the accused have relied, upon which they have all dwelt with great force, and to the maintenance of which they have directed all their powers, that we can not assent to; we mean to contend against it, because we believe it to be totally untenable, and because it is of the first importance in the decision of the question now under discussion. We do not contend that, to sustain an impeachment, it is not necessary to show that the offenses charged are of such a nature as to subject the party to an indictment, for the learned counsel have said that the person now accused is not guilty, because the misdemeanors charged against him are not of a nature for which he might be indicted in a court of law.

To show how entirely groundless this position is, I need only pursue that course which has been pointed out to us by the respondent himself and his counsel. I might refer to English authorities of the highest respectability, to show that officers of the British Government have been impeached for offenses not indictable under any law whatever. But I feel no disposition to resort to foreign precedents. In my judgment, the Constitution of the United States ought to be expounded upon its own principles, and that foreign aid ought never to be called in. Our Constitution was fashioned after none other in the known world, and if we understand the language in which it is written, we require no assistance in giving it a true exposition. As we speak the English language, we may, indeed, refer to English authorities for definitions, as we should refer to English dictionaries for the meaning of English words; but upon this, as upon all occasions, where the principles of our Government are to be developed, I trust that the Constitution of the United States will stand upon its own foundation, unsupported by foreign aid, and that the construction given to it will be, not an English construction, but one purely and entirely American.

The Constitution declares that "the judges both of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their commissions during good behavior." The plain and correct inference to be drawn from this language is, that a judge is to hold his office so long as he demeans himself well in it; and whenever he shall not demean himself well, he shall be removed. I therefore contend that a judge would be liable to impeachment under the Constitution, even without the insertion of that clause which declares, that "all civil officers of the United States shall be removed for the commission of treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors." The nature of the tenure by which a judge holds his office is such that, for any act of misbehavior in office, he is liable to removal. These acts of misbehavior may be of various kinds, some of which may, indeed, be punishable under our laws by indictment; but there may be others which the lawmakers may not have pointed out, involving such a flagrant breach of duty in a judge, either in doing that which he ought not to have done, or in omitting to do that which he ought to have done, that no man of common understanding would hesitate to say he ought to be impeached for it.

The words "good behavior" are borrowed from the English laws, and if I were inclined to rest this case on English authorities, I could easily show that, in England, these words have been construed to mean much more than we contend for. The expression durante se bene gesserit, I believe, first occurs in a statute of Henry VIII, providing for the appointment of a custos rotulorum, and clerk of the peace for the several countries in England. The statute recites, that ignorant and unlearned persons had, by unfair means, procured themselves to be appointed to these offices, to the great injury of the community, and provides that the custos shall hold his office until removed, and the clerk of the peace shall hold his office durante se bene gesserit. The reason for making the tenure to be during good behavior was that the office had been held by incapable persons, who were too ignorant to discharge the duties; and it was certainly the intention of the legislature that such persons should be removed whenever their incapacity was discovered. Under this statute, therefore, I think it clear that the officer holding his office during good behavior might be removed for any improper exercise of his powers, whether arising from ignorance, corruption, passion, or any other cause. To this extent, however, we do not wish to go. We do not charge the judge with incapacity. His learning and his ability are acknowledged on all hands; but we charge him with gross impropriety of conduct in the discharge of his official duties, and as he can not pretend ignorance we insist that his malconduct arose from a worse cause.

If, however, a judge were not made liable to removal, from the very nature of the tenure by which he holds his office, we still insist that every judge conducting himself improperly in office comes under that clause of the Constitution which declares that "the President, Vice-President, and civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

We do not mean to contend against a positiou which one of the learned counsel took so much pains to prove, that the word "high" applies as well to misdemeanors as to crimes; nor do we deem it important at this time to inquire whether a civil officer of the United States can be removed for offenses not committed in the discharge of his official duties. It will be time enough to make this inquiry when the case presents itself. At present we aver that the party charged has been guilty of a high misdemeanor in office, and that he ought to be removed for it.

Here, however, we are met by being told, that although his conduct may have been improper, yet that he is not liable to impeachment, unless the offense is of such a nature as that he might be indicted for it in a court of law.

If this be true, as it relates to a judge, the Constitution, to be consistent with itself, must make it universally true; and yet, if the doctrine be admitted, the Constitution will be found to be at variance with itself. Treason is an offense which may or may not be committed in the discharge of official duty, and no doubt the party committing it may be indicted. Bribery is an offense for which a judge may be indicted in the courts of the United States, because an act of Congress makes provision for it, and declares the punishment; but there is no law by which any other officer of the United States can be indicted for bribery. If, therefore, the President of the United States should accept a bribe, he certainly can not be indicted for it, and yet no man can doubt that he might be impeached. If one of the heads of Departments should undertake to recommend to office for pay, he certainly might be impeached for it, and yet, I would ask, under what law, and in what court could he be indicted?

To this, perhaps, it might be answered, that bribery is one of those offenses for which the Constitution expressly provides that the officer may be impeached. This is true; but let us proceed further, and inquire whether there are not other offenses for which an officer may be impeached, and for which he can not be indicted?

If a judge should order a cause to be tried with eleven jurors only, surely he might be impeached for it, and yet I believe there is no court in which he could be indicted. You, Mr. President, as Vice-President of the United States, together with the Secretary of the Treasury, the Chief Justice, and the Attorney-General, as commissioners of the sinking fund, have annually at your disposal $8,000,000, for the purpose of paying the national debt. If, instead of applying it to this public use, you should divert it to another channel, or convert it to your own private uses, I ask if there is a man in the world who would hesitate to say that you ought to be impeached for this misconduct? And yet there is no court in this country in which you could be indicted for it. Nay, sir, it would amount to nothing more than a breach of trust, and would not be indictable under the favorite common law.

But, sir, this ground, which was so strenuously fought for, will probably be abandoned, and instead of our adversaries maintaining that the offense must be of an indictable nature, they will, like one of the honorable counsel (Mr. Harper), go a step back and say that it must be a breach of some known positive law. Thus they will endeavor to shelter their client by saying that there is no act of Congress declaring it illegal for a judge to deliver his opinion on the law before counsel have been heard, or to make political harangues from the bench.

There are offenses for which an officer may be impeached, and against which there are no known positive laws. It is possible that the day may arrive when a President of the United States, having some great political object in view, may endeavor to influence the legislature by holding out threats or inducements to them. A treaty may be made which the President, with some personal view, may be extremely anxious to have ratified. The hope of office may be held out to a Senator; and I think it can not be doubted, that for this the President would be liable to impeachment, although there is no positive law forbidding it. Again, sir, a Member of the Senate or of the House of Representatives may have a very dear friend in office, and the President may tell him unless you vote for my measures your friend shall be dismissed. Where is the positive law forbidding this, yet where is the man who would be shameless enough to rise in the face of the country and defend such conduct, or be bold enough to contend that the President could not be impeached for it?

It was said by one of the counsel that the offense must be a breach either of the common law, a State law, or a law of the United States, and that no lawyer would speak of a misdemeanor, but as an act violating some one of these laws. This doctrine is surely not warranted, for the Government of the United States have no concern with any but their own laws. In a State court, I would speak of a misdemeanor as an offense against a State law; in the courts of the United States, I would speak of it as an offense against an act of Congress; but, sir, as a member of the House of Representatives, and acting as a manager of an impeachment before the highest court in the nation, appointed to try the highest officers of the Government, when I speak of a misdemeanor, I mean an act of official misconduct, a violation of official duty, whether it be a proceeding against a positive law, or a proceeding unwarranted by law.

If the objection that the offense must be of an indictable nature, or against some positive law, means anything, it must be that the misconduct for which a judge or any other officer may be impeached, is either made punishable by, or is a violation of an act of Congress, for we are not to be regulated either by the common law or a State law. What, then, would be the result? I have pointed out several instances of gross misconduct in violation of no act of Congress, and yet under this doctrine he is to be permitted to pursue his wicked courses until every possible offense is defined by statute. This, too, would teach us that we have done wrong heretofore, for at the last session a judge was impeached and removed from office for drunkenness and profane swearing on the bench, although there is no law of the United States forbidding them. Indeed, I do not know that there is any law punishing either in New Hampshire, where the offense was committed. It was said by one of the counsel that these were indictable offenses. I, however, do not know where; certainly not in England. Drunkenness is punishable there by the ecclesiastical authority, but the temporal magistrate never had any power over it until it was given by a statute of James I, and even then the power was not to be exercised by the courts, but only by a justice of the peace, as is now the case in Maryland, where a small fine may be imposed.

But the attorney-general of Maryland (Mr. Martin) admits that offenses may be of so heinous a nature that their punishment carries infamy with them, and that, though not committed in the discharge of official duty, yet if against a State law, the party may be impeached and removed from office. This, though not very material to the present question, may serve us in showing how inapplicable the doctrine is, that the offense must be against a State law or the common law. I will suppose that in New Hampshire there is no law punishing profane swearing. In Maryland a magistrate is authorized to impose a fine of 33 cents, and if this is not paid instantly the offender may be put in the pillory and receive thirty-nine lashes. The punishment is infamous, and if inflicted on a judge, according to the idea of this gentleman, he is to be impeached and removed from office. If the same offense is committed in New Hampshire, the judge is not to be removed, not because he has been guilty of a lighter offense, but because there is no State law punishing it. If, then, the State law is to be made the criterion, a judge in Maryland is to be removed from office for that which he might do with impunity in another State.

To carry this idea a little further: There was once in the State of Connecticut, and may be yet for aught I know, a celebrated code called the Blue Laws. Under the provisions of this code, I believe it is a fact that a captain of a ship was tied up and publicly whipped, because, on returning from a long voyage, he met his wife on a Sunday at the front door and kissed her. This was deemed a high offense, and was ignominiously punished. Now, if we are to be governed by the State laws, I trust the Blue Laws of Connecticut will be rejected, and that our grave judges may be allowed to kiss when and where they please, as to their wisdom shall seem meet, without incurring the pains and penalties of an impeachment. This, sir, may be somewhat ludicrous, but I hope it is not, therefore, the less illustrative of the absurdity of the doctrine contended for. It has been said that the offenses for which a judge or other officer is to be impeached ought to be defined by act of Congress. This is impossible. Such is the multiplicity of passions that sway the human heart, such is the variety of human action, that a code of laws never did and never can exist in which all human offenses are defined. The Constitution is sufficiently definite when it declares that a judge shall hold his office during good behavior, and that all civil officers shall be removed for high crimes and misdemeanors. The law of good behavior is the law of truth and justice. It is confined to no soil and to no climate. It is written on the heart of man in indelible characters, by the hand of his Creator, and is known and felt by every human being. He who violates it violates the first principles of law. He abandons the path of rectitude, and by not listening to the warning voice of his conscience, he forsakes man's best and surest guide on this earth. The best and ablest judge will often err in mere matters of law, but as to principles of duty, in discharging acts of common justice to his fellow-men, he can never err so long as he follows conscience as his guide, and suffers justice to be the only object which he has in view.

The argument of Mr. Manager Rodney on the nature of the power of impeachment.

Mr. Manager Rodney, at greater length, discussed this question:[1]

We have been told by that able lawyer, the attorney-general of Maryland, that a judge can not be impeached for any offense which is not indictable; nor, indeed, for an indictable offense, unless it be a high crime or misdemeanor; and not even for a high crime or misdemeanor, except such as stamp infamy on the character and brand the soul with corruption. A variety of cases have been put to explain his ideas. The law books and the Constitution have been relied on to support those positions, which it becomes my duty to examine. Without troubling you to remove the lumber of the books, let me call your attention, in the first place, to the Constitution. The Constitution shall be my text. I think I shall be able to demonstrate that, in order to render an offense impeachable, it is not necessary that it should be indictable. But, I will go further and prove that, agreeably to the learned counsel's own principles, Judge Chase has committed indictable offenses. Taking his own explanation of crimes and misdemeanors, and recurring to his authority, I will prove that, within the strictest terms of the definition on which he relies, Judge Chase is guilty, not merely of misdemeanors in the various acts of judicial misbehavior, but of aggravated crimes against the express language of the laws and the positive provisions of the Constitution.

In adverting to the Constitution, when looking at one part, we should take a view of the whole instrument to fix the proper construction. In examining any provision, we should consider the bearing and tendencies of all the rest. By adopting this rule we shall preserve order and harmony throughout the system.

The first place in which the subject of impeachment is mentioned in the Constitution is in the first section of the first article. The language used by those who framed it is, in my humble opinion, too plain to be misconceived, and too clear to be misunderstood: "The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers, and shall have the sole power of impeachment."

This section vests the exclusive authority to impeach in the immediate representatives of the people. The power thus delegated is general and comprehensive. It is not limited to any particular acts or transgressions, but is coextensive with every proper object or subject of impeachment. The House of Representatives is thus constituted, most emphatically, the grand jury of the nation: A high and responsible authority, which, I trust, will always be exercised with prudence and discretion, directed with impartiality and justice. But I do confidently hope that there will ever be found sufficient spirit and firmness to arraign the guilty delinquent, however elevated his station, when the Constitution or laws have been infringed, the tenure of office broken, or its duties violated.

The next passage in order which touches this topic and to which I shall refer is the third section of the same article: "The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside. And no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the Members present."

This clause establishes a tribunal for the trial of impeachments. To the Senate this important trust is wisely confided. It prescribes the manner in which the jurisdiction shall be exercised, directs that the Members shall be under oath or affirmation, and fixes the number necessary to convict. Let us proceed a step further in the path: "Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall, nevertheless, be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law."

The part I have just read contains two very salutary provisions. The first limits the extent of the punishment to be inflicted by the Senate. The second, as a necessary consequence of the former, reserves to the ordinary tribunals of law the right to proceed by indictment. This last provision has been a fruitful source of argument to the learned counsel. They have very ingeniously played upon these terms, and, in the zeal of their imaginations, have fancied that they proved to a demonstration the position, that an offense must be indictable or it is not impeachable. There may be magic in their argument, but I do not perceive there is any logic. The superstructure which they have erected on this basis is easily demolished. From the language of this clause they draw the inference that the framers of the Constitution intended that no person should be impeached for any offense for which he was not liable to be indicted. Is this the fair import of the expressions? The text of this instrument is remarkably free from ambiguity. Clearness, correctness, and precision are its leading characteristics. With a very few exceptions it speaks a language intelligible by all. Had it been the design and wish of the authors of the Constitution that no offenses should be impeachable which were not indictable, they would have declared so in express and positive terms, and left nothing for inference or conjecture. This they have not done, and we may reasonably presume they did not intend to do. They prudently looked into the volume of history, where they saw the shocking purposes to which, in evil times, the power of impeachments had been basely and inhumanly prostituted. They read in those instructive pages the dear-bought lessons of experience, and wisely ordained limits which the authority to punish should not exceed. They fixed a ne plus ultra for the tribunal that they established which their severest judgments should not pass. They knew, at the same time, that crimes might be perpetrated and offenses committed which would demand additional chastisement. The loss of office, and disqualification to hold any in future, the maximum of punishment which they had prescribed, would be very inadequate and bear little proportion to the atrocious guilt which might be incurred. Under the influence of these impressions they reserved to the tribunals established by law the right to inflict the just penalties annexed to this class of cases. Without any intention whatever, when any acts had been committed which manifested an unfitness for office, or when there had been a breach of the tenure by which it was held, by malconduct or misbehavior, to prevent the proceedings by impeachment, although the case might not be such as to warrant any additional punishment at law. This, I apprehend, is the object they had in view, and this is the fair, easy, natural, and obvious sense of the words they have used.

Those conversant with the juridical history of England, or who have studied her political annals, must be sensible of the deplorable situation to which that country has been reduced, at different periods, by the abuse of the power of impeachment. The revengeful exercise of this authority has too often deluged the scaffold with blood. In that country the proceeding by impeachment for any offense supersedes all other modes. The person accused, whether he be acquitted or condemned, can not afterwards be indicted for the same offense, or called to an account before the ordinary tribunals. The former course is a complete bar to the latter. To prevent those consequences flowing from a proceeding by impeachment under the Constitution, those who formed that instrument, at the same time that they limited the punishment, have expressly declared it shall have no effect to bar a trial before the ordinary courts, but that the party shall be liable to indictment and punishment according to law. Without this positive provision, as we are almost as much in the habit of drawing on the Bank of England for law as our merchants are for cash or credit, we might have incorporated a principle into our code totally repugnant to the system. The Constitution has drawn the true line on this subject. From a mere reprimand or temporary suspension, the court may ascend in the scale of punishment to removal and disqualification. But thus far can they go and no farther. They can not pass the Rubicon. If the crime deserves a more exemplary sentence recourse must be had to the ordinary mode of proceeding, and then their judgment is not pleadable in bar to an indictment. By this means adequate punishment may in all cases be inflicted.

In England every person, in a public or private capacity, either as an officer or an individual, is liable to be proceeded against by impeachment. In this country the sphere of impeachment is properly limited. The attorney-general of Maryland has taken a long, tedious, and circuitous march to arrive at this point, which I would readily have yielded without an argument. I do not recollect that any of my colleagues contended for the position that every man in this country, in his individual capacity, might be an object of impeachment. For myself I utterly disclaim the idea. Admitting, as I do, in its fullest extent, this wide distinction between the power delegated by the Constitution and that exercised in England, which embraces every subject of that kingdom, how does it bear on the case or affect the argument? After laboring for a considerable time, and employing all his talents, and that fund of legal knowledge which is inexhaustible, to prove that the House of Representatives can not impeach every citizen indiscriminately, the learned attorney-general has not favored us with any application of his principle to the present cause. It proves certainly one among many other broad lines of difference which exist between the British doctrines on the subject of impeachment and the constitutional provisions of this country. In this respect it adds to the weight of our scale. It shows how cautious we should be in bowing down to British precedents which can not be perfectly applicable. I hope I have satisfied the court that the gentlemen are mistaken in their argument on this part of the Constitution. In the general wreck of their defense I conceive this sinking plank, to which they have clung, can not afford them the most distant prospect of safety. We will now proceed a little further in the broad and plain road of the Constitution, carefully examining the ground on which we move.

By the fourth section of the second article of the Constitution it is provided that "The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

The learned counsel have placed great reliance on this passage to prove that an officer must be guilty, not merely of an indictable offense (as they concede every crime or misdemeanor to be), but must have committed a high crime or high misdemeanor to justify an impeachment. One of the learned gentlemen, to fix the true construction of the terms "or other high crimes and misdemeanors," commented at great length on the expressions. To illustrate the subject his fancy readily formed an objection which with logical accuracy he removed. He demonstrated that, agreeably to the strictest grammatical construction and the nicest propriety of speech, the epithet high was to be considered as prefixed to misdemeanors as well as to crimes. In this manner the phantom which his own imagination raised was laid not by a spell, but by the exertion of his argumentative powers. We would willingly have conceded the point and spared him his labor and his breath. We mean not to cavil about trifles or dispute for straws.

Taking it for granted that he has given the proper construction to a part, let us examine what is the just sense of the whole of this passage. In plain English it commands upon the conviction by impeachment of certain atrocious offenses that the guilty officer shall be removed at all events. Depriving the court thus far of the discretion which they would otherwise have possessed as to the judgment they might pass. Having previously limited, in general cases, the punishment which they might inflict, according to their discretion, by establishing a maximum which they should not exceed in this particular grade of flagrant offenses, they have fixed the sentence which they shall pass. The language of the Constitution is peremptory and imperative. Those convicted of such daring enormities of those high crimes or high misdemeanors must be removed from office, which they have justly forfeited. This is the minimum of punishment to be inflicted. Perhaps those who penned the great charter of the Union apprehended that in evil times some high officer of the United States clothed with power and armed with influence might be proved to have committed the base and detestable crime of bribery, or some other equally great, by evidence too strong and too powerful to be resisted, and in an unfortunate hour, awed by fear or seduced by favor, the constitutional judges would not hurl him at once from the seat which he was unworthy to occupy, but permit him to remain in his station, to the disgrace of the country and to the injury of the people. Hence they were induced to make this wholesome provision which left nothing to the discretion of the judges. But is there a word in the whole sentence which expresses an idea or from which any fair inference can be drawn that no person shall be impeached but for "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors?" It does not pretend to specify the various acts of an officer which may subject him to an impeachment: its whole object is to define and fix the punishment which he shall incur on the commission of particular offenses, which is removal from office. This is the least penalty they can inflict in such cases, and God knows it would be much too little had they not in the former part provided that after stripping the traitorous impostor of the insignia of office and power the ordinary tribunals may add to the constitutional sentence of the Senate the fines or forfeitures imposed by law.

From the most cursory and transient view of this passage I submit with due deference that it must appear very manifest that there are other cases than those here specified for which an impeachment will lay and is the proper remedy. In these particular cases the punishment is ascertained, to wit, removal from office; but in a clause to which I have sometime since adverted it is discretionary. Where was the necessity or use of that, if this defined all the impeachable offenses and specified the punishment?

We must, if possible, give effect to every sentence of this instrument. We must not suppose that its authors made nugatory provisions. The sense and meaning which I have given to their language and the constructions which I have maintained will give force and effect to every word.

The system of impeachment thus understood, and I humbly submit rationally explained, is perhaps as little liable to exception as any branch of the Constitution. It is stripped of those terrible instruments of death and destruction which have made such dreadful havoc and carnage in the ages that have preceded us. We have been benefited by the sanguinary precedents of barbarous times. We have been taught wisdom ourselves by the folly of others. We have improved the advantages we possessed, and thus, according to his own inscrutable ways, has the benevolent Author of our existence brought good out of evil.

In guarding effectually against the cruel and vindictive punishments which the extraordinary tribunal of impeachment might inflict, in the exacerbations of party violence and personal animosity, the fathers of the Constitution took care to provide that a certain grade of offenses should deprive the guilty incumbent of his office, thereby rendering him a harmless object to the community when dispossessed of his abused authority. Nay, they went further. Their wisdom and prudence led them to make a specific declaration that, after being deprived of his power, he should be subject to the legal consequences of his guilt upon trial and conviction before the ordinary tribunals at law. Thus rendering the system perfect and complete.

There is an important provision contained in the Constitution, intimately connected with this subject, to which I now beg leave to refer. It will be found in the first section of the third article:

"The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior."

With this particular part of the Constitution the learned judge must have been more especially acquainted when he accepted of his present office, and must then have expressly accepted it on the terms specified. No man can seriously say that for a judge to continue in the exercise of his authority and the receipt of his salary after any acts of misbehavior is not a violation of this essential provision of the Constitution. He holds his office explicitly and expressly during good behavior. The instant he behaves bad he commits a breach of the tenure by which he holds the possession, and the office becomes forfeited. The people have leased out the authority upon certain specified terms. So long as he complies with them, and not a moment longer, is he entitled to exercise the power which was not intended for his individual advantage, but for their benefit. But, sir, who is to take notice of these acts of misbehavior? How are they to be ascertained, and what shall be considered as such? Are the people in their individual capacity, ipso facto, on the commission of the act to declare the office forfeited, and is a judge then to cease from his labors? Or must it not be officially, or rather judicially, ascertained? This, I conceive, would be the proper mode of procedure. Has the Constitution provided no tribunal for this purpose? I answer it has, most indubitably. By the Constitution the Senate, as the court, and jury, too, in cases of impeachment, has the sole power of removing from offices those who hold them by the tenure of good behavior. If a judge misbehave, he ought to be removed, because agreeably to the plainest provision he has forfeited his right to hold the office. The Constitution having established this single mode of removal, and having declared that a judge shall hold his office only during good behavior, it becomes the duty of the representatives of the people, as the grand inquest of the nation, vested with the general power of impeachment, when they know, of their own knowledge or from the information of their constituents, that acts of misbehavior have been committed, to present the delinquent to this high tribunal, whose powers are competent to inquire into the case and apply the remedy; whose authority is coextensive with the complaint, commensurate with the object, and adequate to the redress of the evil. Shall it be said that it is true the Constitution has declared that a judge shall hold his office no longer than he behaves himself well, and that though he behaves never so ill it has provided no means to turn him out of office if he has the hardihood to remain in his seat? If such a doctrine be contended for, it is too preposterous to receive the sanction of this court. It would render this provision nugatory indeed. It would do more. It would be establishing the principle that whether they behave well or ill they must continue in office, because there was no mode fixed for removing them. This would be the strongest construction that plain language, obvious to the common sense of the most unlettered man, ever received in a court of justice. The method I have pointed out solves all difficulties at once and releases us from every embarrassment on this subject. It makes the Constitution consistent with itself and preserves uniformity throughout all the parts.

The learned counsel were compelled to make a show in maintenance of unsound doctrines to give the appearance of support to positions equally untenable.

I flatter myself that every member of this court is by this time convinced that if a judge misbehave, he should be deprived of his office, because guilty of a breach of the tenure by which it is held; that any acts of misbehavior must be judicially inquired into and ascertained; that the Constitution, having delegated to the House of Representatives exclusively the general power to impeach, acts of misbehavior are proper subjects of impeachment, upon conviction of which the Senate has the authority to remove an officer, and is bound to exercise it. Shall we be told, then, that no matter how gross the acts of judicial misbehavior, or how flagrant the misconduct of a judge, he can not be removed from office, nay, he can not be impeached, unless guilty of treason or bribery or some crime equally great? Sir, it is impossible that the intelligent understandings and the mature judgments of this court could countenance for a moment such an idea.

The terms "during good behavior" appear to have been considered as very vague and indefinite by the learned counsel for the defendant, from the manner in which they have argued the case. When, in the strong, nervous language of my honorable friend, the conduct of the accused has been described in the most appropriate terms in the articles of impeachment, they have treated them with levity, as if they did not understand their import, because they admitted of no serious refutation. The clear explanation of the expression "during good behavior," and the lucid exposition of this passage contained in the charges themselves, they seem unwilling to comprehend. The commentary is as unintelligible as the text. When to such conduct as was never before witnessed in a court of justice is applied the epithet of novel, we have been told by one counsel that the term is too uncertain to be comprehended—no precise idea can be affixed to it, nor is the language sufficiently technical to constitute a criminal charge. When behavior the most rude and contumelious, disgraceful on any occasion, but truly degrading on the bench and unquestionably criminal, because calculated to bring the judiciary into the lowest contempt and to excite universal indignation against the tribunals of the country, is portrayed in the impressive style of truth, the age of captious sophistry or technical bigotry is resorted to for proving there is no sense or meaning in the charge. Upon what an ocean of uncertainty have we embarked when the plainest language is not understood! If sound, solid common sense were to be confounded by technical jargon, the tower of Babel would not present a greater confusion of tongues. Sir, when the gentlemen can not but feel the force of these charges, with what admirable ingenuity do they attempt to evade them! Is this tribunal, say they, to erect itself into a court of honor, or assume the chair of chivalry, and form a scale by which decorum and good manners may be nicely graduated? Is every slight deviation from the line of politeness at an assembly or drawing-room to be marked with accuracy and chastised with severity? The testimony furnishes apt and ready answers to those questions. The learned judge is not arraigned because he does not possess the polished manners of an accomplished gentleman, but for outraging all the rules of decency and decorum by conduct at which the plain sense of every honest man would revolt.

I beg this court seriously to consider whether a judge may not be guilty of acts of misbehavior inferior in criminality to treason or bribery for which he ought to be impeached, though no indictment would lay for the same. When gentlemen talk of an indictment being a necessary substratum of an impeachment I should be glad to be informed in what court it must be supported. In the courts of the United States or in the State courts? If in the State courts, then in which of them? Or, provided it can be supported in any of them, will the act warrant an impeachment? If an indictment must lay in the courts of the United States, in the long catalogue of crimes there are very few which an officer might not commit with impunity. He might be guilty of treason against an individual State, of murder, arson, forgery, and perjury, in various forms, without being amenable to the Federal jurisdiction, and unless he could be indicted before them he could not be impeached. Are we then to resort to the erring data of the different States? In New Hampshire drunkenness may be an indictable offense, but not in another State. Shall a United States judge be impeached and removed for getting intoxicated in New Hampshire, when he may drink as he pleases in another State with impunity? In some States witchcraft is a heinous offense, which subjects the unfortunate person to indictment and punishment; in several other States it is unknown as a crime. A greater variety of cases might be put to expose the fallacy of the principle and to prove how improper it would be for this court to be governed by the practice of the different States. The variation of such a compass is too great for it to be relied on. This honorable body must have a standard of their own, which will admit of no change or deviation. The test by which they will try an impeachment can not be that of indictment. Even in England, to whose practice and whose precedents such constant recourse has been had, the learned counsel have not adduced a single case where a judge of one of their superior courts has been indicted for any malconduct in office. Nay, I believe I may defy them to show an example of the kind. The best authorities tell us they are not subject to indictment, but may be proceeded against by impeachment. They have been impeached, convicted, and punished for giving opinions which they knew to be contrary to law, and for a variety of misdeeds, but never in a solitary instance that I know of have they been indicted. I think I can put so many striking cases of misconduct in a judge for which it must be admitted that an impeachment will lay, though no indictment could be maintained, that the learned counsel themselves must be compelled at length to surrender this post at discretion, without any terms of capitulation. I will not state the case of a judge willfully and designedly neglecting to hold a court on the day prescribed by law, for I am aware of the answer gentlemen would give, that it is an offense against a particular provision. But let use suppose Judge Chase, to comply with the forms of the law at the time appointed, should appear and open the court, and notwithstanding there was pressing business to be done he should proceed knowingly and willfully to adjourn it until the next stated period. He would be guilty of no violation of any positive law for which he might be punished by indictment; but ought he not to be impeached? Suppose he proceeded in the dispatch of business, and from prejudice against one party or favor to his antagonist he ordered on the trial of a cause, though legal grounds are exhibited for postponement. Is this not a proper subject of impeachment? And yet there is no express law infringed. If when the jury return to the bar to give the verdict, he should knowingly receive the verdict of a majority, is there any positive provision by which a jury shall be composed of twelve men and that their decision shall be unanimous? I believe even the learning of that profound lawyer (Mr. Martin), from the reading of laborious years and the indefatigable researches of a life devoted to the pursuit of his profession, could not show any positive provision in the Constitution of the United States or any statute of Congress on the subject. So far from it being originally necessary in civil cases that a jury should be unanimous, the late Judge Wilson (a great and venerable authority), magnum et memorabile nomen, asserts that a majority always decided agreeably to the primary principles of that valuable institution.

Again, there is no man so ignorant as to be insensible to manifest violations of the sanctuary of a court. It was never intended as a stage for the exhibition of pantomimes or plays. Were a judge to entertain the suitors with a farce or a comedy, instead of hearing their causes, and turn a jester or buffoon on the bench, I presume he would subject himself to an impeachment; and yet there is no positive law preventing a court from being converted into a theater or of preferring the buskin to the sock. If he should exhibit a tragic scene, in which an unfortunate fellow-citizen might find himself really no actor in the part which he bore, I presume his conduct would claim the attention of the House of Representatives, as the grand inquest of the nation. It must be unnecessary to multiply examples of misconduct in a judge against the known law of his duty, so manifest at first blush that the most callous conscience can not be insensible to them, not minutely specified and described (for that would be impossible) by particular provision in any legislative act, but all embraced and comprehended in the solemn oath which he takes to perform his duty faithfully and impartially as a judge. As a judge he is bound to execute the laws. Every opinion which he gives and every sentence which he passes must be in conformity to law and be authorized by it. It ought to be the judgment of the law and not his own individual opinion. If he willfully make a decree not sanctioned by law, he is guilty of misbehavior as a judge, for it is a glaring violation of the fundamental principles of his office. I shall have occasion in the course of my argument to advert to judicial opinions delivered by the accused which there was no legislative act to warrant, no precedent to authorize, no principle to sanction, and which the utmost latitude of legal discretion would not justify. In such a case, if this court be satisfied that he acted innocently wrong, that it was an honest error of judgment which led him astray, he will no doubt stand acquitted. But if, from a concurrence of circumstances, they are convinced that he erred through design, from prejudiced and partial motives, though he may not have been corrupted by a bribe, they will consider him as a proper subject of their jurisdiction, and a proper object for the exercise of their authority.

The doctrines of the learned counsel for the defendant would lead to a conclusion which they may not have contemplated, but which the country would feel. Time would fail me to enumerate the different offenses of various grades which a judge might commit, and for which he ought most assuredly to be impeached, though no indictment could be maintained in any of the Federal courts. If their positions were correct, a judge might violate all the Ten Commandments without subjecting himself to impeachment and removal; for I know of no method of removal but through the medium of impeachment. There is no law of the United States prohibiting drunkenness on the bench, or indeed punishing this vice at all, unless we look into the laws of a naval or military court-martial, and yet a judge ought certainly to be removed from office if guilty of habitual intoxication. The use of profane or obscene language by a judge is not expressly proscribed by any act of Congress with which I am acquainted, though if it were forbidden in general terms gentlemen might say with as much propriety as they have done in other cases, in the course of their argument, that every term, considered as such, ought to be enumerated, and yet, I believe, should a judge, in his place, be guilty of taking the name of his God in vain, of cursing and swearing on the bench, or using the obscene language of Billingsgate or St. Giles, he ought to be impeached and removed. The sancity of a court should be preserved unsullied, and the officer displaced who was capable of exhibiting so shocking an example, calculated to destroy all respect for, and confidence in, the judicial establishment of the country, and to corrupt the morals of the nation. But, sir, why need I enlarge on this subject? The counsel for the defendant have appeared at one stage of their argument to possess great respect and deference for precedent. To consider cases solemnly argued or deliberately adjudged as fixing the law so perfectly as to justify a court in absolutely preventing any counsel, even though concerned for a criminal, and that, too, in a capital case, from questioning principles thus established. If precedent will furnish us with a clue to the intricate labyrinth in which they have attempted to involve us, we are in possession of one equal to that of Ariadne

Suffer me again to refer them to the precedent which I cited a few days since. I allude to the case of Judge Addison, in Pennsylvania. One of the counsel (Mr. Martin), for whose legal erudition I feel the greatest respect, has endeavored to impeach the authority of the highest tribunal in that State, and has asked if that decision is to be a precedent for this court? I was the more surprised at this, because his colleague (Mr. Lee) had cited, in the course of his argument, a case from Kirby's Connecticut Reports, decided by Chief Justice Ellsworth and his associates. I ask, sir, in reply, whether, when a case determined in one of the ordinary courts of Connecticut has been produced by the opposite counsel as entitled to consideration, the decision of the senate of Pennsylvania, the highest court of criminal judicature in that Commonwealth, ought not to be respected. Permit me to add that, in my humble opinion, there is as much propriety in referring to such examples as in recurring to British precedents. I have said, and with increasing confidence I repeat it, that this case, under the constitution of Pennsylvania, is emphatically stronger than the present, under the Constitution of the United States, on the much-litigated question whether a judge can be impeached for any act for which he can not be indicted. In the constitution of Pennsylvaina, article 5 and section 2, there is a provision not to be found in the Constitution of the United States, by which a judge, for any reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient ground for impeachment, may be removed by the governor, on the address of two-thirds of each branch of the legislature. This provision would seem to be intended to meet the distinction which the learned counsel have labored to establish. In this light Judge Addison himself on his trial considered it, and pressed the point most forcibly on the senate of Pennsylvania. He had the strongest interest in so doing. If this course had been pursued, he would have merely lost his office, but upon conviction by impeachment he dreaded the disqualification to hold any office which the senate might annex to the judgment of removal. But, sir, this is not the only reason, cogent as it is, for considering the case of Judge Addison particularly applicable to the present. It so happens that we have a decision of the supreme court of Pennsylvania on the very objection which the gentlemen now take, when the conduct of Judge Addison was brought before them previous to his being impeached. If the learned counsel will not give full faith and credit to the determination of the senate of Pennsylvania, perhaps they will admit the authority of her supreme court. I hope this tribunal, at least, will give it equal weight with that of the supreme court of Connecticut. A very correct account of the case will be found in the statement of the attorney-general on the trial of Judge Addison, taken in connection with a printed report of the case, which was produced by Mr. Dallas on that occasion. I will not detain this honorable court with reading all which is there recorded on this subject, but will refer to pages 51, 52, 64, and 69 of Addison's trial, and endeavor to present them an accurate view of the case.

On the ground of an application filed by J. B. C. Lucas, then an associate judge of the same court in which Judge Addison presided, stating that Judge Addison, on a particular occasion, after having delivered a charge to the grand jury himself, had prevented Judge Lucas from addressing them, by ordering a constable to be sworn and the jury to be taken from the box, the attorney-general moved for leave to file an information against Mr. Addison.

The attorney-general made two points: First, that Judge Lucas had an equal right with the presiding judge to deliver a charge to the grand jury, on principle and authority. The chief justice, Shippen, immediately observed that it was unnecessary to speak to that point or to read authorities; "speak to the second point—Is this conduct the subject of an information?"

After the argument was closed, the opinion of the court (Judge Breckenridge taking no part) was delivered by the chief justice, who stated that the proceeding was arbitrary, unbecoming, unhandsome, ungentlemanly, unmannerly, and improper, but "but that it was not indictable, nor the subject of an information," and that there was another remedy, referring no doubt to an impeachment; for the attorney-general states, in page 52, "That from what fell from the judges of the supreme court, when the case was before them, it might be easily inferred that impeachment was the proper mode to correct the evil complained of."

Thus we have the solemn adjudication of the supreme court that conduct in a judge may be impeachable, though no indictment can be maintained for it. We could not have formed for ourselves a precedent more apposite.

An impeachment was accordingly presented against Judge Addison by the constitutional authority to the senate of Pennsylvania. Pardon me for trespassing so much on your time as to read distinctly the articles, in order to put this court in possession of the whole case:

"ARTICLE 1. That the said Alexander Addison, being duly appointed and commissioned president of the several courts of common pleas, in the circuit consisting of the said counties of Westmoreland, Fayette, Washington, and Allegheny, within the territory of the said Commonwealth, while acting as president of the said court of common pleas of the said county of Allegheny, on Saturday, the 28th day of March, in the year of our Lord 1801, in open court of common pleas, then and there holden, in and for the county last aforesaid, did, after John Lucas, otherwise John B. C. Lucas, also duly appointed and commissioned one of the judges of the court of common pleas of the county last aforesaid, had, in his official character and capacity of judge as aforesaid, and as of right he might do, addressed a petit jury, then and there duly impaneled, and sworn or affirmed, respectively, as jurors, in a cause then pending, then and there, openly declare and say to the said jury, 'that the address delivered to them by the said John Lucas, otherwise John B. C. Lucas, had nothing to do with the question before them, and that they ought not to pay any attention to it;' thereby degrading or endeavoring to degrade and vilify the said John Lucas, otherwise John B. C. Lucas, and his character and office as aforesaid, to the obstruction of the free, impartial, and due administration of justice, and contrary to the public rights and interests of this Commonwealth.

"ART. 2. That the said Alexander Addison, being duly appointed and commissioned president as aforesaid, did, at a court of quarter sessions of the peace and court of common pleas, holden in and for the county of Allegheny aforesaid, on Monday, the 22d day of June, in the year of our Lord, 1801, under the pretense of discharging and performing his official duties as president aforesaid, unjustly, illegally, and unconstitutionally claim, usurp, and exercise authority not given or delegated to him by the constitution and laws of this Commonwealth, inasmuch as he, the said Alexander Addison, president as aforesaid, did, under pretense as aforesaid of discharging and performing his official duties, then and there, in time of open court, unjustly, illegally, and unconstitutionally stop, threaten, and prevent the said John Lucas, otherwise John B. C. Lucas, also duly appointed and commissioned one of the judges of the said courts, from addressing, as of right he might do, a grand jury of the said county of Allegheny, then and there assembled and impaneled, and sworn or affirmed, respectively, concerning their rights and duties as grand jurymen, thereby abusing and attempting to degrade the high offices of president and judge as aforesaid, to the denial and prevention of public right, and of the due administration of justice, and to the evil example of all others in the like case offending."

You have now a clear and comprehensive view of the grounds on which the impeachment was supported. The first charge accuses Judge Addison of speaking, in terms very unjustifiable for a president of a court, of an address delivered to a petit jury by his associate, Judge Lucas. The language which he used, and the manner in which it was proved to have been delivered, are equally exceptionable. His conduct was rude, ungentlemanly, and utterly inconsistent with that decorum and respect which should be inculcated and practiced on the bench, to preserve the credit and the character of a court of justice. Its object and tendency was to deter Mr. Lucas from exercising his judgment and expressing his opinion from the bench, and to reduce him to a perfect cipher.

The other charge was for preventing Judge Lucas from addressing a grand jury. This was effected in the same rude and insolent manner, as will appear from the testimony of Judge Lucas himself, in pages 33 and 37 of the printed trial.

To support the first article, I believe it would not be possible to find any positive act or special provision prescribing what particular language a president of a court may use, and what he shall not, in reference to the opinion which an associate justice may have delivered. There is no legal barometer for weighing words, nor any particular law embracing all the variety of cases of lighter and darker shades which may occur. The learned counsel who supported the prosecution did not cite a single precedent, even, of the kind. There may have been a law to be found in the breast of every man of common sense and common manners, with which Judge Addison was not unacquainted, and upon which the Senate considered themselves perfectly justified in convicting him. This was the general, but clear and comprehensive law which marked his rights and duties as a judge—the law of his office, prescribed by his oath.

The second article, for preventing an associate judge from delivering a charge to the grand jury after they had received one from the president of the court, could not have been maintained on the ground of any express statute or legal usage. It is the first time I ever heard of such a case. The uniform practice in the courts to which I have been accustomed is for the chief justice or president to deliver the charge. This was more especially the case in the court in which Judge Addison presided, for it appears they had adopted a positive rule on the subject. The practice of a court of justice is generally considered as the law of that court. But the senate, believing on principle (and believing correctly) that the power of all the judges of the court was equal, pronounced a sentence of condemnation.

With these plausible circumstances to countenance him, Judge Addison, a gentleman of considerable celebrity both in the legal and political world, and of unquestionable talents, conducted his own defense. His principal reliance was on the very objection which the learned counsel for the present defendant now make. He contended that he had committed no act for which he was liable to indictment, and that he was, therefore, not subject to impeachment. In the position that his conduct was not indictable, he was supported by the opinion of the supreme court, who had, nevertheless, considered it a fit subject for impeachment. His argument was able and ingenious; but, sir, his objection was anticipated or answered in such a masterly manner, by a chain of reasoning so irresistible, that it produced complete conviction on the minds of the senate of Pennsylvania. This honorable court know the result. He has been not only removed, but disqualified to hold the office of judge in any court of law in that State. We have, then, the deliberate opinion of the senate of Pennsylvania, upon solemn argument, confirming the decision made by her supreme court. If these cases do not furnish us with lessons of instruction, I know not where such lessons are to be read.

I will remark, sir, further, in relation to this case, that had it not been for the extreme anxiety of Judge Addison to propagate his political dogmas from the bench, he would never have been reduced to this serious dilemma. Like the defendant, he converted the sacred edifice of justice into a theater for the dissemination of doctrines to which I hope I shall never subscribe. If I have a desire relative to the administration of justice, paramount to all others, it is that party and party spirit should be banished from every court. My sincere and fervent prayer is that the laws, like the providence of God, may shed their protecting influence equally over all, without respect to persons or opinions.

I have been requested by the attorney-general of Maryland to state another and a recent case which has happened in Pennsylvania. For his satisfaction I will briefly inform this honorable court of all that took place on that occasion, in the least degree applicable to the present trial. Three of the judges of their supreme court were accused of fining and imprisoning, without the intervention of a jury, a fellow-citizen, for publishing a paper which they considered as a contempt of court. The judges were defended by two most able and eloquent counsel, who contended that the constitution, the laws, and the practice of Pennsylvania, by adopting the common law doctrines on the subject, justified the proceeding; and that if there was no law to justify it, their conduct flowed from an honest error in judgment, for which they were not liable to impeachment. But, sir, they did not attempt to maintain the position contended for on this occasion, that to support an impeachment the conduct of a judge must be such as to subject him to an indictment. Nor could they, with any consistency, have supported such a doctrine, for their clients had before in the case of Mr. Addison decided that his conduct was not a proper subject of impeachment though it might be of indictment.

This precedent, then, fortifies the former decisions on this point, and adds another authority to those which previously existed, and to which I have adverted.

The judges were acquitted, I acknowledge, and were I to hazard an opinion, I would say because some of the members of the senate of Pennsylvania thought their conduct proceeded from an honest error of judgment. If this court shall be of the same opinion with respect to the conduct of Judge Chase, I trust they will follow the precedent and acquit him, and I shall cheerfully acquiesce in the decision.

I fear I shall fatigue this honorable court by noticing the various cases on this subject, but I can not omit pressing on their attention a decision of the most authoritative and binding nature, because it is one of their own. The case to which I allude and its attending circumstances must be fresh in the recollection of every Member of the Senate. The district judge of New Hampshire was impeached for habitual drunkenness on the bench, and for using profane and indecent language. It was not in evidence to the court that drunkenness or profane and indecent language were indictable by any law of that State. There is no law of the United States, unless we recur to the naval or military code, punishing these vices as offenses. Of course, sir, it was not pretended by the managers on that occasion, of whom I had the honor to be one, that any indictment could be maintained against Judge Pickering in any civil court of the United States, or of the individual State of which he was a citizen. I appeal to your recollection, sir, for the accuracy of this statement; and, let me ask, what was the result? A constitutional majority of the senate pronounced a verdict of guilty and passed a judgment of removal.

One of the counsel (Mr. Harper), of whose argument I may be permitted to observe, without disparagement to the talents and learning of his colleagues, that it contained an able and masterly defense of the conduct of the accused, sunk beneath the weight of this stubborn and conclusive precedent. It was a stumbling block which he could not remove out of his way, and he seemed compelled, reluctantly, to yield the principle to the decisive authority and pointed application of the case.

We have, then, the whole weight of American authority in our scale, whilst the learned counsel have not been able to adduce a single precedent, foreign or domestic, against us. When I speak of precedents, I do not allude to the obscure dicta which may be found by turning over the dark lantern of tradition in remote ages of antiquity, or to the interpolations which may be scattered through the marginal references to the abridgments, by unknown editors; but to some authoritative case which has occurred since the regular date of parliamentary impeachments. The fines which Edward I imposed on some of his judges, in what manner is not certainly known, to replenish, as many have supposed, an exhausted treasury, are familiar to every student. But from the period of impeachment to the present time, I believe no instance of an indictment can be shown against a judge of the Common Pleas, Exchequer, or King's Bench in England, nor against a Lord Keeper or Lord Chancellor, who hold their offices to this day, let it be remembered, during pleasure. The civil business of the Court of Chancery is more important than that of all the other courts, and the decisions of that tribunal have been as impartial I believe as any, notwithstanding the high sounding doctrines of judicial independence. There have been many impeachments, the judges have sometimes been complained of by information in the execrable Star Chamber, but there have been no indictments at law. The Star Chamber has been long since abolished, and the sole method of proceeding against judges of the superior court now is by impeachment. The best writers agree, "that judges of record are freed from all presentations whatever, except in Parliament, where they may be punished for anything done by them in such courts as judges." Numerous authorities might be cited on this subject, but I shall content myself with barely referring to them.—1 Hawk., 192, chap. 73, sec. 6; 1 Salk., 396; Woodeson, 596; Jacob's Law Dictionary, title Judges, 12 Co., 25, 26.

Were I to rest the point here, I confidently believe we should be perfectly safe; but I will proceed further, agreeably to my engagement in the commencement of my argument, and demonstrate that, according to their own principles and authorities, Judge Chase has been guilty of crimes and misdemeanors, in the strictest technical sense of the terms, for which he ought to be punished in an exemplary manner.

In contesting the principles that no act is impeachable unless it also be indictable, I have not contended for the position attributed to me by the learned attorney-general of Maryland, that a judge may be impeached for conduct which is not criminal. On the contrary, we rely on supporting this as a criminal proceeding, and the gentlemen are entitled to every advantage which they can reap from this declaration.

I have had occasion to state that I considered every act of misbehavior in a judge as a misdemeanor, and the attorney-general of Maryland has expressed in strong terms his perfect agreement in the opinion that misbehavior is synonymous with misdemeanor. He appeared to imagine that he gained a great advantage by making this concession, and I am content to give him the full benefit to be derived from it. I shall not shrink from the position, but meet the gentleman with pleasure and confidence on this ground. I love to break a lance in the open field of discussion, and disdain every kind of ambush in argument.

As we agree in one point, that misbehavior and misdemeanor are convertible terms, Jacob's Law Dictionary, which quotes the language of Judge Blackstone in his Commentaries, has been recurred to for a definition of a misdemeanor. Let us try the conduct Judge Chase by his text. "A crime or misdemeanor (says Judge Blackstone) is an act committed or omitted, in violation of a public law either forbidding or commanding it." "This general definition comprehends both crimes and misdemeanors, which properly speaking are mere synonymous terms."

There is a public law that prescribes the following oath which Judge Chase took on his entrance into office (1 vol., p. 53): "I do solemnly swear that I will administer justice without respect to persons, and do equal right to the poor and the rich, and that I will faithfully and impartially perform all the duties incumbent on me as a judge of the Supreme Court according to the best of my abilities and understanding, agreeably to the Constitution and laws of the United States."

Who that reads this solemn and impressive provision, and looks at the plenary evidence we have before us, can hesitate to pronounce the respondent guilty of violating a public law, which he was bound by the most sacred of all human obligation to execute with fidelity? His oath informed him that the law, like the gospel, was no respecter of persons, and yet what have we beheld in his conduct, when a poor unfortunate Fries or a wretched Callender was before him, upon a criminal charge? I appeal to the testimony which I shall by and by comment upon, whether his acts do not prove that he marked them out as victims to be sacrificed on the altar of party? Sir, I can not believe that gentlemen will seriously contend that the expressions "faithfully and impartially to perform his duties," have no definite meaning; that conduct grossly prejudiced, and the most shameless partiality shall be considered as no violations of his solemn oath. If they did, I have too exalted an opinion of the good sense and discernment of the court to believe they would countenance such an idea. Their import is certainly plain and obvious without recurring to the black-lettered lore for explanation. What then was the conduct of the respondent to Fries, if testimony not only unimpeached but unimpeachable is to be believed? Was he not prejudiced both against the unhappy prisoner and his case, which he had from a superabundance of zeal completely prejudged? Or, sir, when he declared Callender ought to be hung and set off with his miserable pamphlet in his pocket, ready scored for his purpose, and proceeded in the most arbitrary manner with his trial, was he impartial, or was he not guilty of the most manifest and daring partiality? Shall he be guilty of all these outrages against the plain language of a public statute, which combines the obligation of an oath with the sanction of a law, and yet be innocent of any crime or misdemeanor? If gentlemen will hold up the acts of Congress in one hand, and the acts of Judge Chase, proved by the testimony, in the other, they will see and be satisfied, that within the strictest legal definition he has been guilty of repeated and aggravated violations of public law, and therefore unquestionably of crimes and misdemeanors.

The Constitution, however, is declared to be emphatically the supreme law of the land. This sacred nstrument he was bound by a twofold oath to preserve inviolate. All executive and judicial officers of the United States, independent of their oaths of office, are bound by oath to support the Constitution. (Art. 6, sec. 3.)

By the seventh article of the amendments of the Constitution, which have been duly ratified and therefore now form part of that instrument, it is declared, that "In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law; and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor: and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense."

This article secures to every accused individual the right of a trial by an impartial jury. Without their unanimous consent, no matter how eager the Government are for conviction, no person can be punished. Where any man is charged in due form with the commission of a crime, and pleads he is not guilty, the jury are to decide on the whole case whether he be innocent or not. Their verdict must be commensurate with the issue joined, which involves both fact and law, which they have indubitably the right to decide, agreeably to the express and positive provision of the Constitution. This right, therefore, is an original right, flowing from the highest authority. It is beyond doubt a principle and not an incidental right. It is not a right incidental to the trial, but it constitutes the trial itself; for there can be no other trial in the case but by jury.

This same amendment guarantees to the accused the assistance of counsel. How important is this privilege, when it is recollected that veterans of the bar are generally selected to prosecute. The situation, too, of an innocent man, charged with the commission of a crime, is delicate and embarrassing. It excites frequently apprehensions which unfit him for making a defense. I feel myself compelled to declare, upon the authority of the testimony in this case, that the respondent has been proved guilty of violating the supreme law of the land in those great essential provisions. He has deprived accused individuals of a trial by jury, for he wound not suffer the jury to decide, or even to hear argument on the subject of the law, and he has deprived them of the benefit of counsel by conduct which drove counsel from the bar. This has happened in more than one instance, and above all, an injured fellow-citizen has been stripped of his invaluable privileges in a capital case. Is this imagination or is it reality? Let the recorded testimony determine. If, however, I am correct, must I not have satisfied this honorable court, agreeably to my promise that taking the learned counsel's own definition, and relying upon his authorities, I have demonstrated that the accused has been guilty of crimes and misdemeanors? But have I not gone further, and shown that he has been guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, and such as disqualify him for a seat on the bench, so as to come fully within the rule which he has laid down?

God forbid that it should be said, when a judge is guilty of grossly violating not merely a public law, but the supreme law of the land, nay, a law which he was bound by two solemn oaths to support, he is not guilty of any crime or misdemeanor; or that when he violated this supreme law which he is thus obligated to respect, for the purpose of depriving a fellow-citizen, accused of a capital crime, of the benefit of counsel, and the inestimable right of trial by jury, he shall not be declared guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, which evince a want of integrity, and mark a depravity of heart that completely disqualify him for a judicial office.

I have now finished my observations in reply to the preliminary objections which have been made to this mode of proceeding, and have been reluctantly compelled to discuss them at much greater length than I at first contemplated, from the zeal and pertinacity with which they have been urged and insisted on by the learned counsel opposed to us. Under the impression that I have been successful in this undertaking, I shall hasten to the investigation of the articles themselves.

The argument of Mr. Manager Randolph on the nature of the power of impeachment.

And Mr. Manager Randolph said:[1]

It has been contended that an offense, to be impeachable must be indictable. For what then, I pray you, was it that this provision of impeachment found its way into the Constitution? Could it not have said, at once, that any civil officer of the United States, convicted on an indictment, should (ipso facto) be removed from office? This would be coming at the thing by a short and obvious way. If the Constitution did not contemplate a distinction between an impeachable and an indictable offense, whence this cumbrous and expensive process, which has cost us so much labor, and so much anxiety to the nation? Whence this idle parade, this wanton waste of time and treasure, when the ready intervention of a court and jury alone was wanting to rectify the evil? In addition to the instances adduced by my right worthy friend (Mr. Nicholson) who first addressed the court yesterday, permit me to cite a few others by way of illustration. The President of the United States has a qualified negative on all bills passed by the two Houses of Congress, that he may arrest the passage of a law framed in a moment of legislative delirium. Let us suppose it exercised, indiscriminately, on every act presented for his acceptance.

[1] Annals, pp. 642, 643.

This surely would be an abuse of his constitutional power, richly deserving impeachment; and yet no man will pretend to say it is an indictable offense. The President is authorized by the Constitution to retain any bill presented for his approbation, not exceeding ten days, Sundays excepted, within which period he may return it to the House wherein it originated, stating his reasons for disapproving it. Now let us suppose that, at a session like the present, which must necessarily terminate on the third of March (and that day falls this year on a Sunday) the President should keep back until the last hour of an expiring Congress every bill offered to him for signature during the ten preceding days (and these are always the greater part of the laws passed at any session of the Legislature), and should then return them, stating his objections, whether good or bad is altogether immaterial. It is true that a vote of two-thirds of each branch may enact a law in despite of Executive opposition; but, in the case I have stated, it would be physically impossible for Congress to exercise its constitutional power. Indeed, over the bills presented to the President within nine days preceding its dissolution, the Legislature might be deprived of even the shadow of control, since the Executive is not bound to make any return of them whatever. Now, I ask whether such misconduct in the President be an indictable offense? And yet is there a man who hears me who will deny that it would be a flagrant abuse, under pretense of exercise of his constitutional authority, for which he ought to be impeached, removed, and disqualified? Sir, this doctrine, that impeachable and indictable are convertible terms, is almost too absurd for argument. Nothing but the high authority by which it is urged, and the dignified theater where it is advanced, could induce me to treat it seriously. Strip it of technical jargon, and what is it but a monstrous pretension that the officers of Government, so long as they steer clear of your penal statutes—so long as they keep without the letter of the law—may, to the whole length of the tether of the Constitution, abuse that power, which they are bound to exercise with a sound discretion and under a high responsibility for the general good? The counsel who closed the defense (Mr. Harper) felt that this ground trembled beneath his feet; and, fearing to be swallowed up in the yawning ruin, he precipitately abandoned it. He shifts from the position taken by his associates, and lays down this principle "that an offense, to be impeachable, need not be indictable, yet it must have been committed against some known law." Well, take the question in this point of view, and there is no longer matter of dispute between us; it is reduced to a miserable quibble. For what do we contend?—that the respondent has contravened the known law of the land and of his duty, which required him "to dispense justice faithfully and impartially, and without respect to persons." He stands charged with having sinned against this law and against his sacred oath, by acting in his judicial capacity unfaithfully, partially, and with respect to persons. These are our points. We do charge him with misdemeanor in office. We aver that he hath demeaned himself amiss—partially, unfaithfully, unjustly, corruptly. This is the sum and substance of our accusation, and this we have established by undeniable proof. I will waste no more time in attempting to dislodge our opponents from a position which they have abandoned in the face of day.

The counsel for Mr. Justice Chase argued elaborately that the power of impeachment applied only to indictable offenses.

Argument of Mr. Joseph Hopkinson, counsel for Mr. Justice Chase, on the nature of the power of impeachment.

On the other hand the counsel for the respondent argued at length that the power should be considered narrower.

Mr. Hopkinson said:[1]

In England the impeachment of a judge is a rare occurrence. I recollect but two in half a century. But, in our country, boasting of its superior purity and virtue, and declaiming ever against the vice, venality, and corruption of the Old World, seven judges have been prosecuted criminally in about two years. A melancholy proof either of extreme and unequaled corruption in our judiciary, or of strange and persecuting times among us.

The first proper object of our inquiries in this case is, to ascertain with proper precision what acts or offenses of a public officer are the objects of impeachment? This question meets us at the very threshold of the case. If it shall appear that the charges exhibited in these articles of impeachment are not, even if true, the constitutional subjects of impeachment; if it shall turn out on the investigation that the judge has really fallen into error, mistake, or indiscretion, yet if he stands acquitted in proof of any such acts as by the law of the land are impeachable offenses, he stands entitled to discharge on his trial. This proceeding by impeachment is a mode of trial created and defined by the Constitution of our country; and by this the court is exclusively bound. To the Constitution, then, we must exclusively look to discover what is or is not impeachable. We shall there find the whole proceeding distinctly marked out; and everything designated and properly distributed necessary in the construction of a court of criminal jurisdiction. We shall find (1) who shall originate or present an impeachment; (2) who shall try it; (3) for what offenses it may be used; (4) what is the punishment on conviction. The first of these points is provided for in the second section of the first article of the Constitution, where it is declared that "the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment." This power corresponds with that of a grand jury to find a presentment or indictment. In the third section of the same article the court is provided before whom the impeachment thus originated shall be tried: "The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments." And the fourth section of the second article points out and describes the offenses intended to be impeachable, and the punishment which is to follow conviction, subject to a limitation in the third section of the first article.

Have any facts, then, been given in evidence against the respondent which makes him liable to be proceeded against by this high process of impeachment? What are the offenses? What is the constitutional description of those official acts for which a public officer may be arraigned before this high court? In the fourth section of the second article of the Constitution it is declared that "the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." Treason or bribery is not alleged against us on this occasion. Our offenses, then, must come under the general description of "high crimes and misdemeanors," or we are not impeachable by the Constitution of the United States. I offer it as a position I shall rely upon in my argument, that no judge can be impeached and removed from office for any act or offense for which he could not be indicted. It must be by law an indictable offense. One of the gentlemen, indeed, who conduct this prosecution (Mr. Campbell), contends for the reverse of this proposition, and holds that for such official acts as are the subject of impeachment no indictment will lie or can be maintained. For, says he, it would involve us in this monstrous oppression and absurdity, that a man might be twice punished for the same offense, once by impeachment and then by indictment. And so most surely he may; and the limitation of the punishment on impeachment takes away the injustice and oppression the gentleman dreads. A slight attention to the subject will show the fallacy of this gentleman's doctrine. If the absurdity and oppression he fears will really ensue on indicting a man for the same offense for which he has already been impeached, they must be charged to the Constitution itself, which, in the third section of the first article, after limiting the extent of the judgment in cases of impeachment, goes on to declare that "the party convicted shall, nevertheless, be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law." The idea of the honorable manager is that for acts done in the course of official duty a judge must be proceeded against exclusively by impeachment; and that no indictment will lie in such case. The incorrectness of this notion appears not only from a reference to the Constitution, but to the known law of England also. I will remind you of a case, stated, I believe, in the elementary books of the law, in which it is said that if a judge undertakes, of his own authority, to change the mode of punishment prescribed by law for any crime, he is indictable; for instance, should he sentence a man to be beheaded when the law directed him to be hanged, the judge is guilty of murder, and may be accordingly indicted. When, sir, I contend, that, in order to sustain an impeachment, an offense must be proved upon the respondent which would support an indictment, I do not mean to be understood as admitting that the converse of the proposition is true—that is, that every act or offense which is impeachable is indictable. Far from it. A man may be indictable for many violations of positive law which evince no mala mens, no corrupt heart or intention, but which would not be the ground of an impeachment. I will instance the case of an assault, which is an indictable offense, but will not surely be pretended to be an impeachable offense, for which a judge may be removed from office. It is true that the second section of the first article, which gives the House of Representatives the sole power of impeachment, does not in terms limit the exercise of that power. But its obvious meaning is not, in that place, to describe the kind of acts which are to be subjects of impeachment, but merely to declare in what branch of the Government it shall commence. The House of Representatives has the power of impeachment; but for what they are to impeach, in what cases they may exercise this delegated power, depends on other parts of the Constitution, and not on their opinion, whim, or caprice. The whole system of impeachment must be taken together, and not in detached parts; and if we find one part of the Constitution declaring who shall commence an impeachment, we find other parts declaring who shall try it, and what acts and what persons are Constitutional subjects of this mode of trial. The power of impeachment is with the House of Representatives—but only for impeachable offenses. They are to proceed against the offense in this way when it is committed, but not to create the offense, and make any act criminal and impeachable at their will and pleasure. What is an offense, is a question to be decided by the Constitution and the law, not by the opinion of a single branch of the legislature; and when the offense thus described by the Constitution or the law has been committed, then, and not until then, has the House of Representatives power to impeach the offender. So a grand jury possesses the sole power to indict; but in the exercise of this power they are bound by positive law, and do not assume under this general power to make anything indictable which they might disapprove. If it were so, we should indeed have a strange, unsettled, and dangerous penal code. No man could walk in safety, but would be at the mercy of the caprice of every grand jury that might be summoned, and that would be crime to-morrow which is innocent to-day.

What part of the Constitution then declares any of the acts charged and proved upon Judge Chase, even in the worst aspect, to be impeachable? He has not been guilty of bribery or corruption; he is not charged with them. Has he then been guilty of "other high crimes and misdemeanors?" In an instrument so sacred as the Constitution, I presume every word must have its full and fair meaning. It is not then only for crimes and misdemeanors that a judge is impeachable, but it must be for high crimes and misdemeanors. Although this qualifying adjective "high" immediately precedes and is directly attached to the word "crimes," yet, from the evident intention of the Constitution and upon a just grammatical construction, it must be also applied to "misdemeanors." The repetition of this adjective would have injured the harmony of the sentence without adding anything to its perspicuity. How would this be in common parlance? Suppose it should be said that at this trial there are attending many ladies and gentlemen. Would it be doubted that the adjective many applies to gentlemen as well as ladies, although not repeated? Or, if there is anything peculiar in this respect in this word "high," I will suppose it were said that among the auditors there are men of high rank and station. Would it not be as well understood as if it were said that men of high rank and station are here? There is surely no difference. So in the Constitution, it is said, that "a regular statement of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time." Is not the account to be regular as well as the statement? I should have deemed it unnecessary to have spent a word on so plain a point, had I not understood that a difficulty would probably be made upon it. If my construction of this part of the Constitution be not admitted, and the adjective "high" be given exclusively to "crimes" and denied to "misdemeanors," this strange absurdity must ensue—that when an officer of the Government is impeached for a crime, he can not be convicted unless it proves to be a high crime; but he may nevertheless be convicted of a misdemeanor of the most petty grade. Observe, sir, the crimes with which these "other high crimes" are classed in the Constitution, and we may learn something of their character. They stand in connection with "bribery and corruption;" tried in the same manner and subject to the same penalties. But if we are to lose the force and meaning of the word "high" in relation to misdemeanors, and this description of offenses must be governed by the mere meaning of the term "misdemeanors," without deriving any grade from the adjective, still my position remains unimpaired, that the offense, whatever it is, which is the ground of impeachment, must be such a one as would support an indictment. "Misdemeanor" is a legal and technical term, well understood and defined in law; and in the construction of a legal instrument we must give to words their legal signification. A misdemeanor or a crime—for in their just and proper acceptation they are synonymous terms—is an act committed or omitted, in violation of a public law either forbidding or commanding it. By this test, let the conduct of the respondent be tried, and, by it, let him stand justified or condemned.

Does not, sir, the court, provided by the Constitution for the trial of an impeachment give us some idea of the grade of offenses intended for its jurisdiction? Look around you, sir, upon this awful tribunal of justice—is it not high and dignified, collecting within itself the justice and majesty of the American people? Was such a court created—does such a court sit—to scan and punish paltry errors and indiscretions, too insignificant to have a name in the penal code, too paltry for the notice of a court of quarter sessions? This is indeed employing an elephant to remove an atom too minute for the grasp of an insect. Is the Senate of the United States solemnly convened and held together in the presence of the nation to fix a standard of politeness in a judge and mark the precincts of judicial decorum? The honorable gentleman who opened the prosecution (Mr. Randolph) has contended for a contrary doctrine, and held that many things are impeachable that are not indictable. To illustrate his position, he stated the cases of habitual drunkenness and profane swearing on the bench, which he held to be objects of impeachment and not of indictment. I do not desire to impose my opinions on this court as of any value. But surely I could not hesitate to say that both of the cases put by the gentleman would be indictable. Is there not known to us a class of offenses, not provided for indeed by the letter of any statute, but which come under the general protection which the law gives to virtue, decency, and morals in society? Any act which is contra bonos mores is indictable as such. And it is so, not by act of Congress, but by the pure and wholesome mandates of that common law which some men would madly drive from our jurisprudence, but which I most sincerely pray may live forever.

If I am correct in my position that nothing is impeachable that is not also indictable, for what acts then may a man be indicted? May it be on the mere caprice or opinion of any ten, twenty, or one hundred men in the community; or must it not be on some known law of the society in which he resides? It must unquestionably be for some offense, either of omission or commission, against some statute of the United States—or some statute of a particular State, or against the provision of the common law. Against which of these has the respondent offended? What law of any of the descriptions I have mentioned has he violated? By what is he to be judged, by what is he to be justified or condemned, if not by some known law of the country; and if no such law is brought upon his case—if no such violation rises on this day of trial in judgment against him—why stands he here at this bar as a criminal? Whom has he offended? The House of Representatives—and is he impeached for this?

I maintain as a most important and indispensable principle, that no man should be criminally accused, no man can be criminally condemned, but for the violation of some known law by which he was bound to govern himself. Nothing is so necessary to justice and to safety as that the criminal code should be certain and known. Let the judge, as well as the citizen, precisely know the path he is to walk in, and what he may or may not do. Let not the sword tremble over his unconscious head, or the ground be spread with quicksands and destruction which appear fair and harmless to the eye of the traveler. Can it be pretended there is one rule of justice for a judge and another for a private citizen; and that while the latter is protected from surprise, from the malice or caprice of any man or body of men, and can be brought into legal jeopardy only by the violation of laws before made known to him, the latter is to be exposed to punishment without knowing his offense, and the criminality or innocence of his conduct is to depend not upon the laws existing at the time, but upon the opinions of a body of men to be collected four or five years after the transaction? A judge may thus be impeached and removed from office for an act strictly legal, when done, if any House of Representatives for any indefinite time after, shall for any reason they may act upon, choose to consider such act improper and impeachable. The Constitution, sir, never intended to lay the Judiciary thus prostrate at the feet of the House of Representatives, the slaves of their will, the victims of their caprice. The Judiciary must be protected from prejudice and varying opinion, or it is not worth a farthing. Suppose a grand jury should make a presentment against a man, stating that most truly he had violated no law or committed any known offense; but he had violated their notions of common sense—for this was the standard of impeachment the gentleman who opened gave us—he had shocked their nerves or wounded their sensibility. Would such a presentment be received or listened to for a moment? No, sir; and on the same principle, no judge should be put in jeopardy because the common sense of one hundred and fifty men might approve what is thus condemned, and the rule of right, the objects of punishment or praise, would thus shift about from day to day. Are we to depend upon the House of Representatives for the innocence or criminality of our conduct? Can they create offenses at their will and pleasure, and declare that to be a crime in 1804 which was an indiscretion or pardonable error, or perhaps an approved proceeding, in 1800? If this gigantic House of Representatives, by the usual vote and the usual forms of legislation, were to direct that any act heretofore not forbidden by law should hereafter become penal, this declaration of their will would be a mere nullity; would have no force and effect, unless duly sanctioned by the Senate and the approbation of the President Will they then be allowed, in the exercise of their power of impeachment, to create crimes and inflict the most serious penalties on actions never before suspected to be criminal when they could not have swelled the same act into an offense in the form of a law? If this be truly the case, if this power of impeachment may be thus extended without limit or control, then indeed is every valuable liberty prostrated at the foot of this omnipotent House of Representatives; and may God preserve us! The President may approve and sign a law, or may make an appointment which to him may seem prudent and beneficial, and it may be the general, nay the universal, sentiment that it is so; and it is undeniable that no law is violated by the act. But some four or five years hence there comes a House of Representatives whose common sense is constructed on a new model, and who either are or affect to be greatly shocked at the atrocity of this act. The President is impeached. In vain he pleads the purity of his intention, the legality of his conduct, in vain he avers that he has violated no law and been guilty of no crime. He will be told, as Judge Chase now is, that the common sense of the House is the standard of guilt, and their opinion of the error of the act conclusive evidence of corruption. We have read, sir, in our younger days, and read with horror, of the Roman Emperor who placed his edicts so high in the air that the keenest eye could not decipher them, and yet severely punished any breach of them. But the power claimed by the House of Representatives to make anything criminal at their pleasure, at any period after its occurrence, is ten thousand times more dangerous, more tyrannical, more subversive of all liberty and safety. Shall I be called to heavy judgment now for an act which, when done, was forbidden by no law, and received no reproach, because in a course of years there is found a set of men whose common sense condemns the deed? The gentlemen have referred us to this standard, and, being under the necessity to acknowledge that the respondent has violated no law of the community, they would on this vague and dangerous ground accuse, try, and condemn him. The code of the Roman tyrant was fixed on the height of a column, where it might be understood with some extraordinary pains; but here, to be safe, we must be able to look into years to come, and to foresee what will be the changing opinions of men or points of decorum for years to come. The rule of our conduct, by which we are to be judged and condemned, lies buried in the bosom of futurity, and in the minds and opinions of men unknown, perhaps unborn.

The pure and upright administration of justice, sir, is of the utmost importance to any people; the other movements of Government are not of such universal concern. Who shall be President, or what treaties or general statutes shall be made, occupies the attention of a few busy politicians, but these things touch not, or but seldom, the private interests and happiness of the great mass of the community. But the settlement of private controversies, the administration of law between man and man, the distribution of justice and right to the citizen in his private business and concern, comes to every man's door, and is essential to every man's prosperity and happiness. Hence I consider the judiciary of our country most important among the branches of Government, and its purity and independence of the most interesting consequence to every man. Whilst it is honorably and fully protected from the influence of favor or fear, from any quarter, the situation of a people can never be very uncomfortable or unsafe. But if a judge is forever to be exposed to prosecutions and impeachments for his official conduct, on the mere suggestions of caprice, and to be condemned by the mere voice of prejudice, under the specious name of common sense, can he hold that firm and steady hand his high functions required? No! if his nerves are of iron they must tremble in so perilous a situation.

In England the complete independence of the judiciary has been considered, and has been found the best and surest safeguard of true liberty, securing a government of known and uniform laws, acting alike upon every man. It has, however, been suggested by some of our newspaper politicians, perhaps from a higher source, that although this independent judiciary is very necessary in a monarchy to protect the people from the oppression of a court, yet that, in our republican institution, the same reasons for it do not exist; that it is indeed inconsistent with the nature of our Government that any part or branch of it should be independent of the people from whom the power is derived. And as the House of Representatives come most frequently from this great source of power, they claim the best right of knowing and expressing its will; and of course the right of a controlling influence over the other branches. My doctrine is precisely the reverse of this. If I were called upon to declare whether the independence of judges were more essentially important in a monarchy or a republic, I should certainly say, in the latter. All governments require, in order to give them firmness, stability, and character, some permanent principle, some settled establishment. The want of this is the great deficiency in republican institutions. Nothing can be relied upon; no faith can be given either at home or abroad to a people whose systems and operations and policy are constantly changing with popular opinion. If, however, the judiciary is stable and independent; if the rule of justice between men rests upon known and permanent principles, it gives a security and character to a country which is absolutely necessary in its intercourse with the world and in its own internal concerns. This independence is further requisite as a security from oppression. All history demonstrates, from page to page, that tyranny and oppression have not been confined to despotisms, but have been freely exercised in republics, both ancient and modern—with this difference, that in the latter, the oppression has sprung from the impulse of some sudden gust of passion or prejudice, while in the former it is systematically planned and pursued as an ingredient and principle of the government. The people destroy not deliberately, and will return to reflection and justice, if passion is not kept alive and excited by artful intrigue, but, while the fit is on, their devastation and cruelty are more terrible and unbounded than the most monstrous tyrant. It is for their own benefit and to protect them from the violence of their own passions that it is essential to have some firm, unshaken, independent branch of government, able and willing to resist their frenzy. If we have read of the death of a Seneca under the ferocity of a Nero, we have read too of the murder of a Socrates under the delusion of a republic. An independent and firm judiciary, protected and protecting by the laws, would have snatched the one from the fury of a despot and preserved the other from the madness of a people.

I have considered these observations on the necessary independence of the judiciary applicable and important to the case before this honorable court, to repel the wild idea that a judge may be impeached and removed from office although he has violated no law of the country, but merely on the vague and changing opinions of right and wrong—propriety and impropriety of demeanor. For if this is to be the tenure on which a judge holds his office and character; if by such a standard his judicial conduct is to be adjudged criminal or innocent, there is an end to the independence of our judiciary. In opposition to this reasoning I have heard (not from the honorable managers) a sort of jargon about the sovereignty of the people, and that nothing in a republic should be independent of them. No phrase in our language is more abused or more misunderstood. The just and legitimate sovereignty of a people is truly an awful object, full of power and commanding respect. It consists in a full acknowledgment that all power originally emanates in some way from them, and that all responsibility is finally in some way due to them; and whether this is acknowledged or not, they have, if driven to the last resort, a physical force, to make it so. But, sir, this sovereignty does not consist in a right to control or interfere with the regular and legal operations and functions of the different branches of the Government at the will and pleasure of the people. Having delegated their power; having distributed it for various purposes into various channels, and directed its course by certain limits, they have no right to impede it while it flows in its intended directions. Otherwise we have no Government. In like manner the officers of Government are responsible in certain modes, and at certain periods, for the exercise of their duties and powers; but the people have no right to make them accountable in any other manner, or at any other period than that prescribed by the great compact of Government or Constitution. Having parted with their power under certain regulations and restrictions, they are done with it. They are bound by their own act, and having retained and declared the manner in which they will correct abuses in office, they have no right to claim any other sort of responsibility. If this be not the case, what government have we? What rule of conduct? What system of association? None; but we are truly in a state of savage anarchy and ruthless confusion, with all the vices incident to civilization without the restraints to control them.

Argument of Mr. Luther Martin, counsel for Mr. Justice Chase, on the nature of the power of impeachment.

Mr. Martin, counsel for the respondent, said:[1]

We have been told by an honorable manager (Mr. Campbell) that the power of trying impeachments was lodged in the Senate with the most perfect propriety, for two reasons—the one, that the person impeached would be tried before those who had given their approbation to his appointment to office. This certainly was not the reason by which the framers of the Constitution were influenced when they gave this power to the Senate. Who are the officers liable to impeachment? The President, the Vice-President, and all civil officers of Government. In the election of the two first the Senate have no control, either as to nomination or approbation. As to other civil officers who hold their appointments during good behavior, it is extremely probable that, though they were approved by one

Senate, yet from lapse of time and the fluctuations of that body an officer may be impeached before a Senate not one of whom had sanctioned his appointment, not one of whom, perhaps, had he been nominated after their election would have given him their sanction.

This, then, could not have been one of the reasons for thus placing the power over these officers. But as a second reason he assigned that, if any other inferior tribunal had been intrusted with the trial of impeachments, the members might have an interest in the conviction of an officer, thereby to have him removed in order to obtain his place; but that no Senator could have such inducement. I, sir, disclaim—I hold in contempt the idea—that the members of any tribunal would be influenced in their decision by so unworthy, so base a motive; but what is there to prevent this Senate more than any other court from being influenced? Is there anything to prevent any Member of this Senate or any of their friends from being appointed to the office of any person removed by their conviction?

I speak not from any apprehension I have of this honorable Court. In their integrity I have the greatest confidence. I have the greatest confidence they will discharge their duty to my honorable client with uprightness and impartiality. I have only made these observations to show that the reasons assigned by the honorable manager for vesting the trials of impeachment in the Senate are fallacious.

I see two honorable Members of this court [Messrs. Dayton and Baldwin] who were with me in convention, in 1787, who as well as myself perfectly know why this power was invested in the Senate. It was because, among all our speculative systems, it was thought this power could nowhere be more properly placed or where it would be less likely to be abused. A sentiment, sir, in which I perfectly concurred, and I have no doubt but the event of this trial will show that we could not have better disposed of that power.

Let us now, sir, examine the Constitution on the subject of impeachments, and from thence learn in what cases, and in what only, impeachments will lie. To have correct sentiments on this subject is of infinite importance. An error here would be like what is called an error in the first concoction, and would pervade the whole system.

By the Constitution it is declared that "the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment." That section, however, does not declare in what cases the power shall be exercised. This is designated in a subsequent part of the Constitution, and I shall contend that the power of impeachment is confined to the persons mentioned in the Constitution, namely, "the President, Vice-President, and all other civil officers."

Will it be pretended, for I have heard such a suggestion, that the House of Representatives have a right to impeach every citizen indiscriminately? For what shall they impeach them? For any criminal act? Is the House of Representatives, then, to constitute a grand jury to receive information of a criminal nature against all our citizens and thereby to deprive them of a trial by jury? This was never intended by the Constitution?

The President, Vice-President, and other civil officers can only be impeached. They only in that case are deprived of a trial by jury; they, when they accept their offices, accept them on those terms, and, as far as relates to the tenure of their offices, relinquish that privilege; they, therefore, can not complain. Here, it appears to me, the framers of the Constitution have so expressed themselves as to leave not a single doubt on this subject.

In the first article, section the third, of the Constitution it is declared that judgment in all cases of impeachment shall not extend further than removal from office and disqualification to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States. This clearly evinces that no persons but those who hold offices are liable to impeachment. They are to lose their offices; and, having misbehaved themselves in such manner as to lose their offices, are with propriety to be rendered ineligible thereafter.

The next question of importance is in what cases the House of Representatives have a right to impeach the President, the Vice-President, and the other civil officers.

It has been said that a judge can not be indicted for the same crime for which he may be impeached, "for," says the honorable manager (Mr. Campbell), "it would introduce the absurdity that a person might be punished twice for the same crime."

This honorable Court will observe that the two punishments which may here be inflicted on impeachment and subsequent indictment amount to no more than in England takes place on a single prosecution; for there on a single conviction a judge may be removed from office and also fined, imprisoned, or otherwise punished according to the nature of his offense. But the whole of this power the United States have not vested in the same body. To the Senate they have confined the punishment of removal from office, and disqualification of the person from holding offices in future; but can there be a single doubt that a person by impeachment removed from office can not afterward, according to the nature of his crime, be punished by indictment? Can gentlemen suppose a removal from office was intended to wash away all crimes the officer should have committed? What are the crimes for which an officer can be impeached? "Treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors."

Suppose a judge removed from office by impeachment for treason. Would that wash away his guilt? Would he not afterwards be liable to be indicted, tried, and punished as a traitor. Undoubtedly he would; so in the case of bribery. Yet, if the gentleman's idea is correct, a removal from office on impeachment for either of those crimes would free the officer from any other punishment. Consider the monstrous consequences which would result from the principle suggested by the managers, that a judge is only removable from office on account of crimes committed by him as a judge, and not for those for which he would be punishable as a private individual! A judge, then, might break open his neighbor's house and steal his goods; he might be a common receiver of stolen goods; for these crimes he might be indicted, convicted, and punished in a court of law; but yet he could not be removed from office because the offense was not committed by him in his judicial capacity, and because he could not be punished twice for the same offense.

The truth is, the framers of the Constitution, for many reasons which influenced them, did not think proper to place the officers of Government in the power of the two branches of the Legislature further than the tenure of their office. Nor did they choose to permit the tenure of their offices to depend upon the passions or prejudices of jurors. The very clause in the Constitution of itself shows that it was intended the persons impeached and removed from office might still be indicted and punished for the same offense, else the provision would have been not only nugatory, but a reflection on the enlightened body who framed the Constitution; since no person ever could have dreamed that a conviction on impeachment and a removal from office, in consequence, for one offense, could prevent the same person from being indicted and punished for another and different offense.

I shall now proceed in the inquiry, For what can the President, Vice-President, or other civil officers, and, consequently, for what can a judge, be impeached? And I shall contend that it must be for an indictable offense. The words of the Constitution are, "that they shall be liable to impeachment for treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

There can be no doubt but that treason and bribery are indictable offenses. We have only to inquire, then, what is meant by high crimes and misdemeanors? What is the true meaning of the word "crime?" It is the breach of some law which renders the person who violates it liable to punishment. There can be no crime committed where no such law is violated. The honorable gentleman to whom I before alluded has cited the new edition of Jacob's Law Dictionary; let us, then, look into that authority for the true meaning of the word "misdemeanor." He tells us—

"Misdemesnor, or misdemeanor, a crime less than felony. The term 'misdemeanor' is generally used in contradistinction to felony, and comprehends all indictable offenses which do not amount to felony, as perjury, libels, conspiracies, assaults," etc. (See 4 Comm. c. 1, p. 5.)

"A crime or misdemeanor, says Blackstone, is an act committed or omitted in violation of a public law either forbidding or commanding it. This general definition comprehends both crimes and misdemeanors which, properly speaking, are mere synonymous terms, though in common usage the word 'crimes' is made use of to denote such offenses as are of a deeper and more atrocious dye; while smaller faults and omissions of less consequence are comprised under the gentle name of misdemeanors only.

"In making the distinction between public wrongs and private, between crimes and misdemeanors, and civil injuries, the same author observes that public wrongs or crimes and misdemeanors are a breach and violation of the public rights and duties due to the whole community, considered as a community in its social aggregate capacity." (4 Comm., 5.)

Thus it appears crimes and misdemeanors are the violation of a law exposing the person to punishment, and are used in contradistinction to those breaches of law which are mere private injuries, and only entitle the injured to a civil remedy

Blackstone's Commentaries, volume 4. page 5, is cited by Jacob, and is as there stated. I shall not turn to it. Hale, in his Pleas of the Crown, volume 1, in his Præmium, which is not paged, speaking of the division of crimes, says:

"Temporal crimes, which are offenses against the laws of this realm, whether the common law or acts of Parliament, are divided into two general ranks or distributions in respect to the punishments that are by law appointed for them, or in respect to their nature or degree; and thus they may be divided into capital offenses, or offenses only criminal, or rather, and more properly, into felonies and misdemeanors. And the same distribution is to be made touching misdemeanors, namely, they are, such as are so by the common law, or such as are specially made punishable, as misdemeanors, by acts of Parliament."

Thus, then, it appears that crimes and misdemeanors are generally used as synonymous expressions, except that "crimes" is a word frequently used for higher offenses. But while I contend that a judge can not be impeached except for a crime or misdemeanor, I also contend that there are many crimes and misdemeanors for which a judge ought not to be impeached unless immediately relating to his judicial conduct. Let us suppose a judge provoked by insolence should strike a person; this certainly would be an indictable but not an impeachable offense. The offense for which a judge is liable to impeachment must not only be a crime or misdemeanor, but a high crime or misdemeanor. The word "crime," as distinguished from "misdemeanor," is applied to offenses of a more aggravated nature; the word "high," therefore, must certainly equally apply to misdemeanors as to crimes. Nay, sir, I am ready to go further and say there may be instances of very high crimes and misdemeanors for which an officer ought not to be impeached and removed from office; the crimes ought to be such as relate to his office, or which tend to cover the person who committed them with turpitude and infamy; such as show there can be no dependence on that integrity and honor which will secure the performance of his official duties.

But we have been told, and the authority of the State of Pennsylvania has been cited by one honorable manager (Mr. Rodney) in support of the position, that a judge may be impeached, convicted, and removed from office, for that which is not indictable, for that which is not a violation of any law.

What, sir! Can a judge be impeached and deprived of office when he has done nothing which the laws of his country prohibited? Is not deprivation of office a punishment? Can there be punishment inflicted where there is no crime? Suppose the House of Representatives to impeach for conduct not criminal; the Senate to convict, does that change the law? No, the law can only be changed by a bill brought forward by one House in a certain manner, assented to by the other, and approved by the President Impeachment and conviction can not change the law and make that punishable which was not before criminal.

It is true it often happens that the good of the community requires that the laws should be passed making criminal and exposing to punishment conduct, which, antecedently, was not punishable; but even in those cases Government has no power to punish acts antecedently done; it can only punish those acts done after the enaction of the law. The Constitution has declared "no ex post facto law shall be passed."

Should such a principle be once admitted or adopted, could the officers of Government ever know how to proceed? Admit that the House of Representatives have a right to impeach for acts which are not contrary to law, and that thereon the Senate may convict and the officer be removed, you leave your judges and all your other officers at the mercy of the prevailing party. You will place them much in the unhappy situation as were the people of England during the contest between the white and red roses, while the doctrine of constructive treasons prevailed. They must be the tools or the victims of the victorious party.

I speak not, sir, with a view to censure the principles or the conduct of any party which has prevailed in the United States since our Revolution, but I wish to bring home to your feelings what may happen at a future time. In republican governments there ever have been, there ever will be a conflict of parties. Must an officer, for instance a judge, ever be in favor of the ruling party whether wrong or right? Or, looking forward to the triumph of the minority, must he however improper their views act with them? Neither the one conduct nor the other is to be supposed but from a total dereliction of principle. Shall, then, a judge by honestly performing his duty and very possibly thereby offending both parties be made the victim of the one or the other, or perhaps of each, as they have power? No, sir; I conceive that a judge should always consider himself safe while he violates no law, while he conscientiously discharges his duty, whomever he may displease thereby.

But an honorable manager (Mr. Campbell) has read to us an authority to prove that a judge can not in England be proceeded against by indictment for violation of his official duties, but only in Parliament or by impeachment; his authority was the new edition of Jacob's Law Dictionary. Let me be indulged with reading to this honorable Court the case from 12 Coke, the case of Floyd and Barker to which Jacob refers, and it will be found that the reasons there assigned, however correct they might be as to judges in England, can have no possible application to the judges of the United States.

"It was resolved that the said Barker who was judge of assize, and gave judgment on the verdict upon the said W. P., and the sheriff who did execute him according to the said judgment, nor the justices of peace who did examine the offender, and the witnesses for proof of the murder before the judgment were not to be drawn in question, in the Star Chamber, for any conspiracy; nor any witness, nor any other person ought to be charged with conspiracy in the Star Chamber, or elsewhere, when the party indicted is convicted or attaint of murder or felony, and although the offender upon the indictment was acquitted, yet the judge, be he judge of assize, or a justice of peace, or any other judge, by commission and of record and sworn to do justice, can not be charged for conspiracy for that which he did openly in court as judge or justice of peace; and the law will not admit any proof against this vehement and violent presumption of law, that a justice sworn to do justice will do injustice, but if he hath conspired before out of court, this is extrajudicial, but due examination of causes out of the court, and inquiring by testimony and similar is not any conspiracy, for this he ought to do; but subornation of witnesses, and false and malicious prosecutors, out of court, to such whom he knows will be indictors, to find any guilty, etc., amounts to an unlawful conspiracy.

"And as a judge shall not be drawn in question in the cases aforesaid at the suit of the parties, no more shall he be charged in the said cases before any other judge at the suit of the King.

"And the reason and cause why a judge, for anything done by him as a judge, by the authority which the King (concerning his justice) shall not be drawn in question before any other judge, for any surmise of corruption, except before the King himself, is for this; the King himself is de jure to deliver justice to all his subjects; and for this, that he himself can not do it to all persons, he delegates his power to his judges, who have the custody and guard of the King's oath.

"And forasmuch as this concerns the honor and conscience of the King, there is great reason that the King himself shall take account of it, and no other."

But even in England it has been solemnly determined that judges may be proceeded against by indictment for the violation of the laws in their official conduct, for which I refer this honorable Court to Viner's abridgment, 14th volume, page 579, (F), pl. 3, and in notes, where he says:

"A justice can not rase a record, nor imbecile it, nor file an indictment which is not found, nor give judgment of death where the law does not give it, but if he doth this it is misprision, and he shall lose his office and shall make fine for misprision." (In the note "Brooke, Corone pl. 173 cities 2 R, 3, 9, 10, S. C. and P. and that he shall be indicted and arraigned.")

And that to Hawkin's Pleas of the Crown, volume 1, chapter 69, section 6, where that author tells us:

"It is said that at common law bribery in a judge, in relation to a cause depending before him, was looked upon as an offense of so heinous a nature that it was sometimes punished as high treason, before the 25th Edward III, and at this day it certainly is a very high offense and punishable not only with the forfeiture of the offender's office of justice, but also with fine and imprisonment," etc.

Mr. President, the principle I have endeavored to establish is that no judge or other officer can, under the Constitution of the United States, be removed from office but by impeachment, and for the violation of some law, which violation must be not simply a crime or misdemeanor, but a high crime or misdemeanor.

But an honorable manager (Mr. Rodney), who has this morning referred to some authorities as to other parts of the case has also contested the correctness of the foregoing principle, and has introduced the constitution of the State of Pennsylvania, by which he has told us a judge may, by the governor, be removed from office without the commission of any offense upon the vote of two-thirds of the two houses for his removal; notwithstanding that constitution has a similar provision for removal by impeachment as has the Constitution of the United States. To this I answer as we have no such provision in the Constitution of the United States the reverse is to be inferred, to wit, that the people of the United States from whom the Constitution emanated did not intend their judges should be removed, however obnoxious they might be to any part or to the whole of the Legislature, unless they were guilty of some high crime or misdemeanor, and then only by impeachment. It is also well known that the governor of Pennsylvania has not considered those words in the constitution of that State, "that he may remove the judges on such address," as being imperative. For, in a recent instance, where he did receive such address, instead of admitting the construction to be as was contended, "you must," he determined it to be "I will not," and I have had the pleasure of seeing that judge some time since that transaction on the bench with his brethren dispensing justice. I again repeat that as the framers of the Constitution of the United States did not insert in their Constitution such a clause as is inserted in the constitution of Pennsylvania, it is the strongest proof that they did not mean a judge or other officer should be displaced by an address of any portion of the legislature, but only according to the constitutional provisions.

The same gentleman (Mr. Rodney) has told us that the tenure by which a judge holds his office is good behavior, therefore that he is removable for misbehavior; and, further, that misbehavior and misdemeanor are synonymous and coextensive. Here I perfectly agree with the honorable gentleman and join issue with him. Misbehavior and misdemeanor are words equally extensive and correlative; to misbehave or to misdemean is precisely the same; and as I have shown that to misdemean, or, in other words, to be guilty of a misdemeanor, is a violation of some law punishable, so, of course, misbehavior must be the violation of a similar law.

The same honorable gentleman has mentioned the impeachment and conviction of Judge Addison, and has told us that he was not impeached for the breach of any law, but only for rude or unpolite conduct to his brother judge; that this objection was made with much energy on his defense, but that the Senate were convinced by the great talents and eloquence of Mr. Dallas and some other gentlemen that the objection was groundless; they, therefore, convicted and removed him. I have not here the proceedings against Judge Addison and, therefore, it is possible that the senate of Pennsylvania erected themselves into a court of honor to punish what they might consider breaches of politeness; but does this honorable Court sit here to take its precedents from the State of Pennsylvania or any other State, however respectable? I should rather hope that this honorable Court should furnish precedents which might be respected and adopted by the different States. I would also ask, When was that precedent established? Was it not at a time when there is too much reason to believe that the warmth and violence of party had more influence in it than justice; and that the senate of Pennsylvania overleaped their constitutional limits? But if we are to go to Pennsylvania for a precedent, why should we not be guided by that which the same State has so recently given us in a trial in which that gentleman bore so conspicuous a part? a precedent of acquittal; a precedent which we are perfectly willing should be adopted, and which we trust will be adopted on the present occasion.

My observations thus far have been principally with a view to establish the true construction of our Constitution, as relates to the doctrine of impeachment.

Argument of Mr. Robert G. Harper, counsel for Mr. Justice Chase, on the nature of the power of impeachment.

And finally, on behalf of the respondent, Mr. Harper said:[1]

The honorable managers, indeed, are as much at war with themselves on this point as with the Constitution and the laws. For when they have told us in one breath that this is merely a question of policy and expediency, they resort in the next to legal authorities, both English and American, for the purpose of explaining the doctrine of impeachment, and of proving that the acts alleged against the respondent amount to impeachable offenses; thus paying an involuntary homage to truth and furnishing an instance of the irresistible power with which she forces herself on the mind, even when most obstinately determined to resist her. Let us also, Mr. President, be permitted to adduce the authority of an elementary writer, of very high authority, on the laws of England in support of the principle for which we contend. Woodeson, in his Lectures, volume 2, page 611, treating on the law of impeachment, speaks thus: "As to the trial itself, it must of course vary in external ceremony, but differs not in essentials from criminal prosecutions before inferior courts. The same rules of evidence, the same legal notions of crimes and punishments, prevail. For impeachments are not formed to alter the law, but to carry it into more effectual execution, where it might be obstructed by the influence of too powerful delinquents, or not easily discerned in the ordinary course of jurisdiction, by reason of the peculiar quality of alleged crimes. The judgment therefore is to be such as is warranted by legal principles or precedents. In capital cases the mere stated sentence is to be specifically pronounced." Thus far this learned professor and commentator of the laws of England; and he cites as authorities for this doctrine Selden and the State Trials; the latter of which, this honorable court need not be informed, is a collection of adjudged cases in the highest courts of England; and the former, a writer of great learning and very high authority, peculiarly tenacious of every principle tending to the security of public liberty, and not likely to mistake on a point so essential as the law of impeachment.

Thus we find that even in England, where the power of impeachment is subject to no express constitutional restrictions and where abuses of that power, for the purpose of party persecution and State policy, have sometimes been committed, and more frequently attempted, an impeachment has never been considered as a mere inquest of office, but always as a criminal prosecution, differing not in essentials from those which are carried on before the ordinary tribunals of justice and subject to the same rules of evidence, and the same legal maxims concerning crimes and punishments, as a proceeding contrived not to alter the law, but to carry it into more effectual execution. These authorities, sanctioned by the practice of one hundred and fifty years, prove the principle for which we contend. Instances may, no doubt, be found in the history of that country where these salutary principles have been disregarded and impeachments have been converted into engines of oppression. But this abuse does not destroy or impair the principle. That remains as eternal as the laws of reason and justice on which it is founded, while the abuse passes into oblivion with the temporary interests and fleeting projects which it was made to subserve, or remains in our recollection as a sad monument of the excesses into which frail man is hurried by his passions.

And has not this great principle of English jurisprudence, which in that country has weathered so many storms of faction, revolution, and civil war, received the sanction also of this honorable court? Has not testimony been rejected because it was judged illegal according to the ordinary rules of evidence? And how could those rules apply to this case unless it were considered as a criminal prosecution?

The Constitution of the United States will as little bear out the managers in their position as the laws of England. That Constitution gives the power of impeachment to the House of Representatives and to the Senate the power of trying impeachments. Had the authors of that instrument and those who adopted it intended to leave this power at large or to erect it into a general inquest for inquiring into the qualifications of judges and the expediency of removing them, nothing more would have been done than merely to give the power. But it will be found that various restrictions are imposed in the subsequent parts of the instrument, which prove that no person can be impeached except for an offense.

Thus, for instance, in speaking of the power of pardoning, the Constitution provides (art. 2, sec. 2) that "the President may grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment." Is not this the same thing as saying that cases of impeachment are cases of offenses? What, Mr. President, are offenses in the language of the Constitution and the laws? For a definition of the term "offense," in a constitutional sense, we must consult our law books and not the caprice or the varying opinions of popular leaders or popular assemblies. Those books tell us that the word "offense" means some violation of law. Whence it evidently follows that no officer of Government can be impeached unless he has committed some violation of the law, either statute or common. It is not necessary for me to contend that this offense must be an indictable offense. I might safely admit the contrary, though I do not admit it, and there are reasons which appear to be unanswerable in favor of the opinion that no offense is impeachable unless it be also the proper subject of an indictment. But it is not necessary to go so far, and I can suppose cases where a judge ought to be impeached for acts which I am not prepared to declare indictable. Suppose, for instance, that a judge should constantly omit to hold court, or should habitually attend so short a time each day as to render it impossible to dispatch the business. It might be doubted whether an indictment would lie for those acts of omission, although I am inclined to think that it would. But I have no hesitation in saying that a judge in such a case ought to be impeached. And this comes within the principle for which I contend, for these acts of culpable omission are a plain and direct violation of the law which commands him to hold courts a reasonable time for the dispatch of business, and of his oath which binds him to discharge faithfully and diligently the duties of his office.

The honorable gentlemen who opened the case on the part of the prosecution cited the case of habitual drunkenness and profane swearing on the part of a judge as an instance of an offense not indictable and yet punishable by impeachment. But I deny his position. Habitual drunkenness in a judge and profane swearing in any person are indictable offenses. And if they were not, still they are violations of the law. I do not mean to say that there is a statute against drunkenness and profane swearing. But they are offenses against good morals, and as such are forbidden by the common law. They are offenses in the sight of God and man, definitive in their nature, capable of precise proof and of a clear defense.

The honorable managers have cited a case decided in this court as an authority to prove that a man may be convicted on impeachment without having committed an offense. I mean the case of Judge Pickering. But that case does not support the position. The defendant there was charged with habitual drunkenness and gross misbehavior in court arising from this drunkenness. The defense set up was that the defendant was insane, and that the instances adduced of intoxication and improper behavior proceeded from his insanity. On this point there was a contrariety of evidence. It is not for me to inquire on which side the truth lay. But the court, by finding the defendant guilty, gave their sanction to the charge that his insanity proceeded from habitual drunkenness. This case therefore proves nothing further than that habitual drunkenness is an impeachable offense.

As little aid can the honorable gentlemen derive from the case of Judge Addison, on which also they have relied. The articles of impeachment will show that Judge Addison was not impeached, as the honorable gentlemen suppose, for rude and ungentleman-like behavior in court to one of his colleagues; but for a supposed usurpation of power in preventing his colleague, by an exertion of authority, from exercising the right which he was supposed to possess to charge a grand jury, and in exerting his official influence and power to prevent the jury from paying attention to the legal opinions expressed by his colleague in a civil case. The report of that trial, now in my hand, will attest the correctness of this statement and will show also that Judge Addison was so far from being charged with rude and ungentleman-like behavior to his colleague that the honorable gentleman himself towards whom that behavior is supposed to have been used and who gave evidence on the trial, bore testimony to the mildness and politeness of Judge Addison's manner on the occasions which furnished the grounds of impeachment. Whether the acts done by that learned and distinguished judge did amount to an usurpation of unconstitutional power, or whether his colleague did possess those rights in the exercise of which he was supposed to have been improperly restricted, are questions foreign from the present inquiry. But I am free to declare that if Judge Addison's colleague did possess those rights and if he did arbitrarily prevent and impede the exercise of them by an unconstitutional exertion of the powers of his office he was guilty of an offense for which he might properly be impeached, because he must in that case have acted in express violation of the Constitution and laws.

The great principle for which we contend, and which is so strongly supported by the clause of the Constitution already cited, that an impeachment is a criminal prosecution and can not be maintained without the proof of some offense against the laws, pervades all the other provisions of the Constitution on the subject of impeachment. The fourth section of the second article declares "that the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." This provision, I know has been considered by some as a mere direction of what shall be done in those specified cases, and not as a prohibition confining impeachment to those cases. But it must be recollected, Mr. President, that the Constitution is a limited grant of power, and that it is of the essence of such a grant to be construed strictly and to leave in the grantors all the powers not expressly or by necessary implication granted away. In this manner has the Constitution always been construed and understood; and although an amendment was made for the purpose of expressly declaring and asserting this principle, yet that amendment was always understood by those who adopted it and was represented by the eminent character who brought it forward as a mere declaration of a principle inherent in the Constitution which it was proper to make for the purpose of removing doubts and quieting apprehensions. When, therefore, the Constitution declares for what acts an officer shall be impeached, it gives power to impeach him for those acts and all power to impeach him for any other cause is withheld. The enumeration in the affirmative grant implies clearly a negative restriction as to all cases not enumerated. This provision of the Constitution, therefore, must be considered upon every sound principle of construction as a declaration that no impeachment shall lie except for a crime or misdemeanor; in other words, for a criminal violation of some law.

The same idea is found in the second section of the third article, third clause, where it is declared that "the trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury;" plainly implying that cases of impeachment are cases of "trials for crimes."

It is material, also, Mr. President, to advert to the peculiar force of the term "conviction," which is employed in several parts of the Constitution, in application to cases of impeachment. The third section of the first article, sixth clause, speaking of the trial of impeachments, says: "And no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present." The seventh clause of the same section, treating on the extent and operation of a judgment in impeachment, says: "But the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject," etc. And the fourth section of the second article declares that certain officers "shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery," etc. This term "conviction" has in our law a fixed and appropriate meaning. There is indeed no word in our legal vocabulary of more technical force. It always imports the decision of a competent tribunal pronouncing a person guilty of some specific offense for which he has been legally brought to trial. In an instrument so remarkable as the Constitution of the United States for technical accuracy in the use of terms the frequent and indeed constant use of this word is decisive to prove that in the intention of the framers of that instrument no man could be impeached except for some offense against law of which he might in legal language be said to be "convicted."

In fixing the construction of this instrument no safer guide can be followed than contemporaneous expositions furnished by those who made or ratified it; and among those expositions the most authoritative are to be found in the constitutions of the several States, formed about the same time, and drawn up in many instances by the same persons. Whenever it appears clearly from the context of these constitutions that they affix a certain meaning to particular terms we may safely infer that those or similar terms in the Constitution of the United States were intended to have the same meaning. And we shall find by inspecting the constitutions of the several States that impeachment has been considered by all of them as a criminal prosecution for the punishment of defined offenses against the laws.

Let us begin with that of Pennsylvania. In treating of impeachments, article the fourth, it speaks of conviction on impeachment, and declares that all civil officers shall be liable to impeachment for any misdemeanor in office. The term "misdemeanor" is of as accurate meaning and of as much technical force as any term in the law. It describes a class of offenses against law, as well defined as any in the criminal code. A still stronger argument is furnished by the second section of the fifth article, which provides that for any reasonable cause which shall not be sufficient ground of impeachment the governor may remove any of the judges on the address of two-thirds of each branch of the legislature. It is most manifest that this provision would have been wholly unnecessary had the people of Pennsylvania, in framing their constitution, considered impeachments, like the honorable managers, merely as inquests of office by which a judge might be removed for any cause which two-thirds of each branch might think reasonable. And the arguments derived from the constitution of Pennsylvania have more force, inasmuch as the terms "misdemeanor in office," used by it for describing impeachable acts, are much less strong than "treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors," employed by the Constitution of the United States for the same purpose.

The constitution of Delaware, section 22, directs that impeachments shall lie against all persons "offending against the State, either by maladministration, corruption, or other means by which the safety of the State may be endangered." This is a very broad description of impeachable offenses against the laws, liable to punishment in the regular course of justice. It is declared that all impeachments shall be commenced "within eighteen months after the offense committed" and shall be prosecuted by the attorney-general or such other persons as the house of assembly shall appoint, according to the laws of the land. Persons found guilty on impeachment are to be disqualified, or removed, "or subjected to such pains and penalties as the laws shall direct." And the term "conviction," whose peculiar technical force has been already remarked, is applied by this constitution to cases of impeachment.

The people of Maryland did not think fit to invest the legislature with the power of impeachment, but have directed by their bill of rights, section 30, and by their constitution, section 40, that misbehavior in office shall be proceeded against by indictment in a court of law only, and that removal, and, in some cases, disqualification, shall be the consequence of conviction. It will not be denied that "misdemeanor" and "misbehavior in office" are convertible terms. If there be any difference, the latter is the less strong; and yet the people of Maryland have declared that the term "misbehavior in office" means an indictable offense, of which a person may be convicted in a court of law.

The constitution of Virginia provides that persons offending against the State by maladministration, corruption, or other means by which the safety of the State may be endangered, "shall be impeach-able by the house of delegates" in the general court, according to the laws of the land; "and that if all or any of the judges of the general court should, on grounds (to be judged by the house of delegates), be accused of any of the crimes or offenses above mentioned, such house of delegates may, in like manner, impeach the judge or judges so accused, to be tried in the court of appeals." Hence it appears most clearly that these general words "offending against the State by maladministration, corruption, or other means by which the safety of the State may be endangered," words far more general and indefinite in themselves than those employed by the Federal Constitution, were considered by the people of Virginia as meaning specific crimes or offenses, which might be proceeded against in a court of law according to the usual course of criminal justice. The words "any other means by which the safety of the State may be endangered" are certainly broad enough to embrace those reasons of political expediency and State policy for which the honorable managers contend that a judge may be removed by impeachment; but we find that the people of Virginia had no idea of giving them a construction so contrary to the notions entertained in this country respecting legal rights, personal safety, and constitutional liberty.

The provisions made on this subject by the constitution of North Carolina breathe the same spirit. That instrument declares, section 23, "that the governor and other officers offending against the State by violating any part of this constitution, maladministration, or corruption, may be prosecuted on the impeachment of the general assembly or presentment of the grand jury of any court of supreme jurisdiction in this State." This plainly implies that impeachable acts, though described in terms the most indefinite were neither more nor less than offenses indictable in the ordinary course of law.

In the constitution of South Carolina, article 5, we find the same idea necessarily implied. The words "misdemeanor in office" are used as the description of impeachable offenses; the term "conviction" is applied to impeachments, and it is provided that persons so convicted "shall, nevertheless, be liable to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law." It is plain, therefore, that the words "misdemeanor in office," were understood and intended by the people of South Carolina to mean offenses against the laws for which the offender might be indicted and "convicted."

The constitution of Georgia contains no words which can operate in any manner to define or describe impeachable offenses. It merely directs who shall have the power of impeaching, who shall try impeachments, and what description of persons may be impeached. But in that of Vermont there is a provision on this subject, which, though very concise, is very strong to our present purpose. Among the powers given by it, section 9, to the house of representatives is that to "impeach State criminals." This term "criminals," which in our laws is never applied except to persons charged with offenses of the highest nature, sufficiently declares that the people of Vermont considered impeachments as applicable to cases of crimes only, and not to removals for reasons of State expediency; not even to cases of smaller offenses, much less of indiscretion or impropriety of behavior, such as is alleged against the respondent in this case. For surely it would be an abuse of language to apply the term "criminal" to improper interruptions of the counsel, to rude, hasty or intemperate expressions; to ridicule employed by a judge against counsel who, in his opinion, conducted themselves incorrectly, or to the precipitate and ill-timed expression of a correct legal opinion. No, sir. This word imports the intentional violation of some known law, the perpetration of some specific defined crime, which may admit of precise proof, which every citizen may be able to avoid, against which, when accused of it, he may know how to make his defense.

Such, Mr. President, is the solemn exposition of impeachable offenses given by the people of the United States through the medium of their constitutions. Though not accustomed to talk about the will of the people, there is no man that bows with more reverence to that will when constitutionally declared. And shall we, Mr. President, let go this sheet-anchor of personal rights and political privileges to commit ourselves to the storms of party rage, personal animosity, and popular caprice? Shall we throw down this great landmark, fixed by the wisdom and patriotism of our fellow-citizens and fathers? Instead of having our best and dearest rights secured by fixed and known principles of law, shall we leave them to be governed and disposed by the ever varying whims and passions of the moment? No, sir, I trust not. When I look at these benches and recollect how deep a stake the members of this honorable court have in those rights which form the palladium of our safety and are now intrusted to their care and keeping, I can not but confidently expect that they will feel the whole importance of the great trust reposed in them by their country; that they will regard themselves as acting for future generations, as well as for the present age; and will elevate themselves above the sphere of little views and momentary feelings. They will recollect, sir, that unjust principles, adopted to answer particular purposes, are two-edged swords, which often rebound on the head of him who strikes with them, and that justice, though it may be an inconvenient restraint on our power while we are strong, is the only rampart behind which we can find protection when we become weak. They will remember that power which depends on popular favor is of all sublunary things the most fleeting and transient; that it must, from time to time, change hands; and that when the change which sooner or later must arrive shall have taken place, when those who now direct the thunder of impeachment shall be placed, as ere long they must be, in a situation to be smitten by its bolts, they will be glad to invoke, and unless they now set a great example of correct decision, will invoke in vain those constitutional privileges to which we now cry for safety.

Need I, Mr. President, urge the necessity of adhering to those principles, as it respects the independence of the judiciary department? Need I enlarge on the essential importance of that independence to the security of personal rights, and to the well-being, nay, to the existence of a free government? These considerations of themselves strike the mind with a force not to be increased by any efforts of mine. It is sufficient merely to bring them into the view of this honorable court.

But it is not to the party accused, to the nation, to posterity, and to the interests of free governments that the observance of settled constitutional principles in cases of impeachment is alone important. It is equally so to the character and feelings of those appointed to judge. Is there any member of this honorable court who would wish, nay, who would consent, in deciding this cause, to be set free from the restraints of the law, or, more properly speaking, to be deprived of its guidance and left to the influence of his own passions, feelings, or prepossessions? Were causes like this to be determined on expediency, and not on fixed principles of law, to what suspicions might not the judges be liable, of having sought the indulgence of some animosity, or the attainment of some selfish end, instead of consulting for the public good? But when they are known to be governed by the settled rules of law, and are considered as merely its organs, their motives will be more respected, and their conduct less liable to suspicion or reproach. Is any member of this honorable body prepared to relinquish the high and venerable station of the organ and expounder of the law, in order to assume the doubtful and dangerous character of a judge, subject to no rule but his own arbitrary will?

To a judge, too, it is the sweetest consolation in the discharge of his painful duties that when he has doomed a fellow-citizen to dishonor and misery, he has merely pronounced the decision of the law, and not the dictates of his own will; that he is not the author of the sentence by which so much calamity is brought on others, but merely its official organ. This reflection soothes his mind under the anguish which it must feel from another's woe. And is there any member of this honorable court who would consent to relinquish this consolation? I boldly say, no. I feel that every heart will respond to the assertion. And if any who hear me be capable of entertaining a contrary opinion, or would wish, in the same situation, to hold a different conduct, I envy not their feelings, however highly I may estimate their intellectual powers.

In every light, therefore, in which this great principle can be viewed, whether as a well-established doctrine of the Constitution; as the bulwark of personal safety and judicial independence; as a shield for the characters of those whose lot it may be to sit under the trial of impeachments; or as a solace to them under the necessity of pronouncing a fellow-citizen guilty; it will equally claim, and I can not doubt that it will receive the sanction of this honorable court, by whose decision it will, I trust, be established so as never hereafter to be brought into question, that an impeachment is not a mere inquiry, in the nature of an inquest of office, whether an officer be qualified for his place, or whether some reason of policy or expediency may not demand his removal, but a criminal prosecution, for the support of which the proof of some willful violation of a known law of the land is known to be indispensably required.

At the conclusion of the final arguments in the Chase trial, the court set a day and hour for giving final judgment.

It does not appear surely that the House attended on the final judgment in the Chase impeachment.

In the Chase trial the court modified its former rule as to form of final question.

Two-thirds not having voted guilty on any article, the Presiding Officer declared Mr. Justice Chase acquitted.

As soon as the arguments were concluded, on February 27,[1] it was, on motion of Mr. James Jackson, of Georgia, a Senator—

Resolved, That the court will on Friday next, at 12 o'clock, pronounce judgment in the case of Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.

On Friday, March 1,[2] the court being opened by proclamation, the managers, accompanied by the House of Representatives, attended.[3]

The counsel for the respondent also attended.

The consideration of the motion, made yesterday for an alteration of one of the rules in cases of impeachments, was resumed; whereupon,

Resolved, That in taking the judgment of the Senate upon the articles of impeachment now depending against Samuel Chase, esq., the President of the Senate shall call on each Member by his name, and upon each article, propose the following question, in the manner following: "Mr. ———, how say you; is the respondent, Samuel Chase, guilty or not guilty of a high crime or misdemeanor, as charged in the —— article of impeachment?"

Whereupon, each Member shall rise in his place, and answer guilty or not guilty.

The President rose, and addressing himself to the members of the court, said:

Gentlemen: You have heard the evidence and arguments adduced on the trial of Samuel Chase, impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors. You will now proceed to pronounce distinctly your judgment on each article.

The Secretary then read the first article of impeachment.

The article having been read, the President took the opinion of the members of the court respectively, in the form following:

Mr. ———, how say you; is the respondent, Samuel Chase, guilty or not guilty of a high crime or misdemeanor, as charged in the first article of impeachment?

And thus, after the reading of each article, the opinion of the court was taken.

At the conclusion, the President rose and said: On the first article, sixteen gentlemen have pronounced guilty and eighteen not guilty; on the second article, ten have said guilty and twenty-four not guilty; on the third article, eighteen have said guilty and sixteen not guilty; on the fourth article, eighteen have said guilty and sixteen not guilty; on the fifth article, there is an unanimous vote of not guilty; on the sixth article, four have said guilty and thirty not guilty; on the seventh article, ten have said guilty and twenty-four not guilty; and on the eighth article, nineteen have said guilty and fifteen not guilty.

Hence, it appears that there is not a constitutional majority of votes finding Samuel Chase, esq., guilty on any one article. It, therefore, becomes my duty to declare that Samuel Chase, esq., stands acquitted of all the articles exhibited by the House of Representatives against him.

Whereupon, the court adjourned without day.

It does not appear, from the House Journal,[4] that the decision was communicated to the House; and there is no record in the House Journal that the House attended either as Committee of the Whole House or otherwise.

[3] The House Journal raises a doubt as to whether or not the House as a Committee of the Whole attended. No mention of such attendance is made, after February 23 (Journal, pp. 149–162). It is probable that in the pressure of business, attendance as an organized body was omitted.

2364. The impeachment and trial of James H. Peck, United States judge for the district of Missouri.

The impeachment proceedings in the case of Judge Peck were set in motion by a memorial.

The investigation into the conduct of Judge Peck was revived by referring to a committee a memorial presented in a former Congress.

Form of memorial praying for an investigation into the conduct of Judge Peck.

The House decided formally to investigate the conduct of Judge Peck only after the Judiciary Committee had examined the memorial.

On December 8, 1826,[1] Mr. John Scott, of Missouri, presented a memorial of Luke Edward Lawless, for an inquiry into the official conduct of James H. Peck, district judge of the United States for the district of Missouri, in relation to certain proceedings on an attachment for contempt had by said judge against said Lawless. This memorial was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. On February 15, 1827,[2] the House ordered the committee discharged from the consideration of the memorial, and gave leave to the memorialist to withdraw the same.

On December 29, 1828,[3] on motion of Mr. George McDuffie, of South Carolina, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Luke Edward Lawless, presented on the 8th December, 1826, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

No report was made at this session.

On December 15, 1829,[1] on motion of Mr. McDuffie, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Luke Edward Lawless, presented on the 8th December, 1826, praying for impeachment of John H. Peck, judge of the United States court in the State of Missouri, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

This memorial[2] was addressed as follows:

To the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States:

The petition of Luke Edward Lawless, a citizen of the State of Missouri, and of the United States, respectfully showeth:

That, on the 30th day of March, in the present year, 1826, there appeared in the Republican, a newspaper printed in the city of St. Louis, State of Missouri, an article purporting to be the final decree or opinion of the judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, in the cause in which the widow and heirs of Antoine Soulard were plaintiffs, and the United States defendant, etc.

The memorial goes on to set forth that an appeal had already been taken to the Supreme Court of the United States when this final decree was published; that the petitioner wrote a letter, which was published in a St. Louis newspaper, setting forth in courteous and decorous language the errors of fact and law which he conceived to exist in the decree. This publication, as petitioner conceived, was meritorious rather than censurable, since the land titles of a large district were affected adversely by the decree, and speculators were taking advantage of this fact. The petition goes on to set forth that he was, for this publication, punished by Judge Peck for contempt. In conclusion the memoralist says:

Having thus submitted to your honorable body the facts of his case, and the evidence in support thereof, your petitioner begs leave to observe that it appears from those facts:

First. That the said James H. Peck has, in his capacity of judge of a district court of the United States, been guilty of usurping a power which the laws of the land did not give him.

Second. That said James H. Peck has exercised his power, be the same usurped or legitimate, in the case of your petitioner, in a manner cruel, vindictive, and unjust.

Wherefore, and inasmuch as the said James H. Peck has not only outraged and oppressed your petitioner as an individual citizen, but, in your petitioner's person, has violated the most sacred and undoubted rights of the inhabitants of these United States, namely, the liberty of speech and of the press, and the right of trial by jury, your petitioner prays that the conduct and proceedings in this behalf, of said Judge Peck, may be inquired into by your honorable body, and such decision made therein as to your wisdom and justice shall seem proper.

And your petitioner, as in duty bound, will pray.

LUKE EDWARD LAWLESS.

ST. LOUIS, MO., September 22, 1826.

Various documents accompanied this memorial, in substantiation of those charges which he offered to prove.

On January 7, 1830,[3] Mr. James Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the following resolution, which was agreed to by the House:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be authorized to send for persons and papers in the case of the charge of official misconduct against James H. Peck, judge of the district court of Missouri.

In reporting in favor of impeaching Judge Peck the committee submitted transcripts of testimony.

Following the Chase precedent, the committee refrained from giving their reasons for concluding that Judge Peck should be impeached.

In the investigation of Judge Peck, the respondent cross-examined witnesses, and addressed the committee.

The House declined to print with the evidence in the Peck investigation the memorial or the address of respondent.

The report favoring the impeachment of Judge Peck was committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

On March 23[1] Mr. Buchanan submitted from that committee the following report:

That, in consequence of the evidence collected by them, in virtue of the powers with which they have been invested by the House, and which is hereunto subjoined, they are of opinion that James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, be impeached of high misdemeanors in office.

In presenting the report Mr. Buchanan stated that the committee[2] deemed it fairest toward the party accused not to report to the House their reasons at length for arriving at the conclusion that he ought to be impeached. In this respect they thought it advisable to follow the precedent which had been established in the case of the impeachment of Judge Chase.

The report contains, however, an abstract of the case of heirs of Antoine Soulard v. United States, the opinion of Judge Peck therein, the letter of Mr. Lawless criticising the opinion, and the court records showing the arrest and punishment of the latter. The journal of the committee also accompanies the report. It gives the testimony of Mr. Lawless and others before the committee, and shows that Judge Peck was present in the committee room in person, and cross-examined the witnesses.

Mr. Buchanan moved that the report, with the documents as described and the transcripts of the testimony, be printed. Thereupon Mr. Clement C. Clay, of Alabama, moved to add to the matter to be printed "the memorial of Luke E. Lawless and the address of the judge to the committee." This amendment was disagreed to, and then the original motion of Mr. Buchanan was agreed to.

The report was committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Judge Peck, threatened with impeachment, was permitted to make to the House a written or oral argument.

Judge Peck, threatened with impeachment, transmitted to the House a written argument, which was ordered to be read.

In Judge Peck's case the committee proceeded on the theory of an ex parte inquiry.

Judge Peck was not permitted to bring witnesses before the House committee, but cross-examined and filed a statement.

In the Peck case the House, with a view to English precedents, discussed the nature of the inquiry preliminary to impeachment.

Form of memorial in which Judge Peck asked leave to state his case to the House.

On April 5[1] the Speaker laid before the House a memorial:

To the honorable the Speaker and Members of the House of Representatives of the United States:

The memorial of James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, respectfully represents:

That, by a report of the Committee on the Judiciary, made to your honorable body on the 23d March, 1830, on the petition of Luke E. Lawless, it is proposed that your memorialist be impeached of high misdemeanors in office.

The memorialist goes on to describe the status of the case, and says that in view of the gravity of the proceeding he—presumes that it will not be displeasing to your honorable body to have a full view of the whole ground of this accusation before you proceed to decide finally on the report of the committee. In England, from which we borrow the process of impeachment, the House of Commons has been willing to receive such information from the party accused before they will vote the impeachment.

The memorialist then cites in support of this assertion the case of Warren Hastings.

The memorialist further asks that he may be permitted to adduce against the prima facie impression to his disadvantage arising from the report of the committee the fact that Mr. Lawless's petition had been presented in former Congresses, and that the able men to whom it was referred found no grounds for proceeding.

The petitioner suggests that any method which may be taken to enable him to present "a full exposition of all the facts" will be satisfactory to him, whether by direct address to the House or before a committee.

When the memorial of Mr. Lawless had been referred to the Judiciary Committee, they had notified the present memorialist, Judge Peck, that they would receive "any explanation" which he might think proper to make in reference to the charge. In the brief time allowed he had made such a statement as was possible, although it was inadequate. But when it was handed in, the chairman of the committee did not read it, but proceeded immediately to examine the witnesses.

It is true, also, continues the memorial—

that your memorialist was permitted to cross-examine, to a certain extent, the witnesses who had been summoned and examined in support of the charge, but this cross-examination was much restricted by frequent objections, and by the strong desire evinced by the committee to get through the examination at least within the two remaining days of the week; and your memorialist having been more than once admonished that he was there ex gratia, felt himself checked and restrained from extending the cross-examination to points which seemed to him to belong to the inquiry, so that his having been permitted to be present under such circumstances is rather a disadvantage to him than a benefit, because it gives to the transaction all the semblance of a free and full investigation of the whole case, without the reality. Your memorialist does not make this remark in censure of the honorable committee; on the contrary, considering the proceeding, as they manifestly seemed to do, as being analogous to an inquiry by a grand jury and to be governed by the same rules, your memorialist is sincerely satisfied that it was their purpose to treat him, as, in this view of the subject, they did in fact treat him, with great liberality and indulgence.

But your memorialist submits, with great respect, that the proceeding of the House of Representatives, in inquiring whether they will, or will not, institute an impeachment, is not to be governed by those strict rules which confine a grand jury to ex parte evidence. It was not the course pursued by the House of Commons of Great Britain, in the case of Warren Hastings, to which he has referred, and in which the House, before they voted the impeachment, heard not only the defense, but the testimony of his witnesses.

And the memorialist concludes:

Your memorialist, therefore, respectfully prays that your honorable body will receive from him a written exposition of the whole case, embracing both the facts and the law, and give him, also, process to call his witnesses from Missouri in support of his statements, before any discussion or vote shall be taken on the evidence as it is now presented with the report of the committee. * * *

If this prayer can not be granted, his hope and prayer is that your honorable body will, if it meet your own approbation, vote the impeachment at once, without any discussion on that partial evidence which presents a garbled view of the subject, greatly to the prejudice of your memorialist, and that he may have as speedy an opportunity as the nature of the case will allow to exhibit before the tribunal of the Senate and before his country the entire transaction, in all its parts, as it really occurred, being conscious and confident that to insure his acquittal from all censure in the minds of all honorable men accustomed to discussions of this kind, the case requires only to be fully understood.

And in the strong hope that the one or the other of these prayers will be granted, your memoralist, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

JAMES H. PECK.

WASHINGTON CITY, April 5, 1830.

Mr. Henry R. Storrs, of New York, at once moved that the memorial be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, to which the report of the Judiciary Committee had already been referred.

A debate[1] at once arose as to the propriety of granting the prayer of the petitioner. Mr. Clement C. Clay, of Alabama, said:

As to precedents, there was no uniformity in them on this subject. One high case had been referred to, that of Warren Hastings, and also that of Judge Chase. But the practice in the several States differed from that which had been pursued by the General Government. In his own State (and he hoped he should not be considered as presumptuous in referring to the practice of a State which had so recently been admitted to the Union) the course pursued in cases of impeachment was different and he thought there were many inducements for the House to pursue the practice there adopted. He could not unite in the opinion that the House should proceed precisely as did a grand jury in ordinary cases of indictment. The present case was totally different. A great officer had been accused of a great offense. Did gentlemen suppose, could they think, that when a high officer of the Government was accused by a private individual he must, on the mere ex parte testimony of that accuser, be at once impeached? Mr. Clay said he should hesitate much before he could subscribe to such an opinion. He thought the House ought to proceed with very great caution. Merely to accuse was not all that was necessary in order to have a judge impeached. Some gentlemen seemed to conceive that the memorial of this petitioner asked that witnesses might be examined at the bar of that House; but it made no such request directly. It only asked this as one alternative—that his witnesses might be heard here, if not elsewhere.

Mr. Buchanan said:

Judge Peck, in that memorial, suggests that the Committee on the Judiciary sent for such witnesses only as had been selected by Mr. Lawless. That is far from being the fact. The committee acted upon higher principles. They were sensible of the high responsibility which they owed, both to this House and to the country, for the correctness of their proceedings; and had, therefore, inquired and ascertained, from the best sources in their power, the names of such witnesses as would be most likely to give an impartial and intelligent statement of the transaction. They had sent for and examined seven witnesses; and he owed it to them to say that, although he had long been in the habit of examining witnesses in courts of justice, he had never observed, on any occasion, more candor or more impartiality than these seven gentlemen had exhibited upon their examination before the committee.

It is true, as the memorial suggests, that, in the case of Warren Hastings, the House of Commons did hear the accused, and did permit him to produce testimony, before they voted an impeachment against him. But this was only a single instance. That course might have been adopted, because Mr. Burke, merely as an individual Member of the House, had risen in his place, and moved the impeachment. Whether he was correct in this conjecture or not, it was certain there had been no case of an impeachment by this House, in which so much indulgence was granted, as had been allowed to the accused upon the present occasion. He was permitted to furnish the committee with a written explanation of his conduct, and his request that he might cross-examine the witnesses was promptly granted.

Mr. Ralph I. Ingersoll, of Connecticut, confessed that this was, in a great measure, a new case to him. The only one that he had ever before witnessed was that in which charges, through a newspaper of this district, had been brought against the Vice-President about three years ago. That officer had presented these charges to the House, as the grand inquest of the nation, and requested an inquiry. A committee had been appointed to investigate them; and, before that committee, a friend of the Vice-President had been permitted to appear and represent him throughout the whole investigation. Witnesses, also, had been examined on the part of the accused. How it had been in the case of Judge Chase, or of Judge Pickering, from New Hampshire, he did not recollect; but he well recollected that witnesses in favor of the Vice-President had been examined, as well as against him, and that his representative had been allowed to be present before the committee through every stage of that examination. The committee at that time took some pains to ascertain what was the proper mode of proceeding, and they became satisfied that the party accused had, in these preliminary proceedings, a right to be thus heard.

Mr. Spencer Pettis, of Missouri, said that the practice in cases of impeachment, so far as regarded the proceedings of this House, was now to be settled; for it was obvious that it had not yet been settled by precedent. Gentlemen had, indeed, spoken of the case of Judge Chase; but that case had no application to the present one as it now stands. Judge Chase did not ask to make his defense before this House, nor did he ask either to cross-examine witnesses on the part of the Government, or to have an examination of his own witnesses. As the present question was not then raised, that case can form no precedent to govern in this instance.

Mr. Pettis also went on to cite the investigations of the conduct of Mr. John C. Calhoun, as Secretary of War, and of Secretary of the Treasury William H. Crawford. In both investigations the accused had been permitted to have witnesses examined before the committees. Both these gentlemen were charged with high misdemeanors, and the charges had been preferred in times of great political excitement.

Mr. James Strong, of New York, said that, from the little examination he had been able to give to this subject, he had come to the conclusion that the present proceedings should be strictly ex parte, rigidly so. It had been said by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Everett] that the committee had departed somewhat from this line. It was true that they had deviated from it in a slight degree, but the departure was not such as to warrant the House in taking the other step which was now requested. There was a very material difference between hearing the party accused and hearing his witnesses. The Members of the House were not judges to try or to condemn the accused. It was true that the matters in this testimony might not be such as to mix themselves up with party politics; but suppose that it were proposed to impeach a political man of high standing, and that the witnesses were brought to the bar of the House, he put it to every man to say whether the safety of the country did not require that in such cases politics should be thoroughly excluded from that tribunal. And how could this be done but by keeping the proceedings strictly ex parte? Complaints had been made that the committee had not reported articles of impeachment; the case had been referred to them for no such purpose; their duty had been simply to ascertain facts. The House did not want even their opinions; it wanted the facts only, and on one side. What the House had to decide was, whether the testimony did or did not contain matter to warrant an impeachment. If it did, then the House would say the party should be impeached, and the next step would be to appoint a committee to frame the articles. These would be reported to the House, and, if they were agreed upon, then managers would be appointed to conduct the trial before the Senate. It struck him that the safest course would be to keep the proceedings as near ex parte as possible.

Finally the memorial was ordered to be laid on the table for printing, and was not referred to the Committee of the Whole.

On April 7,[1] Mr. Pettis proposed a resolution which, after modifications, read as follows:

Resolved, That James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, be permitted, at any time, until Wednesday next at 12 o'clock, to make to this House any written or oral argument on the law or matters of fact, now in evidence before the House, he may think proper, in answer to the charges preferred against him by Luke E. Lawless, esq., which charges have been reported on by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. William Drayton, of South Carolina, moved to strike out the words "or oral." He said that in making the motion he had no intention of preventing the individual concerned from availing himself of the full benefit of what the resolution proposed to grant to him, but had been influenced by the consideration that, if his exposition should be made in writing all the Members of the House would have an opportunity of examining it; but if made orally it would be impossible that all the Members should distinctly hear it, and, if they did, they would probably not retain the substance of it distinctly in their memories. This was one reason which actuated him. Another was that, in his opinion, ill consequences would be likely to arise from the personal appearance of the memorialist before the House. He might aver that a material fact could be established by testimony incorrectly or imperfectly referred to in the report of the committee, and ask leave to introduce it fully. Should his application be rejected, he might regard the permission to be heard as illusory. Should his application be acceded to, they would be drawn into a trial of the cause.

The amendment was disagreed to by the House.

On behalf of the resolution, Mr. Pettis said that he had examined the precedents since 1640 and had found none against the proposed action.

Mr. Buchanan said that he had examined the British precedents, and found that in several cases the party had been admitted to the floor of the House of Commons simply to make an argument on the testimony which had been previously given to the House. This was the utmost extent of the privilege so far as he had examined, except in a single instance—that of Warren Hastings. He should make no objection to a mere permission to make an exposition of the law and an argument upon the facts as they appeared in the testimony already taken.

Mr. William Drayton, of South Carolina, drew a distinction between this House and the House of Commons. This House had no other inquisitorial authority than was expressly delegated to it by the Constitution. The House of Commons, on the other hand, was the "grand inquest" of the nation. It may even supersede the courts in cases of individual misdemeanors, as in the case of Alice Pierce, Sir John Fenwick, etc. British precedents were more likely to mislead than assist. The Constitution simply gives this House power to decide whether the case shall be tried before another body. The House could not itself try the case. Unless it should confine itself to what was termed ex parte evidence there would be no bounds to the inquiry.

Mr. Buchanan said his desire was that the House might establish such a precedent as should protect the interests of the accused in all future time. The Judiciary Committee had Judge Chase's trial before them. The mode of proceeding in that trial they considered as strictly proper and delicate. The committee in that case were directed to report their opinion on the charges against Judge Chase, which had been made on the floor of the House. For the purpose of enabling them to do so they procured all the testimony in their power. This they reported to the House, together with a simple statement of their own opinion upon it—nothing else. And why? He presumed that, as it was a judicial proceeding, they wished to leave every gentleman to decide for himself on the naked testimony. They considered one Member as competent to decide as another. Their report was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and there it was discussed. If in this case the Committee of the Whole should concur with the Judiciary Committee in their view of the case, then the House would appoint a committee to draft articles of impeachment. These articles would be considered and adopted by the House. Until after this second decision the accused would not be called upon to answer. As to the course pursued by the Pennsylvania house in a similar case, it had never met his approval.

The House agreed to the resolution proposed by Mr. Pettis without division.

Judge Peck did not avail himself of the permission to come before the House and make an oral statement; but on April 14[1] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from Judge Peck transmitting his "explanation in answer to the charges," with documents referred to in the answer.

The House decided that the explanation should be read, but after a time the reading was suspended and the statement alone having been ordered printed, it was, with the documents, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

After consideration in Committee of the Whole, the House concurred in the proposition to impeach Judge Peck.

The impeachment of Judge Peck was only for "high misdemeanors in office."

Forms and ceremonies of carrying the impeachment of Judge Peck to the Senate.

The impeachment of Judge Peck was carried to the Senate by a committee of two.

After discussing precedents the Senate appointed a committee to consider the message impeaching Judge Peck.

The Blount precedent for requiring bonds of the respondent was discussed adversely in the Peck case.

Mr. Senator Benton was excused from voting on a preliminary question in the Peck impeachment.

On April 21, 22, 23, and 24[2] the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union considered the question of impeachment, the debate being on a resolution proposed, as follows, by Mr. Buchanan:

Resolved, That James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, be impeached of high misdemeanors in office

Mr. Edward Everett, of Massachusetts, moved to amend the resolution by striking all out after the word "Resolved" and inserting as follows:

That though, on the evidence now before it, this House does not approve of the conduct of James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, in his proceeding by attachment against Luke E. Lawless for alleged contempt of the said court, yet there is not sufficient evidence of evil intent to authorize the House to impeach the said judge of high misdemeanors in office.

This amendment was disagreed to.

The resolution was then agreed to, ayes 113, negative not taken.

The Committee of the Whole then rose and reported the resolution to the House, whereupon the question was put:

Will the House concur with the Committee of the Whole House [on the state of the Union] in the adoption of the said resolution?

and there were ayes 123, nays 49.[3]

[3] It was stated later by Mr. Manager Spencer, in his argument to the high court, that this decision was not at all on party lines. (See Report of the trial of James H. Peck, p. 289.)

So the resolution was agreed to.

It was then[1]—

Ordered, That Mr. Buchanan and Mr. Henry R. Storrs, of New York, be appointed a committee to go to the Senate and, at the bar thereof, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States, to impeach James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, of high misdemeanors in office, and acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will in due time exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him and make good the same.

Ordered, That the committee do demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said James H. Peck to answer to said impeachment.

On motion of Mr. Henry R. Storrs, of New York—

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report to this House articles of impeachment against James H. Peck, district judge of the United States for the district of Missouri, for high misdemeanors in his said office.

And Mr. Buchanan, Mr. Storrs, of New York; Mr. George McDuffie, of South Carolina; Mr. Ambrose Spencer, of New York, and Mr. Charles A. Wickliffe, of Kentucky, were appointed the said committee.

All of this committee were from among those who had voted in favor of the impeachment.

On April 26[2]—

Ordered, That James H. Peck have leave to withdraw his memorials and the documents which accompanied the same.

On April 26,[3] in the Senate Messrs. Buchanan and Storrs, Members of the House of Representatives, with a message from that House, were announced, and, having taken the seats assigned them,

The President[4] informed them that the Senate was ready to receive any communication they might have to make.

Mr. Buchanan then rose and said:

We are commanded, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States, to impeach James H. Peck, judge of the district court of Missouri, of high misdemeanors in office, and to acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him and make good the same, and we do demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said James H. Peck to answer to said impeachment.

Messrs. Buchanan and Storrs, having retired,

Mr. Littleton W. Tazewell, of Virginia, rose and said that in looking over similar cases for the purpose of ascertaining what would be the proper course of proceeding, he discovered that messages, similar in most particulars to the one just received, had been presented to the Senate in three cases. The first was the case of Blount, one of the Members of this body; the next was that of John Pickering, judge of the district court of New Hampshire, and the third was that of Judge Chase. Upon each of these cases there seemed to have been some anxious consideration in order to adopt the course most proper to be pursued. Mr. Tazewell would state in what the proceedings in these cases differed. The case of Mr. Blount, being the first of the kind that had ever occurred, presented so anomalous a practice that it never could be referred to as a precedent. The other two were consistent with the general principles of law and justice. From these it seems that it had been settled that when the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they were about to present articles of impeachment a select committee was appointed to take the subject into consideration and report what measures were proper to be taken. He would read for the information of the Senate the cases as they occurred.

Mr. Tazewell, having read the precedents in the cases of Blount, Pickering, and Chase, said that as to the precedent in the case of Blount the idea of calling upon an individual to enter into a recognizance to appear at no named time at no given place to answer charges not yet set forth in articles of impeachment was so manifestly contrary to justice that the Senate itself seemed to have abandoned it. Therefore he concluded that the Blount case would not be considered a fit precedent, so he moved the following resolution to the message:

Resolved, That it be referred to a select committee, to consist of three members, to consider and report thereon.

This resolution was agreed to.

The Senate then proceeded to ballot for the committee.

Mr. Thomas H. Benton, of Missouri, asked to be excused from voting on the question, and the question being taken he was excused.

Then the committee were chosen, as follows: Messrs. Tazewell, Samuel Bell, of New Hampshire, and Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts.

On the same day, in the House,[1] Mr. Buchanan reported that, in obedience to the order of the House, they had been to the Senate, and in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States had impeached James H. Peck, judge, etc., of high misdemeanors in office; that the committee had acquainted the Senate that the House of Representatives would, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against the said James H. Peck and make good the same, and that the committee had demanded that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said James H. Peck to answer to the said impeachment.

On April 27,[2] in the Senate, Mr. Tazewell, from the Select Committee appointed on the subject, made the following report; which was concurred in by the Senate:

Whereas the House of Representatives on the 26th of the present month, by two of their members, Messrs. Buchanan and Storrs, of New York, at the bar of the Senate, impeached James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, of high misdemeanors in office, and acquainted the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him, and make good the same; and likewise demanded that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said James H. Peck, to answer the said impeachment: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Senate will take proper order thereon, of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.

And the committee further recommended to the Senate that the Secretary of the Senate be directed to notify the House of Representatives of the foregoing resolution.

Accordingly, after the report had been concurred in, it was Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

On the same day the message was communicated to the House.[1]

The respondent in the Peck impeachment communicated with the Senate as to the trial before articles had been presented.

The article of impeachment against Judge Peck was considered in Committee of the Whole before being agreed to by the House.

All of the committee who framed the article in the Peck case had voted for the impeachment. (Footnote.)

The article in the Peck impeachment appears in the House Journal on the day of its adoption.

The managers of the Peck impeachment were chosen by ballot, a majority vote being required for election.

Instance wherein the Journal recorded the names of the tellers on a vote by ballot.

Form of resolutions providing for carrying to the Senate the article impeaching Judge Peck.

All the managers in the Peck trial were of those who had voted for impeachment.

On April 28[2] the Vice-President communicated to the Senate two letters from Judge Peck, notifying the Senate of his intention to go to Baltimore, where he should remain some days; and requesting that, in the arrangement of the Senate chamber preparatory to his impeachment, a seat might be assigned him by which he might avoid facing the windows. The letters, having been read, were laid on the table.

On April 29,[3] Mr. Buchanan, from the committee appointed for the purpose, reported an article, to be exhibited to the Senate of the United States in behalf of themselves and of all the people of the United States, against Judge Peck, a judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, in maintenance and support of their impeachment against him. It was laid on the table and directed to be printed.

On April 30,[4] on motion of Mr. Buchanan,

Ordered, That the article of impeachment against James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, be committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

On May 1,[5] the article was considered in Committee of the Whole, and, after a verbal amendment, was reported favorably to the House.

And the question was then put:

Will the House adopt the said article, as its article of impeachment against James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri?

And it passed in the affirmative, without division.

The article[1] appears in full in the Journal of the House of this date.

On motion of Mr. Buchanan,

Resolved, That five managers be appointed, by ballot, to conduct the impeachment against James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, on the part of this House.

The House proceeded to the appointment of five managers, by ballot, when the following gentlemen received a majority of votes, and were appointed, viz: James Buchanan, of Pennsylvania; Henry R. Storrs, of New York; George McDuffie of South Carolina; Ambrose Spencer, of New York, and Charles Wickliffe, of Kentucky.

The first four were elected on the first ballot. But four ballots were taken before a majority was given for Mr. Wickliffe.

The Journal records that Messrs. William McCoy, of Virginia, Daniel H. Miller, of Pennsylvania, and Robert Desha, of Tennessee, were appointed tellers to examine the ballots on the vote.

The managers were the same as the committee appointed to prepare the article of impeachment; and all had been favorable to the impeachment.

On motion of Mr. Buchanan, it was

Resolved, That the article agreed to by this House, to be exhibited, in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, against James H. Peck, in maintenance of their impeachment against him for high misdemeanors in office, be carried to the Senate by the managers appointed to conduct said impeachment.

On motion of Mr. Buchanan, it was

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate, to inform them that this House have appointed managers to conduct the impeachment against James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, and have directed the said managers to carry to the Senate the article agreed upon by this House, to be exhibited in maintenance of their impeachment against the said James H. Peck, and that the Clerk of this House do go with said message.

The message announcing to the Senate that an article impeaching Judge Peck would be presented gave the names of the managers.

The Senate adopted a rule prescribing ceremonies for receiving as a court the articles impeaching Judge Peck.

Form of oath prescribed for Senators in the Peck trial.

Form of proclamation of the Sergeant-at-Arms when articles of impeachment against Judge Peck were to be presented.

On May 3,[2] in the Senate, the Clerk of the House delivered this message:

Mr. President, I am directed to inform the Senate that the House of Representatives have appointed Mr. Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, etc. (naming the others), managers to conduct the impeachment against James H. Peck, judge of, etc.; and have directed the said managers to carry to the Senate the articles agreed upon by the House to be exhibited in maintenance of their impeachment against the said James H. Peck.

[2] Senate Journal, p. 282; Debates, p. 405.

The message having been delivered and read, on motion by Mr. Tazewell, it was

Resolved, That at 12 o'clock to-morrow the Senate will resolve itself into a court of impeachment, at which time the following oath or affirmation shall be administered by the Secretary to the President of the Senate, and by him to each Member of the Senate, viz:

"I solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, I will do impartial justice according.to law."

Which court of impeachment being thus formed will, at the time aforesaid, receive the managers appointed by the House of Representatives to exhibit articles of impeachment, in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, against James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, pursuant to notice given to the Senate this day by the House of Representatives that they had appointed managers for the purposes aforesaid; and that the Secretary of the Senate lay this resolution before the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That after the managers of the impeachment shall be introduced to the bar of the Senate, and shall have signified that they are ready to exhibit articles of impeachment against James H. Peck, the President of the Senate shall direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to make proclamation, who shall, after making proclamation, repeat the following words: "All persons are commanded to keep silence, on pain of imprisonment, while the grand inquest of the nation is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States articles of impeachment against James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri." After which the articles shall be exhibited and the President of the Senate shall inform the managers that the Senate will take proper order on the subject of the impeachment, of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.

On the same day the first of the above resolutions was communicated to the House of Representatives by message.[1]

On May 4[2] the Senate resolved itself into a high court of impeachment,[3] and the Secretary administered the prescribed oath to the Vice-President, who then administered it in turn to the Senators.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives appeared and were admitted; and Mr. Buchanan, their chairman, having announced that they were the managers instructed by the House of Representatives to exhibit a certain article of impeachment against James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, they were requested by the Vice-President to take seats assigned them within the bar; and the Sergeant-at-Arms was directed to make proclamation in the words following:

Oyez! Oyez! Oyez! All persons are commanded to keep silence, on pain of imprisonment, while the grand inquest of the nation is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States articles of impeachment against James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri.

The article of impeachment against Judge Peck.

The article of impeachment in the Peck case was signed by the Speaker and attested by the Clerk.

The article of impeachment in the Peck case was read by the chairman of the managers, and appears in full on the journal of the trial.

[3] During this trial the court is described by the singular number "impeachment." In former trials the word has been "impeachments."

Having laid the article impeaching Judge Peck on the Senate table, the managers returned and reported verbally to the House.

The article of impeachment against Judge Peck having been presented, the Senate ordered a writ of summons to issue, and informed the House thereof.

After which the managers rose, and Mr. Buchanan, their chairman, read the following article, which appears in full in the journal of the impeachment:

Article exhibited by the House of Representatives of the United States, in the name of themselves, and of all the people of the United States, against James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, in maintenance and support of their impeachment against him for high misdemeanors in office.

ARTICLE.

That the said James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, at a term of the said court, holden at St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, on the 4th Monday in December, 1825, did, under and by virtue of the power and authority vested in the said court, by he act of the Congress of the United States, entitled "An act enabling the claimants to lands within the limits of the State of Missouri and Territory of Arkansas to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims," approved on the 26th day of May, 1824, render a final decree of the said court in favor of the United States, and against the validity of the claim of the petitioners, in a certain matter or cause depending in the said court, under the said act, and before that time prosecuted in the said court, before the said judge, by Julie Soulard, widow of Antoine Soulard, and James G. Soulard, Henry G. Soulard, Eliza Soulard, and Benjamin A. Soulard, children and heirs at law of the said Antoine Soulard, petitioners against the United States, praying for the confirmation of their claim, under the said act, to certain lands situated in the said State of Missouri; and the said court did, thereafter, on the 30th day of December, in the said year, adjourn to sit again on the third Monday in April, 1826.

And the said petitioners did, and at the December term of the said court, holden by and before the said James H. Peck, judge as aforesaid, in due form of law, under the said act, appeal against the United States from the judgment and decree so made and entered in the said matter, to the Supreme Court of the United States; of which appeal, so made and taken in the said district court, the said James H. Peck, judge of the said court, had then and there full notice. And the said James H. Peck, after the said matter or cause had so been duly appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, and on or about the 30th day of March, 1826, did cause to be published, in a certain public newspaper, printed at the city of St. Louis, called "The Missouri Republican," a certain communication, prepared by the said James H. Peck, purporting to be the opinion of the said James H. Peck, as judge of the said court, in the matter or cause aforesaid, and purporting to set forth the reasons of the said James H. Peck, as such judge, for the said decree; and that Luke Edward Lawless, a citizen of the United States, and an attorney and counsellor at law in the said district court, and who had been of counsel for the petitioners in the said court, in the matter aforesaid, did, thereafter, and on or about the 8th day of April, 1826, cause to be published in a certain other newspaper, printed at the city of St. Louis, called "The Missouri Advocate and St. Louis Enquirer," a certain article signed "A Citizen," and purporting to contain an exposition of certain errors of doctrine and fact alleged to be contained in the opinion of the said James H. Peck, as before that time so published, which publication by the said Luke Edward Lawless was to the effect following, viz:

"To the Editor:

"SIR: I have read, with the attention which the subject deserves, the opinion of Judge Peck on the claim of the widow and heirs of Antoine Soulard, published in the Republican of the 30th ultimo. I observe that, although the judge has thought proper to decide against the claim, he leaves the grounds of his decree open for further discussion.

"Availing myself, therefore, of this permission, and considering the opinion so published to be a fair subject of examination to every citizen who feels himself interested in, or aggrieved by, its operation, I beg leave to point the attention of the public to some of the principal errors which I think I have discovered in it. In doing so, I shall confine myself to little more than an enumeration of those errors, without entering into any demonstration or developed reasoning on the subject. This would require more space than a newspaper allows, and, besides, is not, as regards most of the points, absolutely necessary.

"Judge Peck, in this opinion, seems to me to have erred in the following assumptions, as well of fact as of doctrine:

"1. That, by the ordinance of 1754, a subdelegate was prohibited from making a grant in consideration of services rendered or to be rendered.

"2. That a subdelegate in Louisiana was not a subdelegate, as contemplated by the said ordinance.

"3. That O'Reily's regulations, made in February, 1770, can be considered as demonstrative of the extent of the granting power of either the governor-general or the subdelegates, under the royal order of August, 1790.

"4. That the royal order of August, 1770 (as recited or referred to in the preamble to the regulations of Morales, of July, 1799), related exclusively to the governor-general.

"5. That the word 'mercedes,' in the ordinance of 1754, which, in the Spanish language, means 'gifts,' can be narrowed, by anything in that ordinance, or in any other law, to the idea of a grant to an Indian, or a reward to an informer, and much less to a mere sale for money.

"6. That O'Reily's regulations were in their terms applicable, or ever were in fact applied to, or published in, upper Louisiana.

"7. That the regulations of O'Reily have any bearing on the grant to Antoine Soulard, or that such a grant was contemplated by them.

"8. That the limitations to a square league of grants to new settlers in Opelousas, Attakapas, and Natchitoches (in eighth article of O'Reily's regulations) prohibits a larger grant in upper Louisiana.

"9. That the regulations of the governor-general, Gayoso, dated 9th September, 1797, entitled 'Instructions to be observed for the admission of new settlers,' prohibit, in future, a grant for services, or have the effect of annulling that to Antoine Soulard, which was made in 1796, and not located or surveyed until February, 1804.

"10. That the complete titles made by Gayoso are not to be referred to as affording the construction made by Gayoso himself, of his own regulations.

"11. That, although the regulations of Morales were not promulgated as law in upper Louisiana, the grantee in the principal case was bound by them, inasmuch as he had notice, or must be presumed, 'from the official station which he held,' to have had notice, of their terms.

"12. That the regulations of Morales 'exclude all belief that any law existed under which a confirmation of the title in question could have been claimed.'

"13. That the complete titles (produced to the court) made by the governor-general, or the intendant-general, though based on incomplete titles, not conformable to the regulations of O'Reily, Gayoso, or Morales, afford no inference in favor of the power of the lieutenant-governor, from whom these incomplete titles emanated, and must be considered as anomalous exercises of power in favor of individual grantees.

"14. That the language of Morales himself, in the complete titles issued by him, on concessions made by the lieutenant-governor of upper Louisiana, anterior to the date of his regulations, ought not to be referred to as furnishing the construction which he, Morales, put on his own regulations.

"15. That the uniform practice of the subdelegates, or lieutenant-governor of upper Louisiana, from the first establishment of that province to the 10th March, 1804, is to be disregarded as proof of law, usage, or custom therein.

"16. That the historical fact that nineteen-twentieths of the titles to lands in upper Lousiana were not only incomplete but not conformable to the regulations of O'Reily, Gayoso, or Morales at the date of the cession to the United States, affords no inference in favor of the general legality of those titles.

"17. That the fact that incomplete concessions, whether floating or located, were, previous to the cession, treated and considered by the Government and population of Louisiana as property, salable, transferable, and the subject of inheritance and distribution ab intestato, furnishes no inference in favor of those titles, or to their claim to the protection of the treaty of cession, or of the law of nations.

"18. That the laws of Congress heretofore passed in favor of incomplete titles furnish no argument or protecting principle in favor of those titles of a precisely similar character, which remain unconfirmed.

"In addition to the above, a number of other errors, consequential on those indicated, might be stated. The judge's doctrine as to the forfeiture which he contends is inflicted by Morales's regulations, seems to me to be peculiarly pregnant with grievous consequences. I shall, however, not tire the reader with any further enumeration, and shall detain him only to observe, by way of conclusion, that the judge's recollection of the argument of the counsel for the petitioner, as delivered at the bar, differs materially from what I can remember, who also heard it. In justice to the counsel I beg to observe that all that I have now submitted to the public has been suggested by that argument as spoken, and by the printed report of it, which is even now before me.

"A CITIZEN."

And the said James H. Peck, judge as aforesaid, unmindful of the solemn duties of his station, and that he held the same, by the Constitution of the United States, during good behavior only, with intention wrongfully and unjustly to oppress, imprison, and otherwise injure the said Luke Edward Lawless, under color of law, did, thereafter, at a term of the said district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, begun and held at the city of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, on the 3d Monday in April, 1826, arbitrarily, oppressively, and unjustly, and under the further color and pretense that the said Luke Edward Lawless was answerable to the said court for the said publication signed "A Citizen," as for a contempt thereof, institute, in the said court, before him, the said James H. Peck, judge as aforesaid, certain proceedings against the said Luke Edward Lawless, in a summary way, by attachment issued for that purpose by the order of the said James H. Peck, as such judge, against the person of the said Luke Edward Lawless, touching the said pretended contempt, under and by virtue of which said attachment the said Luke Edward Lawless was, on the 21st day of April, 1826, arrested, imprisoned, and brought into the said court, before the said judge, in the custody of the marshal of the said State, and the said James H. Peck, judge as aforesaid, did, afterwards, on the same day, under the color and pretenses aforesaid, and with the intent aforesaid, in the said court, then and there, unjustly, oppressively, and arbitrarily, order and adjudge that the said Luke Edward Lawless, for the cause aforesaid, should be committed to prison for the period of twenty-four hours, and that he should be suspended from practicing as an attorney or counsellor at law in the said district court for the period of eighteen calendar months from that day, and did then and there further cause the said unjust and oppressive sentence to be carried into execution; and the said Luke Edward Lawless was, under color of the said sentence, and by the order of the said James H. Peck, judge as aforesaid, thereupon suspended from practicing as such attorney or counsellor in the said court for the period aforesaid, and immediately committed to the common prison in the said city of St. Louis, to the great disparagement of public justice, the abuse of judicial authority, and to the subversion of the liberties of the people of the United States.

And the House of Representatives, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting, at any time hereafter, any further articles, or other accusations or impeachment, against the said James H. Peck, and also of replying to his answers which he shall make unto the article herein preferred against him, and of offering proof to the same, and every part thereof, and to all and every other articles, accusation, or impeachment, which shall be exhibited by them as the case shall require, do demand that the said James H. Peck may be put to answer the misdemeanors herein charged against him, and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments, may be thereupon had and given, as may be agreeable to law and justice.

A. STEVENSON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, United States.

Attest:
M. ST. CLAIR CLARKE,
Clerk House of Representatives, United States.

The Vice-President then informed the managers that the Senate would take proper order thereon, of which the House of Representatives should have due notice.

The managers, by their chairman, delivered the article of impeachment at the table of the Secretary, and then withdrew.

On motion by Mr. Tazewell, it was Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to issue a summons, in the usual form, to James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, to answer a certain article of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives on this day; that the said summons be returnable here on Tuesday next, the 11th instant, and be served by the Sergeant-at-Arms, or some person to be deputed by him, at least three days before the return day thereof; and that the Secretary communicate this resolution to the House of Representatives.

On motion by Mr. Tazewell,

The court then adjourned to Tuesday next at 12 o'clock.

On the same day, in the House, the managers reported:[1]

That they did, this day, carry to the Senate, then in session as a high court of impeachment, the article of impeachment agreed to by this House on the 1st instant, and that they were informed that they would take proper measures relative to the said impeachment, of which the House would be duly notified.

A little later, on the same day, the Secretary of the Senate communicated[2] a message:

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
HIGH COURT OF IMPEACHMENT,
Tuesday, May 4, 1830.

The United States v. James H. Peck.

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to issue a summons, etc. [here follows the text of the resolution already given above].

Attest:

WALTER LOWRIE, Secretary.

Form of proclamation of Sergeant-at-Arms enjoining silence at the opening of the high court of impeachment for the Peck trial.

Form used by the Sergeant-at-Arms in calling Judge Peck to appear and answer the article.

Form of return made by the Sergeant-at-Arms in the Peck trial, and oath taken by him at the time.

Ceremonies at the appearance of Judge Peck in response to the writ of summons.

Judge Peck appeared in person, attended by counsel, in answer to the writ of summons.

Having appeared, Judge Peck asked time to prepare his answer, accompanying the request with an affidavit.

The Senate declined to allow Judge Peck until the next session of Congress to file his answer, and set an earlier date.

The answer of Judge Peck to the article of impeachment was ordered to be filed with the Secretary.

The Senate notified the House of the date fixed for Judge Peck to file his answer.

On May 11,[3] the high court of impeachment was opened by proclamation of silence by the Sergeant-at-Arms, as follows:

Oyez! Oyez! Oyez! Silence is commanded on pain of imprisonment while the Senate of the United States is sitting as a high court of impeachment for the trial of James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri.

The return of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the summons issued to James H. Peck was read, as follows:

I, Mountjoy Bayly, Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate of the United States, in obedience to the within summons, to me directed, did proceed to Barnum's Hotel, in the city of Baltimore, on Thursday, the 6th instant, and did then and there deliver to, and leave with, the within-named James H. Peck a true copy of the within writ of summons and a true copy of the precept thereon indorsed, and did show him both.

MOUNTJOY BAYLY.

WASHINGTON, May 8, 1830.

The Secretary then administered the following oath to the Sergeant-at Arms:

You, Mountjoy Bayly, Sergeant-at-Arms to the Senate of the United States, do swear that the return made and subscribed by you upon the process issued on the 4th day of May, instant, by the Senate of the United States against James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, is truly made, and that you have performed said services as therein described. So help you God.

Proclamation was then made as follows:

Oyez, oyez, oyez. James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, come forward and answer the article of impeachment exhibited against you by the House of Representatives.

Whereupon James H. Peck appeared at the bar, attended by William Wirt, as his counsel, and they were seated within the bar.

The Vice-President informed Judge Peck that the court was ready to receive his answer.

Judge Peck rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: I appear, in obedience to a summons from this honorable court, to answer an article of impeachment exhibited against me by the honorable the House of Representatives; and I have a motion to make, which I request may be done by my counsel.

The Vice-President having signified the willingness of the court to receive the motion,

Mr. Wirt rose and read a letter addressed to the President of the Senate and signed by the respondent, in which were set forth the necessity of time to prepare a defense, and in which was also included a motion, respectfully submitted:

1. That a reasonable time may be allowed me to prepare my answer and plea; and, for this purpose, I ask until the 25th day of the present month.

2. That, after my answer and plea shall be filed, process for witnesses may be awarded to me, and a reasonable time may be allowed to collect my witnesses and proofs from the State of Missouri.

The communication also referred to an accompanying affidavit. In this affidavit James H. Peck made oath that certain named persons were material witnesses for him, that there were other witnesses not named who would be material, and that there were certain public records needful to his defense; and that in order to produce these the delay asked for was not too much. He further made oath that his application was not for purposes of delay.

The reading having concluded, Mr. Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts, then submitted the following order:

Ordered, That James H. Peck file his answer and plea with the Secretary of the Senate to the article of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives, on or before the second Monday of the next session of Congress.

On motion of Mr. George M. Bibb, of Kentucky, this order was amended by striking out all after the words "on or before" and inserting "the 25th day of the present month;" and as amended the order was agreed to.

It was further—

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the foregoing order to the House of Representatives and to James H. Peck.

On the same day this message was duly communicated to the House.[1]

In the Peck trial new rules were not adopted, the rules framed in the Chase trial being considered as operative.

On May 11,[2] also, the Senate (not the high court of impeachment) agreed to the following:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate direct copies of the rules of proceedings, prescribed in cases of impeachment, to be printed for the use of the Members, and laid on their tables on the first day of the next session of the court; and also that copies be furnished to the managers of the impeachment in the case of James H. Peck and to the accused and his counsel.

The rules referred to are those agreed upon at the trial of Samuel Chase. They are printed as a footnote in the Journal of the impeachment; but they were not acted on in any way by the court at this time, being treated as existing rules.[3]

In the Peck trial the House decided to attend its managers at the presentation of the answer but not during the trial.

On May 25,[4] in the House, Mr. Storrs, of New York, observed that, as the Senate would meet to-day as a court of impeachment for the purpose of receiving the answer of the respondent, Judge Peck, it was indispensable that the House come to some order immediately on the subject. He therefore moved a resolution that the House would, in Committee of the Whole, attend the Senate during the trial of James H. Peck. Mr. Storrs argued that the resolution was in accordance with former usage and that the House should be present during every day of the trial. The appointment of managers was not intended to dispense with the presence of the House. The managers could take no step without consulting the House, which must, therefore, be present.

On the other hand, Mr. Pettis and Mr. Joel B. Sutherland, of Pennsylvania, insisted that the presence of the managers alone would be sufficient, and that if the House were to attend daily the other business would suffer. Mr. Sutherland said it would be very proper to go to the Senate to-day, and be present at the opening of the court for the impeachment, and receiving the answer of the accused; but afterwards, unless some very pressing occasion should require it, the presence of the House would be unnecessary. The object in appointing managers was to leave it to them to conduct the impeachment. He cited Jefferson's Manual to sustain his opinion, and moved to modify the resolution so as to provide that the House would attend this day.

In accordance with this suggestion, the resolution was modified and agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That this House will, this day, at such hour as the Senate shall appoint, resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, and attend in the Senate on the trial of the impeachment there pending of James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri.

Arrangement of the Hall and ceremonies at the presentation of Judge Peck's answer.

Form of answer of Judge Peck in answer of the article of impeachment.

Judge Peck, in his plea, declared that the acts charged were justified by the law of the land.

The answer in the Peck case was read by counsel for respondent and then delivered to the Secretary.

Form of journal entry describing the attendance of the House in Committee of the Whole at the Peck trial.

The House was furnished by the court with a copy of Judge Peck's answer.

On the same day, May 25,[1] in the high court of impeachment, at the hour of 12 o'clock, the court was opened by proclamation in the usual form.

On motion by Mr. Webster, it was Ordered, That the Secretary give notice to the House of Representatives that the Senate are now in their Chamber and are ready to proceed on the trial of the impeachment of James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri; and that seats are provided for the accommodation of the Members of the House of Representatives.

And this notice was duly received by the House.[2]

In the high court seats had been arranged on the right and left of the Chair, for the accommodation of the Senators, and their seats assigned to the managers and Members of the House of Representatives, and the accused and his counsel.

Judge Peck appeared, accompanied by William Wirt and Jonathan Meredith as his counsel, and they occupied seats assigned them to the right of the Chair.

The managers and Members of the House of Representatives appeared and took the seats usually occupied by the Senate.

The Vice-President then asked Judge Peck whether he was prepared to answer the article of impeachment exhibited against him.

Judge Peck replied that his answer and plea were prepared and desired that they might be read by his counsel.

The Vice-President asked Judge Peck whether the answer now to be made was to be considered as his final answer on which he intended to rely; and the judge having answered in the affirmative, the counsel was directed to proceed to read it.

Mr. Meredith read the answer (which occupied upward of two hours). In form the answer began as follows:

The answer of James H. Peck to the article of impeachment exhibited against him by the honorable House of Representatives of the United States.

The said James H. Peck, saving to himself all exceptions whatsoever to the said article and the charges therein contained, answers and says:

Here follows the answer in detail, and the conclusion:

In all which actions and doings of this respondent in the premises, he avers that he was supported and justified by the Constitution and laws of the land, and that he will be prepared to make good this averment at such time as this honorable court shall appoint.

And, solemnly denying the intention charged to him by the article of impeachment, "wrongfully and unjustly to oppress, imprison, and otherwise injure the said Luke E. Lawless, under color of law," and asserting, in the presence of the Supreme Searcher of Hearts, that in all that he did in the premises he was actuated by the purest sense of what he deemed a high official duty and was, as he believed and still confidently believes, well warranted and supported in every step by the Constitution and laws of the land, this respondent, for plea to the said article of impeachment, saith that he is not guilty of any high misdemeanor, as in and by the said article is alleged, and this he prays may be inquired of by this honorable court in such manner as law and justice shall seem to them to require.

JAMES H. PECK.

This answer, with sundry exhibits referred to therein, is spread on the Journal of the high court of impeachment. It was delivered to the Secretary of the Senate after the reading.

Mr. Storrs, in behalf of the managers, moved

That they have time to consult the House of Representatives on a replication, and that they be furnished with a copy of the answer of the respondent, which was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. Webster it was Ordered, That when this court adjourn, it adjourn to meet again on the second Monday of the next session of Congress, at 12 o'clock, then to proceed with the said impeachment.

Mr. Wirt desired to know whether blank summons as for the attendance of witnesses would be allowed to the respondent.

The Vice-President replied that they would.

The court then adjourned to the second Monday of the next session of Congress.

The House Journal of this day has this entry:[1]

The House then, in pursuance of a resolution agreed to this day, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, and proceeded in that capacity to the Senate Chamber, to attend the trial by the Senate of the impeachment against James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri; and, after sometime spent therein, the committee returned into the Chamber of the House; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. P. P. Barbour, of Virginia, from the said Committee of the Whole, reported that the committee had, according to order, attended the trial by the Senate of the said impeachment; that the answer and plea of the said James H. Peck were delivered in their presence; that some progress was made in said trial, and that the Senate, sitting as a high court of impeachment, had adjourned to meet again on the second Monday of the next session of Congress, at 12 o'clock.

And on May 31[2] the Congress adjourned.

A recess of Congress intervened between the filing of the answer and the presentation of the replication in the Peck trial.

Form of replication to Judge Peck's answer and forms of resolutions providing for its presentation.

Senators elected after the beginning of an impeachment trial are sworn as in the case of other Senators.

At the next session of Congress the proceedings were resumed where they had ended at the preceding session.

On December 13,[1] 1830, in the House,

Mr. Buchanan, on behalf of the managers appointed to conduct the impeachment against Judge James H. Peck, submitted the following report:

The committee of managers appointed by the House of Representatives to conduct the impeachment against James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, report that they have had under consideration the answer of Judge Peck to the article of impeachment exhibited against him by the House, and recommend the adoption of the following replication thereto:

REPLICATION.

By the House of Representatives of the United States to the answer and plea of James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, to the article of impeachment exhibited against him by the said House of Representatives.

The House of Representatives of the United States having considered the answer and plea of James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, to the article of impeachment against him by them exhibited, in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, reply that the said James H. Peck is guilty in such manner as he stands impeached; and that the House of Representatives will be ready to prove their charges against him at such convenient time and place as shall be appointed for that purpose.

The replication being read was agreed to by the House.

Thereupon, on motion of Mr. Buchanan,

Resolved, That the foregoing replication be put into the answer and plea of the aforesaid James H. Peck on behalf of this House; and that the managers be instructed to maintain the said replication at the bar of the Senate, at such time as shall be appointed by the Senate.

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House have agreed to a replication on their part to the answer and plea of James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, to the article of impeachment exhibited to the Senate against him by this House, and have directed the managers appointed to conduct the said impeachment to carry the said replication to the Senate, and to maintain the same at the bar of the Senate, at such time as shall be appointed by the Senate.

On the same day[2] the high court of impeachment was opened by proclamation,[3] and the President[4] administered the oath to Messrs. David J. Baker, of Illinois, and George Poindexter, of Mississippi, newly-elected Senators who had taken their seats at the first of the session.

On motion of Mr. Levi Woodbury, of New Hampshire,

[3] The Debates say that this proclamation was made by the marshal of the District of Columbia.

Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate are in their public Chamber, and are ready to proceed on the trial of the impeachment of James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, and that seats are provided for the accommodation of the Members.

The message from the House of Representatives announcing that the managers had been directed to carry the replication was received.

The respondent, accompanied by Mr. Wirt and Mr. Meredith, his counsel, appeared at the bar of the Senate. They were conducted to seats, with a table before them, prepared for their convenience.

In a few minutes the managers to conduct the impeachment on the part of the House of Representatives also came in and took their seats.

Mr. Buchanan, one of the managers, rose and said that the managers, on the part of the House of Representatives, were ready to present the replication of that House, to the answer and plea of James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him by that body. He then read the replication, after which it was handed to the Secretary to be filed.

In the Peck trial, after the witnesses had been called, the court granted the request of the managers for delay to await a material witness.

The President then informed the managers that they were at liberty to proceed in support of the article of impeachment exhibited.

On request of Mr. Buchanan the witnesses on behalf of the managers were called; and on request of Mr. Meredith the witnesses for the respondent were also called.

Then it was—

Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate will, on Monday next, at 12 o'clock, be ready further to proceed on the trial of the impeachment of James H. Peck, judge. * * *

The court then adjourned to Monday next at 11 o'clock.

The House attended its managers a portion of the time during the Peck trial, including the days of final argument.

The subject of attendance with the managers was discussed during the Peck trial, with citation of American and English precedents.

The court of impeachment provided that the House should be notified daily of its sittings.

The court of impeachment may adjourn over without interfering with session of the Senate in the interim.

When the managers had returned to the House,[1] a question was raised over the fact that the House itself had not attended the managers. Mr. Buchanan said that no motion had been made on the subject, and the managers had felt it their duty to go and present the replication without awaiting action. As to the question of attendance generally, with the permission of the House he would state the course that had been pursued by the managers. They had examined all the precedents which had occurred in this country to guide them to a correct performance of their duty. It was ascertained that since the adoption of the present Constitution there had been three impeachments, viz, those of Messrs. Blount and Pickering and Judge Chase. On the trial of the first two the House did not attend in a body, but left it to the managers to conduct the impeachment; on the trial of Judge Chase, they did attend every day. It not being considered by the managers of the pending trial that any principle so important as to interrupt the legislative business of the House was involved in the present case, they had gone to the Senate this day, as managers, and presented to that body the replication agreed upon by the House. Mr. Buchanan further remarked that he had consulted the English precedents. On the trial of Warren Hastings the House of Commons attended at the commencement of the trial, but they did not continue to do so. On the trial of the Earl of Macclesfield they did not attend until his conviction by the House of Lords; and then they attended in consequence of a message having been sent them by that body that they were ready to pronounce judgment on the impeached, if the House of Commons would attend and demand it.

This question arose from time to time during the trial. On December 20,[1] when the trial was to begin, Mr. Michael Hoffman, of New York, proposed an order that the House, from time to time, resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to attend, but after discussion as to the state of the general business before the House, it was decided to modify the proposition so as to provide merely for attendance on that day. On December 22[2] a proposed order that the House attend each day until otherwise ordered was disagreed to, yeas 83, nays 88. On December 23,[3] by a vote of yeas 96, nays 30, it was—

Resolved, That during the trial of the impeachment now pending before the Senate this House will meet daily at the hour of 11 o'clock in the forenoon; and that, from day to day, it will resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole and attend said trial during the continuance thereof, and until the conclusion of the same.

The House acted in accordance with this resolution until January 4,[4] when the vote agreeing to it was reconsidered, and then the resolution was disagreed to, yeas 69, nays 118. Thereupon Mr. Kensey Johns, jr., of Delaware, proposed this resolution:

Resolved, That a message be sent by the Clerk of the House, informing the Senate that the House of Representatives decline further attendance during the trial of the impeachment of Judge Peck.

This was criticised as likely to give an impression that the House had abandoned the impeachment. Finally, after being amended, on motion of Mr. Storrs, the resolution was agreed to in this form:

Resolved, That the managers appointed to conduct the impeachment of James H. Peck be instructed to attend the trial of the said impeachment, at such times as the Senate shall appoint for that purpose; and that the attendance of the House be dispensed with until otherwise ordered by the House, and that the Clerk communicate this resolution to the Senate.

On January 17 [1] it was resolved by the House that "during the argument of counsel in the impeachment" this House "will, from day to day, resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and attend the same."

And in accordance with this order the House attended until the end of the session.

On December 24,[2] after the House had decided to attend each day, the high court of impeachments—

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives, from day to day, that the Senate is sitting as a high court of impeachment for the trial of James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri.

And on January 3, 1831,[3] when it was ordered that the adjournment of the high court on that day (a Monday) be to Wednesday, it was also ordered that the House be informed. It may be noted that while the high court of impeachment adjourned over January 4, the Senate itself was in session on that day.

The presentation of evidence and the arguments in the Peck trial.

On the final arguments in the Peck trial the managers had the opening and closing.

In the Peck trial a Senator was examined as a witness on behalf of respondent.

On receipt of a letter from a physician, showing the illness of one of Judge Peck's counsel, the court adjourned.

On Monday, December 20,[4] the court having been opened by proclamation, and the managers accompanied by the House of Representatives, and the respondent accompanied by his counsel having attended, at the request of Mr. Meredith the witnesses in behalf of the respondent were called. Although one or two material witnesses failed to answer, Mr. Meredith announced that they were ready to go to trial.

The President informed the managers that they might now proceed to substantiate their charge.

Mr. McDuffie thereupon proceeded to open the cause, and concluded on the succeeding day. Then, on December 21 [5] and thereafter until January 5, 1831, witnesses were called for the managers, the same being cross-examined on behalf of the respondent.

On January 5,[6] Mr. Meredith opened the defense and began the introduction of testimony, which continued to January 17.

On January 11,[7] Thomas H. Benton, a Senator from Missouri, was sworn on behalf of the respondent.

On January 13,[1] the Vice-President communicated a letter from the physician attending Mr. Wirt, one of the counsel for the respondent, stating that Mr. Wirt would be unable to attend until the 17th. Thereupon the high court adjourned until that date. Once previously it had adjourned for the same reason at request of counsel and with consent of managers.

On January 17,[2] Mr. Spencer, on behalf of the managers, commenced the argument in support of the article of impeachment, and on January 18, Mr. Wickliffe, also on behalf of the managers, continued.

On January 19,[3] Mr. Meredith commenced the argument on behalf of the respondent, and continued until January 22, when Mr. Wirt continued the argument for the respondent until January 25, when he concluded.

From January 26 to 29,[4] Messrs. Storrs and Buchanan occupied the time with the arguments for the managers.

In the arguments in the Peck trial the managers resisted the theory that impeachment might be only for indictable offenses.

Argument of Mr. Manager Spencer on the nature of impeachable offenses.

In the course of the argument the managers and counsel for respondent considered not only the evidence and law applicable to the article itself, but discussed the nature of the power of impeachment. Mr. Manager Spencer said:[5]

It is necessary to a right understanding of the impeachment to ascertain and define what offenses constitute judicial misdemeanors. A judicial misdemeanor consists, in my opinion, in doing an illegal act, colore officii, with bad motives, or in doing an act within the competency of the court or judge in some cases, but unwarranted in a particular case from the facts existing in that case, with bad motives. To illustrate the last proposition: The eighth article of the amendments of the Constitution forbids the requirement of excessive bail, the imposition of excessive fines, or the infliction of cruel or unusual punishments. If a judge should disregard these provisions, and from bad motives violate them, his offense would consist, not in the want of power, but in the manner of his executing an authority intrusted to him, and for exceeding a just and lawful discretion.

Argument of Mr. Manager Wickliffe on the constitutional provisions relating to impeachment.

Mr. Manager Wickliffe said:[6]

I do not know that it will be contended by the counsel for the respondent, as it has been on a former impeachment before the Senate of the United States, with great ability and apparent confidence, "that a judge can not be impeached for any offense which is not indictable; that the Constitution declares the judges shall be removed from office by impeachment for treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors;" consequently as nothing less than the commission of some offense which may be punishable by indictment, presentment, or information comes within the known interpretation of the terms "high crimes and misdemeanors," no act, judicial or otherwise, unless indictable, is impeachable.

I do not agree with this interpretation of the Constitution. * * *

I maintain the proposition that any official act committed or omitted by the judge, which is in in violation of the condition upon which he holds his office, is an impeachable offense under the Constitution. * * *

[6] Report of the trial of James H. Peck, pp. 308–310.

The framers of the Constitution wisely limited the punishment which this court may award, fixing a point beyond which you can not go, but leaving you in the exercise of a sound discretion to make it less than removal from office. They were governed by equal wisdom when they left the official delinquent to answer personally to the offended laws of the State in which he had committed any crime or misdemeanor against their injunctions.

The offense for which an officer may be impeached might not, in the judgment of his triers (though deserving punishment), require the infliction of the severer punishment, that of removal from and disqualification for office. It might not deserve both of these penalties, perhaps neither; a reprimand, a temporary suspension of his functions and salary, might, in particular cases, be a punishment equal to the official misdemeanor.

If nothing else had been said in this Constitution upon the subject of impeachment, who would doubt the plenitude of power, the nature of the punishment, or the objects upon which Congress could exercise it? But, sir, the members of the convention, as if solemnly impressed with the danger to the judiciary and other departments of the Government, resulting from the humanity and mercy of the members of the tribunal for the trial of impeachment; or, perhaps, looking at the dark side of the picture of human nature, believing it possible that the time might come when a judge or other officer, though stained with the foul crime of treason and bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors, would find favor in the sympathies, or cover in the bad passions of his triers, who would blush, however, to pronounce him not guilty in the face of conclusive evidence; but who would, nevertheless, diminish the punishment under the discretionary power in the first article, and leave the traitor or convicted felon to disgrace the judicial ermine or official robe. To guard against this possible state of the case, * * * the members of the convention intended, by the sixth section of the second article, to declare what shall be the punishment to be awarded by the court of impeachment for the enumerated offenses of treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors; hence they declared that "the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." This language is imperative; it leaves you no discretion; you can not stop short of removal from office; you can not exceed it,

If the construction of the Constitution which was contended for in the impeachment to which I have referred be the true reading of the instrument, and it shall be decided that no offense, no conduct of an officer, unless it be a high crime and misdemeanor, within the technical meaning of these terms, and punishable by some known and existing criminal law, is impeachable, what would be the condition of our Government, and especially the judicial department? No matter what was the conduct of a judge in or out of court, if he kept himself without the pains and penalties enacted for the punishment of treason, felony, and vice, in the most degraded of civil society, no power exists to strip him of the judicial character which he degraded. He would, covered with disgrace and immorality, smile with contempt at your power, and shield himself under the imputed ignorance of the members of the convention.

A few cases will, I think, suffice to prove the fallacy of such a construction of the Constitution. Suppose a judge, who is bound to open his court at stated periods for the trial of causes, fulfills the letter of the law, opens his court at the regular stated terms, but as regularly adjourns, and refuses to hear and decide the causes pending in court. This, sir, would be no indictable offense under any law; yet I am inclined to believe this court would remove him from office for official misconduct, for misbehavior in office, a forfeiture of the condition upon which he held his commission.

Suppose a judge, under the influence of political feeling, * * * shall award to his favorite a new trial, in an important cause, against known law, would this be an indictable offense under any code of laws in force in this Government?

Suppose a judge shall forget the dignity which belongs to the station he fills, and to disregard that decorum which should ever regulate the conduct of a judge, in and out of court, shall, while in court, take advantage of his situation, and labor for two hours in pouring forth his abuse and vituperation upon a respectable and unoffending citizen, whom he has dragged before him by the strong arm of usurped power—in what court would you file your indictment against him, for a high misdemeanor? * * *

Take the case of the President of the United States. Suppose him base enough, or foolish enough, if you please, to refuse his sanction to any and every act which Congress may pass. This is a power which, according to the Constitution, he can exercise. Will it be contended that he could be indicted for it, as a misdemeanor, in any court, State or Federal? Yet where is the man who would hesitate to remove him from office by impeachment? If one of the heads of a department shall so far forget the obligations of his official duty as to direct his power and patronage, not to the promotion of the welfare of the country, but with the known and avowed purpose of his own personal or political aggrandizement, who would think of finding an indictment in a criminal court of justice against him? Yet who would not remove him from office by impeachment?

If precedent is to have any authority in this court, I consider the question settled by the Senate of the United States in the trial of Judge Pickering, of New Hampshire. The principal charge exhibited against him was a disregard of a plain statute of the United States, which makes it the duty of a district court, before restoration of goods libeled for a violation of the revenue laws of the United States, to the claimant in court, to take from him bond and security to return the goods or to perform the judgment of the court. Upon this charge the Senate found him guilty and removed him from office. He was also charged with intemperance, which, though a misdemeanor, has never been denominated or regarded by the laws of any country a "high misdemeanor."

Argument of Mr. Manager Buchanan on the nature of impeachable offenses.

Argument that the proof of intention is not necessary in an impeachment trial to secure punishment for the fact.

Mr. Manager Buchanan said:[1]

The Constitution of the United States declares the tenure of the judicial office to be "during good behavior." Official misbehavior, therefore, in a judge is a forfeiture of his office. But when we say this we have advanced only a small distance. Another question meets us. What is misbehavior in office? In answer to this question, and without pretending to furnish a definition, I freely admit that we are bound to prove that the respondent has violated the Constitution or some known law of the land. This, I think, was the principle fairly to be deduced from all the arguments on the trial of Judge Chase, and from the votes of the Senate in the articles of impeachment against him, in opposition to the principle for which his counsel in the first instance strenuously contended, that in order to render an offense impeachable it must be indictable. But this violation of law may consist in the abuse, as well as in the usurpation of authority. The abuse of a power which has been given may be as criminal as the usurpation of a power which has not been granted. Can there be any doubt of this? Suppose a man to be indicted for an assault and battery. He is tried and found guilty, and the judge, without any circumstances of peculiar aggravation having been shown, fines him a thousand dollars and commits him to prison for one year. Now, although the judge may possess the power to fine and imprison for this offense, at his discretion, would not this punishment be such an abuse of judicial discretion and afford such evidence of the tyrannical and arbitrary exercise of power as would justify the House of Representatives in voting an impeachment? But why need I fancy cases? Can fancy imagine a stronger case than is now, in point of fact, before us? A member of the bar is brought before a court of the United States guilty, if you please, of having published a libel on the judge—a libel, however, perfectly decorous in its terms and imputing no criminal intention, and so difficult of construction that though the counsel for the respondent have labored for hours to prove it to be a libel, still that question remains doubtful. If, in this case, the judge has degraded the author by imprisonment and deprived him of the means of earning bread for himself and his family by suspending him from the practice of his profession for eighteen months, would not this be a cruel and oppressive use of authority, even admitting the power to punish in such a case to be possessed by the judge?

A gross abuse of granted power and an usurpation of power not granted are offenses equally worthy of and liable to impeachment. If therefore the gentleman could establish, on the firmest foundation, that the power to punish libels as contempts may be legally exercised by all the courts of the United States, still he would not have proceeded far toward the acquittal of his client. * * *

It has been contended that even supposing the judge to have transcended his power and violated the law, yet he can not be convicted unless the Senate should believe he did the act with criminal intention. It has been said that crime consists in two things—a fact and an intention; and in support of this proposition the legal maxim has been quoted that "actus non fit reum, nisi mens rea." This may be true as a general proposition, and yet it may have but a slight bearing upon the present case. Did the gentlemen mean to contend that before the judge could be convicted we must prove by positive testimony malice in his breast, a lurking emnity against Mr. Lawless and the purpose of gratifying a base revenge? I should suppose that to have been the reason for which they asked so many questions to show that the judge and Mr. Lawless had previously been upon good terms. This argument may be answered with great force in the strong language of the respondent himself in his answer to the article of impeachment. "Both in law and morals (says the judge) every man is presumed to intend the natural consequences of his own actions." This was the rule by which he tried Mr. Lawless. He took up the article signed "A Citizen" and from that article alone he inferred the intention of its author. In doing this he acted correctly; but his jaundiced mind and wounded vanity had so diseased his perceptions that he saw burnt letters upon the scroll, although in themselves they were perfectly innocent and harmless. * * *

I admit that if the charge against a judge be merely an illegal decision on a question of property, in a civil cause, his error ought to be gross and palpable, indeed, to justify the inference of a criminal intention and to convict him upon an impeachment. And yet one case of this character has occurred in our history. Judge Pickering was tried and condemned upon all the four articles exhibited against him, although the three first contained no other charge than that of making decisions contrary to law in a cause involving a mere question of property, and then refusing to grant the party injured an appeal from his decision, to which he was entitled.

And yet am I to be told that if a judge shall do an act which is in itself criminal, if he shall, in an arbitrary and oppressive manner, and without the authority of law, imprison a citizen of this country, and thus consign him to infamy, you are not to infer his intention from the act? Is not the act itself the best source from which to draw the inference? * * *

The fourth article of impeachment exhibited against Judge Pickering charged him with having appeared upon the bench in a state of total intoxication. This was gross official misbehavior. Would the Senate in that case have gravely listened to an argument to prove that the judge might have got drunk without an evil intention? Certainly not. The act was done. The tribunal had been disgraced, and the Senate inferred his intention from his conduct and turned him out of office.

Mr. William Wirt argued in defense of Judge Peck that a judge might not be impeached for a mere mistake of the law without guilty intent.

Mr. William Wirt's argument that intent was not established by proof of the mere commission of an unlawful act.

Arguing for the respondent, Mr. Wirt said:[1]

Even if the judge were proved to have mistaken the law, that would not warrant a conviction, unless the guilt of intention be also established. For a mere mistake of the law is no crime or misdemeanor in a judge. It is the intention that is the essence of every crime. The maxim is (for the principal is so universally admitted that it has grown into a maxim) actus non facit reum nisi mens sit rea.

Sir, if the impeachment had not contained the charge of the guilty intention the respondent, under the advice of his counsel, would have demurred to it; not by any special demurrer to the form, but a general demurrer to the substance, for the intention is the substance of the crime. The honorable managers who prepared this article of impeachment were perfectly aware of this and have, therefore, very properly charged the intention in express terms. Sir, it is a material part of the charge, and what it was material to charge it is material to prove. * * * One of the honorable managers, seeming to perceive the impossibility of satisfying any candid mind that the respondent was guilty of the intention charged, endeavored to escape this rule of the criminal law by contending that if they fixed on the respondent the commission of an unlawful act, the guilty intention charged in the impeachment followed as a necessary implication of law. This I deny; for then every mistake of law on the part of a judge would become a crime or a civil injury, for which he would be personally responsible. The honorable manager sought to illustrate his proposition by the cases of murder and forgery. "If," said he, "a party be proved to have committed a deliberate murder, will he not be presumed to have intended to commit murder? Is separate proof of intention ever required in such a case? Or if a man be proved to have committed forgery, will not the law infer the intention from the act?" This is plausible; let us examine its solidity: It is the proposition which they must maintain, and from which alone they can have any hope of success in this case. Is it sound?

Mr. Wirt then proceeded to discuss the crimes of murder and forgery to show that the guilty intention was part of the proof in such cases, since neither crime existed without guilty intention. Continuing, he said:

Another of the honorable managers (Mr. Wickliffe) has advanced a proposition so novel and so directly confronted by all the authorities, that had it not been for some other things that I have heard in this case, I should have heard it with unmixed surprise. The honorable manager tells us that "he cares not for proof of intention; that he cares not whether the judge acted wrong from ignorance or intention. That ignorance of the law is no excuse in an unlearned layman, much less in a learned judge. That every man is presumed to know the law, and a fortiori, a judge whose office it is to understand and administer the law. If, therefore, a judge through ignorance of the law has done that which he has no power to do, he is just as guilty in the eye of the law as if he had sinned intentionally against the light of knowledge."

Then, according to this process of reasoning, a mistake of the law by a judge is an impeachable offense. But is it possible that the honorable manager can mean to contend that a judge is answerable, either civilly or criminally, for an error of judgment; that he can be either sued, indicted, or impeached for such an error? If such be his meaning, he is in direct conflict with all the authorities on the subject. The question is not a new one. It has been long since settled both in England and the United States; and I am not aware that, for many centuries, any judge or advocate has, even by inadvertence, sanctioned or even countenanced the position which has been thrown out by the gentleman. From the reign of Edward III to the present day the current of authorities is clear and uniform the other way, and establish beyond controversy the principle that the judge of a court of record is not answerable either civilly or criminally for a mistake of judgment in his judicial character.

Mr. Wirt then discusses the case of Yates and Lansing, wherein the English authorities were reviewed by Chief Justice Kent, and says:

What does the judge declare would be an impeachable offense? The acting with knowledge (scienter) that the judge was violating the law—"the intentional violation of the law." The chancellor, he says, was bound to imprison the party if he considered his conduct as a contempt of court. He might have been mistaken in considering that as a contempt, which in truth was not one. But this would have been a mere error of judgment, for which he was not answerable either civilly much less criminally. If he knew it was not a contempt, and still punished it as one, it would have been an intentional violation of the law, which would have been an impeachable offense. Here is the very doctrine for which we are contending—that it is the guilty intention which forms the gist of the charge in every impeachment, and that a mere mistake of judgment is not an impeachable offense. * * *

I have examined, with all the attention and care in my power, the various cases of impeachment of judges, both in England and the United States, and I have not observed that any counsel, even under the severest stress of the evidence, has taken refuge in so bold a proposition as this which we are considering—that error of judgment is an impeachable offense. On the contrary, I think it will be found, on the strictest perusal of all the cases that have been cited, that the counsel on both sides have uniformly proceeded on the concession that the guilty intention is the gist of the impeachment.

The discussion of the power of impeachment was preliminary merely, the main force of the arguments going to the question of law as to the right of the judge to punish for contempt, and the question of fact as to his intention.

The Senate proceeded to judgment in the Peck case without prior deliberation in secret session.

The House accompanied its managers when the court pronounced judgment in the Peck impeachment.

Form of question put in ascertaining the judgment of the court in the Peck trial.

A Senator who had been a witness for respondent was excused from voting on the judgment in the Peck trial.

A Senator who had taken his seat after part of the testimony in the Peck trial had been taken was excused from voting.

Two-thirds not voting guilty, the Vice-President declared Judge Peck acquitted.

Judgment being rendered in the Peck impeachment, the Vice-President directed an adjournment sine die.

On Saturday, January 29,[1] at the conclusion of the arguments, on motion of Mr. Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts:

Resolved, That the Senate will, on Monday next, at 12 o'clock, proceed further on the trial of the article of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives of the United States against James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri.

On Monday, January 31,[2] the court was opened as usual, with proclamation. The managers, accompanied by the House of Representatives, attended. James H. Peck, the respondent, and his counsel also attended.

Mr. Littleton W. Tazewell, of Virginia, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That this court will now pronounce judgment upon James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri.

Mr. Tazewell observed that if there were one member of the court unprepared for a decision on this impeachment at this time, or preferred any other mode of proceeding to pronounce judgment, he would cheerfully withdraw the resolution.

No objection having been made, the resolution was unanimously adopted.

The names of the Senators were then called over by the Secretary.

The Secretary of the Senate, under the direction of the Vice-President, read the article of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri.

The Vice-President rose and said:

Senators: You have heard the article of impeachment read; you have heard the evidence and the arguments for and against the respondent; when your names are called you will rise from your seats and distinctly pronounce whether he is guilty or not guilty, as charged by the House of Representatives.

The Vice-President then, in an audible voice, put the following question to each of the Senators in alphabetical order:

Mr. Senator ———: What say you: Is James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, guilty or not guilty of the high misdemeanor charged in the article of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives?

Each Senator rose from his seat as this question was propounded to him, and answered.

Messrs. Thomas H. Benton, of Missouri, who had been a witness, and John M. Robinson, of Illinois, who had taken his seat on January 4, after the testimony for the managers had been concluded, were, on their request, excused from voting.

The vote having been ascertained, the Vice-President said:

Senators: Twenty-one Senators having voted that the respondent is guilty and 22 that he is not guilty, and two-thirds of the Senate not having voted for his conviction, it becomes the duty of the Chair to pronounce that James H. Peck, the judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri, stands acquitted of the charge exhibited against him by the House of Representatives.

The Vice-President then directed the marshal to adjourn the court of impeachment; and it was accordingly adjourned sine die.

A report of the acquittal of Judge Peck was made in the House in the report of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole.

Forms of reports made by a chairman of a Committee of the Whole after attending an impeachment trial. (Footnote.)

The House attended the Peck trial as a Committee of the Whole House. (Footnote.)

The journal of the House for this day has this entry:[1]

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, and proceeded to the Senate Chamber to attend the trial by the Senate of the impeachment of James H. Peck, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Missouri; and, after some time spent therein, the committee returned into the Chamber of the House; and, the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Cambreleng [Churchill, C., of New York], from the Committee of the Whole, reported that the committee had, according to order, attended the trial of the said impeachment, and that the said James H. Peck had been acquitted by the Senate of the matter whereof he stood charged by the House of Representatives, as contained in their article of impeachment exhibited against him.[2]

[2] The reports from day to day had been similar, but varied to meet the conditions. Usually they ended somewhat like this: "That further progress had been made therein, and that the court of impeachment had adjourned to meet again to-morrow, at 12 o'clock meridian." If no progress had been made, the report simply gave the hour to which the court had adjourned. (Journal, pp. 226, 229.) Mr. William D. Martin, of South Carolina, acted as chairman of the Committee of the Whole a portion of the time.

It is to be noticed that, while the impeachment had been considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House to attend the proceedings.

2385. The impeachment and trial of West H. Humphreys, United States judge for the several districts of Tennessee.

It being declared by common fame that Judge Humphreys had joined the foes of the Government the House voted to investigate his conduct.

After an ex parte investigation the House voted to impeach Judge Humphreys.

Form of resolution providing for carrying the impeachment of Judge Humphreys to the Senate.

The impeachment of Judge Humphreys was carried to the Senate by a committee of two representing the two political parties.

On January 8, 1862,[1] Mr. Horace Maynard, of Tennessee, presented the following preamble and resolution, which were agreed to by the House without debate or division:

Whereas it is alleged that West H. Humphreys, now holding a commission as one of the judges of the district court of the United States, has, for nearly twelve months, failed to hold the courts for the districts of East, Middle, and West Tennessee, as by law he was required to do, and that he has accepted a judicial commission in hostility to the Government of the United States, and is assuming to act under it,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary inquire into the truth of the said allegations, with power to send for persons and papers, and report from time to time such action as they may deem proper.

On March 4, 1862,[2] Mr. John A. Bingham, of Ohio, submitted the report of the committee. This report showed that the committee examined four witnesses,

[2] Journal, p. 400; Globe, p. 1062; House Report No. 44.

Mr. Maynard, Member of the House, and Messrs. Trigg, McFall, and Lellyet, citizens of Tennessee. It does not appear that anyone was present to represent Judge Humphreys at the investigation, or that any suggestion was made in his behalf. From the testimony it appeared that Judge Humphreys, who still held and had not resigned his commission, had publicly declared in favor of secession; that he had neglected his duties as judge; that he had officiated as judge for the confederacy, and in that capacity had entertained proceedings against loyal citizens. Therefore the committee proposed this resolution:

Resolved, That West H. Humphreys, judge of the district court of the United States for the several districts of Tennessee, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors.

On May 6,[1] after the reading of the report and very brief debate, the House agreed to the resolution without division.

Thereupon, Mr. Bingham, stating that he followed the usual precedents, offered the following resolution, which was agreed to without division:

Resolved, That a committee of two be appointed to go to the Senate, and at the bar thereof, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all of the people of the United States, to impeach West H. Humphreys, judge of the district court of the United States for the several districts of Tennessee, of high crimes and misdemeanors, and to acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will in due time exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him and make good the same, and that the committee do demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of said West H. Humphreys to answer said impeachment.

The Speaker[2] thereupon appointed Mr. Bingham and Mr. George H. Pendleton, of Ohio, as the committee; both were members of the Judiciary Committee, and Mr. Bingham represented the majority party in the House and Mr. Pendleton the minority party.

Forms and ceremonies of presenting the impeachment of Judge Humphreys in the Senate.

Form of resolution adopted by the Senate in taking order for the impeachment of Judge Humphreys.

On May 7,[3] in the Senate, a message was received from the House by its Clerk, announcing the passage of the resolution and the committee appointed in accordance therewith.

Immediately thereafter the committee, Messrs. Bingham and Pendleton, appeared at the bar of the Senate, and Mr. Bingham spoke as follows:

Mr. President, by order of the House of Representatives, we appear at the bar of the Senate, and in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States, we do impeach West H. Humphreys, judge of the district court of the United States for the several districts of Tennessee, of high crimes and misdemeanors, and we do further inform the Senate that the House of Representatives will in due time exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him, and make good the same, and in their name we do demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of said West H. Humphreys to answer to said impeachment.

The Presiding Officer[4] said:

The Senate will take order in the premises.

[4] Lafayette S. Foster, of Connecticut, in the chair.

It does not appear that the committee from the House reported to that body on their return from the Senate.

In the Senate, on May 8,[1] the message from the House was read, and on motion of Mr. Lafayette S. Foster, of Connecticut, the subject was referred to a select committee of three, to be appointed by the Chair. Thereupon the President pro tempore[2] appointed Messrs. Foster, James R. Doolittle, of Wisconsin, and Garrett Davis, of Kentucky.

On May 9,[3] in the Senate, Mr. Foster reported from the select committee the following resolution, which was agreed to without division or debate:

Whereas the House of Representatives, on the 7th day of the present month, by two of their Members, Messrs. Bingham and Pendleton, at the bar of the Senate impeached West H. Humphreys, judge of the district court of the United States for the several districts of Tennessee, of high crimes and misdemeanors, and informed the Senate that the House of Representatives will in due time exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him, and make good the same, and likewise demanded that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said West H. Humphreys to answer the said impeachment: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Senate will take proper order thereon, of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.

On the same day a message announcing the action of the Senate was received in the House.[4]

The committee to draw the articles in the Humphreys impeachment were appointed by the Speaker, and all but one was of the majority party.

The articles of impeachment against Judge Humphreys were agreed to by the House without debate.

On May 14,[5] in the House, Mr. Bingham submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to without debate or division:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to prepare and report articles of impeachment against West H. Humphreys, judge of the district court of the United States for the several districts of Tennessee, with power to send for persons, papers, and records.

The Speaker thereupon appointed Messrs. Bingham, John Hickman, of Pennsylvania, George H. Pendleton, of Ohio, Charles R. Train, of Massachusetts, and Charles W. Walton, of Maine. All of this committee but Mr. Pendleton, of Ohio, appear to have been of the majority party in the House. All but Messrs. Train and Walton were members of the Judiciary Committee.

On May 19[6] Mr. Bingham, from the select committee, reported articles of impeachment, which were read and at once, without debate or division, were adopted by the House and ordered printed. They appear in full in the Journal of the House of this date.

Form of resolutions providing for selection of managers and the presentation of the articles to the Senate in the Humphreys impeachment.

The managers of the Humphreys impeachment were appointed by the Speaker, and all but one belonged to the majority party.

The message informing the Senate that articles impeaching Judge Humphreys would be brought contained the names of the managers.

Mr. Bingham then offered the following resolutions, which were agreed to without debate or division:

Resolved, That five managers be appointed by the Speaker of this House to conduct the impeachment against West H. Humphreys, judge of the district court of the United States for the several districts of Tennessee.

Resolved, That the articles agreed to by this House, to be exhibited, in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, against West H. Humphreys in maintenance of their impeachment against him for high crimes and misdemeanors, be carried to the Senate by the managers appointed to conduct the impeachment.

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House have appointed managers on their part to conduct the impeachment against West H. Humphreys, and have directed the said managers to carry to the Senate the articles of impeachment agreed upon by the House to be exhibited in maintenance of their impeachment against the said West H. Humphreys.

On May 20[1] the Speaker announced the appointment of the following managers: Messrs. Bingham, Hickman, Pendleton, Train, and George W. Dunlap, of Kentucky. All but Mr. Pendleton belonged to the majority party in the House.

On May 21[2] the Clerk of the House delivered the message in the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: I am directed to inform the Senate that the House of Representatives has appointed Mr. Bingham, of Ohio, Mr. Hickman, of Pennsylvania, Mr. Pendleton, of Ohio, Mr. Train, of Massachusetts, and Mr. Dunlap, of Kentucky, managers to conduct the impeachment against West H. Humphreys, judge of the district court of the United States for the several districts of Tennessee, and has directed the said managers to carry to the Senate the articles of impeachment agreed upon by the House, to be exhibited in maintenance of their impeachment against the said West H. Humphreys.

The Senate followed the precedents in adopting rules prescribing forms and ceremonies for receiving the articles in the Humphreys impeachment.

Forms of oath taken and proclamations made in the court opened to receive the articles impeaching Judge Humphreys.

The message having been delivered, the resolution of the House was read, and thereupon Mr. Foster proposed the following:

Resolved, That at 1 o'clock to-morrow afternoon the Senate will resolve itself into a court of impeachment, at which time the following oath and affirmation shall be administered by the Secretary to the President of the Senate, and by him to each Member of the Senate, to wit: "I solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of West H. Humphreys, judge of the district court of the United States for the districts of Tennessee, I will do impartial justice, according to law;" which court of impeachment, being thus formed, will, at the time aforesaid, receive the managers appointed by the House of Representatives to exhibit articles of impeachment in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States against West H. Humphreys, judge of the district court of the United States for the districts of Tennessee, pursuant to notice given to the Senate this day by the House of Representatives that they had appointed managers for the purpose aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the House of Representatives.

The resolution having been agreed to, Mr. Foster offered the following, which was also agreed to:

Resolved, That after the managers of the impeachment shall be introduced to the bar of the Senate, and shall have signified that they are ready to exhibit articles of impeachment against West H. Humphreys, the President of the Senate shall direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to make proclamation, who shall, after making proclamation, repeat the following words: "All persons are commanded to keep silence, on pain of imprisonment, while the grand inquest of the nation is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States articles of impeachment against West H. Humphreys, judge of the district court of the United States for the districts of Tennessee;" after which the articles shall be exhibited, and then the President of the Senate will take proper order on the subject of the impeachment, of which due notic eshall be given to the House of Representatives.

On the same day the first of the above resolutions was communicated to the House by message.[1]

On May 22,[2] in the Senate, the Vice-President[3] announced:

The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Senate will now resolve itself into a court of impeachment, in pursuance of its order of yesterday, for the trial of West H. Humphreys, judge of the district court of the United States for the State of Tennessee.

The following oath was administered to the Vice-President by the Secretary of the Senate:

I, Hannibal Hamlin, do solemnly swear that in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of West H. Humphreys, judge of the district court of the United States for the districts of Tennessee, I will do impartial justice according to law. So help me God.

The Vice-President said:

The Secretary will now call the roll of Senators alphabetically, calling them in numbers of four, and Senators will please to advance as they are called.

The Secretary called the names of Senators, and they advanced by fours to the desk, when the Vice-President administered the oath to them.

The House being notified that the Senate was ready to receive the articles impeaching Judge Humphreys, the managers attended unaccompanied.

The articles impeaching Judge Humphreys and their presentation.

The articles impeaching Judge Humphreys were signed by the Speaker and attested by the Clerk.

The oath having been administered to the Senators, it was then—exhibit articles of impeachment against West H. Humphreys, judge of the district court of the United States for the districts of Tennessee.

This message was duly delivered in the House, and presently four of the managers appointed by the House of Representatives, namely, Mr. Bingham, Mr. Pendleton, Mr. Train, and Mr. Dunlap (Mr. Hickman not being present), appeared below the bar.

Mr. Bingham advanced and said:

Mr. President, myself and associates are managers appointed by the House of Representatives, and instructed in their name to appear at the bar of the Senate, and present articles of impeachment against West H. Humphreys, judge of the district court of the United States for the several districts of Tennessee, for high crimes and misdemeanors.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The managers on the part of the House of Representatives will please be seated, at seats prepared for them within the bar of the Senate.

The managers were conducted to the seats prepared for them in the area between the Secretary's desk and the seats of the Senators.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate will now make the usual proclamation,

The Sergeant-at-Arms, GEORGE T. BROWN, Esq. Oyez! oyez! oyez! All persons are commanded to keep silence on pain of imprisonment, while the grand inquest of the nation is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States articles of impeachment against West H. Humphreys, judge of the district court of the United States for the districts of Tennessee.

Mr. Bingham (all the managers standing) read the articles of impeachment, as follows:

Articles exhibited by the House of Representatives of the United States in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States against West H. Humphreys, judge of the district court of the United States for the several districts of the State of Tennessee, in maintenance and support of their impeachment against him for high crimes and misdemeanors.

ARTICLE 1. That, regardless of his duties as a citizen of the United States, and unmindful of the duties of his said office, and in violation of the sacred obligation of his official oath "to administer justice without respect to persons," "and faithfully and impartially discharge all the duties incumbent upon him as judge of the district court of the United States for the several districts of the State of Tennessee agreeable to the Constitution and laws of the United States," the said West H. Humphreys, on the 29th day of December, A. D. 1860, in the city of Nashville, in said State, the said West H. Humphreys then being a citizen of the United States, and owing allegiance thereto, and then and there being judge of the district court of the United States for the several districts of said State, at a public meeting, on the day and year last aforesaid, held in said city of Nashville, and in the hearing of divers persons then there present, did endeavor by public speech to incite revolt and rebellion within said State against the Constitution and Government of the United States, and did then and there publicly declare that it was the right of the people of said State, by an ordinance of secession, to absolve themselves from all allegiance to the Government of the United States, the Constitution and laws thereof.

ART. 2. That, in further disregard of his duties as a citizen of the United States, and unmindful of the solemn obligations of his office as judge of the district court of the United States for the several districts of the State of Tennessee, and that he held his said office, by the Constitution of the United States, during good behavior only, with intent to abuse the high trust reposed in him as such judge, and to subvert the lawful authority and Government of the United States within said State, the said West H. Humphreys, then being judge of the district court of the United States, as aforesaid, to wit, in the year of our Lord 1861, in said State of Tennessee, did, together with other evil-minded persons within said State, openly and unlawfully support, advocate, and agree to an act commonly called an ordinance of secession, declaring the State of Tennessee independent of the Government of the United States, and no longer within the jurisdiction thereof.

ART. 3. That in the years of our Lord 1861 and 1862, within the United States, and in said State of Tennessee, the said West H. Humphreys, then owing allegiance to the United States of America, and then being district judge of the United States, as aforesaid, did then and there, to wit: within said State, unlawfully, and in conjunction with other persons, organize armed rebellion against the United States and levy war against them.

ART. 4. That on the 1st day of August, A. D. 1861, and on divers other days since that time, within said State of Tennessee, the said West H. Humphreys, then being judge of the district court of the United States, as aforesaid, and J. C. Ramsay, and Jefferson Davis, and others, did unlawfully conspire together "to oppose by force the authority of the Government of the United States," contrary to his duty as such judge and to the laws of the United States.

ART. 5. That said West H. Humphreys, with intent to prevent the due administration of the laws of the United States within said State of Tennessee, and to aid and abet the overthrow of "the authority of the Government of the United States" within said State, has, in gross disregard of his duty as judge of the district court of the United States, as aforesaid, and in violation of the laws of the United States, neglected and refused to hold the district court of the United States, as by law he was required to do, within the several districts of the State of Tennessee, ever since the 1st day of July, A. D. 1861.

ART. 6. That the said West H. Humphreys, in the year of our Lord 1861, within the State of Tennessee, and with intent to subvert the authority of the Government of the United States, to hinder and delay the due execution of the laws of the United States, and to oppress and injure citizens of the United States, did unlawfully act as judge of an illegally constituted tribunal within said State, called the district court of the Confederate States of America, and as judge of said tribunal last named said West H. Humphreys, with the intent aforesaid, then and there assumed and exercised powers unlawful and unjust, to wit, in causing one Perez Dickinson, a citizen of said State, to be unlawfully arrested and brought before him, as judge of said alleged court of said Confederate States of America, and required him to swear allegiance to the pretended government of said Confederate States of America; and upon the refusal of said Dickinson so to do, the said Humphreys, as judge of said illegal tribunal, did unlawfully, and with the intent to oppress said Dickinson, require and receive of him a bond, conditioned that while he should remain within said State he would keep the peace, and as such judge of said illegal tribunal, and without authority of law, said Humphreys there and then decreed that said Dickinson should leave said State.

2. In decreeing within said State, and as judge of said illegal tribunal, the confiscation to the use of said Confederate States of America of property of citizens of the United States, and especially of property of one Andrew Johnson and one John Catron.

3. In causing, as judge of said illegal tribunal, to be unlawfully arrested and imprisoned within said State citizens of the United States because of their fidelity to their obligations as citizens of the United States, and because of their rejection of, and their resistance to, the unjust and assumed authority of said Confederate States of America.

ART. 7. That said West H. Humphreys, judge of the district court of the United States as aforesaid, assuming to act as judge of said tribunal known as the district court of the Confederate States of America, did, in the year of our Lord 1861, without lawful authority, and with intent to injure one William G. Brownlow, a citizen of the United States, cause said Brownlow to be unlawfully arrested and imprisoned within said State in violation of the rights of said Brownlow as a citizen of the United States, and of the duties of said Humphreys as a district judge of the United States.

And the House of Representatives, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any further articles, or other accusation or impeachment against the said West H. Humphreys, and also of replying to his answers which he shall make unto the articles herein preferred against him, and of offering proof to the same and every part thereof, and to all and every other article, accusation, or impeachment which shall be exhibited by them as the case shall require, do demand that the said West H. Humphreys may be put to answer the high crimes and misdemeanors herein charged against him, and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments may be thereupon had and given as may be agreeable to law and justice.

GALUSHA A. GROW,
Speaker House of Representatives.

Attest:

EMERSON ETHERIDGE,
Clerk House of Representatives.

Mr. Bingham delivered the articles to the Secretary, who handed them to the Vice-President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair informs the managers on the part of the House of Representatives that the Senate will take proper order upon the impeachment preferred, of which notice will be furnished to the House of Representatives.

The managers thereupon retired.

2391. Humphreys's impeachment, continued.

Form of resolution directing the issue of a writ of summons to Judge Humphreys, and fixing the return day.

The House was informed by message of the issuance of a writ of summons to Judge Humphreys.

Mr. Foster then offered in the high court of impeachment the following, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to issue a summons, in the usual form, to West H. Humphreys, judge of the district court of the United States for the districts of Tennessee, to answer a certain article of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives on this day, and that the said summons be returnable here on Monday, the 9th day of June next, and be served by the Sergeant-at-Arms, or some person deputed by him, at least ten days before the return day thereof.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the House of Representatives.

Then the court, on motion of Mr. Foster, adjourned until Monday, June 9, at 1 o'clock p. m.

In the House it does not appear that the managers reported after they had presented the articles of impeachment in the Senate.

On May 23[1] in the House a message from the Senate informed the House that the issuance of a summons had been directed.

2392. Humphreys's impeachment, continued.

On the day set for the appearance of Judge Humphreys the House in Committee of the Whole House attended its managers.

Forms observed by the House attending the Humphreys trial as a Committee of the Whole (footnote).

Forms of oath, proclamation, and ceremonies at the calling of Judge Humphreys to appear and answer articles of impeachment.

On June 9,[2] in the high court of impeachment, the Vice-President having administered the prescribed oath to certain Senators, and the court having been opened by proclamation, it was—Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is now sitting as a high court of impeachment for the trial of West H. Humphreys, and that seats are provided for the accommodation of the Members of the House in the Senate Chamber.

The message having been delivered, it was then resolved by the House as follows:[3]

Resolved, That the House will this day, and at such hour as the Senate shall appoint, resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House, and attend in the Senate on the trial of the impeachment of West H. Humphreys, judge of the district court of the United States for the several districts of Tennessee.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, Mr. E. B. Washburne, of Illinois, being chairman, and proceeded to the Senate Chamber.[1]

Previous to the arrival of the House the Senators took seats on a platform prepared on the right and left of the Vice-President, leaving the body of the Hall for the House of Representatives.

The managers and Representatives having arrived, the following occurred:

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Sergeant-at-Arms will make proclamation opening the court.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. Oyez! Oyez! Oyez! All persons are commanded to keep silence, on pain of imprisonment, while the Senate of the United States is sitting as a court of impeachment on the case of West H. Humphreys, judge of the district court of the United States for the several districts of Tennessee.

The Sergeant-at-Arms handed his return to the Vice-President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The return of the officer will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read, as follows:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, City of Washington, ss:

I, George T. Brown, Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate of the United States, in obedience to the within and foregoing writ of summons and precept to me directed, did proceed to the usual place of residence of the within-named West H. Humphreys, in the vicinity of Nashville, in the State of Tennessee, on the 29th day of May, A. D. 1862, and then and there made diligent inquiry for the said West H. Humphreys, but he could not be found. I further certify, that on the same day and year, and at the usual place of residence of the said West H. Humphreys, in the vicinity of Nashville, in the State of Tennessee, I did then and there leave true and attested copies of the within and foregoing writ of summons and precept.

GEORGE T. BROWN,
Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate.

JUNE 9, 1862.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will administer the oath to the Sergeant-at-Arms touching the truth of his return.

The Secretary administered the oath to the Sergeant-at-Arms, as follows:

"George T. Brown, Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate of the United States, do solemnly swear that the return made and subscribed by me upon the process issued on the 22d day of May last, by the Senate of the United States against West H. Humphreys, judge of the district court of the United States for the several districts of Tennessee, is truly made, and that I have performed said services as therein described. So help me God.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Sergeant-at-Arms will make proclamation for the appearance of West H. Humphreys.

[1] The Globe (p. 2617) has the following as to the order: "The form in which it appears on such occasions displaces its high functionary, the Speaker, its Sergeant-at-Arms, and the emblem of its authority—the mace.

"The chairman, supported by Emerson Etheridge, esq., the Clerk, and Ira Goodnow, esq., the Doorkeeper, were conducted to seats in the center aisle, in front of the Vice-President; the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, Messrs. Bingham, Pendleton, Dunlap, and Train, took the seats which they previously occupied in the right section of the central area; that on the left, with similar accommodations, was provided for the judge impeached and his counsel, if they should appear. The Members of the House occupied the body of the Senate Chamber."

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. Oyez! Oyez! Oyez! West H. Humphreys, judge of the district court of the United States for the several districts of Tennessee, come forward and answer the articles of impeachment exhibited against you by the House of Representatives of the United States.

2393. Humphreys's impeachment continued.

Judge Humphreys did not appear, in person or by attorney, to answer the articles of impeachment.

Judge Humphreys not appearing, the case was continued on motion of the managers, to enable the production of testimony.

Judge Humphreys having failed to appear to answer the articles of impeachment, the court directed publication of a proclamation for him to appear.

In the Humphreys impeachment it was first provided that the subpœnas should be served by the Sergeant-at-Arms or his deputy.

Form of report of Chairman of the Committee of the Whole on returning from the Humphreys trial.

Whereupon, West H. Humphreys not appearing in person, or by counsel, to answer the said articles of impeachment, the following occurred:

Mr. Manager BINGHAM (after a pause). On behalf of the managers of the House of Representatives, I move the continuance of this cause until the 26th day of June, 1862, in order to obtain the attendance of witnesses necessary to the prosecution of the impeachment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Senators, the following motion is submitted for the decision of the court: On behalf of the managers of the House of Representatives, Mr. Bingham moves that further proceedings in the impeachment of West H. Humphreys, be postponed until Thursday, the 26th day of June, 1862.

The roll being called, there appeared, yeas 35, nays 4. So the motion was agreed to.

The Vice-President then informed the managers that of such other proceedings as should be taken by the Senate in the case of the impeachment of West H. Humphreys, the House of Representatives should be duly notified.

Thereupon the managers, attended by the House of Representatives, withdrew and having returned into their own Hall, the Committee of the Whole House rose,[1] and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. Washburne reported—that the committee had, according to order, attended the trial by the Senate of the said impeachment, when the Senate postponed the further consideration of the case until Thursday, the 26th instant.

Meanwhile, in the high court of impeachment, on motion of Mr. Foster, and by a vote of yeas 36, nays 0, the following was agreed to:[2]

Ordered, That this high court of impeachment stand adjourned till the 26th day of June next, at 12 o'clock, meridian; and as the said West H. Humphreys has failed to make his appearance to answer the said articles of impeachment, though duly summoned, it is further ordered that proclamation for his appearance on that day be made by publishing this order in the National Intelligencer, National Republican, and Evening Star, newspapers printed in the city of Washington, for at least ten days successively, before said 26th day of June, instant, and also in the Nashville Union, a newspaper published in the city of Nashville, State of Tennessee, on at least five several days before said 26th day of June, instant.

And further, on motion of Mr. Foster, and in order to obviate the difficulty which might arise from there being no marshal of the United States in certain districts where it might be necessary to send subpœnas, it was further Ordered, That subpœnas may be issued by the Secretary of the Senate, according to the rules[1] of proceedings of the Senate, when acting as a court of impeachment, and directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, or his deputy, as well as to the marshal of the district of ———.

The court then adjourned to Thursday, June 26, at 12 o'clock, meridian.

On June 10[2] a message was received in the House giving information of the resolutions adopted by the court after the House had retired, and of the date to which the court had adjourned.

Judge Humphreys's having failed to appear in answer both to the summons and proclamation, the Presiding Officer announced that the managers might proceed in support of the articles.

Form of proclamation for appearance of Judge Humphreys, and the proof thereof on the day set for appearance.

In the absence of the Vice-President the President pro tempore took the oath and presided at the Humphreys trial.

At the beginning of the Humphreys trial the returns on the subpœnas were read and the names of the witnesses called.

A witness unable to attend the Humphreys trial was excused by the court.

On June 26,[3] when the high court of impeachment again opened, the Vice-President was absent and the President pro tempore[4] of the Senate was in the chair. At once the Secretary administered to him the prescribed oath. The court was then opened by proclamation as follows by the Sergeant-at-Arms:

Oyez! Oyez! Oyez! Silence is commanded on pain of imprisonment while the Senate of the United States is sitting as a high court of impeachment for the trial of West H. Humphreys, judge of the district court of the United States for the several districts of Tennessee.

On motion of Mr. Foster—

Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is in its Chamber and ready to proceed on the trial of the impeachment of West H. Humphreys, judge of the district court of the United States for the several districts of Tennessee, and that seats are provided for the accommodation of the Members.

This message being received in the House[5] that body resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House and proceeded to the Senate. When they arrived the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate appeared before the bar and announced:[6]

The honorable the House of Representatives of the United States.

The Members then entered and took the seats assigned them, the chairman of the Committee of the Whole House occupying a seat in the aisle in front of the President pro tempore, and the Clerk of the House having a seat near him. The managers on the part of the House were conducted to seats assigned to them in the area in front of the Secretary's desk.

By direction of the President pro tempore, the Secretary read the return made by the Sergeant-at-Arms on the 9th instant and already read in the high court on that day. The Secretary also read the proclamation made by order of the court on the 9th and published in certain newspapers. This proclamation[1] was as follows:

The Senate of the United States of America, as the court of impeachment, sitting on the case of West H. Humphreys, judge of the district court of the United States for the several districts of the State of Tennessee.

MONDAY, JUNE 9, 1862.

Ordered, That this high court of impeachment stands adjourned till the 26th day of June, instant, at 12 o'clock meridian; and, as the said West H. Humphreys has failed to make his appearance to answer the said articles of impeachment, though duly summoned, it is further ordered that proclamation for his appearance on that day be made by publishing this order in the National Intelligencer, National Republican, and Evening Star newspapers, printed in the city of Washington, for at least ten days, successively, before said 26th day of June, instant, and also in the Nashville Union newspaper, printed in the city of Nashville, in the State of Tennessee, at least five several days before said 26th day of June, instant.

Attest: J. W. FORNEY,
Secretary of the Senate.

A question being raised as to the proof of the proclamation, the production of copies of the several papers in which it was published was considered sufficient.

Then the following proceedings occurred:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will now make proclamation for the appearance of the accused.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS! Oyez! Oyez! Oyez! West H. Humphreys, judge of the district court of the United States for the several districts of Tennessee, come forward and answer the articles of impeachment exhibited against you by the House of Representatives of the United States.

No response being made,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The accused West H. Humphreys being in default, not appearing in pursuance of the summons or proclamation, the managers on the part of the United States House of Representatives are now at liberty to proceed in support of the articles of impeachment exhibited against him.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, on behalf of the managers for the House of Representatives, I ask that the returns of the Sergeant-at-Arms to the subpœnas issued for witnesses in support of this impeachment may be reported, and the names of the witnesses called over and those present recorded.

The Secretary then read the returns on the subpœnas, and the names of the witnesses were called on motion of Mr. Manager Bingham. The witnesses were assigned seats on the left of the chair, in the rear of the seats usually occupied by Senators.

Among the witnesses called was Andrew Johnson, who failed to respond. Mr. Bingham, of the managers, stated that Mr. Johnson was detained by his duties as governor of Tennessee, and moved that he be excused from obeying the process of the court. This motion was unanimously agreed to.

In the Humphreys trial, with no representative for the respondent, witnesses were not cross-examined.

The respondent not being represented in the Humphreys trial, the managers, without argument, demanded judgment.

In the absence of representation of respondent in the Humphreys trial, the Senators insisted on the rules of evidence.

Mr. Train then opened the case for the managers, outlining at not great length what it was proposed to prove.

Mr. Bingham, for the managers, then proceeded to offer evidence, documentary and oral, witnesses being sworn, in accordance with the rule, by the Secretary.

The witnesses were then examined by the managers.[1] There was no cross-examination, as there was no appearance for Judge Humphreys. At the close of each witness's testimony the President pro tempore announced that any Senator might propose a question by reducing it to writing and having it read by the Secretary. But no questions were proposed.

Twice objection was made by Senators to questions put by the managers, as eliciting testimony inadmissible as evidence, but either the question or the objection was withdrawn without a decision by the court.[2]

At the conclusion of the testimony Mr. Bingham stated that the managers did not deem it necessary to introduce further testimony or to submit argument; and he respectfully demanded of the court, in the name of all the people of the United States, a judgment of guilty, in manner and form as prescribed by the Constitution of the United States.

The decision of the court on the articles in the Humphreys case was guilty as to a portion of the articles.

Form of question on verdict of the court in the Humphreys trial.

Various Senators were excused from voting on the judgment in the Humphreys case.

The presiding officer ruled that testimony might not be read during the voting on the articles impeaching Judge Humphreys.

By unanimous consent, in the Humphreys trial a Senator was permitted to vote after the decision on the articles had been declared.

Then, by direction of the President pro tempore, the articles of impeachment were read one by one, and at the conclusion of the reading of each article the President pro tempore took the opinion of the members of the court,[3] respectively, in the form following:

> Mr. Senator ———, how say you? Is the accused, West H. Humphreys, guilty or not guilty of the high crimes and misdemeanors as charged in this article of impeachment?

And the Senators having answered, the President declared West H. Humphreys guilty or not guilty of the charge, according as two-thirds voted him guilty or failed to do so.

Very frequently a Senator would give a brief explanation of his reason for his vote, and several Senators were by vote excused from voting on a particular article, reasons in each case being assigned as absence when the testimony was given or inability to hear the testimony.

In voting on the second specification of the sixth article Mr. Preston King, of New York, asked that the testimony in support of the specification be referred to.

The President pro tempore[1] said:

That proceeding is entirely out of order at this stage.

The sixth article containing several specifications, a vote was taken separately on each one at the suggestion of a Senator and by direction of the President pro tempore.

The vote was as follows:

	Guilty.	Not guilty.
Article 1	39	0
Article 2	36	1
Article 3	33	4
Article 4	28	10
Article 5	39	0
Article 6, specification 1	36	1
Article 6, specification 2	12	24
Article 6, specification 3	35	1
Article 7	35	1

Mr. James H. Lane, of Kansas, was by unanimous consent permitted to record his vote after the results had been announced and declared.[2]

On motion of Mr. Foster it was—Ordered, That the court take a recess until 4 o'clock p. m., at which hour the court will proceed to pronounce judgment in the case of West H. Humphreys, judge of the district court of the United States for the eastern, middle, and western districts of Tennessee.

The court declined to consider in secret session the question of final judgment in the Humphreys case.

Having found Judge Humphreys guilty, the court proceeded to pronounce judgment of removal and disqualification.

The presiding officer held that the question on removal and disqualification was divisible.

Debate as to whether or not the Constitution requires both removal and disqualification on conviction by impeachment.

Form of judgment pronounced by the presiding officer in the Humphreys trial.

Judgment being pronounced in the Humphreys case, the court adjourned without day.

The judgment of the court in the Humphreys trial was communicated to the House by the report of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole.

[1] Solomon Foot, of Vermont, President pro tempore.

[2] Globe, p. 2951.

The Senate ordered an attested copy of the court's decision in the Humphreys case to be sent to the President of the United States.

The high court met again at 4 p. m., and the House was informed by message that the court was ready to pronounce judgment and requested the attendance of the House of Representatives.[1]

Before the arrival of the Members of the House Mr. Edgar Cowan, of Pennsylvania, suggested[2] a short secret session; but Mr. John P. Hale, of New Hampshire, suggested that the rule required the doors to be kept open. Mr. Cowan suggested that the rule referred only to the trial and not to proceedings relating to the verdict.

The President pro tempore said he would entertain a motion for a secret session, but Mr. Cowan did not insist on it.

The House of Representatives having entered the Chamber, Mr. Foster offered[3] the following as an interrogation to be put to each member of the court in order that judgment might be perfected.

Is the court of the opinion that West H. Humphreys be removed from the office of judge of the district court of the United States for the districts of Tennessee?

To this Mr. Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois, offered an amendment as follows:

Add thereto: "and be disqualified to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States."

Mr. Trumbull quoted the Constitution to show that both removal from office and disqualification should be the punishment.

Mr. Foster explained that the question proposed was in exactly the form used in the case of Judge Pickering, and that it was the only question propounded in rendering that judgment.

After debate, Mr. Trumbull's amendment was agreed to, yeas 27, nays 10.

Thereupon, Mr. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky, asked for a division of the question.

Upon this demand there was debate. Mr. Trumbull said:

I have very serious doubts whether it is a double question; whether the whole is not one judgment. "Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States." I am not sure but that when the Constitution says it shall not extend further than that, it necessarily follows that it shall extend that far. It is not in the alternative, and I am by no means satisfied that that consequence does not necessarily follow the conviction. It is a limitation. As is well suggested by my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. Wilmot], could you impose that latter part without the former? Could you decide that he should be disqualified to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit? If each proposition is independent, it must be able to stand by itself without affecting any other. I am by no means satisfied that these are independent propositions. It seems to me that altogether the safer way is to take the question on them together.

Mr. Jacob Collamer, of Vermont, said:

Mr. President, I take it the test of the divisibility of a question depends upon whether there can be a vote left after it is divided, let the first be decided as it may. That is the criterion; that, if after you have voted "yea" or "nay" upon the first article of division, there is still a question to be decided

[1] House Journal, p. 943.
[2] Globe, p. 2951.
[3] Senate Impeachment Journal, pp. 903, 904; Globe, pp. 2951–2953.

if the decision be either way. Now, in this case, suppose the proposition to be that this man be deprived of office, and that he be rendered ineligible, and it is divided, and the vote shall be that he be not deprived of his office; is there anything left? There would be nothing left to vote on, because the rendering him ineligible hereafter is only a consequence of the first, and rests in judicial discretion whether we put it on or not. It is not, in my apprehension, divisible, because a vote in one way on the first branch would render it impossible to get along with the second.

Mr. O. H. Browning, of Illinois, said:

We have the authority of an adjudicated case of the action of the Senate, in which they found a judge guilty upon impeachment and entered against him a judgment of ouster from his office; going no further. I apprehend it was competent for them to do that. They were not bound to attach to it the other consequence that may be attached to it under the Constitution, of disqualification forever thereafter to hold office. It may frequently occur—it occurred in that case, it may occur again—that a majority of the Senators would feel it their duty to vote for his ouster from office, and would not feel it their duty to vote for his disqualification forever thereafter to hold any other office under the Government, however unimportant. If you are compelled to put the question, and the whole question, as one question—to put it all together—men who are unwilling to vote to disqualify him forever, disfranchise him forever, will be constrained to vote that he be ousted from office, and also to vote for another proposition, which in their judgments would be unjust. That would follow inevitably; and after you had taken the question on them jointly, I apprehend you could not return and divide them, and take the propositions separately, so as to say whether he should be ousted from office.

The President pro tempore [1] said:

In the judgment of the Chair these are separate and divisible propositions. * * * From the authority of the Pickering case the Chair is obliged to say that it is a divisible proposition.

The question was then taken on the first proposition, and it was determined in the affirmative, yeas 38, nays 0.

On the second branch of the question there appeared, yeas 36, nays 0.

The President pro tempore thereupon pronounced the judgment of the court, as follows:

This court, therefore, do order and decree, and it is hereby adjudged: That West H. Humphreys, judge of the district court of the United States for the eastern, middle, and western districts of Tennessee, be and he is removed from his said office; and that he be and is disqualified to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

Then, on motion of Mr. Foster, the court adjourned without day.

On the same day, the Committee of the Whole House having returned to Representatives Hall, the Committee of the Whole rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. E. B. Washburne, of Illinois, the Chairman, reported—that the committee had, according to order, attended the trial by the Senate of the said impeachment; and that the said West H. Humphreys, judge of the district court of the United States for the several districts of Tennessee, had been found guilty by the Senate of the matter whereof he stood charged by the House of Representatives, as contained in its articles of impeachment exhibited against him.[2]

In the Senate, on June 27,[3] on motion of Mr. Foster, it was, Ordered, That the Secretary lay before the President of the United States an attested copy of the judgment of the Senate as the high court of impeachment in the case of West H. Humphreys.

Chapter LXXV.

THE FIRST ATTEMPTS TO IMPEACH THE PRESIDENT.

1. Refusal of the House to impeach President Tyler. Section 2398.
2. First proposition to impeach President Johnson. Section 2399.
3. Investigation of charges made by a Member. Sections 2400–2402.
4. Proceedings and report of investigating committee. Section 2403.
5. Usurpation of power as an impeachable offense. Section 2404.
6. Nature of the power of impeachment elaborately discussed. Sections 2405, 2406.
7. House decides not to impeach. Section 2407.

2398. The House refused in 1843 to impeach John Tyler, President of the United States, on charges preferred by a Member.

A proposition to impeach a civil officer of the United States is received in the House as a question of privilege.

Form of impeachment of a civil officer by a Member on the floor of the House.

On January 10, 1843,[1] Mr. John M. Botts, of Virginia, proposed the following:

I do impeach John Tyler, Vice-President, acting as President of the United States, of the following high crimes and misdemeanors:

First. I charge him with gross usurpation of power and violation of law, in attempting to exercise a controlling influence over the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, by ordering the payment of accounts of long standing that had been by them rejected for want of legal authority to pay, and threatening them with expulsion from office unless his orders were obeyed; by virtue of which threat thousands were drawn from the Public Treasury without the authority of law.

Second. I charge him with a wicked and corrupt abuse of the power of appointment to and removal from office: First, in displacing those who were competent and faithful in the discharge of their public duties, only because they were supposed to entertain a political preference for another; and, secondly, in bestowing them on creatures of his own will, alike regardless of the public welfare and his duty to the country.

Third. I charge him with the high crime and misdemeanor of aiding to excite a disorganizing and revolutionary spirit in the country, by placing on the records of the State Department his objections to a law as carrying no constitutional obligation with it; whereby the several States of this Union were invited to disregard and disobey a law of Congress which he himself had sanctioned and sworn to see faithfully executed, from which nothing but disorder, confusion, and anarchy can follow.

Fourth. I charge him with being guilty of a high misdemeanor, in retaining men in office for months after they have been rejected by the Senate as unworthy, incompetent, and unfaithful, with an utter defiance of the public will and total indifference to the public interests.

[1] Third session Twenty-seventh Congress, Journal, pp. 157–163; Globe, pp. 144–146.

Fifth. I charge him with the high crime and misdemeanor of withholding his assent to laws indispensable to the just operations of government, which involved no constitutional difficulty on his part; of depriving the Government of all legal means of revenue, and of assuming to himself the whole power of taxation, and of collecting duties of the people without the authority or sanction of law.

Sixth. I charge him with an arbitrary, despotic, and corrupt abuse of the veto power, to gratify his personal and political resentments against the Senate of the United States for a constitutional exercise of their prerogative in the rejection of his nominees to office, with such evident marks of inconsistency and duplicity as leave no room to doubt his disregard of the interests of the people and his duty to the country.

Seventh. I charge him with gross official misconduct, in having been guilty of a shameless duplicity, equivocation, and falsehood with his late Cabinet and Congress, which led to idle legislation and useless public expense, and by which he has brought such dishonor on himself as to disqualify him from administering the Government with advantage, honor, or virtue, and for which alone he would deserve to be removed from office.

Eighth. I charge him with an illegal and unconstitutional exercise of power, in instituting a commission to investigate past transactions under a former Administration of the custom-house in New York, under the pretense of seeing the laws faithfully executed; with having arrested the investigation at a moment when the inquiry was to be made as to the manner in which those laws were executed under his own Administration; with having directed or sanctioned the appropriation of large sums of the public revenue to the compensation of officers of his own creation, without the authority of law, which, if sanctioned, would place the entire revenues of the country at his disposal.

Ninth. I charge him with the high misdemeanor of having withheld from the Representatives of the people information called for and declared to be necessary to the investigation of stupendous frauds and abuses alleged to have been committed by agents of the Government, both upon individuals and the Government itself, whereby he himself became accessory to these frauds.

Mr. Botts also submitted this resolution, for the action of the House:

Resolved, That a committee of nine members be appointed, with instructions diligently to inquire into the truth of the preceding charges preferred against John Tyler, and to report to this House the testimony taken to establish said charges, together with their opinion whether the said John Tyler hath so acted in his official capacity as to require the interposition of the constitutional power of this House; and that the committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. Botts stated in his place as a Member that he was himself able to prove every charge made, and he not only asked but demanded the opportunity to do so.

The Speaker [1] having decided that the charges involved a question of privilege, the House proceeded to consideration of the resolution.

Mr. Cave Johnson, of Tennessee, moved that the proposition lie on the table. This motion was disagreed to, yeas 104, nays 119.

On the question of agreeing to the resolution, there appeared yeas 84, nays 127. So the resolution was disagreed to.

2399. The first attempt to impeach Andrew Johnson, President of the United States.

The impeachment of President Johnson was first proposed indirectly through general investigations.

On December 17, 1866,[2] Mr. James M. Ashley, of Ohio, moved that the rules be suspended so as to enable him to report from the Committee on Territories [3] the following resolution:

---

[1] John White, of Kentucky, Speaker.

[3] At that time reports could not be made at any time.

Resolved, That a select committee to consist of seven Members of this House be appointed by the Speaker, whose duty it shall be to inquire whether any acts have been done by any officer of the Government of the United States which in contemplation of the Constitution are high crimes or misdemeanors, and whether said acts were designed or calculated to overthrow, subvert, or corrupt the Government of the United States, or any department thereof, and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers and to administer the customary oath to witnesses, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

In the brief debate permitted objection was made to such a general inquest on all the officers of the United States. On the vote there appeared yeas 90, nays 49. So the rules were not suspended.

On January 7, 1867,[1] in the morning hour for the presentation of resolutions,[2] Mr. Benjamin F. Loan, of Missouri, submitted this resolution:

Resolved, That for the purpose of securing the fruits of the victories gained on the part of the Republic during the late war, waged by rebels and traitors against the life of the nation, and of giving effect to the will of the people as expressed at the polls during the recent elections by a majority numbering in the aggregate more than 400,000 votes, it is the imperative duty of the Thirty-ninth Congress to take without delay such action as will accomplish the following objects:

1. The impeachment of the officer now exercising the functions pertaining to the office of President of the United States of America, and his removal from said office upon his conviction, in due form of law, of the high crimes and misdemeanors of which he is manifestly and notoriously guilty, and which render it unsafe longer to permit him to exercise the powers he has unlawfully assumed.

2. To provide for the faithful and efficient administration of the executive department of the Government within the limits prescribed by law.

3. To provide effective means for immediately reorganizing civil government in those States lately in rebellion, excepting Tennessee, and for restoring them to their practical relations with the Government upon a basis of loyalty and justice; and to this end

4. To secure by the direct intervention of Federal authority the right of franchise alike, without regard to color, to all classes of loyal citizens residing within those sections of the Republic which were lately in rebellion.

After some discussion this resolution was, under the requirements of a rule of the House, referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

Immediately thereafter Mr. John R. Kelso, of Missouri, offered as a new proposition the first portion of the resolution, having stricken out all of subdivisions 3 and 4.

Mr. Thomas T. Davis, of New York, moved to lay the resolution on the table, and the motion was disagreed to, yeas 40, nays 104. The question was then put on ordering the previous question, when the morning hour expired, and the House proceeded to other business.

2400. The first attempt to impeach President Johnson, continued.

On January 7, 1867, President Johnson was formally impeached in the House on the responsibility of a Member.

The House voted to investigate the conduct of President Johnson on the strength of charges made by a Member on his own responsibility only.

A Member having impeached the President and presented a resolution of investigation, the Speaker admitted it as a question of privilege.

In the first attempt to impeach President Johnson the investigation was made by the Judiciary Committee.

[1] Journal, pp. 118, 119; Globe, pp. 319–321.

[2] This order of business does not now exist.

On the same day, January 7,[1] Mr. James M. Ashley, of Ohio, rising in his place, declared:

On my responsibility as a Representative, and in the presence of this House, and before the American people, I charge Andrew Johnson, Vice-President and acting President of the United States, with the commission of acts which, in contemplation of the Constitution, are high crimes and misdemeanors. I therefore submit the following—which was presented as a question of privilege:

I do impeach Andrew Johnson, Vice-President and acting President of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

I charge him with a usurpation of power and violation of law:

In that he has corruptly used the appointing power.

In that he has corruptly used the pardoning power.

In that he has corruptly used the veto power.

In that he has corruptly disposed of public property of the United States.

In that he has corruptly interfered in elections, and committed acts which, in contemplation of the Constitution, are high crimes and misdemeanors: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby, authorized to inquire into the official conduct of Andrew Johnson, Vice-President of the United States, discharging the powers and duties of the office of President of the United States, and to report to this House whether, in their opinion, the said Andrew Johnson, while in said office, has been guilty of acts which were designed or calculated to overthrow, subvert, or corrupt the Government of the United States, or any department or officer thereof; and whether the said Andrew Johnson has been guilty of any act, or has conspired with others to do acts, which, in contemplation of the Constitution, are high crimes or misdemeanors, requiring the interposition of the constitutional power of this House; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers and to administer the customary oath to witnesses.

A question of order being raised, the Speaker[2] held that the resolution presented a question of privilege.

A motion by Mr. Rufus P. Spalding, of Ohio, that the resolution be laid on the table, was disagreed to—yeas 39, nays 106.

Then the previous question was ordered, and a motion to reconsider the vote whereby it was ordered was laid on the table by a vote of yeas 95, nays 47.

Then the question being put: "Will the House agree to the proposition submitted by Mr. James M. Ashley?" there appeared yeas 108, nays 39. So the resolution was agreed to.

On January 14,[3] Mr. Loan's resolution was debated, Mr. Loan, in a speech at length, using language interpreted to be a charge that President Johnson was guilty of complicity in the murder of President Lincoln, and further charging him with participation in a conspiracy to capture the Government in the interest of the late participants in the secession movement. On January 28 and February 4 the resolution was further considered, the debate on the later days being principally on a motion made by Mr. Thomas A. Jenckes, of Rhode Island, that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, which was already considering the subject.

This motion was agreed to, although it was urged in opposition that there was much business before the Judiciary Committee, and that the matter would be expedited by reference to a select committee.

2401. The first attempt to impeach President Johnson, continued.

The Thirty-ninth Congress having expired during investigation of President Johnson's conduct, the House in the next Congress directed the Judiciary Committee to resume the investigation.

A resolution directing the Judiciary Committee to resume an investigation with a view to an impeachment was held to be privileged.

On February 28,[1] Mr. James F. Wilson, of Iowa, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, submitted a report which in effect stated that considerable testimony had been taken, but that it would be impracticable to conclude the subject during the then existing Congress; and expressed the opinion that the evidence indicated the desirability of a further prosecution of the case. This report was signed by eight members of the committee. Mr. Andrew J. Rogers, of New Jersey, submitted minority views, in which he declared "that the most of the testimony that has been taken is of a secondary character, and such as would not be admitted in a court of justice," and advised discontinuance of the proceedings.

On March 2 [2] the report was laid on the table and ordered printed.

At the beginning of the next Congress, on March 7, 1867,[3] Mr. James M. Ashley, of Ohio, as a question of privilege, submitted a preamble and resolution, which, after modification, were as follows:

Whereas the House of Representatives of the Thirty-ninth Congress adopted on the 7th of January, 1867, a resolution authorizing an inquiry into certain charges preferred against the President of the United States; and

Whereas the Judiciary Committee, to whom said resolution and charges were referred, with authority to investigate the same, were unable for want of time to complete said investigation before the expiration of the Thirty-ninth Congress; and

Whereas in the report submitted by said Judiciary Committee on the 2d of March, they declare that the evidence taken is of such a character as to justify and demand a continuation of the investigation by this Congress: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Judiciary Committee when appointed, be, and they are hereby, instructed to continue the investigation authorized in said resolution of January 7, 1867, and that they have power to send for persons and papers, and to administer the customary oath to witnesses; and that the committee have authority to sit during the sessions of the House, and during any recess which Congress or this House may take.

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House be requested to appoint the Committee on the Judiciary forthwith, and that the committee so appointed be directed to take charge of the testimony taken by the committee of the last Congress; and that said committee have power to appoint a clerk at a compensation not to exceed $6 per day, and employ the necessary stenographer.

Resolved further, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, on the order of the Committee on the Judiciary, such sum or sums of money as may be required to enable the said committee to prosecute the investigation above directed, and such other investigations as it may be ordered to make.

[3] First session Fortieth Congress, Journal, pp. 19–21; Globe, pp. 18–25.

Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, having raised a question as to the presentation of the resolution, the Speaker[1] said:

The Chair has entertained the resolution as a question of privilege, as it has reference to proceedings for the impeachment of the President of the United States.[2]

A motion by Mr. William S. Holman, of Indiana, that the resolutions be laid on the table was disagreed to, yeas 33, nays 119; and then after debate, largely as to the political expediency of reviving the proceedings, the preamble and resolutions were agreed to by the House, without division.

Throughout this session of Congress, which continued with intermissions until November 30, various resolutions were offered[3] with the object of hastening the work of the Judiciary Committee or of procuring the printing of the testimony. On March 29 a resolution requesting the committee to report within a certain time was agreed to.

2402. The first attempt to impeach President Johnson, continued.

A verbal report as to progress made by a committee in an impeachment investigation was offered as privileged.

A proposition to instruct a committee to investigate new charges in an impeachment case was held to be privileged.

On July 10,[4] Mr. James F. Wilson, of Iowa, claiming the floor for a question of privilege, reported verbally from the Judiciary Committee, by direction of that committee, that they expected to be able to report on or after October 16. He also stated that as the case now stood five members of the committee were of the opinion that such high crimes and misdemeanors had not been developed as to call for the exercise of the impeachment power on the part of the House. The remaining four members of the committee took the opposite view.

On July 17, 1867,[5] Mr. John Covode, of Pennsylvania, claiming the floor for a question of privilege, offered the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, did, upon the 4th day of July, 1867, at the request of the counsel of John H. Surratt, caused to be issued to Stephen F. Cameron, of the rebel army, and one of the most notorious violators of the laws of war, a full pardon for all his crimes, in order that his credibility might be increased as a witness to aid in the exculpation of said Surratt from his participation in the murder of Mr. Lincoln, thus showing his sympathy with the men who murdered the President: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the foregoing charge, and report the evidence to the House in the first week of its next session, together with all the testimony already taken in the impeachment case.

Mr. Benjamin M. Boyer, of Pennsylvania, raised a question as to the privilege of the resolution.

---

[1] Schuyler Colfax, of Indiana, Speaker.

[2] It is to be noticed that several nonprivileged matters are contained in the resolutions, which under the present practice would destroy the privilege—notably the provisions for a clerk and for payments from the contingent fund.

[4] Globe, p. 565.

[5] Journal, pp. 220, 221; Globe, p. 697.

The Speaker[1] said:

It does unquestionably, in the opinion of the Chair, present a question of the very highest privilege.

The resolution was then agreed to; but the preamble was amended by striking out all after the word "whereas" and inserting the words: "It is reported that a pardon has been issued by the President to Stephen F. Cameron," and as amended was agreed to.

The first proposition to impeach President Johnson was reported from a committee divided as to fact and law.

In the first attempt to impeach President Johnson the committee reported the testimony and also majority and minority arguments.

The first investigation of President Johnson's conduct was conducted ex parte and in executive session.

It does not appear that President Johnson sought to be represented before the committee making the first investigation.

Instance wherein a Member of the House not a member of the committee was permitted to examine a witness.

In the first investigation of the conduct of President Johnson the committee relaxed the strict rules of evidence.

On November 25[2] Mr. George S. Boutwell, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the report of the majority of that committee, signed by five of the members, while Mr. James F. Wilson, of Iowa, presented minority views signed by himself and Mr. Frederick E. Woodbridge, of Vermont. Also Mr. Samuel S. Marshall, of Illinois, presented other minority views, signed by himself and Mr. Charles A. Eldridge, of Wisconsin.

On motion of Mr. Boutwell,

Ordered, That the said testimony and reports be printed (the report of the majority and the views of the minorities to be printed together), and that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until Wednesday, the 4th day of December next.

The report of the committee presents the testimony in full. It appears that the examination was conducted ex parte, there being no one present to cross-examine witnesses on behalf of the President, nor does it appear that any testimony was introduced at his suggestion or sought to be introduced. The witnesses were examined generally by the chairman or other members of the committee. In one instance[3] Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, a Member of the House, but not a member of the committee, was permitted to examine a witness; but his examination was in no sense an appearance in behalf of the President, but rather the reverse. In the minority views[4] presented by Mr. Marshall the investigation is spoken of as "a secret, ex parte one."

[1] Schuyler Colfax, of Indiana, Speaker.

[2] Journal, p. 265; Globe, pp. 791, 792; House Report No. 7, First session Fortieth Congress. Although presented by Mr. Boutwell, this report was prepared principally by Mr. Thomas Williams, of Pennsylvania.

[3] See p. 56 of the testimony.

[4] See p. 110 of the report.

As to the nature of the testimony taken in the course of the investigation, the majority say [1] that they—have spared no pains to make their investigations as complete as possible, not only in the explorations of the public archives, but in following every indication that seemed to promise any additional light upon the great subjects of inquiry.

And in the minority views submitted by Mr. Wilson it is stated:[2]

A great deal of matter contained in the volume of testimony reported to the House is of no value whatever. Much of it is mere hearsay, opinions of witnesses, and no little amount of it utterly irrelevant to the case. Comparatively a small amount of it could be used on a trial of this case before the Senate.

It seems to have been assumed in the committee that this was the proper course, since in the minority views presented by Mr. Marshall it is stated: [3]

In what we have said of the character of evidence taken before us, and the means used to procure it, we must not be understood as reflecting upon the action of the committee or any member thereof. Such an interpretation of our remarks would do great injustice to us and to them. Whether such latitude should have been given in the examination of witnesses we will not now inquire. In an investigation before a committee it would be difficult and perhaps impossible to confine the evidence to such as would be deemed admissible before a court of justice. Indeed, it may be questioned whether it would be proper so to restrict it, and it is perhaps better, even for the President, that those who were managing the prosecution from the outside were permitted to present anything that they might call or consider evidence.

The majority of the committee embodied their conclusion in this resolution:

Resolved, That Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors.

The minority, taking issue, were united in recommending a resolution as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the proposed impeachment of the President of the United States, and that the subject be laid upon the table.

The fact that all the minority did not unite in submitting views did not arise from any disagreement as to essential facts or law, but merely as to a difference as to whether or not the conduct of the President should be criticised as improper, although not impeachable.

The first attempt to impeach President Johnson was based on the salient charge of usurpation of power, with many specifications.

The discussion of the committee touched two main branches (1) as to the facts, and (2) as to the law.

1. As to the facts.

In moving the impeachment Mr. Ashley had specified six offenses. The majority of the committee found in general that the evidence sustained these charges, and say that "the great salient point of accusation, standing out in the foreground, and challenging the attention of the country, is usurpation of power." The majority specify as follows:

1. That the President of the United States, assuming it to be his duty to execute the constitutional guaranty, has undertaken to provide new governments for the rebellious States without the consent or cooperation of the legislative power, and upon such terms as were agreeable to his own pleasure, and then to force them into the Union against the will of Congress and the people of the loyal States, by the authority and patronage of his high office.

2. That to effect this object he has created offices unknown to the law, and appointed to them without the advice or consent of the Senate, men who were notoriously disqualified to take the test oath, at salaries fixed by his own mere will, and paid those salaries, along with the expenses of his work, out of the funds of the War Department, in clear vioaltion of law.

3. That to pay the expenses of the said organizations, he has also authorized his pretended officers to appropriate the property of the Government, and to levy taxes from the conquered people.

4. That he has surrendered, without equivalent, to the rebel stockholders of southern railroads captured by our arms, not only the roads themselves, but the rolling stock and machinery captured along with them, and even roads constructed or renovated at an enormous outlay by the Government of the United States itself.

5. That he has undertaken, without authority of law, to sell and transfer to the same parties, at a private valuation, and on a long credit, without any security whatever, an enormous amount of rolling stock and machinery, purchased by and belonging to the United States, and after repeated defaults on the part of the purchasers has postponed the debt due to the Government in order to enable them to pay the claims of other creditors, along with arrears of interest on a large amount of bonds of the companies guaranteed by the State of Tennessee, of which he was himself a large holder at the time.

6. That he has not only restored to rebel owners large amounts of cotton and other abandoned property that had been seized by the agents of the Treasury, but has presumed to pay back the proceeds of actual sales made thereof at his own will and pleasure, in utter contempt of the law, directing the same to be paid into the Treasury, and the parties aggrieved to seek their remedy in the courts, and in manifest violation of the true spirit and meaning of that clause of the Constitution of the United States which declares that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law."

7. That he has abused the pardoning power conferred on him by the Constitution, to the great detriment of the public, in releasing, pending the condition of war, the most active and formidable of the leaders of the rebellion, with a view to the restoration of their property and means of influence, and to secure their services in the furtherance of his policy; and, further, in substantially delegating that power for the same objects to his provisional governors.

8. That he has further abused this power in the wholesale pardon, in a single instance, of 193 deserters, with restoration of their justly forfeited claims upon the Government for arrears of pay, without proper inquiry or sufficient evidence.

9. That he has not only refused to enforce the laws passed by Congress for the suppression of the rebellion, and the punishment of those who gave it comfort and support, by directing proceedings against delinquents and their property, but has absolutely obstructed the course of public justice by either prohibiting the initiation of legal proceedings for that purpose, or where already commenced, by staying the same indefinitely, or ordering absolutely the discontinuance thereof.

10. That he has further obstructed the course of public justice, by not only releasing from imprisonment an important state prisoner, in the person of Clement C. Clay, charged among other things, as asserted by himself in answer to a resolution of the Senate (Ex. Doc., Thirty-ninth Congress, No. 7), "with treason, with complicity in the murder of Mr. Lincoln, and with organizing bands of pirates, robbers, and murderers in Canada, to burn the cities and ravage the commercial coasts of the United States on the British frontier," but has even forbidden his arrest in proceedings instituted against him for treason and conspiracy, in the State of Alabama, and ordered his property, when seized for confiscation by the district attorney of the United States, to be restored.

11. That he has abused the appointing power lodged in him by the Constitution:

"1. In the removal, on system, and to the great prejudice of the public service, of large numbers of meritorious public officers, for no other reason than because they refused to indorse his claim of the right to reorganize and restore the rebel States on conditions of his own, and because they favored the jurisdiction and authority of Congress on the premises.

"2. In reappointing in repeated instances, after the adjournment of the Senate, persons who had been nominated by him and rejected by that body as unfit for the place for which they had been so recommended."

12. That he has exercised the dispensing power over the laws, by commissioning revenue officers and others unknown to the law, who were notoriously disqualified by their participation in the rebellion from taking the oath of office required by the act of Congress of July 2, 1862, allowing them to enter upon and exercise the duties appertaining to their respective offices, and paying to them salaries for their services therein.

13. That he has exercised the veto power conferred on him by the Constitution, in its systemmatic application to all the important measures of Congress looking to the reorganization and restoration of the rebel States, in accordance with a public declaration that he "would veto all its measures whenever they came to him," and without other reasons than a determination to prevent the exercise of the undoubted power and jurisdiction of Congress over a question that was cognizable exclusively by them.

14. That he has brought the patronage of his office into conflict with the freedom of elections by allowing and encouraging his official retainers to travel over the country, attending political conventions and addressing the people, instead of attending to the duties which they were paid to perform, while they were receiving high salaries in consideration thereof.

15. That he has exerted all the influence of his position to prevent the people of the rebellious States from accepting the terms offered to them by Congress, and neutralized to a large extent the effects of the national victory by impressing them with the opinion that the Congress of the United States was bloodthirsty and implacable and that their only hope was in adhering to him.

16. That, in addition to the oppression and bloodshed that have everywhere resulted from his undue tenderness and transparent partiality for traitors, he has encouraged the murder of loyal citizens in New Orleans by a Confederate mob pretending to act as a police, by hireling correspondence with its leaders, denouncing the exercise of the constitutional right of a political convention to assemble peacefully in that city as an act of treason proper to be suppressed by violence, and commanding the military to assist instead of preventing the execution of the avowed purpose of dispersing them.

17. That he has been guilty of acts calculated, if not intended, to subvert the Government of the United States by denying that the Thirty-ninth Congress was a constitutional body and fostering a spirit of disaffection and disobedience to the law and rebellion against its authority by endeavoring, in public speeches, to bring it into odium and contempt.

The minority of the committee generally dissent from the conclusions of the majority as to the facts. After reviewing the six specifications alleged by Mr. Ashley, they find from a review of the evidence that the acts of the President bear a very different construction from that given by the majority. Messrs. Wilson and Woodbridge admit that many of his acts have been wrong politically, saying:

In approaching a conclusion we do not fail to recognize two standpoints from which this case may be reviewed: The legal and the political. Viewing it from the former, the case upon the law and the testimony fails; viewing it from the latter, the case is a success.

They then go on to state generally that the President has disappointed the hopes and expectations of those who placed him in power. He has betrayed their confidence and joined hands with their enemies. * * * Judge him politically, we must condemn him. But the day of political impeachments would be a sad one for this country.

But Messrs. Marshall and Eldridge dissent from all criticism of the President, and confine themselves to the simple finding that on the law and the facts he may not be impeached.

Whether or not an offense must be indictable under a statute in order to come within the impeaching power was discussed fully in the first attempt to impeach President Johnson.

Discussion of the nature of the impeaching power with reference to American and English precedents.

2. As to the law.

On this point the majority, composed of Messrs. Boutwell; Francis Thomas, of Maryland; Thomas Williams, of Pennsylvania; William Lawrence, of Ohio, and John C. Churchill, of New York, advocate one view, and the united minority a radically different one.

The majority first review the English authorities as set forth in May's work and the utterances of Cushing, Story, and Rawle to show that the purpose of impeachment in modern times is the punishment of high crimes and misdemeanors, chiefly of an official or political character, which are either beyond the reach of the law or which no other authority in the State but the supreme legislative power is competent to prosecute. The Federalist is also quoted to show that such offenses are of a nature which may be denominated political, as they relate chiefly to injuries done immediately to the society itself. The question then arises as to whether the terms of the United States Constitution are such as to change the view which has been taken in England. The majority say in this connection:

The fourth section of its second article provides that "the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of high crimes and misdemeanors." It therefore names but two offenses specifically, and they are not charged here. Do the facts involved fall, then, within the general description of "other high crimes and misdemeanors," or are they excluded by the enumeration?

It is insisted, for the first time, we think, that they do not come within the meaning of the language used, because, although all confessedly in the popular sense the highest and gravest of misdemeanors, and many of them in the technical and common-law signification of the terms, indictable as such in England, and perhaps in most of the older States, they are neither crimes nor misdemeanors here, because it has been held with much diversity of opinion on the bench, and more at the bar, that there is no jurisdiction in the courts of the United States to punish criminally except where an act has been made indictable by statute, which, as the committee are constrained to think, is not a necessary logical result, even if the doctrine were incontrovertible and to be considered as no longer open to discussion in the courts. It would not follow, as they suppose, that what was undoubtedly a crime or misdemeanor at the common law, in view of the framers of the Constitution who sat under it and used its language and recurred so often to its principles, had become any the less a crime before the highest court for the purposes of impeachment because another tribunal, having no jurisdiction at all over the subject, may have decided that it is no longer cognizable before them, even if it were essential, as there is no authority to show, that it should be a true crime within the meaning of the common law. There is a law of Parliament, which is a part of the common law, and by which only this question must be determined.

The objection has the merit at least of being a novel as well as a subtle one; well enough, perhaps, for the range of a criminal court, but too subtle by far for those canons of interpretation that are supposed to rule in the construction of the fundamental law of a great state. If it be a sound one, then there is no remedy in the Constitution but for the specific offenses of treason and bribery, as there was no such thing as what it describes as "high crimes or misdemeanors" then known to the laws of the United States, and the Government must perish whenever it is attacked from a quarter that could not have been foreseen. But could the statesmen who framed the Constitution have perpetrated so grave a blunder as this? Did they intend, instead of anchoring that power to the rock by a precision that should fix it there, and leave nothing open to construction, to leave it all afloat for future Congresses to say what offenses should be from time to time impeachable? Did they, when dealing with a question so mighty as the safety of the state, use words without a meaning, except what might be thereafter given to them by an ephemeral legislature or invented by an uncertain and not always consistent court? Or did they stand in the august presence and under the not uncertain light of the common law of England, which they had claimed as their birthright, speaking the language, with a thorough understanding of its import, of the sages and statesmen who had illustrated its principles? Are their oracles to be read as they would have been in England or would be now in any of its colonies past or present or are their solemn utterances to be measured by a language that they did not know? They committed no such error, and the suggestion that they did is one that does not seem to antedate the case to which it is at present applied.

To ascertain the meaning of the terms in question there are but three possible sources to which the explorer can recur, and they are the Constitution itself, the statutes, and the parliamentary practice, or the common law of which it is a part. The Constitution, however, goes no further, as already shown, than to declare the two political offenses of treason and bribery to be "high crimes and misdemeanors," and as such impeachable, while no statute has ever attempted it. Nor does it by any means follow that where an offense has been made so punishable as a crime the right to impeach is a corollary. It is not every offense that by the Constitution is made impeachable. It must be not a crime or misdemeanor only, but a "high" one, within the meaning of the law of Parliament. There are, moreover, as suggested by Judge Story in his Commentaries, many offenses of great enormity which are made punishable by statute only when committed in a particular place. What is to be said of them? Are they impeachable if committed under one jurisdiction, and not so if perpetrated under another? There are, too, many others of a purely political character, which have been held again and again to be impeachable, that are not even named in our statute books, and many more may be imagined in the long future for which it would be impossible for human sagacity or perspicuity to provide. There is no alternative, then, left, unless the remedy is to fail altogether, except to resort to the parliamentary practice and the common law, or leave the whole subject in the discretion of the Senate, which would be inadmissible, of course, in a government of law.

The argument asserts that the offense must be an indictable one by statute to authorize an impeachment. It is not even admitted, however, that this high and radical and only effective remedy for official delinquencies—and in this country, at least, it is no more than that—is to be confined to those offenses which are known by these terms, within the technical meaning that has been assigned to them. In such a case as this no narrow interpretation can be allowed to defeat the object of the law. A constitution of government is always to be construed in a broad, catholic sense, in order to suppress the possible mischief and advance the remedy. Those who maintain this doctrine strangely forget that there is a parliamentary sense, which conforms to the popular one, and is as much a common-law sense as the one on which they rely. The object of the law is not to punish crime. That duty is assigned to other tribunals. The purpose here is only to remove the officer whose public conduct has been such as to disqualify him for the proper discharge of his functions, or to show that the safety of the state—which is always the supreme law—requires that he should be deposed. It refers not so much to moral conduct as to official relations—not, indeed, to moral conduct at all, except so far as it may bear on the performance of official duty. The judgment is not fine or imprisonment, as it may be in England, but only removal from office and disqualification for the future. One of the very objects of this extraordinary tribunal, as has been shown already and will be further enforced hereafter, is to reach those very cases of official delinquency against which no human foresight could provide and which the ordinary tribunals are inadequate to punish. No ingenuity of invention, no fertility of resource, can hedge round a high public officer by boundaries which the greater ingenuity of fraud or wickedness may not be able to pass by sap or scale. If a President, it may be that he may prove impracticable. He may ignore the law, and even wage war on the power that is intrusted with the making of it. He may nullify its acts by misconstruing or disregarding them or denying their authority. He may be guilty of offenses which are in their very nature calculated to subvert the Government—all which things Andrew Johnson is shown clearly to have done. And yet these things, although high misdemeanors against the state, and fraught with peril to its life, may not be indictable as crimes. But will anybody say that the Constitution affords no remedy—that the arch offender must be borne with, and the state must die—merely because Congress has failed to provide, not the same, but a different punishment for the same offense? The cases in England show that this is not law there, as it is not reason, which is said to be the life of the law. The cases here, though all of offenses that were not statutory crimes or misdemeanors, have been so few as to leave this question open, to be decided hereafter upon those great reasons of state that lie at the foundation of the law of Parliament, which is the rule that must govern ultimately here.

The report then goes on to quote from the works of Story and Curtis in support of the view just advanced, and to the effect that, as said by Story, "the offenses to which the power of impeachment has been and is ordinarily applied as a remedy are of a political character," "growing out of personal misconduct, or gross neglect or usurpation, or habitual disregard of the public interests in the discharge of the duties of political office;" and, as said by Curtis, that "although an impeachment may involve an inquiry whether a crime against any positive law has been committed, yet it is not necessarily a trial for a crime."

Further the report quotes the following from Judge Story:

The Congress of the United States has itself unhesitatingly adopted the conclusion that no previous statute is necessary to authorize an impeachment for any official misconduct, and the rules of proceeding and the rules of evidence, as well as the principles of decision, have been uniformly regulated by the known doctrines of the common law and parliamentary usage. * * * In the few cases of impeachment that had theretofore been tried no one of the charges had rested on any statutable misdemeanor.

The report then says:

When he wrote the cases had been only three. In the first, which was that of Blount, in 1798, where the charge was of a conspiracy to invade the territories of a friendly power, although there was no decision on the merits, the impeachable character of the offense was affirmed by an almost unanimous vote of the Senate, expelling the delinquent from that body as having been guilty of a high misdemeanor in the very language of the Constitution. The second (Pickering's), in which a conviction took place, was against a judge of a district court and purely for official misconduct. The third (Chase's) was against a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, and was also a charge of official misconduct, but terminated in an acquittal. It is a noteworthy fact, however, that in the last-named case (the only one in which the point was raised) it was conceded by the answer that a civil officer was impeachable for "corruption, or some high crime or misdemeanor, consisting in some act done or omitted in violation of a law commanding or forbidding it." Two other cases have occurred since that time. The first, that of Judge Peck, in December, 1830, was for punishing a refractory barrister for contempt, as for "an arbitrary, unjust, and oppressive arrest and sentence, with intent to injure and oppress under cover of law." The case was clearly not of an indictable offense under any statute of the United States, but, though defended by the very ablest counsel (Messrs. Wirt and Meredith), it did not seem to have occurred to them that the offense charged was not impeachable within the meaning of the Constitution. The other, that of Judge Humphreys, at the commencement of the rebellion, was upon charges of disloyal acts and utterances, some of which clearly did not set forth offenses indictable by statute of the United States, and yet upon all those charges, with one exception only, he was convicted and removed.

It is only necessary to add that the conclusion of Judge Story upon the whole case is that "it seems to be the settled doctrine of the high court of impeachment that, though the common law can not be the foundation of a jurisdiction not given by the Constitution or laws, that jurisdiction, when given, attaches, and is to be exercised according to the rules of the common law, and that what are and what are not 'high crimes and misdemeanors' is to be ascertained by a recurrence to that great basis of American jurisprudence." And he adds to this that "the power of the House to punish contempts, which are breaches of privilege not defined by positive law, has been upheld on the same ground; for if the House had no jurisdiction to punish until the acts had been previously ascertained and defined by positive law, it is clear that the process of arrest would be illegal."

And this, it is hoped, will dispose forever of the novel objection that is now interposed in the path of the nation's justice in the defense of its greatest offender, and in a case that has no parallel in enormity in the parliamentary history of England. It is scarcely necessary to repeat that the charges, resting mainly upon record evidence, are not only of usurpation and abuse of admitted power, but of a contempt of law and of the legislative power that transcends anything in the annals of either the Tudors or the Stuarts.

It may be answered, however, as it has been, that all this was with the best intent, and that positive corruption must be shown to make the act impeachable. The President alleges a necessity, in one case, of dispensing with the laws in consequence of the absence of Congress. The Attorney-General insists that it was not the true policy of the country to enforce the laws against the rebels, and he accordingly refuses to do it. The Secretary of the Treasury holds the same opinion also as to the subject of captured and abandoned property, and he returns the proceeds, as the President returns the property itself.

An old but homely proverb says that the place most dreaded by the wicked is paved with good intentions. If such intentions, or even a supposed necessity, could excuse the violation of the law, no transgressor would ever be punished, and no tyrant fail to show that what he had done was with the best designs and for the purpose of saving the constitution of the state. If Andrew Johnson can plead that he gave away or sold the public property to rebels to promote their commerce, or that he dispensed with the test oath only to conciliate the disaffected, or collect the revenue, because of the absence of that Congress which he had refused to convene, the self-willed James II might even with a better grace have asserted that he had dispensed with the religious test in the interests of universal toleration. By way, however, of disposing of this apology, it may not be amiss to cite a few authorities:

"The rule is, that if a man intends to do what he is conscious the law—which every one is conclusively presumed to know—forbids, there need not be any other evil intention. (Bish. Crim. Law, sec. 428; 11 S. and R., 325.) It is of no avail to him that he means at the same time an ultimate good." (Ibid.)

"When the law imposes a prohibition it is not left to the discretion of the citizen to comply or not. He is bound to do everything in his power to avoid an infringement of it. The necessity which will excuse him for a breach must be instant and imminent. It must be such as to leave him without hope by ordinary means to comply with the requisitions of the law." (Fir. Story, I; 1 Gall., 150 S. P.; 3 Wheat., 39; 1 Bish., sec. 449.)

"Whenever the law, statutory or common, casts on one a duty of a public nature, any neglect of the duty or act done in violation of it is indictable." (1 Bish., secs. 389–537.)

"The same doctrine requires all those who have accepted, to discharge faithfully all public trusts. Any act or omission in disobedience of this duty, in a matter of public concern, is, as a general principle, punishable as a crime." (Ibid., sec. 913.)

The only remaining question is whether, in view of all these facts, it will be the duty of this House to call the President to answer before the Senate, or whether any consideration of mere public or party expediency, on either side of the House, ought to be allowed to prevail on them to let the accused go free.

2406. The first attempt to impeach President Johnson, continued.

In the first attempt to impeach President Johnson, the minority of the Judiciary Committee held that an indictable offense must be charged.

Elaborate discussion of meaning of the words "high crimes and misdemeanors."

American and English precedents were reviewed carefully by the minority of the Judiciary Committee in the first attempt to impeach President Johnson.

The minority views take issue with the argument of the majority, beginning the argument as follows:

The Constitution of the United States declares that "the House of Representatives * * * shall have the sole power of impeachment." What is the nature and extent of this power? Is it as boundless as it is exclusive? Having the sole power to impeach, may the House of Representatives lawfully exercise it whenever and for whatever a majority of the body may determine? Is it a lawless power, controlled by no rules, guided by no reason, and made active only by the likes or dislikes of those to whom it is intrusted? Have civil officers of the United States nothing to insure them against an exercise of this power except an adjustment of their opinions and official conduct to the standard set up by the dominant party in the House of Representatives? Happily for the nation this power is not without its constitutional boundaries, and is not above the law. When we examine the Constitution to ascertain in what cases the power of impeachment may be exercised—for what acts civil officers may be impeached—we are informed that—

"The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." (Art. II, sec. 2.)

In these cases only can the power of impeachment be lawfully used. It would seem to be difficult to mistake the import of this plain provision of the fundamental law of the land; and yet it is not free from conflicting interpretations. This conflict does not arise upon the terms "treason" and "bribery," for they are too well understood and too clearly defined in the Constitution and the laws of the land to admit of any disputation concerning them. They are both crimes of a high grade and punishable upon indictment in the courts of the United States. They are offenses against the public weal, with just and adequate penalties prescribed for them by the law of the nation. There is no difficulty in ascertaining the meaning of the Constitution in so far as it relates to these crimes. Whatever conflict of opinion has arisen respecting the extent of the power of impeachment finds its origin in the terms "other high crimes and misdemeanors." These terms, it has been claimed, give a latitude to the power reaching far beyond the field of indictable offenses. This doctrine is denied. Here arises the only doubt concerning the jurisdiction of the impeaching power of the House of Representatives.

The fact that the framers of the Constitution selected by name two indictable crimes as causes of impeachment would seem to go far toward establishing as the true construction of the terms "high crimes and misdemeanors" that all other offenses for which impeachment will lie must also be indictable. Having fettered the House of Representatives by naming two well-defined crimes of the highest grade, it is not to be presumed that the same hands which did it clothed the House with the right to ramble through all grades of crimes and misdemeanors, all instances of improper official conduct and improprieties of official life, grave and unimportant, harmful and harmless, alike. It is unreasonable to say that the men who framed our Constitution, after undertaking to place a limitation on the power of impeachment, ended their effort by throwing away all restraints upon its exercise and placing it entirely within the keeping of those upon whom it was intended to confer only a limited power. There is something more stable than the whims, caprices, and passions of a majority established as a restraint upon this power by the Constitution. The House of Representatives may impeach a civil officer, but it must be done according to law. It must be for some offense known to the law and not created by the fancy of the Members of the House. As was very pertinently remarked by Hopkinson on the trial of Chase, "The power of impeachment is with the House of Representatives, but only for impeachable offenses. They are to proceed against the offense, but not to create the offense and make any act criminal and impeachable at their will and pleasure. What is an offense is a question to be decided by the Constitution and the law, not by the opinion of a single branch of the legislature; and when the offense thus described by the Constitution or the law has been committed, then, and not till then, has the House of Representatives power to impeach the offender."

A civil officer may be impeached for a high crime. What is a crime? It is such a violation of some known law as will render the offender liable to be prosecuted and punished. "Though all willful violations of rights come under the generic name of wrongs, only certain of those made penal are called crimes." (Encyc. Brit., vol. xiii, 275.) The offense must be a violation of the law of the sovereignty which seeks to punish the offender; for no act is a crime in any sovereignty except such as is made so by its own law. In England no act is a crime save such as is so declared either by the written or unwritten law of the Kingdom, and therefore only crimes by the law of England are indictable in England. Crimes are defined and punished by law—by the law of the sovereignty against which the crime is committed—and nothing is a crime which is not thus defined and punished. "Municipal law" (which, among its multiplicity of offices, defines and punishes crimes) "is a rule of action prescribed by the supreme power in a state, commanding what is right and prohibiting what is wrong." (1 Blackstone, 44.) Nothing is a crime which is not such a breach of this command or prohibition as carries with it a prescribed penalty. Hence Blackstone said: "All laws should be, therefore, made to commence in futuro." The citizen must be notified of what acts are crimes, and he can not be lawfully punished for any others. The reasonableness of this rule was appreciated, and its enforcement provided for, by the convention which framed the Constitution of the United States, when they placed in that instrument the declaration that "no * * * ex post facto law shall be passed." No act which was not a crime at the time of its commission can be made so by subsequent legislative or judicial action; and this doctrine is as binding on the House of Representatives when exercising its powers of impeachment as when employed in ordinary criminal legislation.

All that has been said herein concerning the term "crimes" may be applied with equal force to the term "misdemeanors" as used in the Constitution. The latter term in no wise extends the jurisdiction of the House of Representatives beyond the range of indictable offenses. Indeed, the terms "crime" and "misdemeanor" are, in their general sense, synonymous, both being such violations of law as expose the persons committing them to some prescribed punishment; and, although it can not be claimed that all crimes are misdemeanors, it may be properly said that all misdemeanors are crimes.

In elaboration of its discussion of misdemeanors as crimes the minority views quote Blackstone's Commentaries and Hale's Pleas of the Crown, concluding:

Thus it appears that the terms "crime" and "misdemeanor" merely indicate the different degrees of offenses against law—crime marking the felonious degree, misdemeanor denoting "all offenses inferior to felony." Both indicate indictable offenses. They are terms of well-established legal signification. There is nothing uncertain about them. The framers of the Constitution used these terms as terms of art, and we have no authority for expounding them beyond their true technical limits.

The views then go on to examine provisions of the Constitution to show that—

When the Senate is organized * * * as a high court of impeachment, it is simply a court of special criminal jurisdiction—nothing more, nothing less. It is bound by the rules which bind other courts. It is as much restrained ly law as any other criminal court. It is not a tribunal above the law and without rule to guide it.

The views quote Burke, Blackstone, and Woodeson to show that this view is in accordance with the character of the House of Lords sitting as a court of impeachment, and continue:

If the Senate sitting as a high court of impeachment is not to be bound by the laws which bind other courts, why require the Senators to be put on oath or affirmation? If this court may declare anything a high crime or misdemeanor which may be presented as such by the House of Representatives, and pronounce judgment against a civil officer thereon, why swear the members of the court at all? The oath is not a solemn mockery. It is prescribed for some good purpose. What is it? The form of oath adopted by the Senate in Chase's case affords a very satisfactory answer, and it is, therefore, here quoted, as follows: "You solemnly swear or affirm, that in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of ——— ———, you will do impartial justice according to the Constitution and laws of the United States." (Chase's Trial, vol. 1, p. 12.) This oath is very comprehensive. It covers the charge, the evidence, and all the rules thereof; the decisions upon all questions arising during the progress of the trial, and the final judgment. In all these several respects the members of the court are to be guided by the Constitution and laws of the United States. They can try upon no charges other than treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors; and the offense charged must be known to the Constitution, or to the laws of the United States. The rules of evidence under and in pursuance of which crimes may be proved upon indictment in the courts of the United States are to be observed. The judgment "shall not extend further than a removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States." The office of the oath is to insure a strict observance of these requirements of the Constitution and the laws. This seems clear without further reference to other provisions of the Constitution; but it is proper that we should look at all of its clauses bearing upon the question under discussion.

The Constitution having created a court for the trial of impeachments, prescribed its jurisdiction and placed a limitation on its power to pronounce judgment, then declares that "the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law." It would seem difficult, indeed, to misunderstand this language. A civil officer convicted on impeachment is, notwithstanding such conviction, still liable to a prosecution for the same offense in the courts of ordinary criminal jurisdiction. How can this be if his offense be not an indictable crime? The court of impeachment can not apply the usual statutory punishment. It can not go beyond removal from, and disqualification to hold, office under the United States. The enforcement of other penalties for the same criminal conduct is left to the criminal courts of the country, after conviction upon indictment. Is not this substantially a constitutional direction to the court of impeachment not to convict a civil officer of any crime or misdemeanor for which an indictment will not lie? This view of the question was very forcibly stated by Mr. Martin, in his argument in Chase's case, in these words: "The very clause in the Constitution, of itself, shows that it was intended the persons impeached and removed from office might still be indicted and punished for the same offense, else the provision would have been not only nugatory but a reflection on the enlightened body who framed the Constitution; since no person ever could have dreamed that a conviction on impeachment and a removal from office, in consequence, for one offense, could prevent the same person from being indicted and punished for another and different offense." (Chase's Trial, vol. 2, p. 137.) How can the force of this argument be avoided? Wherein does it lack the support of sound reason and good sense? But it does not rest merely upon the clauses of the Constitution above quoted; others, yet to be noticed, give it much additional strength, and these will now be examined.

The section of the Constitution securing the trial by jury reads as follows: "The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury." (Sec. 2, art. 3.) Can it be successfully claimed that the word "crimes," as here used, is less comprehensive than it is where it occurs in section 4 of article 2? If not, then the crimes for which a civil officer may be impeached are the subjects of indictment or presentment; for such only can be tried by a jury. Any act which is a crime within the meaning of the last-named section is also a crime within the intent of the former, although the converse of this proposition is not true, as it is not every crime which a jury may try that will render a civil officer committing it liable to impeachment. For the latter purpose the crime must "have reference to public character and official duty." (Rawle on the Constitution, 204.) The plain inference to be drawn from the section is "that cases of impeachment are cases of trials for crimes."

Again, in that part of the Constitution which clothes the President with the power to grant pardons, it is said, "He shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment." (Art. 2, sec. 2.) What is the meaning of the term "offenses?" It can not mean less than such acts as render offenders liable to punishment, else why is a pardon necessary, or even desirable? No one needs a pardon who has not committed a crime. A pardon shields from or relieves of punishment. Punishment follows trial and conviction. Trial and conviction for crime can be had only for a violation of an existing law declaring the act done a crime. The term offenses, then, means crimes, in which, of course, is included misdemeanors. High crimes and misdemeanors are subject to two jurisdictions—first, in the ordinary criminal courts of the country; second, in the high court of impeachment. The same party, for the same acts, may be on trial in both tribunals at the same time. If convicted in both cases the President may pardon the criminal and relieve him of the consequences resulting from a conviction by the first-named jurisdiction, but the Constitution forbids his interference with the last. The grant of power and the exceptions are both in the same clause of the same section, and the fact that they are thus intimately associated shows that they relate to the same subjects—indictable offenses.

The views refer in this connection to a fact recorded in the Chase trial as significant:

Eight articles were preferred against him by the House of Representatives. It seems to have been admitted that all of the articles except the fifth charged him with criminal conduct. In regard to the fifth, his counsel made the point that it did not "charge in express terms some criminal intent on the respondent." The proof was as clear upon this point as it was upon the remaining seven. Thirty-four Senators voted on the several articles, and while the votes on seven of them ranged from 4 to 19 for conviction, every Senator answered "not guilty" on the fifth. It is fair to conclude, in view of the proof submitted in proof of the several articles, that the members of the court approved the position taken by the counsel of Chase on the trial.

The minority next examine the precedents, denying that either in this country or in England did they sustain the contention of the majority.

(a) As to precedents in this country.

The views discuss first the Blount case, saying of the charges that "they were undoubtedly regarded as indictable offenses;" but the court did not pass upon them, deciding that Blount was not a civil officer, and hence not within the jurisdiction of the court.

The Pickering case is next discussed, and after setting forth the charges, the views take up the issue of insanity raised by Judge Pickering's son, and say:

This issue was a grave and pertinent one, and yet the court, after deciding to entertain it, and proceeding to its trial, finally disposed of the case as though no such issue had been raised. This conduct of the court is both remarkable and discreditable; but not more so than its final action on the question of the guilt or innocence of the accused. Pickering was impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors. If convicted at all, the Constitution required that it should be for high crimes and misdemeanors, as there were no charges of treason or bribery in the case. In order that the guilt or innocence of the respondent should be directly passed upon by the court, without any improper evasion of its real and legal merits, Senator White moved that the "following question be put to each Member upon each article of impeachment, viz, Is John Pickering, district judge of the district of New Hampshire, guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors upon the charges contained in the —— article of impeachment, or not guilty?" The mover stated that he had borrowed the form of the question from the one used in the case of Warren Hastings. The question was fair in form, and presented the identical issue which the court was about to decide; but it did not suit the purposes of those who were determined to convict, and it was rejected by a vote of yeas 10, nays 18. Thereupon Senator Anderson moved the following form, viz, "Is John Pickering, district judge of the district of New Hampshire, guilty as charged in the —— article of the impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives?" This form was adopted by yeas 18, nays 9. (Ibid., 364.) So the court, after entertaining the plea of insanity and neglecting to decide it, on the foregoing evasive and unmeaning question, convicted Pickering on each article, and removed him from office, but this end was reached by a strict party vote. Senator Dayton said of the form of the question and the reason of its adoption: "They were simply to be allowed to vote whether Judge Pickering was guilty as charged—that is, guilty of the facts charged in each article—aye or no. If voted guilty of the facts, the sentence was to follow, without any previous question whether those facts amounted to a high crime or misdemeanor. The latent reason of this course was too obvious. There were members who were disposed to give sentence of removal against this unhappy judge upon the ground of the facts alleged and proved who could not, however, conscientiously vote that they amounted to high crimes and misdemeanors, especially when committed by a man proved at the very time to be insane, and to have been so ever since, even to the present moment." (Ibid., 365.) If this rule is to be followed, any civil officer may be impeached, convicted, and removed from office for acts entirely proper and strictly lawful. Who can wonder that members of the court denounced the whole proceeding as "a mere mockery of trial?" Surely the case reflects no credit on the Senate which tried it, and in one short year the members of the body seem to have arrived at the same conclusion; for, on the trial of Judge Chase, the form of the question adopted to be propounded to each member of the court was as follows, viz, "Mr. ———, how say you, is the respondent, Samuel Chase, guilty or not guilty of a high crime or misdemeanor, as charged in the —— article of impeachment?" (Ibid., 2d sess., 8th Cong., 664.) It is to be hoped that no one will ever quote the Pickering case as an authority to guide the House in presenting, or the Senate in trying, a case of impeachment. It decided nothing except that party prejudice can secure the conviction of an officer impeached in spite of law and evidence.

The case against Judge Chase is next reviewed at length:

The next case carried to the Senate by the House of Representatives has gone into history as one "without sufficient foundation in fact or law." (Hildreth's History of the United States, Vol. V, 254.) The case of Samuel Chase, a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, is now referred to. Chase was impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors in eight articles. It is not necessary to set out the substance of these articles. One of them was founded on his conduct at the trial of John Fries for treason, before the circuit court of the United States at Philadelphia, in April and May, 1800—more than four years before his impeachment. Five of them were based on his conduct at the trial of James Thompson Callender "for printing and publishing, against the form of the act of Congress, a false, scandalous, and malicious libel," etc., "against John Adams, then President of the United States," etc The remaining two rested on his charge to the grand jury in and for the district of Maryland, in May, 1803, and his refusal to discharge the grand jury in and for the district of Delaware, in June, 1800 The articles portrayed the conduct of Judge Chase in as offensive a manner as the committee could command. The bitterness of Randolph appeared in every article, and the enemies of the accused felt confident of his conviction.

Chase answered minutely and elaborately to the several articles, and filed against each the following plea, viz: "And the said Samuel Chase, for plea to the said article of impeachment, saith that he is not guilty of any high crime or misdemeanor, as in and by said first article is alleged; and this he prays may be inquired of by this honorable court in such manner as law and justice shall seem to them to require." (Ibid., 117.) This was the issue on which the case went to trial. The result was the acquittal of Chase on each article. This result was not owing to a failure of the evidence produced to support the facts alleged; for, so far as at least four of the articles are concerned, the allegations were supported in almost every particular; and had the same form of question been used on the conclusion of the trial as was adopted in the Pickering case, Chase doubtless would have been convicted. The questions propounded in both cases have already been quoted, and a mere glance at them will show how Pickering was convicted and Chase acquitted.

If this case establishes anything, it is that an impeachment can not be supported by any act which falls short of an indictable crime or misdemeanor. This point was urged by the able counsel for Chase with great ability and pertinacity; and the force with which it was presented drove the managers of the House of Representatives to seek shelter under that clause of the Constitution which says: "The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior." (Manager Nicholson's speech, ibid., 597.) This provision, respecting the tenure of the judicial office, it was claimed, would authorize the impeachment of a judge for misbehavior which would not support an indictment. The court did not approve this position, and very properly, for as the Constitution provides that civil officers may be impeached for high crimes or misdemeanors, and nothing is known to the law as a high crime or misdemeanor which is not indictable, of course an impeachment for anything else would be improper.

If the position assumed by the managers in the Chase case, that a judge may be impeached for mere misbehavior in office not amounting to an indictable offense, because such conduct is a breach of the tenure by which the judicial office is held, is correct, what would be its effect on the case which this committee now have in hand? If resort must be had to the clause of the Constitution which prescribes the tenure of the judicial office to justify an impeachment of a judge on account of conduct not known to the law as a crime, does it not reach too far to serve the purposes of those who would impeach the President of the United States because of acts for which he may not be indicted? The President holds his office by a different tenure. The Constitution says: "The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of four years." (Art. 2, sec. 1.) This provision of the Constitution stands firmly in the way of those persons who would tone down the term misdemeanor below the indictable standard by resorting to the clause fixing the judicial tenure. Judges hold their respective offices during good behavior; the President holds for a definite time—four years If, therefore, the argument proves anything in the former case, it proves too much for the latter. If a judge may be impeached for nonindictable conduct, because he holds his office during good behavior, it follows logically that an officer who holds for a term of years can not be so impeached. This exposes the fallacy of the entire argument.

The case of Judge Peck is commented on only so far as to record that the court sustained the respondent's contention that his conduct was proper, lawful, and right.

As to the case of Judge Humphries, the views say:

Humphries was convicted, as it was right he should be. He was charged with a crime against the known law of the land; he was a traitor against the Government of the United States.

(b) As to the English precedents.

At the outset of this branch of the inquiry, the minority say:

Cases can doubtless be found wherein Parliament has exercised this high power in a most extraordinary manner and convicted persons upon charges not indictable. The power of Parliament over the subject is far greater than that which the two Houses of Congress can exercise over the citizen. * * * In times of high party excitement this power has been in some cases most shamefully and oppressively exercised.

Then follows a review of some of these cases, concluding:

Individual resentment, partisan prejudice and excitement, and desire for revenge, instigated very many of the English impeachment cases. This is very well illustrated in the speech of Lord Carnarvon on the trial of the Earl of Danby—a speech that forms one of the footprints in the history of parliamentary impeachments which should ever remind the people of this nation that great caution should be used in the selection of English precedents. Carnarvon said: "My lords, I understand but little of Latin, but a good deal of English, and not a little of English history, from which I have learned the mischiefs of such kind of prosecutions as these, and the ill fate of the prosecutors. I could bring many instances, and those ancient; but, my lords, I shall go no further than the latter end of Queen Elizabeth's reign, at which time the Earl of Essex was run down by Sir Walter Raleigh. My Lord Bacon, he ran down Sir Walter Raleigh, and your lordships know what became of my Lord Bacon. The Duke of Buckingham, he ran down my Lord Bacon, and your lordships know what happened to the Duke of Buckingham. Sir Thomas Wentworth, afterwards Earl of Strafford, ran down the Duke of Buckingham, and you all know what became of him. Sir Harry Vane, he ran down the Earl of Strafford, and your lordships know what became of Sir Harry Vane. Chancellor Hyde (Lord Clarendon) ran down Sir Harry Vane, and your lordships know what became of the chancellor. Sir Thomas Osborn, now Earl of Danby, ran down Chancellor Hyde; but what will come of the Earl of Danby your lordships best can tell. But let me see that man that dare run the Earl of Danby down, and we shall soon see what will become of him." (11 Howell, S. T., 632, 633.)

Did chance weld the chain which so closely holds these names together in the history of parliamentary impeachment? Was it not rather the natural product of misused power? The officer or party who misuses power may be considered fortunate indeed if the wheel of fortune returns no retribution.

The minority then go on to discuss the "well-considered cases of parliamentary impeachments," those of the Earl of Macclesfield, Warren Hastings, and of Viscount Melville, and to deduce therefrom support for the view which they take. In their opinion these cases should be followed, and they say:

The idea that the House of Representatives may impeach a civil officer of the United States for any and every act for which a parliamentary precedent can be found is too preposterous to be seriously considered.

The minority views then take up the remaining branch of the question:

If only indictable crimes and misdemeanors are impeachable, by what law must they be ascertained? Must it be by the law of the United States, of the States, the common law, or by any or all of these?

In the case of the United States v. Hudson and Goodwin (7 Cranch, 32) it was held that "the legislative authority must first make an act a crime, affix a punishment to it, and declare the court that shall have jurisdiction of the offense" before the courts of the United States can exercise jurisdiction over it. This doctrine was affirmed by the case of the United States v. Coolidge et al. (1 Wheaton, 415), and Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the court in Ex parte Ballman and Swartwout (4 Cranch, 95), said: "Courts which originate in the common law possess a jurisdiction which must be regulated by the common law until some statute shall change their established principles; but courts which are created by written law, and whose jurisdiction is defined by written law, can not transcend that jurisdiction." And it was in following these cases that Justice McLean held, in the United States v. Lancaster (2 McLean's R., 433), that "the Federal Government has no jurisdiction of offenses at common law. Even in civil cases the Federal Government follows the rule of the common law as adopted by the States, respectively. It can exercise no criminal jurisdiction which is not given by statute, nor punish any act, criminally, except as the statute provides." The same doctrine is followed in 1 Wash. C. C. R., 84; 2 Brock, 96; 1 Wood. and Minot, 401; 3 Howard, 103; 12 Peters, 654; 4 Dallas, 10, and note; 1 Kent's Com., 354; Sedgwick on Statutory and Constitutional Law, 17; and Wharton, in reviewing this question, says: "However this may be on the merits, the line of recent decisions puts it beyond doubt that the Federal courts will not take jurisdiction over any crimes which have not been placed directly under their control by act of Congress." (Am. Criminal Law, 174.)

Are these authorities founded in reason? If they are, why should they not be followed by the high court of impeachment, as well as other courts of the United States? The principle on which they proceed is that nothing is a crime against the United States which has not been declared so to be by the sovereignty of the Republic; that only the laws of the United States can be enforced in the courts of the United States; that the United States do what other civilized and Christian governments do—enforce their own laws, for such only are rules of conduct prescribed for their own citizens. This seems to be reasonable; and if it is so, it would be difficult to find an excuse, or form a pretext, for not applying it to the tribunal intrusted with the jurisdiction to try cases of impeachment.

But it is claimed that the high court of impeachment is exempt from this jurisdictional limitation by the terms of the Constitution itself; that the Constitution establishes the courts, confers its jurisdiction, and includes within it common-law crimes, inasmuch as it says: "The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." This, it is said, opens the broad field of the common law for the ascertainment of offenses for the commission of which civil officers may be impeached; that the terms treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors are common-law terms, and are to be understood in the sense given them by the common law; that, as used in the Constitution, their import is the same as at common law. Is this true to the extent stated? Suppose the impeachment is to be for treason and some common-law treason is attempted to be set up, what would be the result? The Constitution says: "Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." This puts an end to all attempts to impeach a civil officer of the United States for treason at common law. Then the term treason, as used in the Constitution, although it be a common-law term, is shorn of its common-law signification.

But it may be said that the term "bribery" is not defined in the Constitution, and therefore a civil officer may be impeached for bribery at common law. If this be true, why is it true? Bribery was, at the time the Constitution was formed, a crime known not only to the common law, but also to the laws of each of the thirteen States participating in the organization of the Government of the United States. It was selected by name because it affected the administration of the affairs of the Government in all of its departments—executive, legislative, and judicial—as treason touched the very life of the nation. Being thus selected by name, recourse may be had to the common law to ascertain the constituent elements of the crime thus named. "Courts may properly resort to the common law to aid in giving construction to words used in the Constitution" (3 Wheaton, 610; 1 Wood. and Minot, 448); and as the Constitution used the word bribery, resort can be had to the common law to determine its meaning. Thus, the framers of the Constitution placed within the jurisdiction of the high court of impeachment the two crimes which peculiarly affect the life and well-being of the nation—both being specifically named.

How is it with other offenses? The Constitution says: "or other high crimes and misdemeanors." What other high crimes and misdemeanors? To what extent can the common law aid us in answering this question? If we go to the common law to find what a crime is, we discover that it is some act or omission in violation of law which may be punished in the mode prescribed by law. This is the general signification of the term crime at common law. It is not a naming of a specific offense. If the Constitution had named murder, arson, burglary, larceny, or any other crime by its title the common law could have aided us in arriving at its meaning, for all these, and a multitude of others, are crimes at common law. After wandering over the entire field of common-law crimes, how are we to tell those which will support an impeachment? Learned writers assert that those offenses which may be committed by any person—such as murder, burglary, robbery, etc.—are not the subjects of impeachment. (Rawle on the Constitution, 204.) But these are all crimes, high crimes, and they meet us at every step in our gropings among the winding passages of the common law engaged in vain endeavors to determine what the Constitution means by the terms high crimes and misdemeanors. Can any mode of escape from this perplexity be devised except that which shall affirm that the phrase "or other high crimes and misdemeanors" means such other high crimes and misdemeanors as may be declared by the lawmaking power of the United States? It is unreasonable to conclude that a civil officer can be impeached only for some crime or misdemeanor named by the Constitution or laws of the United States? This is the course pursued toward the citizen in private life. Why should greater uncertainty attend the public officer?

It will not do to answer these suggestions by stating hypothetical cases and affirming that an officer who should do this, that, or another thing ought to be impeached, and that it would be unsafe for the nation to permit such conduct to pass unchallenged and unpunished. The obvious answer to all this is that everything which ought to be made a crime can be made so by legislation. The power is ample and the machinery perfect for all such work. If they are not used, the fault may not lie at the door of the delinquent officer. The statement of a supposed case of itself proves that a remedy may be provided. The remedy is to prohibit the doing of the thing supposed, and declaring its commission a crime. A case can not be stated which will not suggest its own remedy. Every difficulty may be surmounted by appropriate legislation; and the question may very well be asked, What right has the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States to sleep on their undisputed legislative powers and then resort to the common law of England for the punishment of civil officers, when no civil court of the United States can punish a citizen or foreigner for any crime from the highest to the lowest degree, except it be first prescribed by an act of Congress? The decisions of the courts of the United States that they have jurisdiction of no crimes not found in the statutes of Congress give great force to the statement of Mr. Rawle in his work on the Constitution, that "The doctrine that there is no law of crimes except that founded in statutes, renders impeachment a nullity in all cases except the two expressly mentioned in the Constitution—treason and bribery—until Congress shall pass laws declaring what shall constitute the other high crimes and misdemeanors." (P. 265.)

Rawle combatted the doctrine of the decisions referred to, and this it is which gives peculiar force to the language just quoted from him; for had he accepted the doctrine of the decision in the case of the United States v. Hudson and Goodwin, it is perfectly evident that he would have declared the impeaching power inoperative, except so far as it relates to treason and bribery, until Congress, by legislation, should give it vitality.

Story also combatted this doctrine and denied the correctness of the decisions upon which it is based. It was this which gave direction to those parts of his Commentaries on the Constitution so freely quoted by those who claim that the power of impeachment is unlimited. He cites approvingly the works of Rawle above quoted. (Sec. 796.) He affirmed that the courts of the United States have jurisdiction of common-law crimes; but the decisions are against him. He states in his Commentaries on the Constitution that impeachments will lie for nonindictable offenses; but the authorities which he cites are against him. He cites Rawle; but it has already appeared how that author surrenders the entire position. He quotes 2 Woodeson, Lecture 40, but in this very lecture Woodeson says: "Impeachments, as we have seen, are founded and proceed upon the laws in being. A more extraordinary course is sometimes adopted. New and occasional laws have been passed for the punishment of offenders. Such ordinances are called bills of attainder and bills of pains and penalties." (2 Woodeson, 620.)

Offenses known to the laws in being are indictable; and the Congress of the United States may not resort to bills of attainder and bills of pains and penalties; these are forbidden by the Constitution. But to what laws must the offenses be known? To the law of the sovereignty against which they are alleged to have been committed.

Is there any foundation on which to rest a contrary doctrine? May not the case be stated as a syllogism thus: No officer is subject to the impeaching power for the commission of an act which is not indictable; common-law crimes are not indictable in the courts of the United States; ergo, common-law crimes will not sustain an impeachment by the House of Representatives of the United States?

The case of the United States v. Hudson and Goodwin was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in February, 1812, and its doctrine has been adhered to from that day to the present time. It is of some importance to remember this date, as it is subsequent to the impeachment of Blount, Pickering, and Chase, which may account for the failure to raise the question in those cases: "Can a civil officer be impeached for an offense which is not indictable under the laws and in the courts of the United States?" It was not necessary to raise it in the Peck case, for his defense, as has already been stated, was a justification of his conduct, while the Humphreys case was founded on statutory offenses, and no defense was made.

In the first inquiry the House decided not to impeach President Johnson.

At the time of the impeachment of President Johnson it was conceded that he was entitled to exercise the duties of the office until convicted by the Senate.

Reference to argument of Senator Charles Sumner that President Johnson should be suspended during impeachment proceedings.

An instance where the power of obstruction by dilatory motions was used to compel a direct vote on an issue.

On December 6, 1867,[1] at the next session of Congress, the House took up for consideration the resolution proposed by the majority of the committee:

Resolved, That Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors.

The debate was confined to two speeches, one by Mr. Boutwell in favor of the resolution and one by Mr. Wilson against it.[2] While the speakers discussed both the law and the facts, Mr. Boutwell laid greatest stress on the law, as he conceded that—if the theory of the law submitted by the minority of the committee be in the judgment of this House a true theory, then the majority have no case whatever.

It appears also that some question had been raised as to the effect of impeachment on the duties of the office of President, and Mr. Boutwell said:

After much deliberation I can not doubt the soundness of the opinion that the President, even when impeached by this House, is still entitled to his office until he has been convicted by the Senate.[3]

At the close of his speech, Mr. Wilson moved to lay the resolution on the table. As the effect of this motion was to prevent debate and also a direct vote on the issue, dilatory proceedings were begun by those favoring impeachment and continued until December 7, when Mr. Wilson withdrew his motion to lay on the table as a compromise step and thus conceded to the obstructors their demand for a direct vote.

On the question on the resolution, "Will the House agree thereto?" there appeared—yeas 57, nays 108.[4]

So the first attempt to impeach the President failed.

Although debate was not permitted generally when the resolution was under consideration, Members availed themselves of the freedom of debate in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and on December 13[5] the subject was discussed at length by several Members.

[3] Globe, appendix, p. 54. This view was sustained by the event. The House impeached President Johnson on February 24, 1868, and the trial ended May 26, 1868. During that time he continued in the ordinary performance of his duties, as is shown by his communications to the House. (See House Journal, pp. 480, 515, 572, 655, second session Fortieth Congress.) On March 5, 1868 (second session Fortieth Congress, Globe, pp. 1676, 1677), Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, in the Senate, made an interesting and elaborate argument to show that it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution that the President should be suspended during impeachment proceedings.

2408. The impeachment and trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States.

The impeachment of President Johnson was set in motion by a resolution authorizing a general investigation as to the execution of the laws.

The House referred to the Committee on Reconstruction the evidence taken by the Judiciary Committee in the first attempt to impeach President Johnson.

A proposition to impeach President Johnson was held to be privileged, although at this session a similar resolution had been considered and negatived.

Secretary Stanton communicated directly to the House the fact of the President's attempt to remove him.

The first attempt to impeach Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, failed on December 7, 1867,[1] Thereafter the subject was debated at length on December 13[2] in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, but not with any proposition for action pending, and rather with reference to the questions of law and fact raised in the preceding discussions.

On January 22, 1868,[3] Mr. Rufus P. Spalding, of Ohio, moved that the rules be suspended in order that he might present the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Reconstruction be authorized to inquire what combinations have been made or attempted to be made to obstruct the due execution of the laws, and to that end the committee have power to send for persons and papers and to examine witnesses on oath, and report to this House what action, if any, they may deem necessary, and that said committee have leave to report at any time.

The motion was agreed to, yeas 103, nays 37; and the resolution being before the House, motions to lay it on the table, to fix the day to which the House should stand adjourned, and to adjourn were successively disagreed to. Then, under operation of the previous question, the resolution was agreed to, yeas 99, nays 31.

On February 10[4] Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to by the House:

Resolved, That the evidence taken on impeachment by the Committee on the Judiciary[5] be referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and that the committee have leave to report at any time.

On February 21[6] the Speaker laid before the House the following communication:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, February 21, 1868.

SIR: General Thomas has just delivered to me a copy of the inclosed order, which you will please communicate to the House of Representatives.

E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker House of Representatives.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, D. C., February 21, 1868.

SIR: By virtue of the power and authority vested in me, as President, by the Constitution and laws of the United States, you are hereby removed from office as Secretary for the Department of War, and your functions as such will terminate upon the receipt of this communication.

You will transfer to Bvt. Maj. Gen. Lorenzo Thomas, Adjutant-General of the Army, who has this day been authorized and empowered to act as Secretary of War ad interim, all records, books, papers, and other public property now in your custody and charge.

Respectfully, yours,

ANDREW JOHNSON.

Mr. Elihu B. Washburne, of Illinois, moved that the communication be referred to the Committee on Reconstruction. This motion was agreed to without division, although there were suggestions that the letter should go to the Judiciary Committee or to a select committee.

On the same day, and thereafter,[1] Mr. John Covode, of Pennsylvania, rising to a question of privilege, presented this resolution:

Resolved, That Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors.

Mr. Fernando Wood, of New York, having objected, the Speaker[2] said:

It is a privileged question.

Then, on motion of Mr. George S. Boutwell, of Massachusetts, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

The second and successful proposition to impeach President Johnson was reported from the Committee on Reconstruction.

The second investigation of the conduct of President Johnson was ex parte.

The full report justifying the proposition to impeach President Johnson.

On February 22[3] Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, presented from the Committee on Reconstruction the following report:

That in addition to the papers referred to the committee, the committee find that the President, on the 21st day of February, 1868, signed and issued a commission or letter of authority to one Lorenzo Thomas, directing and authorizing said Thomas to act as Secretary of War ad interim, and to take possession of the books, records, and papers, and other public property in the War Department, of which the following is a copy:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, February 21, 1868.

SIR: Hon. Edwin M. Stanton having been this day removed from office as Secretary for the Department of War, you are hereby authorized and empowered to act as Secretary of War ad interim, and will immediately enter upon the discharge of the duties pertaining to that office. Mr. Stanton has been instructed to transfer to you all the records, books, papers, and other public property now in his custody and charge.

Respectfully, yours,

ANDREW JOHNSON.

To Brevet Maj. Gen. LORENZO THOMAS,
Adjutant-General of the United States Army, Washington, D. C.

Official copy respectfully furnished to Hon. Edwin M. Stanton.

L. THOMAS,
Secretary of War ad interim.

Upon the evidence collected by the committee, which is herewith presented, and in virtue of the powers with which they have been invested by the House, they are of the opinion that Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors. They therefore recommend to the House the adoption of the accompanying resolution.

Resolved, That Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors in office.

This report was signed by Messrs. Stevens, George S. Boutwell, of Massachusetts, John A. Bingham, of Ohio, C. T. Hulburd, of New York, John F. Farnsworth, of Illinois, F. C. Beaman, of Michigan, and H. E. Paine, of Wisconsin. There were no minority views, Mr. James Brooks, of New York, who dissented, stating that he had not had the time to prepare them. Mr. James B. Beck, of Kentucky, also a member of the committee, dissented.

The committee reporting the second proposition to impeach President Johnson disagreed as to the grounds thereof.

The question whether impeachment must be confined to indictable offenses was in issue as to the second report favoring impeachment of President Johnson.

Argument of Mr. Thaddeus Stevens that impeachment is a purely political proceeding.

The resolution was debated at length on February 22 and 24.[1] It appears from this debate that the specific act most relied upon by the committee was violation of the law known as the tenure-of-office act,[2] and which provided in its first section:

That every person holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any office, and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is, and shall be, entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided. Provided, That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney-General shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they have been appointed, and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

And in its sixth section:

That every removal, appointment, or employment made, had, or exercised contrary to the provisions of this act, and the making, signing, sealing, countersigning, or issuing of any commission or letter of authority for or in respect to any such appointment or employment, shall be deemed and are hereby declared to be high misdemeanors, and upon trial and conviction thereof every person guilty thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

It was urged generally that the removal of Mr. Stanton and the appointment of General Thomas ad interim constituted specific violations of this law. Members of the House who had by their votes assisted in defeating the first attempt at impeachment, supported the pending resolution on the ground that it was based on an offense indictable under Federal law. Thus, Mr. James F. Wilson, of Iowa, who had submitted the minority views on which the defeat of the former attempt was based, said[3] in this case:

The considerations which weighed upon my mind and molded my conduct in the case with which the Committee on the Judiciary of this House was charged are not to be found in the present case. The logic of the former case is made plain, not to say perfect, by its sequence in the present one. The President was working to an end suspected by others, known to himself. His then means were not known to the law as crimes or misdemeanors, either at common law or by statute, and we so pronounced. He mistook our judgment for cowardice, and worked on until he has presented to us, as a sequence, a high misdemeanor known to the law and defined by statute.

Others who had voted against impeachment in the former instance expressed similar views. Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, in closing the debate,[1] indicated, however, that he did not consider the case as narrowed to this point alone:

The charges, so far as I shall discuss them, are few and distinct. Andrew Johnson is charged with attempting to usurp the powers of other branches of the Government; with attempting to obstruct and resist the execution of the law; with misprision of bribery; and with the open violation of laws which declare his acts misdemeanors and subject him to fine and imprisonment; and with removing from office the Secretary of War during the session of the Senate without the advice or consent of the Senate; and with violating the sixth section of the act entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices." There are other offenses charged in the papers referred to the committee which I may consider more by themselves.

In order to sustain impeachment under our Constitution I do not hold that it is necessary to prove a crime as an indictable offense, or any act malum in se. I agree with the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, on the other side of the House, who holds this to be a purely political proceeding. It is intended as a remedy for malfeasance in office and to prevent the continuance thereof. Beyond that, it is not intended as a personal punishment for past offenses or for future example.

Impeachment under our Constitution is very different from impeachment under the English law. The framers of our Constitution did not rely for safety upon the avenging dagger of a Brutus, but provided peaceful remedies which should prevent that necessity. England had two systems of jurisprudence—one for the trial and punishment of common offenders, and one for the trial of men in higher stations, whom it was found difficult to convict before the ordinary tribunals. This latter proceeding was by impeachment or by bills of attainder, generally practiced to punish official malefactors, but the system soon degenerated into political and personal persecution, and men were tried, condemned, and executed by this court from malignant motives. Such was the condition of the English laws when our Constitution was framed, and the convention determined to provide against the abuse of that high power, so that revenge and punishment should not be inflicted upon political or personal enemies. Here the whole punishment was made to consist in removal from office, and bills of attainder were wholly prohibited. We are to treat this question, then, as wholly political, in which, if an officer of the Government abuse his trust or attempt to pervert it to improper purposes, whatever might be his motives, he becomes subject to impeachment and removal from office. The offense being indictable does not prevent impeachment, but is not necessary to sustain it. (See Story's Commentaries, Curtis on the Constitution, Madison, and others.) Such is the opinion of our elementary writers, nor can any case of impeachment tried in this country be found where any attempt was made to prove the offense criminal and indictable.

Discussion as to whether President Johnson was justified in attempting to test the constitutionality of the tenure-of-office law.

It was urged against the proposed resolution that the tenure-of-office act was unconstitutional, and therefore that the President had committed no specific violation of law. This view was set forth[2] most forcibly by Mr. James B. Beck, of Kentucky, a member of the Committee on Reconstruction:

All questions growing out of the combinations and conspiracies lately charged upon the President were ruled by the Reconstruction Committee to be insufficient and were not brought before this House. And the sole question now before us is, Is there anything in this last act of the President removing Mr. Stanton and appointing Adjutant-General Thomas Secretary of War ad interim to justify his impeachment by this House?

I maintain that the President of the United States is in duty bound to test the legality of every law which he thinks interferes with his rights and powers as the Chief Magistrate of this nation. Whenever he has powers conferred upon him by the Constitution of the United States, and an act of Congress undertakes to deprive him of those powers or any of them, he would be false to his trust as the Chief Executive of this nation, false to the interests of the people whom he represents, if he did not by every means in his power seek to test the constitutionality of that law, and to take whatever steps were necessary and proper to have it tested by the highest tribunal in the land, and to ascertain whether he has a right under the Constitution to do what he claims the right to do, or whether Congress has the right to deprive him of the powers which he claims have been vested in him by the Constitution of the United States, and that is all that he proposes to do in this case.

Now, if that is the object, and the only object, of the President, as I contend the facts show, then I can hardly bring myself to believe that any set of sane men can seriously entertain the opinion that in anything the President has done in the removal of Mr. Stanton he has been guilty of either a high crime or misdemeanor. But "whom the gods wish to destroy they first make mad," and if ever a party was stricken with judicial madness and blindness the action of this party now proves that they are the victims of it.

That the President should be considered guilty of a high crime or misdemeanor for desiring and attempting to bring to the test of judicial decision one of the powers with which he considers that the Constitution has clothed him, and of which power an act of Congress has attempted to divest him, and that, too, in regard to an officer who agrees with him in regard to that constitutional power, seems to me an idea too preposterous to be entertained outside of a lunatic asylum.

The humblest citizen has the undoubted right to try judicially his constitutional rights. In regard to an officer whose office is created by the Constitution it is not only the right but the official duty of the President to bring to the test of judicial decision every power of which Congress endeavors to deprive him and which he believes is vested in him by the Constitution. He can not obey the Constitution nor faithfully fulfill his oath of office without vindicating in a legal, orderly, and judicial mode those powers. A void act of Congress is no excuse before a court or even before the bar of enlightened public opinion for a failure to attempt in a constitutional, legal, and orderly manner to fulfill his constitutional duties. If, therefore, the President is guilty of a crime, that crime consists in his believing that the tenure-of-office bill is unconstitutional or that it does not apply to the case of Mr. Stanton; for if he does so believe it is a duty he can not, without violating his oath, decline to bring to the test of judicial decision whenever the duties of his office require him to remove an officer under his constitutional authority.

Mr. Beck then quoted Madison, Story, and Kent, and cited the attitude of Mr. Stanton himself, at the time the President declined to approve the tenure-of-office act, to show that by the Constitution the right to remove executive officers was vested solely in the President, and that he could not be deprived of this power by an act of Congress.

In opposition to this view it was urged,[1] in the first place, that on the day before this report was made in the House the Senate had solemnly passed on the question of prerogative by agreeing to the following:

Whereas the Senate have read and considered the communication of the President, stating that he had removed Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, and had designated the Adjutant-General of the Army to act as Secretary of War ad interim: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That under the Constitution and laws of the United States the President has no power to remove the Secretary of War and designate any other officer to perform the duties of that officer ad interim.

Further, it was urged:[2]

The Constitution does not make him a judge of the law, but an executor thereof, and he is bound to execute that which the law-making power decrees to be the law of the land. Whatever may be his opinion of the law as a mere individual member of the national family, he is bound to yield it to that higher duty which the Constitution imposes on him as an officer of the state. If his conscience forbid, he may resign the trust, but he has no right to retain the power of a public officer and subordinate that to the judgment of a mere individual member of the community or nation which has clothed him with executive power for the enforcement of its laws. As an individual he may be justified in an assumption of the risks attendant upon a disobedience of the law; as a public officer no such plea can be properly entered in his behalf, for he is not only sworn to execute the law, but he also possesses the right of resignation. If his conscience will not permit him to execute a given law, he may resign his trust, and leave to his successor the performance of a duty which his judgment, as an individual, will not surrender to his obligations as a public officer. A willingness to submit to the penalty prescribed for the violation of a law may, to some extent, excuse disobedience on the part of a private citizen, and at the same time avail nothing to the public officer. The latter may at any time, by resignation, become a private citizen, but the former can not become a public officer in this country except by the suffrages of his fellow-citizens. If he accepts the result of their suffrages, he merges his individuality into that official creature which binds itself by an oath as an executive officer to do that which, as a mere individual, he may not believe to be just, right, or constitutional. Such an acceptance removes him from the sphere of the right of private judgment to the plane of the public officer, and binds him to observe the law, his judgment as an individual to the contrary notwithstanding.

[1] Globe, p. 1341.

The Constitution invests the President with executive power in order that he may "take care that the laws be faithfully executed." Every abuse of this power, whether it be by an improper exercise of it or by neglect or refusal to exercise it at all, is a breach of official duty. But it is not every breach of official duty that can be charged as a crime or misdemeanor against the delinquent officer. Whatever doubt may have arisen in other cases of the criminal character of the official conduct involved in them, the one we are now considering presents no basis on which to rest a doubt. Deliberately, not to say defiantly, the President has violated a penal statute of the United States, and has thereby committed a high misdemeanor which the law says "shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both said punishments, in the discretion of the court." (Act of March 2, 1847, sec. 6.) All of the circumstances attendant upon this case show that the President's action was deliberate and willful. * * *

Mr. Speaker, it has been urged in this debate that the President's sole object is to secure a judgment of the courts as to the constitutionality of the act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices. Such an intent will not justify the commission of a high crime or misdemeanor. Suppose the courts should hold the act to be constitutional, would the fact that his intent was to have that question decided be a good plea to an indictment for a violation of its provisions? Who is so insane as to assert so preposterous a proposition? Whoever acts in the way and for the purpose suggested does it at his peril. The work belongs to the President in this case, not to the law. This plea in his defense demonstrates that his action was not the result of inadvertence or of mistaken judgment, and that it is the fruit of cool calculation and deliberate purpose. He committed a high misdemeanor in order to secure a judgment of the court.

On the report from the Committee on Reconstruction the House voted the impeachment of President Johnson.

Forms of resolutions directing the carrying of the impeachment of President Johnson to the Senate.

The House authorized a committee of seven to prepare articles impeaching President Johnson, with power to compel testimony.

The impeachment of President Johnson was carried to the Senate by a committee of two.

The Speaker appointed the committee to carry the impeachment of President Johnson to the Senate from those favoring impeachment and from the majority party.

The Speaker appointed the committee to draw articles impeaching President Johnson from those favoring impeachment and from the majority party.

After full debate, on February 24,[1] the question was taken on the resolution proposed by the committee, "Will the House agree thereto?" and there appeared yeas 128, nays 47.

So the House determined upon the impeachment of the President.

Immediately thereafter Mr. Thaddeus Stevens proposed the following:

Resolved, That a committee of two be appointed to go to the Senate and at the bar thereof, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States, to impeach Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors in office, and acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will in due time exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him and make good the same; and that the committee do demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said Andrew Johnson to answer to said impeachment.

2. Resolved, That a committee of seven be appointed to prepare and report articles of impeachment against Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, with power to send for persons, papers, and records, and to take testimony under oath.

After an attempted obstruction had been prevented by the adoption, under suspension of the rules, of an order preventing dilatory motions, the House agreed to the resolutions by a vote of yeas 124, nays 42.[2]

The Speaker announced as the committee under the first resolution Messrs. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, and John A. Bingham, of Ohio. Both were members of the Committee on Reconstruction and had signed the report, and both belonged to the majority party in the House.

As the committee under the second resolution the Speaker announced Messrs. George S. Boutwell, of Massachusetts, Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, John A. Bingham, of Ohio, James F. Wilson, of Iowa, John A. Logan, of Illinois, George W. Julian, of Indiana, and Hamilton Ward, of New York. All of these belonged to the majority party in the House and had voted for the impeachment. The first three were members of the Committee on Reconstruction.

The ceremonies of presenting the impeachment of President Johnson at the bar of the Senate.

A message was sent to inform the Senate that a committee would present the impeachment of President Johnson.

Form of declaration by the chairman of the House committee in presenting the impeachment of President Johnson in the Senate.

The message of the House impeaching President Johnson was referred to a committee of seven Senators appointed by the Chair.

The Senate received the message impeaching President Johnson in its legislative capacity and not as a court.

The committee having impeached President Johnson, returned to the House and reported orally in the usual form.

On February 25,[3] in the Senate, the Clerk of the House delivered a message in form as follows:

Mr. President, I have been directed to inform the Senate that the House of Representatives has passed the following resolution:

[1] Journal, p. 392; Globe, p. 1400.

[2] Journal, pp. 393, 396; Globe, pp. 1400–1402.

[3] Senate Journal, p. 217; Globe, p. 1403.

"Resolved, That a committee of two be appointed to go to the Senate and at the bar thereof, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States, to impeach Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors in office, and acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will in due time exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him and make good the same; and that the committee do demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of said Andrew Johnson to answer to said impeachment."

And that the House has appointed Mr. Thaddeus Stevens and Mr. John A. Bingham such committee.

Soon thereafter [1] the Sergeant-at-Arms announced a committee from the House of Representatives, Mr. Thaddeus Stevens and Mr. John A. Bingham, who appeared at the bar of the Senate, when the following occurred:

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore.[2] The committee from the House of Representatives.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, in obedience to the order of the House of Representatives, we appear before you, and in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States we do impeach Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors in office; and we further inform the Senate that the House of Representatives will in due time exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him and make good the same; and in their name we demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said Andrew Johnson to answer said impeachment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will take order in the premises.

The committee of the House thereupon withdrew.

Thereupon Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan, proposed a resolution as follows:

Resolved, That the message of the House of Representatives relating to the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, be referred to a select committee of seven, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. James A. Bayard, of Delaware, objected that the Senate in its legislative capacity might not act on a question of impeachment, and that it should form itself into a court of impeachment before adopting the resolution. In answer to this it was stated that this was a mere preliminary proceeding, and that the procedure followed the precedent of the trial of Judge Peck.

After the resolution had been amended, on the suggestion of Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, and in accordance with the precedent in the trial of Judge Humphreys, by adding after the word "seven" the words "to be appointed by the Chair," the resolution was agreed to.

The President pro tempore thereupon appointed Messrs. Howard, Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois, Roscoe Conkling, of New York, George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana, Stephen C. Pomeroy, of Kansas, and Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland.

On the same day [3] the committee from the House, having returned from the Senate, reported orally at the bar of the House through Mr. Stevens, the chairman, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, in obedience to the order of the House, we proceeded to the bar of the Senate, and in the name of this body and of all the people of the United States we impeached, as we were directed to do, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors in office, and we demanded that the Senate should take order to make him appear before that body to answer for the same, and announced that the House would soon present articles of impeachment and make them good; to which the response was, "Order shall be taken."

To prevent dilatory tactics the House adopted, under suspension of the rules, a special order for consideration of the articles impeaching President Johnson.

Form of resolution in which the Senate took order for the impeachment of President Johnson.

For the trial of President Johnson the Senate readopted most of the existing rules, with amendments and additions.

On February 25,[1] in the House, Mr. Elihu B. Washburne, of Illinois, offered, under suspension of the rules, the following:

Resolved, That the rules be suspended, and that it is hereby ordered as follows:

"When the committee to prepare articles of impeachment of the President of the United States report the said articles the House shall immediately resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole thereon that speeches in committee shall be limited to fifteen minutes each, which debate shall continue till the next legislative day after the report, to the exclusion of all other business except the reading of the Journal; that at 3 o'clock on the afternoon of said second day the fifteen-minute debate shall cease, and the committee shall then proceed to consider and vote upon amendments that may be offered under the five-minute rule of debate, but no merely pro forma amendment shall be entertained; that at 4 o'clock on the afternoon of said second day the committee shall rise and report their action to the House, which shall immediately and without dilatory motions vote thereon: that if the articles of impeachment are agreed on the House shall then immediately and without dilatory motions elect by ballot seven managers to conduct said impeachment on the part of the House; and that during the pendency of resolutions in the House relative to said impeachment thereafter no dilatory motions shall be received except one motion on each day that the House do now adjourn."

This resolution, which was intended to prevent obstructive action on the part of the minority, was agreed to, yeas 106, nays 37.

On the same day,[2] by a vote of yeas 105, nays 36, the House agreed to the following, on motion of Mr. George S. Boutwell, of Massachusetts:

Resolved, That the committee appointed to prepare and report articles of impeachment against Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, have leave to sit during the sessions of the House

Resolved further, That the Committee on Reconstruction be authorized to sit during the sessions of the House.

On February 26,[3] in the Senate, Mr. Howard, from the select committee, reported the following resolution; which was agreed to, and of which the House was duly notified:

Whereas the House of Representatives, on the 25th day of the present month, by two of their members, Messrs. Thaddeus Stevens and John A. Bingham, at the bar of the Senate, impeached Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors in office, and informed the Senate that the House of Representatives will in due time exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him and make good the same, and likewise demanded that the Senate take order for the appearance of said Andrew Johnson to answer to the said impeachment: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Senate will take proper order thereon, of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.

On February 28,[1] in the Senate, Mr. Howard, from the select committee, presented a report "prescribing certain rules of proceeding for the Senate when sitting as a high court of impeachment." The rules comprised the rules of the Chase trial, with some modifications in minor details, and also several new rules. The Senate considered the report on February 29 and March 2,[2] and after amending the rules agreed to them.

The articles impeaching President Johnson were considered in Committee of the Whole.

At the time of President Johnson's impeachment it was agreed that he should be described as President and not as Acting President.

On February 29,[3] in the House, Mr. George S. Boutwell, of Massachusetts, from the committee appointed to prepare articles of impeachment, submitted their report, which was at once considered in Committee of the Whole in accordance with the special order. At the outset Mr. Boutwell said:[4]

In considering and preparing these articles the committee met with a difficulty in the outset which it becomes me to present to the Committee of the Whole House in the beginning of this discussion. That difficulty is this: What should be the description, so far as the office is concerned, in which Andrew Johnson should be arraigned for these misdemeanors; whether as President of the United States or as Vice-President of the United States upon whom the powers and duties of the office of President had devolved.

After such consideration as the committee were able to give to this matter during the period of time assigned to the consideration of this subject they are, I believe I may say, unanimously of opinion that the manner of description used in the articles we have reported is that manner of description on which we shall be compelled to rely. Without undertaking at this moment to advise the House finally as to what they ought to do upon this branch of the subject, I will venture to suggest this consideration, derived from the Constitution: That it is only when the President is on trial before the Senate that the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States is to preside. Therefore it follows that a different court must be organized for the trial of the Vice-President from that authorized by the Constitution to try the President.

Later, on March 2,[5] Mr. John A. Bingham, of Ohio, said:

I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, to the House this question was considered by the committee, and I was not aware when the report was made there was a member of that committee who entertained the slightest doubt on the subject that Andrew Johnson is President of the United States. I desire to say that he must be impeached, if he be impeached at all, either distinctively as President of the United States or as Vice-President of the United States. I desire to say, further, that in both capacities he can not be impeached at the same time and on the same trial, for the reason that the court, as was well said by the chairman of the committee, is differently constituted by the terms of the Constitution to try the President of the United States. The Chief Justice of the United States must, by the terms of the Constitution, preside if the President be tried; the Chief Justice shall not preside if the Vice-President be tried.

Again, Andrew Johnson is estopped by record in five hundred instances from denying that he is President of the United States. The Senate of the United States is estopped; the House of Representatives is estopped. Your Constitution declares that no bill shall be a law until it be presented to the President for his approval or disapproval. If he be not President, if the people have no President, then you can pass no law. If he be President, then let him be called President on your record.

Mr. Luke P. Poland, of Vermont, said:

We have had some Congressional history to which I call the attention of the House. In all that has been said upon the subject I have heard no allusion to the settlement of this question in Congress. The first instance of the accession of Vice-President to the office of President was that of John Tyler on the death of President Harrison, in 1841. Before the first message of Mr. Tyler was sent in at the special session, as it was called, in 1841 the following proceedings took place in the House:

"Mr. Wise offered the usual resolution for the appointment of a committee on the part of the House to join such committee as might be appointed by the Senate to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses had assembled, and that Congress was ready to proceed to business.

"Mr. McKeon moved to amend the resolution by striking out the word 'President' and inserting the words 'Vice-President, now exercising the office of President.'"

After considerable debate the vote was taken in the House, and the amendment was rejected. The yeas and nays do not seem to have been taken.

When the message was sent to the Senate the same question was raised there. A similar amendment was offered to a similar resolution. There was more debate than in the House, participated in by Mr. Huntington, Mr. Allen, Mr. Tappan, Mr. Walker, and Mr. Calhoun. The yeas and nays were taken on this amendment in the Senate, and were as follows.

"Yeas—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Henderson, Linn, McRoberts, Tappan, Williams, and Wright—8.

"Nays—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Buchanan, Calhoun, Choate, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Fulton, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, King, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Moorehead, Nicholson, Pierce, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Sevier, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Woodbridge, Woodbury, and Young—38."

So that the question seems to have been settled by a vote of both Houses at that time, and during the whole administration, nearly four years of President Tyler and three years of President Fillmore, and now almost three years of President Johnson, this question has been regarded as settled by the decision of Congress in 1841.

As appears in the articles of impeachment, this reasoning was conclusive.

As reported from the committee, the articles impeaching President Johnson were confined to a few acts chiefly concerning Secretary Stanton.

Although the charges in the articles impeaching President Johnson were at first narrowed to a few charges, there was a protest against the theory that only an indictable offense was impeachable.

A statement as to the sentiments of the House on the nature of the power of impeachment during the first and second attempts to impeach President Johnson.

In the case of the Johnson impeachment, the question "Will the House agree thereto?" was put as to each article after they had been open to amendment.

The first or headline paragraph and the last or reservation clause were agreed to after the articles impeaching the President had been agreed to.

Mr. Boutwell stated that in the articles as reported the committee had confined themselves to the matters brought forward in the present proceedings, and had not gone into that broad field of general charges on which the first attempt at impeachment had failed. In the course of the debate, however, Mr. William Lawrence, of Ohio, argued again that the President might be impeached for other than indictable offenses, and said in the course of his remarks:[1]

I have taken some pains to ascertain the opinions of members of this House, and I think there are but few, even among those who voted against the impeachment of the President in December last, who entertain the idea or now hold that he must be guilty of an offense indictable either by the common or statute law to render him liable to impeachment. Such a doctrine is at variance with the whole theory and practice in cases of impeachment.

On March 2[2] the articles were discussed at length, amended somewhat, and agreed to. In the Committee of the Whole a committee amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to. When the articles were reported to the House this substitute was agreed to, and then, on each article, begining with Article 1, the question was put: "Will the House agree thereto?" And on the nine articles the result was:

	Yeas.	Nays.
Article 1	127	42
Article 2	124	41

Then, by unanimous consent, the first and last paragraphs were agreed to, as follows:[3]

Articles exhibited by the House of Representatives of the United States, in the name of themselves and all the people of the United States, against Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, in maintenance and support of their impeachment against him for high crimes and misdemeanors in office.

* * * * * * *

And the House of Representatives, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any further articles or other accusation or impeachment against the said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, and also of replying to his answers which he shall make unto the articles herein preferred against him, and of offering proof to the same and every part thereof, and to all and every other article, accusation, or impeachment which shall be exhibited by them, as the case shall require, do demand that the said Andrew Johnson may be put to answer the high crimes and misdemeanors in office herein charged against him, and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments may be thereupon had and given as may be agreeable to law and justice.

The managers of the Johnson impeachment were chosen by ballot.

The Speaker appointed four tellers to count the ballots for managers of the Johnson impeachment.

Mr. Speaker Colfax tendered to several members of the minority a place as one of the tellers to count the ballots for managers of the Johnson impeachment.

Members of the minority declining to serve as tellers to count the ballots for managers of the Johnson impeachment, the Speaker appointed all from the majority party.

In the balloting for managers of the Johnson impeachment nominations were made before the vote.

Mr. Speaker Colfax held that when managers of an impeachment were elected by ballot the managers, and not the House, chose the chairman.

Usage of the House in the selection of chairman of the managers of an impeachment. (Footnote.)

The House excused one Member from voting on the ballot for managers of the Johnson impeachment, but refused to excuse others.

It appears that the minority party generally refrained from participating in the ballot for managers of the Johnson impeachment.

Forms of resolutions providing for carrying to the Senate the articles impeaching President Johnson and notifying the Senate thereof.

Then, under the order, the House proceeded [1] to choose, by ballot, seven managers to conduct the impeachment.

The Speaker appointed as tellers Messrs. Luke P. Poland, of Vermont; Rufus P. Spalding, of Ohio; Thomas A. Jenckes, of Rhode Island, and Samuel S. Marshall, of Illinois. All of these but Mr. Marshall were of the number voting for the articles of impeachment. Mr. Marshall, at his request, was excused, and Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, was appointed, but he asked to be excused, on the ground that he did not wish in any way to participate in the proceedings. Mr. William E. Niblack, of Indiana, further said that the minority party did not intend to vote for managers.

The Speaker,[2] understanding that the minority did not wish to be represented, appointed Mr. Austin Blair, of Michigan, as fourth teller.

Mr. Luke P. Poland, of Vermont, nominated the following for managers:

Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania; Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts; John A. Bingham, of Ohio; George S. Boutwell, of Massachusetts; James F. Wilson, of Iowa; Thomas Williams, of Pennsylvania; John A. Logan, of Illinois.

Mr. John A. Peters, of Maine, rising to a parliamentary inquiry, asked if the order in which the names were presented would determine who should be chairman.

The Speaker said:

The Chair can not answer that question. It is a matter that does not affect the House of Representatives. The managers are to present themselves at the bar of the Senate. They can settle that matter among themselves.

Mr. Halbert E. Paine, of Wisconsin, then asked:

Suppose members should designate on their ballots their choice for chairman, would the gentleman having the greatest number of votes as such be the chairman?

[1] House Journal, pp. 450, 451; Globe, pp. 1618, 1619. [2] Schuyler Colfax, of Indiana, Speaker.

The Speaker said:

The Chair would not declare any such result, because it is not in accordance with the usage for the House to select a chairman. In the case of the impeachment of Judge Chase, in which Mr. John Randolph was the leading manager, the House did not select him as such; he was simply selected by the managers themselves, they deeming it proper to have him act as their spokesman.[1]

Mr. Michael C. Kerr, of Indiana, on his request, was excused from voting. Then, a proposition to excuse all who wished to be excused was objected to, the Chair declining to entertain it except by unanimous consent.

Thereupon, Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, said:

The members on this side do not wish to vote, as they are in favor of no part of this proceeding, and I know of no way by which they can be forced to vote. Therefore there is no necessity for excusing them.

The ballot resulted as follows:

Whole number of votes, 118; necessary to a choice, 60; of which—

John A. Bingham received	114	G. W. Scofield	3
George S. Boutwell	113	Luke P. Poland	3
James F. Wilson	112	G. S. Orth	2
Benjamin F. Butler	108	John A. Peters	1
Thomas Williams	107	Austin Blair	1
John A. Logan	106	J. C. Churchill	1
Thaddeus Stevens	105	J. F. Benjamin	1
Thomas A. Jenckes	22	C. Upson	1

The Speaker thereupon announced the names of the seven elected.

Then, on motion of Mr. Boutwell, the following resolutions were agreed to:

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House have appointed managers to conduct the impeachment against the President of the United States, and have directed the said managers to carry to the Senate the articles agreed upon by this House, to be exhibited in maintenance of their impeachment against said Andrew Johnson, and that the Clerk of the House do go with said message.

Resolved, That the articles agreed to by this House, to be exhibited in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, against Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, in maintenance of their impeachment against him of high crimes and misdemeanors in office, be carried to the Senate by the managers appointed to conduct said impeachment.

It was held in the Johnson impeachment that the managers or any Member of the House might propose an additional article as a question of privilege.

After the House had agreed to articles impeaching President Johnson the managers reported two additional articles, which were also agreed to.

On the tenth and eleventh articles in the Johnson impeachment the House, after debate, concluded to impeach for other than indictable offenses.

On March 3,[2] in the House, Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, from the managers and by their instruction, reported an additional article of impeachment. This article Mr. Butler had previously offered as an amendment,[1] but it had been rejected in Committee of the Whole by a vote of ayes 45, noes 56, on a statement of Mr. James F. Wilson, of Iowa, that the committee appointed to frame articles had already considered it and determined against it. The article proposed (which subsequently became Article X of the articles as presented in the Senate) charged the President with bringing his office into contempt by his utterances.

Mr. William S. Holman, of Indiana, made the point of order that this was an amendment to a proposition not before the House.

The Speaker [2] said:

The Chair rules, as he has ruled in all such cases, that this is a privileged question. And the Chair will also refer to the following paragraph of the original report adopted by the House yesterday:

"And the House of Representatives, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any further articles or other accusation or impeachment against the said Andrew Johnson," etc.

Mr. Charles A. Eldridge, of Wisconsin, made the further point of order that the managers might not report additional articles. Their functions were different from those of the committee appointed to prepare articles

The Speaker ruled:

The Chair overrules the point of order on two grounds. In the first place, the usage of the House has been, in all cases of impeachment, that the replication made by the person accused should be referred to the managers, to which the managers prepare a reply and submit it to the House before it is sent to the Senate. This follows precisely the language of the report adopted by the House on yesterday. * * * The second ground is this: That any Member of the House of Representatives, whether one of the board of managers or not, can, as a question of privilege, propose additional articles of impeachment. The Chair makes his ruling so broad in order to cover the entire case. Such article of impeachment may come with more formality from the board of managers, or from a committee specially appointed for the purpose. But the Member from Wisconsin [Mr. Eldridge], if he sees proper to do so, or any other Member, can propose articles of impeachment against any officer of the Government.

Mr. Butler explained the purpose of the article, saying that it followed the precedent of the eighth article of those preferred against Judge Chase, which received more votes in favor of conviction than any other.

Mr. Frederick E. Woodbridge, of Vermont, who had joined with Mr. James F. Wilson, of Iowa, in arguing that impeachment might be had only for indictable offenses, and whose views had been followed by the House in the first attempt at impeachment, now said: [3]

I wish simply to say now, in order that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Butler] may answer the objection, that I am opposed to this article for two reasons. The first is that if the President of the United States is put on his trial under this specification it will take a long time, almost equal, perhaps if the counsel desire it, to the Warren Hastings trial, which, I believe, was about seven years. For that, if for no other reason, I should be opposed to this article.

The other reason is that there is no offense charged under which a conviction can be had: The article concludes as follows:

"Which said utterances, declarations, threats, and harangues, highly censurable in any, and peculiarly indecent and unbecoming in the Chief Magistrate of the United States, by means whereof said Andrew Johnson has brought the high office of the President of the United States into contempt, ridicule, and disgrace, to the great scandal of all good citizens, whereby said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, did commit, and was then and there guilty of, a high misdemeanor in office."

[3] Globe, pp. 1640, 1641.

Now, sir, there are under the Constitution but two offenses under which a conviction can be had, namely: High crimes and misdemeanors. Neither of these is charged in this article. It is not a crime or misdemeanor in the President to bring himself into public obloquy before the people by reason of his improper speech. It is not a crime for him to make remarks when "swinging round the circle" or elsewhere, that may be distasteful to the Congress of the United States or that may be very improper. I have yet to learn that the President of the United States, or any civil officer, can be impeached, except for a high crime or misdemeanor. The gentleman will not pretend that he has set forth either in this article. He only states that the President had brought himself into public disgrace by reason of public speeches which he made before the country. Now, all I ask of my friend is that he will so frame his article that at least the Senate, sitting as a high court of impeachment, may entertain it as being properly charged.

To this Mr. Butler replied:

What is the proposition of those gentlemen who insist that the President can be impeached for those acts only which are indictable as crimes under some statute? * * * Now, what is this proposition? The proposition is this, that for the lowest degree of indictable crime, to wit: An assault and battery, or, as a friend suggests, selling liquor without license, the President of the United States may be impeached, but he can not be impeached when he usurps the liberties of the people, because there is no indictment under any statute against that. He may be impeached for selling liquor without a license, but he can not be impeached if he gets into an open barouche with two abandoned women, one on each side of him, roaring drunk, and rides up and down Pennsylvania avenue, because there is no statute that I know of against that. He can not be impeached for any violation of public decency which does not happen to be an indictable crime. He can not be impeached for debasing his high office. The statement of this proposition is its best refutation. Here let me say to my friend from Vermont that I have not charged in this article that the President has brought himself into ridicule and contempt. If he had only done that I should have been quite willing to let him go unpunished [laughter], but I do say that he brought the high office which he fills—no, which he occupies—into sovereign disgrace, ridicule, and contempt, so that it is hardly respectable for a decent man to fill hereafter; and is not that an impeachable misdemeanor? I do not stand upon this point on the weight of authority of my own words alone. I stand upon the authority of one of the best lawyers that ever sat upon the bench, Judge Story, of the Supreme Court of the United States, who uses these words to define what is impeachable:

"It is a proceeding, probably the fairest that could be devised, by which the people, through the action of that branch of the Government which most directly and fully represents themselves, call in question the fitness of their public officers, and dismiss them if unfit." (Story on the Constitution, sec. 810.)

Now, is there any one in this House, or outside of this House anywhere in the country, who would vote that Andrew Johnson is a "fit" man to be President of the United States? Who will say "ay" to that anywhere? This article has been drawn exactly within the precedent of Judge Chase's case. Of all the great lawyers who defended Judge Chase—and he had one, Mr. Wirt, who argued two days in succession for him—no one ventured to say to the Senate that that article, if proved, was not a misdemeanor within the provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. James F. Wilson, of Iowa, stated that he was the only one of the managers who opposed the article. He did so because he believed the offense not impeachable and because the article would prolong the trial.

The question being taken on the article, it was agreed to, yeas 87, nays 43. Both Messrs. Woodbridge and Wilson voted against it.

Mr. Bingham, by the unanimous instruction of the managers, presented another article, which was agreed to, yeas 108, nays 82,[1] and which became Article XI.

The House gave to the managers appointed for the Johnson trial the power to send for persons and papers.

[1] House Journal, pp. 464, 465; Globe, p. 1642.

The articles of impeachment of President Johnson having been amended, the House gave a new direction for carrying them to the Senate.

The message from the House announcing that articles of impeachment would be presented against President Johnson contained the names of the managers.

The Senate having informed the House of its readiness to receive the managers with the articles impeaching President Johnson, the House as Committee of the Whole attended its managers to the Senate.

Then Mr. Bingham offered the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the articles agreed to by the House this day, together with those adopted by the House on yesterday, to be exhibited in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States against Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, in maintenance of their impeachment against him for high crimes and misdemeanors in office, be carried to the Senate by the managers appointed to conduct said impeachment.

Resolved, That the managers on the part of the House, in the matter of the impeachment of the President, be, and hereby are, authorized to appoint a clerk and a messenger, to be paid for their services at the usual rates during the time that they are employed, and that the managers have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. James Brooks, of New York, questioned the propriety of giving to the managers the power to send for persons and papers; but the resolutions were agreed to by the House, yeas 96, nays 27.[1]

On March 3,[2] in the Senate, the following message was received from the House by its Clerk:

Mr. President, I am directed to inform the Senate that the House of Representatives has appointed Mr. John A. Bingham, of Ohio; Mr. George S. Boutwell, of Massachusetts; Mr. James F. Wilson, of Iowa; Mr. B. F. Butler, of Massachusetts; Mr. J. A. Logan, of Illinois; Mr. Thomas Williams, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, managers to conduct the impeachment against Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, and has directed the said managers to carry to the Senate the articles of impeachment agreed upon by the House, to be exhibited in maintenance of their impeachment against the said Andrew Johnson.

Thereupon Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan, offered the following, which was agreed to:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is ready to receive the managers appointed by the House of Representatives to carry to the Senate articles of impeachment against Andrew Johnson, President of the United States.

On March 4,[3] in the House, Mr. Bingham presented this resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole and attend the managers appointed by the House to the Senate to present, by its managers, the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House against Andrew Johnson, President of the United States.

Thereupon the Speaker said:

In the absence of the senior Member of the House, Mr. Washburne, of Illinois, the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Dawes, will please take the chair in Committee of the Whole. The Committee of the Whole, preceded by its chairman, who will be supported by the Clerk and Doorkeeper, will follow the managers to the Senate Chamber.

Accordingly, at 1 o'clock p. m., the House, as in the Committee of the Whole preceded by its chairman, Mr. Dawes, who was supported by the Clerk and Doorkeeper of the House, followed the managers of the House to the Senate Chamber

The ceremonies of presenting the articles impeaching President Johnson at the bar of the Senate.

At the presentation of the articles impeaching President Johnson the Speaker was, by order of the Senate, escorted to a seat beside the President pro tempore.

Form of declaration of the chairman of the managers of their readiness to present to the Senate the articles impeaching President Johnson.

The articles impeaching President Johnson.

The articles impeaching President Johnson were read by the chairman of the managers and delivered at the table of the Secretary.

The articles impeaching President Johnson were signed by the Speaker and attested by the Clerk.

The report to the House of the presentation of articles impeaching President Johnson was made by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Speaker Colfax held that the managers of an impeachment were not a committee. (Footnote.)

The articles impeaching President Johnson were received by the Senate with the President pro tempore presiding.

In the Senate Chamber,[1] when the managers[2] appeared at the bar, their presence was announced by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate.

The President pro tempore[3] (for the Senate had not yet organized for the trial) said:

The managers of the impeachment will advance within the bar and take the seats provided for them.

The managers did this.

Thereupon, at the suggestion of Mr. Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, a Senator, a seat was provided for the Speaker of the House by the side of the President of the Senate, and the Speaker was escorted by Mr. James W. Grimes, of Iowa, a Senator, to a seat at the right of the President pro tempore.

Mr. Manager Bingham then said:

Mr. President, the managers of the House of Representatives, by order of the House, are ready at the bar of the Senate, whenever it may please the Senate to hear them, to present articles of impeachment and in maintenance of the impeachment preferred against Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, by the House of Representatives.

The President pro tempore said:

The Sergeant-at-Arms will make proclamation.

The Sergeant-at-Arms proclaimed:

Hear ye, hear ye, hear ye. All persons are commanded to keep silence, on pain of imprisonment, while the House of Representatives is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States articles of impeachment against Andrew Johnson, President of the United States.

The managers then rose and remained standing, with the exception of Mr. Stevens, who was physically unable to do so, while Mr. Manager Bingham read the articles of impeachment, as follows:

Articles exhibited by the House of Representatives of the United States, in the name of themselves and all the people of the United States, against Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, in maintenance and support of their impeachment against him for high crimes and misdemeanors in office.

ARTICLE I.

That said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, on the 21st day of February, in the year of our Lord 1868, at Washington, in the District of Columbia, unmindful of the high duties of his office, of his oath of office, and of the requirement of the Constitution that he should take care that the laws be faithfully executed, did unlawfully, and in violation of the Constitution and laws of the United States, issue an order in writing for the removal of Edwin M. Stanton from the office of Secretary for the Department of War, said Edwin M. Stanton having been theretofore duly appointed and commissioned, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, as such Secretary, and said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, on the 12th day of August, in the year of our Lord 1867, and during the recess of said Senate, having suspended by his order Edwin M. Stanton from said office, and within twenty days after the first day of the next meeting of said Senate—that is to say, on the 12th day of December, in the year last aforesaid—having reported to said Senate such suspension, with the evidence and reasons for his action in the case and the name of the person designated to perform the duties of such office temporarily until the next meeting of the Senate, and said Senate thereafterwards, on the 13th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1868, having duly considered the evidence and reasons reported by said Andrew Johnson for said suspension, and having refused to concur in said suspension, whereby and by force of the provisions of an act entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices," passed March 2, 1867, said Edwin M. Stanton did forthwith resume the functions of his office, whereof the said Andrew Johnson had then and there due notice, and said Edwin M. Stanton, by reason of the premises, on said 21st day of February, being lawfully entitled to hold said office of Secretary for the Department of War, which said order for the removal of said Edwin M. Stanton is, in substance, as follows, that is to say:

"EXECUTIVE MANSION,
"Washington, D. C., February 21, 1868.

"SIR: By virtue of the power and authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and laws of the United States you are hereby removed from office as Secretary for the Department of War, and your functions as such will terminate upon receipt of this communication.

"You will transfer to Brevet Maj. Gen. Lorenzo Thomas, Adjutant-General of the Army, who has this day been authorized and empowered to act as Secretary of War ad interim, all records, books, papers, and other public property now in your custody and charge.

"Respectfully, yours, ANDREW JOHNSON.

"Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON, Washington, D. C."

Which order was unlawfully issued with intent then and there to violate the act entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices," passed March 2, 1867; and with the further intent, contrary to the provisions of said act, in violation thereof, and contrary to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, and without the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, the said Senate then and there being in session, to remove said Edwin M. Stanton from the office of Secretary for the Department of War, the said Edwin M. Stanton being then and there Secretary of War, and being then and there in the due and lawful execution and discharge of the duties of said office, whereby said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, did then and there commit, and was guilty of a high misdemeanor in office.

ARTICLE II.

That on said 21st day of February, in the year of our Lord 1868, at Washington, in the District of Columbia, said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, unmindful of the high duties of his office, of his oath of office, and in violation of the Constitution of the United States, and contrary to the provisions of an act entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices," passed March 2, 1867, without the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, said Senate then and there being in session, and without authority of law, did, with intent to violate the Constitution of the United States and the act aforesaid, issue and deliver to one Lorenzo Thomas a letter of authority, in substance as follows, that is to say:

"EXECUTIVE MANSION,
"Washington, D. C., February 21, 1868.

"SIR: Hon. Edwin M. Stanton having been this day removed from office as Secretary for the Department of War, you are hereby authorized and empowered to act as Secretary of War ad interim, and will immediately enter upon the discharge of the duties pertaining to that office.

"Mr. Stanton has been instructed to transfer to you all the records, books, papers, and other public property now in his custody and charge.

"Respectfully, yours, ANDREW JOHNSON.

"To Brevet Maj. Gen. LORENZO THOMAS,
"Adjutant-General United States Army, Washington, D. C."

Then and there being no vacancy in said office of Secretary for the Department of War, whereby said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, did then and there commit, and was guilty of a high misdemeanor in office.

ARTICLE III.

That said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, on the 21st day of February, in the year of our Lord 1868, at Washington, in the District of Columbia, did commit and was guilty of a high misdemeanor in office in this, that, without authority of law, while the Senate of the United States was then and there in session, he did appoint one Lorenzo Thomas to be Secretary for the Department of War ad interim, without the advice and consent of the Senate and with intent to violate the Constitution of the United States, no vacancy having happened in said office of Secretary for the Department of War during the recess of the Senate, and no vacancy existing in said office at the time, and which said appointment, so made by said Andrew Johnson, of said Lorenzo Thomas, is in substance as follows, that is to say:

"EXECUTIVE MANSION,
"Washington, D. C., February 21, 1868.

"SIR: Hon. Edwin M. Stanton having been this day removed from office as Secretary for the Department of War, you are hereby authorized and empowered to act as Secretary of War ad interim, and will immediately enter upon the discharge of the duties pertaining to that office.

"Mr. Stanton has been instructed to transfer to you all the records, books, papers, and other public property now in his custody and charge.

"Respectfully, yours, ANDREW JOHNSON.

"To Brevet Maj. Gen. LORENZO THOMAS,
"Adjutant-General United States Army, Washington, D. C."[1]

ARTICLE IV.

That said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, unmindful of the high duties of his office and of his oath of office, in violation of the Constitution and laws of the United States, on the 21st day of February, in the year of our Lord 1868, at Washington, in the District of Columbia, did unlawfully conspire with one Lorenzo Thomas, and with other persons to the House of Representatives unknown, with intent, by intimidation and threats, unlawfully to hinder and prevent Edwin M. Stanton, then and there the Secretary for the Department of War, duly appointed under the laws of the United States, from holding said office of Secretary for the Department of War, contrary to and in violation of the Constitution of the United States and of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to define and punish certain conspiracies," approved July 31, 1861, whereby said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, did then and there commit, and was guilty of a high crime in office.

ARTICLE V.

That said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, unmindful of the high duties of his office and of his oath of office, on the 21st day of February, in the year of our Lord 1868, and on divers other days and times in said year, before the 2d day of March, A. D. 1868, at Washington, in the District of Columbia, did unlawfully conspire with one Lorenzo Thomas, and with other persons to the House of Representatives unknown, to prevent and hinder the execution of an act entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices," passed March 2, 1867, and in pursuance of said conspiracy did unlawfully attempt to prevent Edwin M. Stanton, then and there being Secretary for the Department of War, duly appointed and commissioned under the laws of the United States, from holding said office, whereby the said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, did then and there commit and was guilty of a high misdemeanor in office.

ARTICLE VI.

That said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, unmindful of the high duties of his office and of his oath of office, on the 21st day of February, in the year of our Lord 1868, at Washington, in the District of Columbia, did unlawfully conspire with one Lorenzo Thomas, by force to seize, take, and possess the property of the United States in the Department of War, and then and there in the custody and charge of Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary for said Department, contrary to the provisions of an act entitled "An act to define and punish certain conspiracies," approved July 31, 1861, and with intent to violate and disregard an act entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices," passed March 2, 1867, whereby said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, did then and there commit a high crime in office.

ARTICLE VII.

That said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, unmindful of the high duties of his office and of his oath of office, on the 21st day of February, in the year of our Lord 1868, at Washington, in the District of Columbia, did unlawfully conspire with one Lorenzo Thomas with intent unlawfully to seize, take, and possess the property of the United States in the Department of War, in the custody and charge of Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary for said Department, with intent to violate and disregard the act entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices," passed March 2, 1867, whereby said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, did then and there commit a high misdemeanor in office.

ARTICLE VIII.

That said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, unmindful of the high duties of his office and of his oath of office, with intent unlawfully to control the disbursements of the moneys appropriated for the military service and for the Department of War, on the 21st day of February, in the year of our Lord 1868, at Washington, in the District of Columbia, did unlawfully and contrary to the provisions of an act entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices," passed March 2, 1867, and in violation of the Constitution of the United States, and without the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, and while the Senate was then and there in session, there being no vacancy in the office of Secretary for the Department of War, with intent to violate and disregard the act aforesaid, then and there issue and deliver to one Lorenzo Thomas a letter of authority in writing, in substance as follows, that is to say:

"EXECUTIVE MANSION,

whereby said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, did then and there commit and was guilty of a high misdemeanor in office.

ARTICLE IX.

That said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, on the 22d day of February, in the year of our Lord 1868, at Washington, in the District of Columbia, in disregard of the Constitution and the laws of the United States, duly enacted, as Commander in Chief of the Army of the United States, did bring before himself then and there William H. Emory, a major-general by brevet in the Army of the United States, actually in command of the Department of Washington and the military forces thereof, and did then and there, as such Commander in Chief, declare to and instruct said Emory that part of a law of the United States, passed March 2, 1867, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," especially the second section thereof, which provides, among other things, that "all orders and instructions relating to military operations issued by the President or Secretary of War shall be issued through the General of the Army, and, in case of his inability, through the next in rank," was unconstitutional and in contravention of the commission of said Emory, and which said provision of law had been theretofore duly and legally promulgated by general order for the government and direction of the Army of the United States, as the said Andrew Johnson then and there well knew, with intent thereby to induce said Emory, in his official capacity as commander of the Department of Washington, to violate the provisions of said act, and to take and receive, act upon, and obey such orders as he, the said Andrew Johnson, might make and give, and which should not be issued through the General of the Army of the United States, according to the provisions of said act, and with the further intent thereby to enable him, the said Andrew Johnson, to prevent the execution of an act entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices," passed March 2, 1867, and to unlawfully prevent Edwin M. Stanton, then being Secretary for the Department of War, from holding said office and discharging the duties thereof, whereby said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, did then and there commit and was guilty of a high misdemeanor in office.

ARTICLE X.

That said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, unmindful of the high duties of his office and the dignity and proprieties thereof, and of the harmony and courtesies which ought to exist and be maintained between the executive and legislative branches of the Government of the United States, designing and intending to set aside the rightful authority and powers of Congress, did attempt to bring into disgrace, ridicule, hatred, contempt, and reproach the Congress of the United States and the several branches thereof, to impair and destroy the regard and respect of all the good people of the United States for the Congress and legislative power thereof (which all officers of the Government ought inviolably to preserve and maintain), and to excite the odium and resentment of all the good people of the United States against Congress and the laws by it duly and constitutionally enacted; and in pursuance of his said design and intent, openly and publicly, and before divers assemblages of the citizens of the United States convened in divers parts thereof to meet and receive said Andrew Johnson as the Chief Magistrate of the United States, did, on the 18th day of August, in the year of our Lord 1866, and on divers other days and times, as well before as afterwards, make and deliver with a loud voice certain intemperate, inflammatory, and scandalous harangues, and did therein utter loud threats and bitter menaces as well against Congress as the laws of the United States duly enacted thereby, amid the cries, jeers, and laughter of the multitudes then assembled and within hearing, which are set forth in the several specifications hereinafter written, in substance and effect, that is to say:

Specification first.—In this, that at Washington, in the District of Columbia, in the Executive Mansion, to a committe of citizens who called upon the President of the United States, speaking of and concerning the Congress of the United States, said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, heretofore, to wit, on the 18th day of August, in the year of our Lord 1866, did, in a loud voice, declare in substance and effect, among other things, that is to say:

"So far as the executive department of the Government is concerned, the effort has been made to restore the Union, to heal the breach, to pour oil into the wounds which were consequent upon the struggle, and (to speak in common phrase) to prepare, as the learned and wise physician would, a plaster healing in character and coextensive with the wound. We thought, and we think, that we had partially succeeded; but as the work progresses, as reconstruction seemed to be taking place and the country was becoming reunited, we found a disturbing and marring element opposing us. In alluding to that element, I shall go no further than your convention and the distinguished gentleman who has delivered to me the report of its proceedings. I shall make no reference to it that I do not believe the time and the occasion justify.

"We have witnessed in one department of the Government every endeavor to prevent the restoration of peace, harmony, and union. We have seen hanging upon the verge of the Government, as it were, a body called, or which assumes to be, the Congress of the United States, while in fact it is a Congress of only a part of the States. We have seen this Congress pretend to be for the Union when its every step and act tended to perpetuate disunion and make a disruption of the States inevitable. * * * We have seen Congress gradually encroach step by step upon constitutional rights and violate, day after day and month after month, fundamental principles of the Government. We have seen a Congress that seemed to forget that there was a limit to the sphere and scope of legislation. We have seen a Congress in a minority assume to exercise power which, allowed to be consummated, would result in despotism or monarchy itself."

Specification second.—In this, that at Cleveland, in the State of Ohio, heretofore, to wit, on the 3d day of September, in the year of our Lord 1866, before a public assemblage of citizens and others, said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, speaking of and concerning the Congress of the United States did, in a loud voice, declare in substance and effect among other things, that is to say:

"I will tell you what I did do. I called upon your Congress that is trying to break up the Govern ment.

* * * * * * *

"In conclusion, beside that, Congress had taken much pains to poison their constituents against him. But what had Congress done? Have they done anything to restore the union of these States? No; on the contrary, they had done everything to prevent it; and because he stood now where he did when the rebellion commenced he had been denounced as a traitor. Who had run greater risks or made greater sacrifices than himself? But Congress, factious and domineering, had undertaken to poison the minds of the American people."

Specification third.—In this, that at St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, heretofore, to wit, on the 8th day of September, in the year of our Lord 1866, before a public assemblage of citizens and others, said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, speaking of and concerning the Congress of the United States, did, in a loud voice, declare, in substance and effect, among other things, that is to say:

"Go on. Perhaps if you had a word or two on the subject of New Orleans you might understand more about it than you do. And if you will go back—if you will go back and ascertain the cause of the riot at New Orleans, perhaps you will not be so prompt in calling out 'New Orleans.' If you will take up the riot at New Orleans and trace it back to its source or its immediate cause, you will find out who was responsible for the blood that was shed there. If you will take up the riot at New Orleans and trace it back to the Radical Congress, you will find that the riot at New Orleans was substantially planned. If you will take up the proceedings in their caucuses, you will understand that they there knew that a convention was to be called which was extinct by its power having expired; that it was said that the intention was that a new government was to be organized, and on the organization of that government the intention was to enfranchise one portion of the population, called the colored population, who had just been emancipated, and at the same time disfranchise white men. When you design to talk about New Orleans you ought to understand what you are talking about. When you read the speeches that were made, and take up the facts on the Friday and Saturday before that convention sat, you will there find that speeches were made incendiary in their character, exciting that portion of the population, the black population, to arm themselves and prepare for the shedding of blood. You will also find that that convention did assemble in violation of law, and the intention of that convention was to supersede the reorganized authorities in the State government of Louisiana, which had been recognized by the Government of the United States; and every man engaged in that rebellion in that convention, with the intention of superseding and upturning the civil government which had been recognized by the Government of the United States, I say that he was a traitor to the Constitution of the United States, and hence you find that another rebellion was commenced having its origin in the Radical Congress. * * *

"So much for the New Orleans riot. And there was the cause and the origin of the blood that was shed; and every drop of blood that was shed is upon their skirts, and they are responsible for it. I could test this thing a little closer, but will not do it here to-night. But when you talk about the causes and consequences that resulted from proceedings of that kind, perhaps as I have been introduced here and you have provoked questions of this kind, though it does not provoke me, I will tell you a few wholesome things that have been done by this Radical Congress in connection with New Orleans and the extension of the elective franchise.

"I know that I have been traduced and abused. I know it has come in advance of me here, as elsewhere, that I have attempted to exercise an arbitrary power in resisting laws that were intended to be forced upon the Government; that I had exercised that power; that I had abandoned the party that elected me, and that I was a traitor because I exercised the veto power in attempting and did arrest for a time a bill that was called a 'Freedman's Bureau' bill; yes, that I was a traitor. And I have been traduced, I have been slandered, I have been maligned, I have been called Judas Iscariot, and all that. Now, my countrymen here to-night, it is very easy to indulge in epithets; it is easy to call a man a Judas and cry out traitor; but when he is called upon to give arguments and facts he is very often found wanting. Judas Iscariot—Judas. There was a Judas, and he was one of the twelve apostles. Oh, yes; the twelve apostles had a Christ. The twelve apostles had a Christ, and he never could have had a Judas unless he had had twelve apostles. If I have played the Judas, who has been my Christ that I have played the Judas with? Was it Thad. Stevens? Was it Wendell Phillips? Was it Charles Sumner? These are the men that stop and compare themselves with the Saviour; and everybody that differs with them in opinion, and to try and stay and arrest the diabolical and nefarious policy, is to be denounced as a Judas.

* * * * * * *

"Well, let me say to you, if you will stand by me in this action; if you will stand by me in trying to give the people a fair chance, soldiers and citizens, to participate in these offices, God being willing, I will kick them out. I will kick them out just as fast as I can.

"Let me say to you, in concluding, that what I have said I intended to say. I was not provoked into this, and I care not for their menaces, the taunts, and the jeers. I care not for threats. I do not intend to be bullied by my enemies nor overawed by my friends. But, God willing, with your help I will veto their measures whenever any of them come to me."

Which said utterances, declarations, threats, and harangues, highly censurable in any, are peculiarly indecent and unbecoming in the Chief Magistrate of the United States, by means whereof said Andrew Johnson has brought the high office of the President of the United States into contempt, ridicule, and disgrace, to the great scandal of all good citizens, whereby said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, did commit, and was then and there guilty of, a high misdemeanor in office.

ARTICLE XI.

That said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, unmindful of the high duties of his office and of his oath of office, and in disregard of the Constitution and laws of the United States, did heretofore, to wit, on the 18th day of August, 1866, at the city of Washington, and the District of Columbia, by public speech, declare and affirm, in substance, that the Thirty-ninth Congress of the United States was not a Congress of the United States authorized by the Constitution to exercise legislative power under the same; but, on the contrary, was a Congress of only part of the States, thereby denying and intending to deny that the legislation of said Congress was valid or obligatory upon him, the said Andrew Johnson, except in so far as he saw fit to approve the same, and also thereby denying and intending to deny the power of the said Thirty-ninth Congress to propose amendments to the Constitution of the United States; and, in pursuance of said declaration, the said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, afterwards, to wit, on the 21st day of February, 1868, at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, did unlawfully and in disregard of the requirements of the Constitution, that he should take care that the laws be faithfully executed, attempt to prevent the execution of an act entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices," passed March 2, 1867, by unlawfully devising and contriving, and attempting to devise and contrive, means by which he should prevent Edwin M. Stanton from forthwith resuming the functions of the office of Secretary for the Department of War, notwithstanding the refusal of the Senate to concur in the suspension theretofore made by said Andrew Johnson, of said Edwin M. Stanton from said office of Secretary for the Department of War, and also by further unlawfully devising and contriving, and attempting to devise and contrive, means then and there to prevent the execution of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1867, and also to prevent the execution of an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867; whereby the said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, did then, to wit, on the 21st day of February, 1868, at the city of Washington, commit and was guilty of a high misdemeanor in office.

And the House of Representatives, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any further articles or other accusation or impeachment against the said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, and also of replying to his answers which he shall make unto the articles herein preferred against him, and of offering proof to the same and every part thereof, and to all and every other article, accusation, or impeachment which shall be exhibited by them, as the case shall require, do demand that the said Andrew Johnson may be put to answer the high crimes and misdemeanors in office herein charged against him, and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments may be thereupon had and given as may be agreeable to law and justice.

SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Attest:

EDWARD MCPHERSON,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Mr. Bingham having concluded the reading of the articles of impeachment, the President pro tempore informed the managers that the Senate would take proper order on the subject of the impeachment, of which due notice would be given to the House of Representatives.

The managers, by their chairman, Mr. Bingham, then delivered the articles of impeachment at the table of the Secretary, and withdrew, accompanied by the Members of the House of Representatives.

The Committee of the Whole, having returned to the Hall of the House,[1] rose and the Speaker resumed the chair, whereupon Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, the chairman, reported:

Mr. Speaker: The House in the Committee of the Whole, by order of the House, have accompanied their managers to the Senate while they presented, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States, articles of impeachment agreed upon by the House against Andrew Johnson, President of the United States. The President of the Senate announced that the Senate would take order in the premises, of which due notice would be given to the House of Representatives.

Resolution providing for introduction of the Chief Justice and the organization of the Senate for the trial of President Johnson.

The Senate ordered a copy of its rules for the trial of President Johnson to be sent to the House.

The notice to the Chief Justice to meet the Senate for the trial of President Johnson was delivered by a committee of three Senators, who were his escort also.

In the Senate, on the same day, Mr. Howard moved[2] the adoption of the following:

Resolved, That at 1 o'clock to-morrow afternoon the Senate will proceed to consider the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, at which time the oath or affirmation requiredf by the rules of the Senate sitting for the trial of an impeachment shall be administered by the Chief Justice of the United States, as the presiding officer of the Senate, sitting as aforesaid, to each member of the Senate, and that the Senate sitting as aforesaid will at the time aforesaid receive the managers appointed by the House of Representatives.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the House of Representatives.

Ordered, That the articles of impeachment exhibited against Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, be printed.

Ordered, That a copy of the "rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on the trial of impeachments" be communicated by the Secretary to the House of Representatives, and a copy thereof delivered by him to each member of the House.

Mr. George F. Edmunds proposed a simpler resolution, taking the ground that the pending resolution, in some respects, provided for what had already been provided in the rules. But Mr. Howard replied that the House was not obliged to take cognizance of the rules. The resolutions and orders were then agreed to as offered. The communication was duly received in the House.[1]

Thereupon, on motion of Mr. Stephen C. Pomeroy, of Kansas,

Ordered, That the notice to the Chief Justice of the United States to meet the Senate in the trial of the case of impeachment, and requesting his attendance as presiding officer, be delivered to him by a committee of three Senators, to be appointed by the Chair, who shall wait upon the Chief Justice to the Senate Chamber and conduct him to the chair.

The President pro tempore appointed Messrs. Pomeroy, Henry Wilson, of Massachusetts, and Charles R. Buckalew, of Pennsylvania, the committee.

The ceremonies of inducting the Chief Justice and organizing the Senate for the trial of President Johnson.

The President pro tempore left the chair at the hour for the Senate to sit for the trial of the President.

On taking the chair to preside at the trial of President Johnson the Chief Justice had the oath administered by an associate justice.

Having taken the oath himself the Chief Justice administered it to the Senators sitting for the trial of President Johnson.

After the oath had been administered to the Senators sitting for the trial of President Johnson the Sergeant-at-Arms was directed to make proclamation.

The Senate having organized for the trial of President Johnson, rules were adopted and the House was notified of the organization and of readiness to receive the managers.

On March 5[2] in the Senate the hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the President pro tempore said:

The morning hour having expired, all legislative and executive business of the Senate is ordered to cease for the purpose of proceeding to business pertaining to the impeachment of the President of the United States. The chair is vacated for that purpose.

The President pro tempore then left the chair.

The Chief Justice of the United States entered the Chamber, accompanied by Mr. Justice Nelson, and escorted by Senators Pomeroy, Wilson, and Buckalew, the committee appointed for that purpose.

[1] House Journal, p. 475.

[2] Senate Journal, pp. 809, 810; Globe, p. 1671.

The Chief Justice took the chair and said:

Senators: I attend the Senate in obedience to your notice, for the purpose of joining with you in forming a court of impeachment for the trial of the President of the United States, and I am now ready to take the oath.[1]

The oath was administered by Mr. Justice Nelson to Chief Justice Chase in the following words:

I do solemnly swear that in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, I will do impartial justice according to the Constitution and laws. So help me God.

[The Senators rose when the Chief Justice entered the Chamber and remained standing till the conclusion of the administration of the oath to him.]

The CHIEF JUSTICE. Senators, the oath will now be administered to the Senators as they will be called by the Secretary in succession. [To the Secretary.] Call the roll.

The administration of the oath then proceeded until the name of Mr. Benj. F. Wade, of Ohio, was called, when a question was raised as to his competency to vote.[2]

If the managers on the part of the House of Representatives were present during this proceeding, it was informally, as no mention is made of their presence.

On March 6[3] the question as to Mr. Wade's right to vote was withdrawn, and the administration of the oath was concluded.

Thereupon the following occurred:

All the Senators present having taken the oath required by the Constitution, the Senate is now organized for the purpose of proceeding to the trial of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, President the United States. The Sergent-at-Arms will make proclamation.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. Hear ye, hear ye, hear ye. All persons are commanded to keep silence on pain of imprisonment while the Senate of the United States is sitting for the trial of the articles of impeachment against Andrew Johnson, President of the United States.

After the Chief Justice had submitted the question: "Shall the rules of proceeding adopted by the Senate on the 2d of March be the rules of proceeding in the trial of the impeachment?", and the same had been determined in the affirmative, Mr. Howard offered the following order, which was agreed to:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate notify the House of Representatives that the Senate is now organized for the trial of the articles of impeachment against Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, and is ready to receive the managers of the impeachment at its bar.

The House did not attend the managers in making the formal demand that the Senate take process against President Johnson.

The House managers having demanded process against President Johnson, the Senate ordered a summons to issue, returnable on a given date.

---

[1] The Journal has this record "By direction of the Chief Justice the following oath was administered to him," etc. The Senate, in adopting rules for the trial, had assumed that the Chief Justice would not be sworn. See proceedings on Rule XXIV, section 2080 of this volume.

[2] For discussion of this question see section 2061 of this volume.

[3] Senate Journal, p. 811; Globe, p. 1701.

The sessions of the Senate sitting for an impeachment trial may adjourn for more than three days.

The managers, having returned from demanding that process be issued against President Johnson, reported verbally to the House.

The managers of the impeachment of President Johnson were given leave to sit during sessions of the House and power to compel testimony.

A question had arisen in the House[1] as to whether or not the House should attend the managers, and Mr. Bingham said:

Mr. Speaker, after consultation with the managers on the part of the House, I am instructed by them to say to the House that, inasmuch as this is a mere formal proceeding to-day, they do not suppose it to be necessary or according to usage to ask the House to attend them to the bar of the Senate until the issue shall be joined.

In due time the managers (excepting Mr. Stevens), appeared[2] at the bar of the Senate, and their presence was announced by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The Chief Justice said:

The managers of the impeachment on the part of the House of Representatives will please take the seats assigned to them.

The managers having been seated in the area in front of the chair,

Mr. Manager Bingham rose and said:

Mr. President, we are instructed by the House of Representatives, as its managers, to demand that the Senate take process against Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, that he may answer at the bar of the Senate upon the articles of impeachment heretofore preferred by the House of Representatives through its managers before the Senate.

Mr. Howard, a Senator, thereupon moved the following order, which was agreed to:[3]

Ordered, That a summons do issue, as required by the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on the trial of impeachments, to Andrew Johnson, returnable on Friday, the 13th day of March instant, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon.

After a subject relating to an amendment of the rules had been disposed of, Mr. Howard moved that the Senate sitting for the trial of the President upon articles of impeachment,[4] adjourn to Friday, the 13th of March instant, at 1 o'clock afternoon.

This motion was agreed to, and the Chief Justice thereupon declared the Senate sitting for the trial of impeachments adjourned to the time named and vacated the chair.

The President pro tempore resumed the chair and called the Senate to order.[5]

The managers, having returned to the House, appeared at the bar,[6] and being recognized by the Speaker, Mr. Bingham said:

I have the honor to report, on behalf of the managers in the matter of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, that the Senate has organized for the trial of the impeachment; that in the name of the House of Representatives and in the behalf of all the people of the United States, the managers have demanded of the Senate that process be issued against Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, to answer to the articles heretofore exhibited against him at the bar of the Senate; and that the Senate has advised us that process will be issued against him in that behalf, returnable on the 13th instant, at 1 o'clock p. m.

On March 6,[1] also in the House, Mr. Bingham offered the following:

Resolved, That the managers on the part of the House, in the matter of the impeachment of the President, be, and hereby are, authorized to sit during the sessions of the House, and shall have power to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and take the testimony of witnesses.

Mr. Bingham explained that this was desired to enable the managers to administer oaths to witnesses. The resolution was agreed to, yeas 89, nays 25.

Ceremonies at the return of the summons to President Johnson to appear and answer the articles of impeachment.

Form used by the Sergeant-at-Arms in calling President Johnson to appear and answer the articles of impeachment.

President Johnson entered his appearance by a letter addressed to the Chief Justice and naming the counsel to appear for him.

President Johnson by his own letter and by a paper filed and signed by his counsel asked forty days in which to prepare his answer.

The House in Committee of the Whole, on notice from the Senate, attended on the return day of the summons to President Johnson.

The Chief Justice held, in the Senate sitting for the trial of President Johnson, that the journal should be read before other proceedings.

On March 13[2] at 1 p. m. the Chief Justice entered the Senate Chamber, resumed the chair, and said (to the Sergeant-at-Arms):

Make proclamation.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. Hear ye! hear ye. All persons are commanded to keep silence while the Senate of the United States is sitting for the trial of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against Andrew Johnson, President of the United States.

Propositions being made to notify the House of Representatives and also that several Senators be sworn, the Chief Justice said:

The first business is to read the journal of the last session of the court. The Senators will be sworn in afterwards.

The Secretary read the journal of the proceedings of the Senate sitting for the trial of impeachment of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, on Friday, March 6, 1868.

Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan, submitted this order, which was agreed to:

Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is in its Chamber, and ready to proceed with the trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, and that seats are provided for the accommodation of the Members.

This message being received in the House,[3] that body resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, with Mr. Elihu B. Washburne, of Illinois, in the chair, and thereupon attended the managers to the Senate.

The managers having appeared at the bar, were announced by the Sergeant-at-Arms and conducted to the position assigned them.

The oath was then administered to several Senators not previously sworn.

Then the following proceedings occurred:[1]

The CHIEF JUSTICE. The Secretary of the Senate will read the return of the Sergeant-at-Arms to the summons directed to be issued by the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the following return appended to the writ of summons:

The foregoing writ of summons, addressed to Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, and the foregoing precept, addressed to me, were this day duly served on the said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, by delivering to and leaving with him true and attested copies of the same at the Executive Mansion, the usual place of abode of the said Andrew Johnson, on Saturday, the 7th day of March instant, at 7 o'clock in the afternoon of that day.

GEORGE T. BROWN,
Sergeant-at-Arms of the United States Senate.

WASHINGTON, March 7, 1868.

The Chief Clerk administered to the Sergeant-at-Arms the following oath:

I, George T. Brown, Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate of the United States, do swear that the return made and subscribed by me upon the process issued on the 7th day of March, A. D. 1868, by the Senate of the United States against Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, is truly made, and that I have performed said service therein prescribed. So help me God.

The CHIEF JUSTICE. The Sergeant-at-Arms will call the accused.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, appear and answer the articles of impeachment exhibited against you by the House of Representatives of the United States.

There being no response, Mr. Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland, a Senator, made this suggestion:

I understand that the President has retained counsel, and that they are now in the President's room attached to this wing of the Capitol. They are not advised, I believe, of the court being organized. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms inform them of that fact.

The CHIEF JUSTICE. If there be no objection, the Sergeant-at-Arms will so inform the counsel of the President.

The Sergeant-at-Arms presently returned with Hon. Henry Stanbery, of Kentucky; Hon. Benjamin R. Curtis, of Massachusetts, and Hon. Thomas A. R. Nelson, of Tennessee, who were conducted to the seats assigned the counsel of the President.

Then the following occurred:

The Sergeant-at-Arms announced the Members of the House of Representatives, who entered the Senate Chamber preceded by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole House (Mr. E. B. Washburne, of Illinois), into which that body had resolved itself to witness the trial, who was accompanied by the Speaker and Clerk.

The CHIEF JUSTICE (to the counsel for the President). Gentlemen, the Senate is now sitting for the trial of the President of the United States upon articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives. The court will now hear you.

Mr. STANBERY. Mr. Chief Justice, my brothers Curtis and Nelson and myself are here this morning as counsel for the President. I have his authority to enter his appearance, which, with your leave, I will proceed to read·

"In the matter of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States.

"Mr. CHIEF JUSTICE: I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, having been served with a summons to appear before this honorable court, sitting as a court of impeachment to answer certain articles of impeachment found and presented against me by the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States, do hereby enter my appearance by my counsel, Henry Stanbery, Benjamin R. Curtis, Jeremiah S. Black, William M. Evarts, and Thomas A. R. Nelson, who have my warrant and authority therefor, and who are instructed by me to ask of this honorable court a reasonable time for the preparation of my answer to said articles.

"After a careful examination of the articles of impeachment and consultation with my counsel, I am satisfied that at least forty days will be necessary for the preparation of my answer, and I respectfully ask that it be allowed.

"ANDREW JOHNSON."

The CHIEF JUSTICE. The paper will be filed.

Mr. STANBERY. Mr. Chief Justice, I have also a professional statement in support of the application. Whether it is in order to offer it now or to wait until the appearance is entered your Honor will decide.

The CHIEF JUSTICE. The appearance will be conisdered as entered. You may proceed.

Mr. STANBERY. I will read the statement.

"In the matter of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States.

"Henry Stanbery, Benjamin R. Curtis, Jeremiah S. Black, William M. Evarts, and Thomas A. R. Nelson, of counsel for the respondent, move the court for the allowance of forty days for the preparation of the answer to the articles of impeachment, and in support of the motion make the following professional statement:

"The articles are eleven in number, involving many questions of law and fact. We have, during the limited time and opportunity afforded us, considered as far as possible the field of investigation which must be explored in the preparation of the answer, and the conclusion at which we have arrived is that with the utmost diligence the time we have asked is reasonable and necessary.

"The precedents as to time for answer upon impeachments before the Senate, to which we have had opportunity to refer, are those of Judge Chase and Judge Peck.

"In the case of Judge Chase time was allowed from the 3d of January until the 4th of February next succeeding to put in his answer, a period of thirty-two days; but in this case there were only eight articles, and Judge Chase had been for a year cognizant of most of the articles, and had been himself engaged in preparing to meet them.

"In the case of Judge Peck there was but a single article. Judge Peck asked for time from the 10th to the 25th of May to put in his answer, and it was granted. It appears that Judge Peck had been long cognizant of the ground laid for his impeachment, and had been present before the committee of the House upon the examination of the witnesses, and had been permitted by the House of Representatives to present to that body an elaborate answer to the charges.

"It is apparent that the President is fairly entitled to more time than was allowed in either of the foregoing cases. It is proper to add that the respondents in these cases were lawyers, fully capable of preparing their own answers, and that no pressing official duties interfered with their attention to that business; whereas the President, not being a lawyer, must rely on his counsel. The charges involve his acts, declarations, and intentions, as to all which his counsel must be fully advised upon consultation with him, step by step, in the preparation of his defense. It is seldom that a case requires such constant communication between client and counsel as this, and yet such communication can only be had at such intervals as are allowed to the President from the usual hours that must be devoted to his high official duties.

"We further beg leave to suggest for the consideration of this honorable court that as counsel, careful as well of their own reputation as of the interests of their client in a case of such magnitude as this, so out of the ordinary range of professional experience, where so much responsibility is felt, they submit to the candid consideration of the court that they have a right to ask for themselves such opportunity to discharge their duty as seems to them to be absolutely necessary.

"MARCH 13, 1868."

The Senate denied the motion of President Johnson's counsel that he be allowed forty days to answer and granted ten days.

The managers urged, in view of Rule VIII, that President Johnson should answer on the return day, but were overruled.

Review of English precedents as to the distinction between the pleadings and the trial of an impeachment.

The Senate deliberated in secret session on the application of President Johnson for time to prepare his answer.

The proceedings of secret sessions of the Senate in the Johnson trial appear in the Journal, but the debates were not recorded.

Immediately[1] Mr. Manager Bingham raised the question that under the language of the eighth rule the motion for continuance was not allowable, the provision of the rule being that if the respondent appeared he should answer, the terms of the rule being:

If the accused, after service, shall fail to appear, either in person or by attorney, on the day so fixed therefor, as aforesaid, or appearing shall fail to file his answer to such articles of impeachment, the trial shall proceed nevertheless as upon a plea of not guilty.

Counsel for the respondent argued that it would be oppressive for the proceedings to be so hastened, and an innovation upon even the worst precedents in English history. Assuming, apparently, that they must at once proceed to trial, they stated that they could not summon their witnesses until the pleadings were prepared. Mr. Henry Stanbery further said:

Rule 9 provides:

"At 12 o'clock and 30 minutes afternoon of the day appointed for the return of the summons against the person impeached."

This is the return day; it is not the trial day. The letter answers the gentlemen. According to the letter of the eighth rule they say "this is the trial day; go on; not a moment's delay; file your answer and proceed to trial; or without your answer let a general plea of not guilty be entered, and proceed at once with the trial." The ninth rule says this is the return day, not the trial day. Then the tenth rule says:

"The person impeached shall then be called to appear and answer the articles of impeachment against him."

That is the call made on the return day. The accused is called to appear and answer. He is here; he appears; he states his willingness to answer; he only asks a reasonable time to prepare the answer. Then rule 11 speaks "of the day appointed for the trial." That is not this day. This day, the day which the gentlemen would make the first day of the trial, is, in your own rules, put down for the return day, and you must have some other day for the trial day to suit the convenience of the parties; so that the letter of one rule answers the letter of another rule.

Mr. Manager Bingham replied that the making up of the issue and the trial were distinct matters. Citing a precedent, he said:

A very remarkable case in the twelfth volume of State Trials lies before me, wherein Lord Holt presided, on the trial of Sir Richard Grahme, Viscount Preston, and others, charged with high treason. In that case the accused appeared, as the accused by the learned gentlemen appears this morning, after the indictment presented in the court, and before plea asked for continuance. The answer that fell from the lips of the Lord Chief Justice was, we are not to consider the question of trial or the time of trial until plea be pleaded. Let me give his very words:

[1] Globe Supplement, p. 7.

"L. C. HOLT. My lord, we debate the time of your trial too early; for you must put yourself upon your trial first by pleading."

And when Lord Preston presses him again on the point Lord Chief Justice Holt responds:

"My lord, we can not dispute with you concerning your trial till you have pleaded. I know not what you will say to it; for aught I know there may be no occasion for a trial. I can not tell what you will plead; your lordship must answer to the indictment before we can enter into the debate of this matter." (12 State Trials, 664.)

The eighth rule of the Senate, last clause, provides that if the party appearing shall plead guilty there may be no further proceedings in the case, no trial about it; nothing remains to be done but to pronounce judgment under the Constitution. It is time enough for us to talk about a trial when we have an issue. The rule is a plain one, a simple one.

And I may be pardoned for saying that I fail to perceive anything in rules 10 or 11 to which the learned counsel have referred that by any kind of construction can be supposed to limit the effect of the words in rule 8, to wit:

"If the accused, after service, shall fail to appear, either in person or by attorney, on the day so fixed therefor as aforesaid, or appearing shall fail to file his answer [on the day on which he is summoned to appear], the trial shall proceed nevertheless as upon a plea of not guilty."

When words are plain in a written law there is an end to all construction; they must be followed. The managers so thought when they appeared at this bar. All they ask is the enforcement of the rule, not a postponement of forty days, and at the end of that time to be met with a dilatory plea—a motion, if you please—to quash the articles, or a question raising the inquiry whether this is the Senate of the United States.

The Chief Justice being about to put the motion submitted by the counsel for the respondent, Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, submitted[1] the following:

Ordered, That the respondent file his answer to the articles of impeachment on or before the 1st day of April next, and that the managers of the impeachment file their replication thereto within three days thereafter, and that the matter stand for trial on Monday, April 6, 1868.

Then, on motion of Mr. Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana, it was voted "that the Senate retire to deliberate and confer in regard to its determination of the question." The Journal indicates that the Chief Justice retired with the Senate. The proceedings during the secret session were recorded in the Journal,[2] but not in the report of the trial. As soon as the Senate had assembled in the conference chamber, Mr. Charles D. Drake, of Missouri, moved[3] to strike out of Mr. Edmunds's resolution all after the word "Resolved" and insert: "That the respondent file answer to the articles of impeachment on or before Friday, the 20th day of March instant."

At first this was agreed to, yeas 28, nays 20, but on motion of Mr. Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois, and by a vote of yeas 27, nays 23, the vote was reconsidered, and then Mr. Drake's amendment was amended by striking out the words "Friday, the 20th," and inserting "Monday, the 23d." The amendment as amended was agreed to, and then the order as amended was agreed to.

The Senate then returned to its Chamber; and the Chief Justice announced to the counsel for the President that their motion to be allowed forty days to prepare and file answer to the articles of impeachment was denied, and that the Senate had adopted the following order:

Ordered, That the respondent file answer to the articles of impeachment on or before Monday, the 23d day of March instant.

After argument as to the propriety of delay, the Senate determined that the trial of President Johnson should proceed immediately after replication should be filed.

The Chief Justice held, in the Johnson impeachment, that both managers and counsel might be heard on a motion of a Senator to fix the time for the trial to begin.

Then, by instruction of the managers, Mr. Manager Bingham submitted [1] the following motion:

The managers ask the Senate respectfully to adopt the following order:

"Ordered, That upon the filing of a replication by the managers on the part of the House of Representatives the trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, upon the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives shall proceed forthwith."

The question being put on agreeing to the order, there appeared, yeas 25, nays 26. So the order was disagreed to.

Thereupon, Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, a Senator, offered [2] the following:

Ordered, That the trial of the articles of impeachment shall proceed on the 6th day of April next.

Mr. Henry Wilson, of Massachusetts, a Senator, moved to amend by striking out "the 6th day of April" and inserting "the 1st day of April."

Mr. Manager Butler thereupon asked if the managers might be heard on the motion.

The Chief Justice replied:

The Chair is of opinion that the managers have a right to be heard and also the counsel for the accused.

Mr. Manager Butler thereupon argued for a speedy trial. The precedents for delay, which might be cited from the case of Judge Chase, were not applicable, since the railroads and telegraph had revolutionized means of communication. As justifying and enforcing the need of expedition, Mr. Butler said:

The ordinary delays in court, the ordinary time given in ordinary cases for men to answer when called before tribunals of justice, have no application to this case. The rules by which cases are heard and determined before the Supreme Court of the United States are not rules applicable to the case at bar; and for this reason, if for no other, when ordinary trials are had, when ordinary questions are examined at the bar of any court, there is no danger to the common weal in delay, the Republic may take no detriment if the trial is postponed; to give the accused time injures nobody; to grant him indulgence hurts no one, and may help one, and perhaps an innocent man. But here the House of Representatives have presented at the bar of the Senate, in the most solemn form, the Chief Executive officer of the nation. They say (and they desire your judgment upon their accusation) that he has usurped power which does not belong to him; that he is at this very time breaking the laws solemnly enacted by you, the Senate, and those who present him here, the Congress of the United States, and that he still proposes so to do.

[2] Senate Journal, pp. 827, 828; Globe Supplement, pp. 8–11.

Sir, who is the criminal—I beg pardon for the word—the respondent at the bar? He is the Chief Executive of the nation, and when I have said that, I have taken out from all ordinary rules this trial, because I submit with deference that here and now, for the first time in the history of the world, has any nation brought its ruler to the bar of its highest tribunal in a constitutional method, under the rules and forms prescribed by its Constitution, and therefore all the rules, all the analogies, all the likeness to a common and ordinary trial of any cause, civil or criminal, cease at once, are silent, and ought not to weigh in judgment. Other nations have tried and condemned their kings and rulers, but the process has always been in violence and subversive of their constitutions and framework of government, not in submission to and accordance with it.

When I name the respondent as the Chief Executive, I say he is the Commander in Chief of your armies; he specially claims that command, not by force and under the limitations of your laws, but as a prerogative of his office and subject to his arbitrary will. He controls, through his subordinates, your Treasury. He commands your Navy. Thus he has all elements of power. He controls your foreign relations. In any hour of passion, of prejudice, of revenge for fancied wrong in his own mind, he may complicate your peace with any nation of the earth, even while he is being arraigned as a respondent at your bar. And mark me, sir, may I respectfully submit that the very question here at issue this day and this hour is, whether he shall control beyond the reach of your laws, and outside of your laws, the Army of the United States. The one greatest of all questions here at issue is whether he shall be able, against law—setting aside your laws, setting aside the decrees of the Senate, setting aside the laws enacted by Congress, overriding the legislative power of the country, claiming it as an attribute of executive power only, to control the great military arm of this Government, and control it if he chooses at his own good pleasure, its your ruin and the ruin of the country.

Mr. Nelson, counsel for the respondent, in pleading for delay, said:

Mr. Chief Justice, I need not tell you, nor need I tell many of the honorable Senators whom I address on this occasion, many of whom are lawyers, many of whom have been clothed in times past with the judicial ermine, that in the courts of law the vilest criminal who ever was arraigned in the United States has been given time for preparation, time for hearing, The Constitution of the country secures to the vilest man in the land the right not only to be heard himself, but to be heard by counsel; and no matter how great his crime, no matter how deep may be the malignity of the offense with which he is charged, he is tried according to the forms of law; he is allowed to have counsel; continuances are granted to him; if he is unable to obtain justice, time is given to him, and all manner of preparation is allowed him.

If this is so in courts of common law, that are fettered and bound by the iron rules to which I have adverted, how much more in a great tribunal like this that does not follow the precedents of law, but that is aiming and seeking alone to attain justice, ought we to be allowed ample time for preparation in reference to charges of the nature which we have here? How much more, sir, should such time be given us?

We are told that the President acted in regard to one of the matters which is charged against him by the House of Representatives on the 21st of February, and that by the 4th of March—if I did not mistake the statement of the honorable manager—the House of Representatives had presented this accusation against the President of the United States; and, that, therefore, the President, who knew what he was doing, should be prepared for his defense. Mr. Chief Justice, is it necessary for me to remind you and honorable Senators that you can upon a page of foolscap paper prepare a bill of indictment against an individual which may require weeks in the investigation? Is it necessary for me to remind this honorable body that it is an easy thing to make charges, but that it is often a laborious and difficult thing to make a defense against those accusations?

Reasoning from the analogy furnished by such proceedings at law, I earnestly maintain before this honorable body that suitable time should be given us to answer the charges which are made here. A large number of these charges—those of them connected with the President's action in reference to the Secretary of War—involve questions of the deepest importance. They involve an inquiry running back to the very foundation of the Government; they involve an examination of the precedents which have been set by different administrations; they involve, in short, the most extensive range of inquiry. The two last charges that were presented by the House of Representatives, if I may be pardoned for using the expression in the view which I entertain of them, open Pandora's box, and will cause an investigation as to the great differences of opinion which have existed between the President and the House of Representatives, an inquiry which, so far as I can perceive, will be almost interminable in its character.

Mr. Manager Bingham, in arguing against delay, commented on the fact that no formal application had been made by the accused himself for delay. Mr. Bingham also referred to the fact that in the case of Judge Chase the trial had been ordered to proceed on the day the answer was received.

Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, a Senator, proposed to the order offered by Mr. Sherman this amendment:

Strike out all after the word "ordered" and insert: "That unless otherwise ordered by the Senate, for cause shown, the trial of the pending impeachment shall proceed immediately after replication shall be filed."

This amendment was agreed to—yeas 40, nays 10; and then the order as amended was agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That, unless otherwise ordered by the Senate for cause shown, the trial of the pending impeachment shall proceed immediately after replication shall be filed.

Then, on motion of Mr. Jacob M. Howard, of Michigan, the Senate sitting for the trial of the President upon articles of impeachment, adjourned to Monday, the 23d day of March instant, at 1 o'clock p. m.

The House, by a standing order, determined to attend in Committee of the Whole, the trial of President Johnson.

Forms of procedure at the change in the Senate from a legislative session to a session for the trial of the President.

During the trial of the President the Chief Justice was escorted to the chair by the chairman of a committee of the Senate.

The House attended at each session of the trial of the President on notice from the Senate.

The sessions of the Senate for the trial of the President were opened by proclamation.

The managers were announced when they attended in the Senate for the trial of the President, but the counsel for respondent entered unannounced.

The House of Representatives was announced when, as a Committee of the Whole, it attended the trial of the President.

On March 20,[1] in the House, Mr. George S. Boutwell, under suspension of the rules, presented the following resolution, which was agreed to by the House without division:

Resolved, That on the days when the Senate shall sit for the trial of the President upon the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives, the House, in Committee of the Whole, will attend with the managers at the bar of the Senate at the hour named for the commencement of the proceedings.

On March 23,[2] in the House, a message was received from the Senate by their Secretary, that—the Senate is in its Chamber and ready to proceed on the trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, and that seats are provided for the accommodation of the Members.

[1] Second session Fortieth Congress, House Journal, pp. 549, 550; Globe, p. 2021.

[2] House Journal, p. 561; Globe, p. 2071.

This message was ordered by the Senate before the Chief Justice had taken his seat as Presiding Officer.[1]

Thereupon, on motion of Mr. Elihu B. Washburne, of Illinois, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole and with Mr. Washburne as chairman proceeded to the Senate.

In the Senate, at the hour of 1 o'clock, the President pro tempore[2] said:[3]

According to the order of the Senate, the chair will be now vacated, that the Senate may be presided over by the Chief Justice of the United States for the trial of the impeachment.[4]

Thereupon the Chief Justice of the United States entered the Senate Chamber, escorted by Mr. Pomeroy, the chairman of the Senate committee heretofore appointed for that purpose, and took the chair.

The Sergeant-at-Arms made proclamation in the prescribed form; the managers on the part of the House of Representatives appeared, their presence was announced by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and they took their seats; the counsel for the President appeared and took seats, apparently without announcement, and then the Sergeant-at-Arms announced the presence of the House of Representatives; and the Committee of the Whole House, headed by Mr. E. B. Washburne, of Illinois, the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, and the Clerk of the House, entered the Chamber, and the Members were conducted to the seats assigned them.

A Senator who had not taken the oath was sworn, and then the Journal of the preceding sitting was read.[5]

The answer of President Johnson to the articles of impeachment.

The answer of the President took up the articles one by one, denying some of the charges, admitting others, but denying that they set forth impeachable offenses and excepting to the sufficiency of others.

President Johnson's answer was signed by himself and counsel.

In his answer President Johnson referred to the Senate as a court.

The answer by President Johnson to the articles of impeachment was accompanied by two exhibits.

The answer of President Johnson to the articles of impeachment was read by his counsel.

After the disposition of a question relating to the competency of the Senate to proceed with the case,[6] the counsel for the President filed his answer and by direction of the Chief Justice read it,[7] beginning in form as follows:

Senate of the United States, sitting as a court of impeachment for the trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States.

The answer of the said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives of the United States.

ANSWER TO ARTICLE I.

For answer to the first article he says: That * * * , etc.

The answer then proceeds, article by article:

ARTICLE I. The answer reviews at length the transactions with reference to Secretary Stanton and concludes with these specific denials:

And this respondent, proceeding to answer specifically each substantial allegation in the said first article, says: He denies that the said Stanton, on the 21st day of February, 1868, was lawfully in possession of the said office of Secretary for the Department of War. He denies that the said Stanton, on the day last mentioned, was lawfully entitled to hold the said office against the will of the President of the United States. He denies that the said order for the removal of the said Stanton was unlawfully issued. He denies that the said order was issued with intent to violate the act entitled "An act to regulate the tenure of certain civil offices." He denies that the said order was a violation of the last-mentioned act. He denies that the said order was a violation of the Constitution of the United States, or of any law thereof, or of his oath of office. He denies that the said order was issued with an intent to violate the Constitution of the United States or any law thereof, or this respondent's oath of office; and he respectfully, but earnestly, insists that not only was it issued by him in the performance of what he believed to be an imperative official duty, but in the performance of what this honorable court will consider was, in point of fact, an imperative official duty. And he denies that any and all substantive matters, in the said first article contained, in manner and form as the same are therein stated and set forth, do, by law, constitute a high misdemeanor in office, within the true intent and meaning of the Constitution of the United States.

ART. II. The answer in full is as follows:

And for answer to the second article, this respondent says that he admits he did issue and deliver to said Lorenzo Thomas the said writing set forth in said second article, bearing date at Washington, D. C., February 21, 1868, addressed to Bvt. Maj. Gen. Lorenzo Thomas, Adjutant-General United States Army, Washington, D. C., and he further admits that the same was so issued without the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, then in session, but he denies that he thereby violated the Constitution of the United States, or any law thereof, or that he did thereby intend to violate the Constitution of the United States, or the provisions of any act of Congress; and this respondent refers to his answer to said first article for a full statement of the purposes and intentions with which said order was issued, and adopts the same as part of his answer to this article; and he further denies that there was then and there no vacancy in the said office of Secretary for the Department of War, or that he did then and there commit, or was guilty of a high misdemeanor in office, and this respondent maintains and will insist:

1. That at the date and delivery of said writing there was a vacancy existing in the office of Secretary for the Department of War.

2. That, notwithstanding the Senate of the United States was then in session, it was lawful and according to long and well established usage to empower and authorize the said Thomas to act as Secretary of War ad interim.

3. That, if the said act regulating the tenure of civil offices be held to be a valid law, no provision of the same was violated by the issuing of said order or by the designation of said Thomas to act as Secretary of War ad interim.

ART. III. The answer is as follows, in full:

And for answer to said third article this respondent says that he abides by his answer to said first and second articles, in so far as the same are responsive to the allegations contained in the said third article, and, without here again repeating the same answer, prays the same be taken as an answer to this third article as fully as if here again set out at length; and as to the new allegation contained in said third article, that this respondent did appoint the said Thomas to be Secretary for the Department of War ad interim, this respondent denies that he gave any other authority to said Thomas than such as appears in said written authority set out in said article, by which he authorized and empowered said

Thomas to act as Secretary for the Department of War ad interim; and he denies that the same amounts to an appointment and insists that it is only a designation of an officer of that Department to act temporarily as Secretary for the Department of War ad interim until an appointment should be made. But, whether the said written authority amounts to an appointment or to a temporary authority or designation, this respondent denies that in any sense he did thereby intend to violate the Constitution of the United States, or that he thereby intended to give the said order the character or effect of an appointment in the constitutional or legal sense of that term. He further denies that there was no vacancy in said office of Secretary for the Department of War existing at the date of said written authority.

ART. IV. In answer to Article IV the charge of conspiracy was denied, as also the charge that intimidation and threats were used in connection with the attempt to supersede Secretary Stanton by General Thomas; and in concluding, the following exception is taken:

This respondent doth here except to the sufficiency of the allegations contained in said fourth article, and states for ground of exception that it is not stated that there was any agreement between this respondent and the said Thomas, or any other person or persons, to use intimidation and threats, nor is there any allegation as to the nature of said intimidation and threats, or that there was any agreement to carry them into execution, or that any step was taken or agreed to be taken to carry them into execution, and that the allegation in said article that the intent of said conspiracy was to use intimidation and threats is wholly insufficient, inasmuch as it is not alleged that the said intent formed the basis or became a part of any agreement between the said alleged conspirators, and, furthermore, that there is no allegation of any conspiracy or agreement to use intimidation or threats.

ART. V. The answer in full, with an exception:

And for answer to the said fifth article this respondent denies that on the said 21st day of February, 1868, or at any other time or times in the same year before the said 2d day of March, 1868, or at any prior or subsequent time, at Washington aforesaid or at any other place, this respondent did unlawfully conspire with the said Thomas, or with any other person or persons, to prevent or hinder the execution of the said act entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices," or that, in pursuance of said alleged conspiracy, he did unlawfully attempt to prevent the said Edwin M. Stanton from holding said office of Secretary for the Department of War, or that he did thereby commit, or that he was thereby guilty of, a high misdemeanor in office. Respondent, protesting that said Stanton was not then and there Secretary for the Department of War, begs leave to refer to his answer given to the fourth article and to his answer given to the first article as to his intent and purpose in issuing the orders for the removal of Mr. Stanton and the authority given to the said Thomas, and prays equal benefit therefrom as if the same were here again repeated and fully set forth.

And this respondent excepts to the sufficiency of the said fifth article, and states his ground for such exception, that it is not alleged by what means or by what agreement the said alleged conspiracy was formed or agreed to be carried out, or in what way the same was attempted to be carried out, or what were the acts done in pursuance thereof.

ART. VI. The answer in full:

And for answer to the said sixth article, this respondent denies that on the said 21st day of February, 1868, at Washington aforesaid, or at any other time or place, he did unlawfully conspire with the said Thomas by force to seize, take, or possess, the property of the United States in the Department of War, contrary to the provisions of the said acts referred to in the said article, or either of them, or with intent to violate either of them. Respondent, protesting that said Stanton was not then and there Secretary for the Department of War, not only denies the said conspiracy as charged, but also denies any unlawful intent in reference to the custody and charge of the property of the United States in the said Department of War, and again refers to his former answers for a full statement of his intent and purpose in the premises.

ART. VII. The answer in full:

And for answer to the said seventh article respondent denies that on the said 21st day of February, 1868, at Washington aforesaid, or at any other time and place, he did unlawfully conspire with the said Thomas with intent unlawfully to seize, take, or possess the property of the United States in the Department of War with intent to violate or disregard the said act in the said seventh article referred to, or that he did then and there commit a high misdemeanor in office. Respondent, protesting that the said Stanton was not then and there Secretary for the Department of War, again refers to his former answers, in so far as they are applicable, to show the intent with which he proceeded in the premises, and prays equal benefit therefrom, as if the same were here again fully repeated. Respondent further takes exception to the sufficiency of the allegations of this article as to the conspiracy alleged upon the same grounds as stated in the exception set forth in his answer to said article fourth.

ART. VIII. The answer in full:

And for answer to the said eighth article this respondent denies that on the 21st day of February, 1868, at Washington aforesaid, or at any other time and place, he did issue and deliver to the said Thomas the said letter of authority set forth in the said eighth article, with the intent unlawfully to control the disbursements of the money appropriated for the military service and for the Department of War. This respondent, protesting that there was a vacancy in the office of Secretary for the Department of War, admits that he did issue the said letter of authority, and he denies that the same was with any unlawful intent whatever, either to violate the Constitution of the United States or any act of Congress. On the contrary, this respondent again affirms that his sole intent was to vindicate his authority as President of the United States, and by peaceful means to bring the question of the right of the said Stanton to continue to hold the said office of Secretary of War to a final decision before the Supreme Court of the United States, as has been hereinbefore set forth; and he prays the same benefit from his answer in the premises as if the same were here again repeated at length.

ART. IX. In answer to Article IX the President reviews his transactions and conversations with General Emory, admits that he expressed an opinion that the law in question was unconstitutional, shows that he expressed the same opinion to the House of Representatives by message, and summarizes:

Respondent doth therefore deny that by the expression of such opinion he did commit or was guilty of a high misdemeanor in office; and this respondent doth further say that the said article nine lays no foundation whatever for the conclusion stated in the said article, that the respondent, by reason of the allegations therein contained, was guilty of a high misdemeanor in office.

ART. X. In answer to this article the President does not admit that the passages set forth as portions of addresses delivered by him correctly or justly present his speeches, and demands that, in case the matter set forth in the article is deemed to constitute a high misdemeanor cognizable by the court, proof shall be required to be made of the actual speech. He protests that he has not been unmindful of the high duties of his office, or the harmonies and courtesies proper between different branches of the Government, or that he has had designs against the rightful power and authority of Congress; and that in all his communications to the Congress and the public he has acted within and according to his right and privilege as a citizen and his right and duty as President. And in conclusion he says:

And this respondent says that neither the said tenth article nor any specification thereof nor any allegation therein contained touches or relates to any official act or doing of this respondent in the office of President of the United States or in the discharge of any of its constitutional or legal duties or responsibilities; but said article and the specifications and allegations thereof, wholly and in every part thereof, question only the discretion or propriety of freedom of opinion or freedom of speech, as exercised by this respondent as a citizen of the United States in his personal right and capacity, and without allegation or imputation against this respondent of the violation of any law of the United States touching or relating to freedom of speech or its exercise by the citizens of the United States, or by this respondent as one of the said citizens or otherwise; and he denies that by reason of any matter in said article or its specifications alleged he has said or done anything indecent or unbecoming in the Chief Magistrate of the United States, or that he has brought the high office of the President of the United States into contempt, ridicule, or disgrace, or that he has committed or has been guilty of a high misdemeanor in office.

ART. XI. The President denies specifically the charges, standing upon his right to freedom of speech as set forth in the answer to the preceding article, and concludes:

And this respondent, further answering the said eleventh article, denies that by means or reason of anything in said article alleged this respondent, as President of the United States, did, on the 21st day of February, 1868, or at any other day or time, commit, or that he was guilty of, a high misdemeanor in office.

And this respondent, further answering the said eleventh article, says that the same and the matters therein contained do not charge or allege the commission of any act whatever by this respondent, in his office of President of the United States, nor the omission by this respondent of any act of official obligation or duty in his office of President of the United States; nor does the said article nor the matters therein contained name, designate, describe, or define any act or mode or form of attempt, device, contrivance, or means, or of attempt at device, contrivance, or means, whereby this respondent can know or understand what act or mode or form of attempt, device, contrivance, or means, or of attempt at device, contrivance, or means, are imputed to or charged against this respondent, in his office of President of the United States, or intended so to be, or whereby this respondent can more fully or definitely make answer unto the said article than he hereby does.

Having answered article by article, the answer concludes:

And this respondent, in submitting to this honorable court this his answer to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him, respectfully reserves leave to amend and add to the same from time to time, as may become necessary or proper, and when and as such necessity and propriety shall appear.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

Attached to the answer were two exhibits, one being a message transmitted to the Senate by the President March 2, 1867, wherein the right of removal of officers was discussed; and the other a message of December 12, 1867, relating particularly to the case of Mr. Stanton.

The answer of President Johnson to the articles of impeachment having been read, the question was taken on receiving it and placing it on file.

On the request of the managers the Senate ordered an attested copy of the answer of President Johnson to be sent to the House.

The answer of President Johnson having been received, the Senate gave the managers time to consult the House on a replication.

The reading of the answer being concluded, the Chief Justice said:[1]

Senators, you have heard the answer submitted by the counsel for the President of the United States. Those of you who are in favor of receiving and ordering this answer to be filed will say "aye," and those who are of the contrary opinion will say "no." [Having put the question.] It is so ordered; the answer is received and will be filed.

Thereupon Mr. Manager Boutwell presented a request that a copy of the answer be furnished to the House of Representatives. The Chief Justice put the question on the motion suggested by the request of the managers, and it was agreed to, the formal order being:

Ordered, That the managers have time to consult the House of Representatives on a replication, and that they be furnished with a copy of the answer of the respondent; and Ordered, That the Secretary communicate to the House of Representatives an attested copy of the answer of the President to the articles of impeachment, together with a copy of the foregoing order.

The answer of President Johnson having been read, his counsel offered a paper, signed by themselves, asking thirty days to prepare for trial.

The managers contended that President Johnson's request for time to prepare for the trial should have been signed by himself and under oath.

The managers opposed President Johnson's request for thirty days to prepare for trial, citing American and English precedents in argument.

The Senate granted to President Johnson a less time than his counsel asked to prepare for trial.

In granting to President Johnson time to prepare for trial the Senate intimated that there should be no delays after the beginning of the trial.

The Senate retired to consider President Johnson's application for time to prepare for trial.

The proceedings in the Senate consultation chamber during the Johnson trial appear in the Journal and Globe; but the debates are not given. (Footnote.)

Thereupon Mr. Evarts, in behalf of the respondent, submitted the following motion:[2]

To the Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment:

And now, on this 23d day of March, in the year 1868, the counsel for the President of the United States, upon reading and filing his answer to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him, respectfully represent to this honorable court that after the replication shall have been filed to the said answer, the due and proper preparation of and for the trial of the cause will require, in the opinion and judgment of such counsel, that a period of not less than thirty days should be allowed to the President of the United States and his counsel for such preparation, and before the said trial should proceed.

Mr. Manager Logan, on behalf of the House of Representatives, opposed the motion on the ground that the reasons given were not sufficient, and that the trial should be hastened because the respondent was continuing daily in the misuse of power for which he was arraigned. As to the precedents he said:

In the many trials we have reported in this and other countries this application has no precedent.

In the case of Judge Chase his application stated, in substance, that it was not in his power to obtain information respecting facts, alleged against him to have taken place in Philadelphia and Richmond, in time to prepare and put in his answer and proceed to trial before the 5th day of March then next following; and further that he could not get his witnesses or counsel nor prepare his answer, at the same time disclaiming that this was done for delay. This application was sworn to by the respondent; he was given time, and the facts show that his answer was filed and his trial had, and he acquitted in five days' less time than he swore it would take him to prepare for trial.

In Judge Peck's case his application stated his difficulties in obtaining witnesses, the distance they lived from Washington, the time it would require them to travel from St. Louis to Washington, the necessity for copying and obtaining records; that four years had elapsed since the transpiring of the acts complained of against him. This application was also sworn to. If the learned counsel remember the trial of Queen Caroline before the Parliament of Great Britain, when time was granted for the procurement of evidence the learned attorney-general then and there protested against this granting of time becoming a precedent for any future trial, this application being granted merely through courtesy to the Queen, when witnesses were deemed absolutely necessary to protect, if possible, her reputation. This application differs in form and substance from any that our attention has been directed to, made by the counsel, signed by themselves, and sworn to by no one.

Mr. Logan in conclusion said:

I presume no man will doubt that if an application of this kind were made to a court at law the inquiry would be: "Have you issued your subpœnas; have you attempted to get your witnesses; have you attempted to make any preparation to try the cause?" And if the counsel would answer that they had made no preparation whatever; that they had issued no subpœnas; had made no attempt to procure witnesses or get ready for the trial of the cause, but merely desired time for thought and reflection, the application would certainly be denied. And against the granting of this, not made upon the oath of any person, not signed by the President, and merely intended for the benefit of counsel, we, the managers, in the name of the House of Representatives and the whole people of this Republic, do most solemnly protest.

Later Mr. Manager Bingham urged:

I submit that a question of this magnitude has never been decided upon a mere presentation of a statement of counsel, in this country or in any country. To speak more plainly, a motion for continuance arising on a question of this sort, I venture to say, has never been decided affirmatively upon such an issue on a mere statement of counsel. If Andrew Johnson, the accused at this bar, has witnesses that were not within the process of this court up to this day, but whose attendance he can hope to procure if time be allowed him, he can make affidavit before this tribunal that they are material and set forth in his affidavit what he expects to prove by them. I concede that upon such a showing there would be something upon which the Senate might properly act.

Mr. Evarts, of counsel for the respondent, said:

In our estimate of the course of this proceeding before this honorable court we have not yet arrived at a time when it was the duty of counsel or was at the charge of the accused to know or consider what the issues were upon which he was to prepare on his side or expect on the other the production of proofs. Beyond that, we feel no occasion to present by affidavit to this honorable court a matter so completely within its cognizance that our time to plead was fixed so as to offer us but eight working days for that duty of counsel. * * *

It would seem to me that we are placed thus far in the attitude of a defendant in a civil or in a public prosecution who upon the issue joined desires time to prepare for trial. The ordinary course in such a case is that as matter of right, as matter of absolute and universal custom, one is not required or expected to give any cause of actual obstruction and difficulty in reference to a continuance to what is the term of the court, doubtless in most cases to occur within a brief period after the issue is joined. This court having no such arrangement and no such possible arrangement of its affairs in advance, we are obliged at each stage of regular proceeding to ask your attention as to what you will provide and consider in the particular case is, according to the general nature of the procedure and the understood attitude of both parties to it, a just and reasonable proposition to be made by us as to the time that should be allowed for the preparation in all respects for this trial after the issue shall have been joined.

At the conclusion of the discussion between the managers and the counsel for the respondent Mr. John B. Henderson, a Senator from Missouri, moved that the application of counsel for the respondent be postponed until after the filing of the replication. This motion was disagreed to, yeas 25, nays 28.

The question then recurring on granting the application of counsel for the respondent, it was denied, yeas 12, nays 41.

Thereupon Mr. Evarts, counsel for the respondent, submitted the following:

The counsel for the President now move that there be allowed for the preparation of the President of the United States for the trial, after the replication shall be filed and before the trial shall be required to proceed, such reasonable time as shall now be fixed by the Senate.

Pending its consideration the Senate adjourned until the next day, March 24. When it convened on that day[1] for the trial the replication of the House of Representatives was filed, and then the consideration of the application for time was resumed. In answer to the request of counsel for the respondent, Mr. Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland, a Senator, proposed the following:

Ordered, That the Senate proceed to the trial of the President under the articles of impeachment exhibited against him at the expiration of ten days from this day, unless for causes shown to the contrary.

To this Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, a Senator, proposed an amendment, which he subsequently withdrew, striking out all after the word ordered and inserting:

Now that replication has been filed, the Senate, adhering to its rule already adopted, will proceed with the trial from day to day (Sundays excepted) unless otherwise ordered on reason shown.

Pending consideration, the Senate voted, yeas 29, nays 23, to retire for consultation,[2] and being called to order in their conference chamber, Mr. Johnson modified his order to read as follows:

Ordered, That the Senate will commence the trial of the President upon the articles of impeachment exhibited against him on Thursday, the 2d of April.

On motion of Mr. Sumner, and by a vote of yeas 28, nays 24, this order was amended by striking out "Thursday, the 2d of April," and inserting "Monday, the 30th of March instant."

A proposition to suspend consideration of the subject until the managers had opened their case and submitted their evidence, was presented by Mr. George H. Williams, of Oregon, but was disagreed to, yeas 9, nays 42.

On motion of Mr. Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, and without division, the order proposed by Mr. Johnson was further amended by adding the words—and proceed therein with all convenient dispatch, under the rules of the Senate sitting upon the trial of an impeachment.

The order as amended was then agreed to; and the Senate having returned to their Chamber, the Chief Justice informed the counsel for the respondent that the Senate had agreed upon an order in response to their application, as follows:

Ordered, That the Senate will commence the trial of the President upon the articles of impeachment exhibited against him on Monday, the 30th of March instant, and proceed therein with all convenient dispatch, under the rules of the Senate sitting upon the trial of an impeachment.

The form of President Johnson's answer was commented on during preparation of the replication in the House.

Argument as to whether or not a demurrer is permissible in an impeachment case.

Comment on the use of the phrase "all the people" in the pleadings in an impeachment case.

Form of resolutions adopting the replication in the Johnson trial and directing its presentation in the Senate.

In the House, on March 23,[1] Mr. George S. Boutwell, of Massachusetts, from the managers, reported a form of replication. In reporting it he said:

The attention of the managers was called to the peculiar form of the answer filed by the President. To most of the articles, however, he makes answer, in substance, that he is not guilty, although the form of the answer is different from that which has generally been employed in similar cases. In respect to some of the articles the answer probably amounts to a demurrer merely. But upon the whole the managers have chosen to treat the answer of the President to each and every article as a plea of the general issue of not guilty. And the managers are of opinion that no advantage can be taken, as against the House of Representatives, from the form of replication which has been reported by the managers.

Mr. George W. Woodward, of Pennsylvania, criticising the demurrer, said:

If I understood the answer of the President to the eleventh article of impeachment, it amounts to a demurrer to that article. It denies that there is any impeachable offense charged in the eleventh article. My own private opinion is that the demurrer or answer is very conclusive. I do not think there is any impeachable offense charged in the eleventh article.

The answer of the President putting that point in issue, which is a legal question and amounts to a demurrer, there should be a special replication to that part of the answer which relates to the eleventh article, or a formal rejoinder in demurrer. This general replication does not join an issue upon that article at all; it is what might be called a departure in pleading. Here is a demurrer to the eleventh article which denies that any impeachable offense is charged in it. The managers do not aver in the replication that the eleventh article charges any impeachable offense, and therefore there is no issue upon the record upon that article.

To this Mr. John A. Bingham, of Ohio, replied:

Now, as to the answer of the President, I beg leave to call the attention of the House and the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Woodward] to the fact that while it does contain much that is argumentative, much that may be called demurrer, which is never allowed at all in an impeachment case, which was never introduced into the proceedings of an impeachment case—for there never was a demurrer entertained by the Senate in an impeachment case, none ever entertained in the House of Lords of England; there is no such note of record; it does not lie; special pleading is unknown to the whole proceeding—yet this answer of the President to the eleventh article of impeachment, in its last clause, does expressly deny, and is therefore simply a plea of not guilty—it expressly denies that he committed a crime. As to form, it is nothing; substance is everything.

Mr. Fernando Wood, of New York, objected to the language of the replication, in that it professed to reply in the name of all the people of the United States; but Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, replied that this form, using the words "all the people" had been in use five hundred years, and had been questioned only once, in the days of Charles I.

The replication was agreed to on March 24 by a vote of yeas 116, nays 36, whereby the House—

Resolved, That the House hereby adopts the replication to the answer of the President, as now submitted by the managers.

Thereupon, on motion of Mr. Boutwell, the following was agreed to:

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate by the Clerk of the House informing the Senate that the House of Representatives has adopted a replication to the answer of the President of the United States on the articles of impeachment exhibited against him, and that the same will be presented to the Senate by the managers on the part of the House.

The replication of the House to President Johnson's answer to the articles of impeachment.

The replication in the Johnson trial was signed by the Speaker and attested by the Clerk.

The Senate ordered that an authenticated copy of the replication to President Johnson's answer be furnished to counsel of the respondent.

On March 24[1] in the Senate sitting for the trial, the message authorized by the resolution was received, and immediately upon its being laid before the Senate, Mr. Manager Boutwell presented the replication:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
UNITED STATES, March 24, 1868.

Replication by the House of Representatives of the United States to the answer of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives.

The House of Representatives of the United States have considered the several answers of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, to the several articles of impeachment against him by them exhibited in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, and reserving to themselves all advantage of exception to the insufficiency of his answer to each and all of the several article of impeachment exhibited against said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, do deny each and every averment in said several answers, or either of them, which denies or traverses the acts, intents, crimes, or misdemeanors charged against said Andrew Johnson in the said articles of impeachment, or either of them; and for replication to said answer do say that said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, is guilty of the high crimes and misdemeanors mentioned in said articles, and that the House of Representatives are ready to prove the same.

SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
EDWARD MCPHERSON,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

[1] Senate Journal, p. 862; Globe supplement, p. 28.

Thereupon, on motion of Mr. Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland, a Senator, it was:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to furnish the counsel of the President an authenticated copy of the replication of the House of Representatives to the answer of the President to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives.

The opening addresses of managers and counsel in the Johnson trial.

The opening addresses in the Johnson trial discussed constitutional questions and outlined evidence.

Definition of impeachable offenses by counsel for President Johnson.

By consent the managers in the Johnson trial reserved the right to supply omissions in evidence after they had closed their testimony.

On motion of counsel for President Johnson, the Senate adjourned over to permit time for preparation of testimony for the defense.

On March 30,[1] the day set for the commencement of the trial, the Senate assembled and the proceedings began with the usual proclamation and ceremonies. The journal having been read, the Chief Justice said:

Gentlemen, managers of the House of Representatives, you will now proceed in support of the articles of impeachment.

Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler then opened the case for the managers, speaking nearly three hours, and touching on the following topics: (a) What are impeachable offenses, antagonizing the view that only indictable offenses are impeachable; (b) whether or not the Senate sat as a court, taking the view that it did not; (c) and a review of the issues presented by the articles and the reply, with arguments in support of the articles. Mr. Butler also presented a brief of the authorities upon the law of impeachable crimes and misdemeanors, prepared by Mr. William Lawrence, of Ohio, and revised by himself.[2]

Then the managers proceeded with the testimony, Mr. Manager James F. Wilson proceeding first with certain documentary evidence. The presentation of testimony, documentary and oral, continued until Saturday, April 4,[3] when it was announced on behalf of the managers that the case on behalf of the House of Representatives was substantially closed, but that in looking over their testimony they might find some omissions which they might wish to supply, and therefore they did not wish to be precluded from offering them. The counsel for the President announced that they took no exception to this reservation.

Thereupon Mr. Benjamin R. Curtis, of Massachusetts, of counsel for the President, announced that they desired time for preparation of their testimony, and therefore he would move that "when this court adjourns, it adjourn to Thursday next."[4]

Thereupon Mr. John Conness, a Senator from California, moved that the Senate sitting for the trial should adjourn until Wednesday. Mr. Reverdy Johnson, a Senator from Maryland, moved an amendment substituting Thursday for Wednesday, and it was agreed to, yeas 37, nays 10. Then the motion as amended was agreed to.

At the reconvening on April 9, the managers occupied a brief time in presenting additional evidence, after which Mr. Benj. R. Curtis, of counsel for the President, opened the defense, speaking the remainder of this day and concluding on April 10.[1] He first reviewed the issues presented by the articles and the answer, and then argued (a) that impeachable offenses were "only high criminal offenses against the United States, made so by some law of the United States existing when the acts complained of were done;" and (b) that the Senate, in trying an impeachment, was a court.

At the conclusion of Mr. Curtis's opening the presentation of testimony on behalf of the respondent was begun, and proceeded from day to day until April 18,[2] when Mr. William M. Evarts, of counsel, announced that the defense had concluded its testimony, but would reserve the privilege to offer proof that might have been overlooked because of the illness of Mr. Stanberry, to whom had been intrusted the examination of witnesses.

The order of the final arguments in the trial of President Johnson.

Disorder occurring in the galleries during the Johnson trial, they were cleared.

On April 20[3] the managers introduced certain verbal and documentary evidence, after which, on April 23, the Senate, after consideration, agreed to[4] the following:

Ordered, That as many of the managers as desire to do so be permitted to file arguments or to address the Senate orally; but the conclusion of the oral argument shall be by one manager, as provided in the twenty-first rule.

Thereupon Mr. John A. Logan, on behalf of the managers, and in accordance with the above rule, filed an argument.[5] On the same day Mr. Manager George S. Boutwell began an oral argument, which he concluded on the succeeding day.[6] Thereupon Mr. Thomas A. R. Nelson, of counsel for the respondent, began an argument in defense, which he concluded on the succeeding day, April 24.[7]

On April 25,[8] after the consideration of business relative to course of procedure in passing judgment, Mr. William S. Groesbeck, counsel for the President, continued argument for the defense, concluding on that day.

On Monday, April 27, Mr. Manager Thaddeus Stevens argued for the managers.[9] He was followed on the same day by Mr. Manager Thomas Williams, who concluded on the next day.[10]

At the conclusion of Mr. Williams's address, Mr. Manager Benjamin F. Butler asked and obtained leave of the Senate,[1] by unanimous consent, to make "a short narration of facts, made necessary by what fell from Mr. Nelson, of counsel for the President, in his speech of Friday last." Mr. Nelson, also by unanimous consent, was permitted to reply.

On April 28,[2] Mr. William M. Evarts, counsel for the respondent, then began argument for the defense, which he continued daily until May 1, when he concluded. On the same day Mr. Henry Stanbery began the concluding argument for the defense, finishing on May 2.[3]

On May 4, 5, and 6,[4] Mr. Manager John A. Bingham made the concluding argument for the managers.

At the conclusion of Mr. Bingham's address [5] there were in the gallery applause and hisses, whereupon, on motion of Mr. James W. Grimes, of Iowa, it was—Ordered, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to clear the galleries.

In obedience to this order the galleries were completely cleared. Later the galleries were ordered by the Senate to be reopened.

Being excluded from the Johnson trial by a secret session, the House returned to its Hall and determined to attend again when informed that the Senate was ready to receive them.

Shortly after, on motion of Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, the doors of the Senate were closed for deliberation. The House of Representatives consequently returned to their Chamber,[6] and, the Speaker having resumed the chair, a question was raised as to the course of procedure.

The Speaker [7] had read the rule under which the House was acting:

Resolved, That on the days when the Senate shall sit for the trial of the President upon the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives the House, in Committee of the Whole, will attend with the managers at the bar of the Senate at the hour named for the commencement of the proceedings.

and then ruled:

The Chair rules that under this resolution, the Senate having gone into secret session in their own Chamber for deliberation, and it being impossible for the managers and the House as in the Committee of the Whole to attend at the bar of the Senate, it is the duty of the House to return to its Hall, and here, as the House of Representatives, to transact business while waiting for any message from the Senate after the doors of that body have been reopened. * * * The Chair took some time to examine this resolution, and after consultation with others who are excellent parliamentarians he has no doubt of the fact in his own mind that while the Senate is engaged in secret deliberation for one or four and twenty hours it could not be expected or required of the House to remain in the Senate corridors, and the Speaker, as representing the House, could not consent to it without the direct order of the House. The Chair therefore thinks, the order having been made before the House proceeded to the Senate, that when the House returns business should be transacted; and the Senate having excluded the House from its Chamber, as it has a right to do under its rules, the House must therefore return to the Hall and await a message from the Senate.

Thereupon the Speaker recognized Mr. Elihu B. Washburne, chairman of the Committee of the Whole, who reported:

The Committee of the Whole have, according to order, attended the managers to the bar of the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment for the trial of Andrew Johnson; and the argument having been closed and the Senate having ordered its doors to be shut for deliberation, the committee thereupon returned with the managers to the Hall of the House.

The Speaker appears to have sent a letter to the Senate asking that the House might be notified when the doors should be opened. This must have been done informally by the Speaker, but the Chief Justice laid it before the Senate, whereupon it was—[1]

Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate, sitting for the trial of the President upon articles of impeachment, will notify the House when it is ready to receive them at the bar.

The Senate declined to make public its debates in secret session on the final judgment in the Johnson trial.

After the doors of the Senate had been closed,[2] it resumed consideration of this resolution, which had been proposed by Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, on April 24:

Ordered, That after the arguments shall be concluded, and when the doors shall be closed for deliberation upon the final question the official reporters of the Senate shall take down the debates upon the final question, to be reported in the proceedings.

This order, with pending amendments relating to restriction of debate, was laid on the table by a vote of 28 yeas, 20 nays.[3]

The Senate adopted an order governing its deliberations and voting on the final question in the Johnson trial.

Deliberation having been had in secret session, the Senate voted on the articles of impeachment without debate.

While the deliberations on the final question in the Johnson trial were secret, the Senators were permitted to file written opinions.

Thereupon the Senate proceeded to consider[4] a proposition originally submitted by Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, on April 24:

Ordered, That the Senate, sitting for the trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, will proceed to vote on the several articles of impeachment at 12 o'clock on the day after the close of the arguments.

After propositions to amend had been considered, the order was laid on the table, and then, after further consideration, the Senate, without division, agreed to the following, proposed by Mr. Justin S. Morrill, of Vermont:

Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next, at 11 o'clock a. m., for the purpose of deliberation, under the rules of the Senate, sitting on the trial of impeachments, and that on Tuesday next following, at 12 o'clock m., the Senate shall proceed to vote without debate on the several articles of impeachment; and each Senator shall be permitted to file within two days after the vote shall have been so taken his written opinion, to be printed with the proceedings.

Having disagreed as to the form of final question in the Johnson trial, the Senate left it to the Chief Justice.

On May 7[1] the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the form in which the question should be put, and various propositions were offered, as follows, for amendment to the rules:

By Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts:

Rule 23. In taking the votes of the Senate on the articles of impeachment, the Presiding Officer shall call each Senator by his name, and upon each article propose the following question, in the manner following: "Mr. ———, how say you, is the respondent, ———, guilty or not guilty, as charged in the ——— article of impeachment?" whereupon each Senator shall rise in his place and answer "guilty" or "not guilty."

At the suggestion of Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, Mr. Sumner modified this by striking out the words "as charged in" and inserting "of a high crime or misdemeanor (as the case may be) within."

Mr. Charles R. Buckalew, of Pennsylvania, proposed to amend by changing the form of question to the following, which Mr. Sumner accepted:

Mr. ———, how say you, is the respondent, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, guilty or not guilty of a high crime or misdemeanor (as the case may be) as charged in the article of impeachment?

Mr. John Conness, of California, proposed to amend by substituting for the latter portion of Mr. Sumner's proposition, the following:

Each of the articles Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11 propose the following question in the manner following: Mr. Senator, how say you, is the respondent, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, guilty or not guilty of a high crime or misdemeanor as charged in this article? And upon each of the articles Nos. 4 and 6 he shall propose the following question: Mr. Senator, how say you, is the respondent, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, guilty or not guilty of a high crime charged in this article? Whereupon each Senator shall rise in his place and answer "guilty" or "not guilty."

After voting on an amendment proposed by Mr. Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, which provided for voting separately on the several clauses of the eleventh article, the whole subject was, on motion of Mr. Sumner, laid on the table by a vote of, yeas 24, nays 11.

Thereupon, and as appeared later, after an understanding that the Chief Justice should propose a rule, the Senate adjourned to Monday, May 11.

Views of the Chief Justice on form of final question in the Johnson trial and on division of the articles for voting.

In the Johnson trial the Senate adopted the form of final question and method of voting suggested by the Chief Justice.

---

[1] Senate Journal, pp. 937, 938; Globe supplement, p. 409.

On May 11[1] the Chief Justice presented the following views, which were ordered to be entered on the Journal:

Senators: In conformity with what seemed to be the general wish of the Senate when it adjourned last Thursday, the Chief Justice, in taking the vote on the articles of impeachment, will adopt the mode sanctioned by the practice in the cases of Chase, Peck, and Humphreys.

He will direct the Secretary to read the several articles successively, and after the reading of each article will put the question of guilty or not guilty to each Senator, rising in his place, in the form used in the case of Judge Chase:

"Mr. Senator ———, how say you, is the respondent, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, guilty or not guilty of a high misdemeanor, as charged in this article?"

In putting the question on articles 4 and 6, each of which charges a crime, the word "crime" will be substituted for the word "misdemeanor."

The Chief Justice has carefully considered the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Hendricks], which appeared to meet the approval of the Senate, that in taking the vote on the eleventh article, the question should be put on each clause, and has found himself unable to divide the article as suggested. The article charges several facts, but they are so connected that they make but one allegation, and they are charged as constituting one misdemeanor.

The first fact charged is, in substance, that the President publicly declared in August, 1866, that the Thirty-ninth Congress was a Congress of only part of the States and not a constitutional Congress, intending thereby to deny its constitutional competency to enact laws or propose amendments of the Constitution; and this charge seems to have been made as introductory, and as qualifying that which follows, namely, that the President, in pursuance of this declaration, attempted to prevent the execution of the tenure of office act by contriving and attempting to contrive means to prevent Mr. Stanton from resuming the functions of Secretary of War after the refusal of the Senate to concur in his suspension, and also by contriving and attempting to contrive means to prevent the execution of the appropriation act of March 2, 1867, and also to prevent the execution of the rebel States governments act of the same date.

The gravamen of the article seems to be that the President attempted to defeat the execution of the tenure of office act, and that he did this in pursuance of a declaration which was intended to deny the constitutional competency of Congress to enact laws or propose constitutional amendments, and by contriving means to prevent Mr. Stanton from resuming his office of Secretary, and also to prevent the execution of the appropriation act and the rebel States governments act.

The single substantive matter charged is the attempt to prevent the execution of the tenure of office act; and the other facts are alleged either as introductory and exhibiting this general purpose, or as showing the means contrived in furtherance of that attempt.

This single matter, connected with the other matters previously and subsequently alleged, is charged as the high misdemeanor of which the President is alleged to have been guilty.

The general question, guilty or not guilty of a high misdemeanor as charged, seems fully to cover the whole charge, and will be put as to this article as well as to the others, unless the Senate direct some mode of division.

In the tenth article the division suggested by the Senator from New York [Mr. Conkling] may be more easily made. It contains a general allegation, to the effect that on the 18th of August, and on other days, the President, with intent to set aside the rightful authority of Congress and bring it into contempt, delivered certain scandalous harangues, and therein uttered loud threats and bitter menaces against Congress and the laws of the United States enacted by Congress, thereby bringing the office of President into disgrace, to the great scandal of all good citizens, and sets forth, in three distinct specifications, the harangues, threats, and menaces complained of.

In respect to this article, if the Senate sees fit so to direct, the question of guilty or not guilty of the facts charged may be taken in respect to the several specifications, and the question of guilty or not guilty of a high misdemeanor, as charged in the article, can also be taken.

The Chief Justice, however, sees no objection to putting the general question on this article in the same manner as on the others; for, whether the particular questions be put on the specifications or not, the answer to the final question must be determined by the judgment of the Senate, whether or not the facts alleged in the specifications have been sufficiently proved, and whether, if sufficiently proved, they amount to a high misdemeanor within the meaning of the Constitution.

On the whole, therefore, the Chief Justice thinks that the better practice will be to put the general question on each article without attempting to make any subdivision, and will pursue this course if no objection is made. He will, however, be pleased to conform to such directions as the Senate may see fit to give in this respect.

On motion of Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, it was Ordered, That the questions be put as proposed by the presiding officer of the Senate, and each Senator shall rise in his place and answer "guilty" or "not guilty" only.

Form of voting in the Senate on the final question in the trial of President Johnson.

In the Johnson trial the Senate voted on the articles in an order different from the numerical order.

By direction of the Senate the Chief Justice announced the result after the vote on each article in the Johnson trial.

The House in Committee of the Whole attended in the Senate during the voting on the final question in the Johnson trial.

On May 12,[1] the day set for voting on the articles of impeachment, the illness of a Senator caused the voting to be postponed to May 16. On that day the Chief Justice took his seat at the hour of 12 o'clock, the usual proclamation was made by the Sergeant-at-Arms, etc., and then, on motion of Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, it was—Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to inform the House of Representatives that the Senate, sitting for the trial of the President upon articles of impeachment, is now ready to receive them in the Senate Chamber.

Soon thereafter the Sergeant-at-Arms announced the presence of the House of Representatives at the bar, and the Members of the House of Representatives, as in Committee of the Whole, preceded by Mr. E. B. Washburne, chairman of that committee, and accompanied by the Speaker and Clerk, appeared and were conducted to the seats provided for them.

Thereupon, by a vote of yeas 34, nays 19, the Senate agreed to the following order, offered by Mr. George H. Williams, of Oregon:

Ordered, That the Chief Justice, in directing the Secretary to read the several articles of impeachment, shall direct him to read the eleventh article first, and the question shall then be taken on that article, and thereafter the other ten successively as they stand.

Then, on motion of Mr. Edmunds, it was[2]—

Ordered, That the Senate now proceed to vote upon the articles, according to the rules of the Senate.

Thereupon the Chief Justice directed the reading of the eleventh article, which being done, the following procedure occurred:

The CHIEF JUSTICE. Call the roll.

---

[1] Senate Journal, pp. 941, 942; Globe supplement, p. 411.

[2] Senate Journal, pp. 942–945; Globe supplement, p. 411.

The Chief Clerk called the name of Mr. Anthony.

Mr. Anthony rose in his place.

The CHIEF JUSTICE. Mr. Senator Anthony, how say you? Is the respondent, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, guilty or not guilty of a high misdemeanor, as charged in this article?

Mr. ANTHONY. Guilty.

[This form was continued in regard to each Senator as the roll was called alphabetically, each rising in his place as his name was called and answering "guilty" or "not guilty." When the name of Mr. Grimes was called, he being very feeble, the Chief Justice said he might remain seated. He, however, with the assistance of friends, rose and answered. The Chief Justice also suggested to Mr. Howard that he might answer in his seat, but he preferred to rise.]

The Chief Justice did not vote.

Immediately upon the vote being completed, a motion for a recess was made and disagreed to, whereupon a motion was made to adjourn. Mr. Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland, asked if it was in order for the Senate to adjourn while pronouncing judgment.

The Chief Justice said:

The precedents seem to be, except in one case, and that is the case of Humphreys, that the announcement be not made by the presiding officer until after the vote has been taken on all the articles. The Chair will, however, take the direction of the Senate. If they desire the announcement of the vote which has been taken to be now made he will make it.

It being the general opinion of the Senate that the announcement be made, the Chief Justice said:

Upon this article thirty-five Senators vote "guilty," and nineteen Senators vote "not guilty." Two-thirds not having pronounced guilty, the President is, therefore, acquitted upon this article.

The Senate, overruling the Chief Justice, decided that a motion to adjourn over was in order during the voting on the articles in the Johnson trial.

After voting on one article in the Johnson trial, the Senate adjourned to a day fixed.

Thereupon the question recurred on the motion, made by Mr. George H. Williams, of Oregon, that the Senate adjourn until Tuesday, the 26th instant.

Mr. Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, made the point of order that as the Senate was engaged in executing an order, any motion except the simple motion to adjourn was not in order.

The Chief Justice ruled[1] —

A motion that when the Senate adjourns it adjourn to meet at a certain day could not now be entertained, because the Senate is in process of executing an order. A motion to adjourn to a certain day seems to the Chair to come under the same rule. He will, therefore, decide the motion not to be in order.

Mr. John Conness, of California, having appealed, the decision of the Chair was overruled, yeas 24, nays 30.[2]

[1] Globe supplement, p. 412.

[2] On May 26, on the same question, the Chief Justice decided as he had first decided, and was again overruled, 35 to 18. (Globe supplement, p. 414.)

Thereupon the question recurred on the motion of Mr. Williams, which was agreed to, yeas 32, nays 21, after several amendments proposing a different day had been disagreed to.

The Senate, overruling the Chief Justice, held in order a motion to rescind its rule governing the voting on the articles of impeachment in the Johnson trial.

The Senate rescinded its order prescribing the method of voting on the articles in the Johnson trial, although it was partially executed.

On May 26,[1] after the Senate had assembled in the usual form, and after the House of Representatives, informed by message, had attended, Mr. George H. Williams, of Oregon, offered the following:

Resolved, That the resolution heretofore adopted as to the order of reading and voting upon the articles of impeachment be rescinded.

Mr. Charles R. Buckalew, of Pennsylvania, having objected, the Chief Justice held:

The Chief Justice is under the impression that it changes the rule, and he will state the case to the Senate, in order that the Senate may correct him if he is wrong. The twenty-second rule of the Senate provides that—

"On the final question, whether the impeachment is sustained, the yeas and nays shall be taken on each article of impeachment separately."

That necessarily implies that they be taken in their order unless it is otherwise prescribed by the Senate. Subsequently the framing of a question to be addressed to the Senators was left to the Chief Justice, and he stated the views which seemed to him proper to be observed. In the course of that statement he said that "he will direct the Secretary to read the articles successively, and after the reading of each article will put the question of guilty or not guilty to each Senator, rising in his place, in the form used in the case of Judge Chase," and then stated the form.

After the statement was made—

"Mr. Sumner submitted the following order; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

"Ordered, That the questions be put as proposed by the presiding officer of the Senate, and each Senator shall rise in his place and answer guilty or not guilty, only."

That was the order under which the Senate was acting until on the 16th of May the Senate adopted the following order moved by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. Williams]:

"Ordered, That the Chief Justice, in directing the Secretary to read the several articles of impeachment, shall direct him to read the eleventh article first, and the question shall then be taken on that article, and thereafter the other ten successively as they stand."

This order changing the rule was in order on the 16th of May, having been voted some days before. Subsequently, after the House had been notified that the Senate was ready to receive them, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Edmunds] moved—

"That the Senate do now proceed to vote upon the articles according to the order of the Senate just adopted."

The Senate proceeded to vote upon the eleventh article, and after that adjourned until to-day. The present motion is to change the whole of these orders, for changing only the order of the 16th will not reach the effect intended. It must change, also, the order adopted on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Sumner], and also, as the Chief Justice conceives, the rule. He is of opinion, therefore, that a single objection will take it over this day, but will submit the question directly to the Senate without undertaking to decide it, as it is a matter which relates especially to the present order of business.

[1] Senate Journal, p. 946; Globe supplement, p. 413.

The Senate, by a vote of yeas 29, nays 25, decided that the motion was in order. A second point of order, made by Mr. Lyman Trumbull, of Illinois, that an order partially executed might not be rescinded, was also overruled, yeas 24, nays 30.

After propositions to amend and to adjourn had been disagreed to, the motion of Mr. Williams was agreed to.

Having voted on three of the eleven articles, the Senate sitting for the trial of President Johnson adjourned without day.

Before announcing the adjournment voted by the Senate, the Chief Justice directed the Clerk to enter a judgment of acquittal of President Johnson.

Form of acquittal entered in the Journal of the trial of President Johnson.

The acquittal of President Johnson was announced in the House through the report of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole.

Thereupon, on motion of Mr. Williams, the Senate decided to proceed to vote on the second article of impeachment.[1] And the second article having been read, the question was put in the prescribed form, and the Chief Justice announced:

Thirty-five Senators have pronounced the respondent, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, guilty; nineteen have pronounced him not guilty. Two-thirds not having pronounced him guilty, he stands acquitted upon this article.

In a similar manner the Senate determined to vote on the third article, and the vote having been taken, and having resulted 35 guilty and 19 not guilty, the acquittal was pronounced as before.

Thereupon Mr. Williams moved—

That the Senate, sitting for the trial of the President upon the articles of impeachment, do now adjourn without day.[2]

And there appeared yeas 34, nays 4.

Before announcing the result the Chief Justice said:

The Chief Justice begs leave to remind the Senate that the twenty-second rule provides that "if the impeachment shall not, upon any of the articles presented, be sustained by the votes of two-thirds of the members present, a judgment of acquittal shall be entered." * * * The Clerk will enter, if there be no objection, a judgment according to the rules—a judgment of acquittal.

And the Journal has this entry:

The Senate having tried Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, upon articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives, and two-thirds of the Senators present not having found him guilty of the charges contained in the second, third, and eleventh articles of impeachment, it is therefore Ordered and adjudged, That the said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, be, and he is, acquitted of the charges in said articles made and set forth.

The Chief Justice then announced the vote on the motion of Mr. Williams to be yeas 34, nays 16; and thereupon declared the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment for the trial of Andrew Johnson,

[2] Senate Journal, pp. 950, 951; Globe supplement, p. 415.

President of the United States, upon articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives, adjourned without day.

After this adjournment the House of Representatives returned to their Hall, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Washburne, of Illinois, made the following report:

The Committee of the Whole have, according to order, attended the managers to the bar of the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment for the trial of Andrew Johnson; that the respondent has been declared to be acquitted on the second and third articles severally preferred by the House; and that then, without action on the other articles, the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, adjourned sine die.[1]

2444. The impeachment and trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The impeachment of Secretary Belknap was set in motion through the findings of a committee empowered to investigate generally.

Form of resolution authorizing a general investigation of the Departments of the Government in 1876.

A committee empowered to investigate generally reported a resolution for the impeachment of Secretary Belknap.

The committee reported a resolution for the impeachment of Secretary Belknap, although they had been informed of his resignation of the office.

The work of drawing up the articles impeaching Secretary Belknap was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

On January 14, 1876,[1] Mr. William R. Morrison, of Illinois, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported the following resolution in lieu of several resolutions which had been referred to the said committee:

Resolved, That the several committees of this House having in charge matters pertaining to appropriations, foreign affairs, Indian affairs, military affairs, naval affairs, post-office and post-roads, public lands, public buildings and grounds, claims, and war claims be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire, so far as the same may properly be before their respective committees, into any errors, abuses, or frauds that may exist in the administration and execution of existing laws affecting said branches of the public service, with a view to ascertain what change and reformation can be made so as to promote integrity, economy, and efficiency therein; that the Committees on Expenditures in the State Department, in the Treasury Department, in the War Department, in the Navy Department, in the Post-Office Department, in the Interior Department, in the Department of Justice, and on Public Buildings be, and they are hereby, instructed to proceed at once, as required by the rules of the House, to examine into the state of the accounts and expenditures of the respective Departments submitted to them, and to examine and report particularly whether the expenditures of the respective Departments are justified by law; whether the claims from time to time satisfied and discharged by the respective Departments are supported by sufficient vouchers, establishing their justness both as to their character and amount; whether such claims have been discharged out of funds appropriated therefor, and whether all moneys have been disbursed in conformity with appropriation laws; whether any, and what, provisions are necessary to be adopted to provide more perfectly for the proper application of the public moneys and to secure the Government from demands unjust in their character or extravagant in their amount; whether any, and what, retrenchment can be made in the expenditures of the several Departments without detriment to the public service; whether any, and what, abuses at any time exist in the failure to enforce the payment of moneys which may be due to the United States from public defaulters or others, and to report from time to time such provisions and arrangements as may be necessary to add to the economy of the several Departments and the accountability of their officers; whether any offices belonging to the branches or Departments, respectively, concerning whose expenditures it is their duty to inquire, have become useless or unnecessary; and to report from time to time on the expediency of modifying or abolishing the same; also to examine into the pay and emoluments of all officers under the laws of the United States and to report from time to time such a reduction or increase thereof as a just economy and the public service may require. And for the purpose of enabling the several committees to fully comprehend the workings of the various branches or Departments of Government, respectively, the investigations of said committees may cover such period in the past as each of said committees may deem necessary for its own guidance or information or for the protection of the public interests in the exposing of frauds or abuses of any kind that may exist in said Departments; and said committees are authorized to send for persons and papers, and may report by bill or otherwise.

Resolved further, That the Committee on Public Expenditures be instructed to investigate and inquire into all matters set forth in the foregoing resolutions in the legislative departments of the Government, except in so far as the Senate is exclusively concerned, particularly in reference to the public printing and binding, and shall have the same authority that is conferred upon the other committees aforesaid.

This resolution, under the operation of the previous question, was agreed to without debate or division.

On March 2,[1] Mr. Hiester Clymer, of Pennsylvania, chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, presented the following as the unanimous report of that committee:

That they found at the very threshold of their investigation such unquestioned evidence of the malfeasance in office by Gen. William W. Belknap, then Secretary of War, that they find it to be their duty to lay the same before the House.

They further report that this day at 11 o'clock a. m. a letter of the President of the United States was presented to the committee accepting the resignation of the Secretary of War, which is hereto attached, together with a copy of his letter of resignation, which the President informs the committee was accepted about 10 o'clock and 20 minutes this morning. They therefore unanimously report and demand that the said William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, be dealt with according to the laws of the land, and to that end submit herewith the testimony in the case taken, together with the several statements and exhibits thereto attached, and also a rescript of the proceedings of the committee had during the investigation of this subject. And they submit the following resolutions, which they recommend shall be adopted:

"Resolved, That William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors while in office.

"Resolved, That the testimony in the case of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to prepare and report without unnecessary delay suitable articles of impeachment of said William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

"Resolved, That a committee of five Members of this House be appointed and instructed to proceed immediately to the bar of the Senate, and there impeach William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States of America, of high crimes and misdemeanors while in office, and to inform that body that formal articles of impeachment will in due time be presented, and to request the Senate to take such order in the premises as they deem appropriate."

The committee which ascertained questionable facts concerning the conduct of Secretary Belknap gave him opportunity to explain, present witnesses, and cross-examine witnesses.

The House, after a review of English precedents, determined to impeach Secretary Belknap, although he had resigned.

The impeachment of Secretary Belknap was carried to the Senate by a committee of five.

The minority party were represented on the committee to carry the impeachment of Secretary Belknap to the Senate.

Appended to this report,[1] were extracts from the proceedings of the committee showing—

That the Secretary of War had been informed of the testimony, which was read to him in the committee room by the chairman; and that, on his request, he was permitted to employ counsel and cross-examine the witness;

That the committee also gave the Secretary of War permission to appear and make a sworn statement; but that he failed to appear; and

That the evidence against the Secretary of War consisted of the testimony of a single witness, Caleb P. Marsh, partially substantiated as to the charges against the Secretary by a copy of a certain contract between Marsh and one John S. Evans, and substantiated as to certain collateral matters by statements of other persons.

The question being on agreeing to the resolutions accompanying the report, a brief discussion arose. Mr. George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, objected that impeachment should not be voted so hastily when they were confronted with the important question whether or not an officer could be impeached after resignation. The cases of Warren Hastings and Lord Francis Bacon were hardly applicable, since in England any man might be impeached, while in America only civil officers were subject to that proceeding. Mr. Hoar also cited Story on the Constitution as taking the view that an officer might not be impeached after resignation. Mr. J. C. S.

[1] See Record, p. 1426.

Blackburn, of Kentucky, contended, however, that such was not the import of Judge Story's words, and cited, besides the English cases, the Durell case in the Forty-third Congress as justifying the action proposed by the committee.

Debate having been closed by the previous question, the resolutions were agreed to without division.

And thereupon, under authority of the third resolution, the Speaker[1] appointed as a committee Messrs. Hiester Clymer, of Pennsylvania; William M. Robbins, of North Carolina; J. C. S. Blackburn, of Kentucky; Lyman K. Bass, of New York, and Lorenzo Danford, of Ohio.

These gentlemen were the members of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, and a portion of them represented the minority party in the House.

Ceremonies and forms of presenting the impeachment of Secretary Belknap at the bar of the Senate.

Having carried the impeachment of Secretary Belknap to the Senate, the committee returned and reported verbally to the House.

Forms of resolutions in the Senate providing for taking order on the impeachment of Secretary Belknap.

The message informing the Senate that a committee would impeach Secretary Belknap at the bar of the Senate included the names of the committee.

On March 3,[2] in the Senate, the following message was received from the House of Representatives at 12 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m., by the hands of Mr. Green Adams, its Chief Clerk:

Mr. President, the House of Representatives has passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That a committee of five Members of this House be appointed and instructed to proceed immediately to the bar of the Senate, and there impeach William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States of America, of high crimes and misdemeanors while in office, and to inform that body that formal articles of impeachment will in due time be presented, and to request the Senate to take such order in the premises as they may deem appropriate."

And it has

"Ordered, That Messrs. Hiester Clymer, of Pennsylvania; W. M. Robbins, of North Carolina; J. C. S. Blackburn, of Kentucky; L. K. Bass, of New York, and Lorenzo Danford, of Ohio, be the committee aforesaid."

At 1 o'clock p. m. the Sergeant-at-Arms announced the committee from the House of Representatives, who appeared at the bar of the Senate.

The committee advanced to the area in front of the Chair, when

Mr. Clymer said:

Mr. President, in obedience to the order of the House of Representatives we appear before you, and, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States of America, we do impeach William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors while in office; and we further inform the Senate that the House of Representatives will in due time exhibit articles of impeachment against him, and make good the same. And in their name we demand that the Senate shall take order for the appearance of the said William W. Belknap to answer said impeachment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore.[1] Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee of the House of Representatives, the Senate will take order in the premises.

The committee thereupon withdrew.

Thereupon Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, following the usual precedents, offered this order, which was agreed to:

Ordered, That the message of the House of Representatives relating to the impeachment of William W. Belknap be referred to a select committee to consist of five Senators.

The President pro tempore, by authorization of the Senate, appointed the following committee: Messrs. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont; Roscoe Conkling, of New York; Frederick T. Frelinghuysen, of New Jersey; Allen G. Thurman, of Ohio, and John W. Stevenson, of Kentucky.

Meanwhile the committee on the part of the House had returned to the Hall of Representatives, and Mr. Clymer reported[2] verbally—that, in obedience to the order of the House, the committee proceeded to the bar of the Senate and, in the name of this body and of all the people of the United States, impeached William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, of high crimes and misdemeanors in office, and demanded that the Senate shall take order to make him appear before that body and answer for the same, and stated that the House would in due time present articles of impeachment and make them good; to which the response was, "Order shall be taken."

On March 6,[3] in the Senate, Mr. Edmunds reported from the select committee the following orders, which were agreed to without division:

Whereas the House of Representatives on the 3d day of March, 1876, by five of its Members, Messrs. Clymer, Robbins, Blackburn, Bass, and Danford, at the bar of the Senate, impeached William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, of high crimes and misdemeanors, and informed the Senate that the House of Representatives will in due time exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him, and make good the same; and likewise demanded that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said William W. Belknap to answer the said impeachment: Therefore,

Ordered, That the Senate will, according to its standing rules and orders in such cases provided, take proper order thereon (upon the presentation of articles of impeachment), of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives herewith.

In the Belknap case the committee in drawing up articles needed certain special powers as to witnesses.

Discussion of the law giving immunity to witnesses testifying before committees of the House.

On March 8[4] Mr. J. Proctor Knott, of Kentucky, from the Committee on the Judiciary, who had been directed to report articles of impeachment on the evidence referred to them, submitted the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary would respectfully report that, in pursuance of the instructions of the House, they have prepared articles of impeachment against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, for high crimes and misdemeanors in office, but that, since preparing the same, they have been informed and believe that Caleb P. Marsh, upon whose testimony before the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, and referred to them by the House, said articles were framed, has gone beyond the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States, and that probably his attendance as a witness before the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment can not be procured; and that they are also informed and believe that other evidence may be procured sufficient to convict said William W. Belknap of high crimes and misdemeanors in office as Secretary of War. They therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the resolution instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to prepare articles of impeachment against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, for high crimes and misdemeanors in office, be recommitted to said committee with power to take further proof, to send for persons and papers, to sit during the sessions of the House, and to report at any time."

Your committee, impressed with the importance of securing the fullest indemnity to such witnesses as may be required to testify in behalf of the Government before either House of Congress, or any committee of either House, or before the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment, would also recommend the immediate passage of the accompanying bill, entitled "A bill to protect witnesses who shall be required to testify in certain cases." They would further recommend that the accompanying bill, entitled "A bill in relation to witnesses," be introduced, printed, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with leave to report thereon at any time.

In the course of the debate it was urged that so grave a proceeding as the presentation of articles of impeachment should not be undertaken on the testimony of a single witness when, by greater deliberation, other testimony might be procured.

The resolution was agreed to without division.

Immediately thereafter[1] Mr. Knott called up the bill referred to in the report:

A bill (H. R. No. 2572) to protect witnesses who shall be required to testify in certain cases.

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever any person shall be required to testify against his protest before either House of Congress or any committee thereof, or the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment, and shall so testify under protest, he shall not thereafter be held to answer criminally in any court of justice, or subject to any penalty or forfeiture, on account of any fact or act concerning which he shall be so required to testify: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to relieve any person from liability to impeachment.

Mr. Knott explained that this provision was necessary because the existing law, section 859 of the Revised Statutes, giving indemnity to witnesses, did not go far enough. A witness might decline to answer on the ground that his answer might uncover other evidence which would incriminate him.

After debate the bill was passed, yeas 206, nays 8.

In the Senate on April 11[2] the bill was reported adversely and did not become a law.

The articles impeaching Secretary Belknap were considered in the House and agreed to without amendment.

The House decided to appoint the managers of the Belknap impeachment by resolution instead of by ballot.

One of the managers of the Belknap impeachment being excused, the House chose another.

The minority party were represented among the managers of the Belknap impeachment.

On March 30,[1] in the House, Mr. Knott, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted a report, consisting of articles of impeachment (not accompanied by testimony) and a resolution. The articles appear in full in the House Journal. The resolution:

Resolved, That seven managers be appointed by ballot to conduct the impeachment exhibited against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War of the United States.

On April 3[2] the report on the articles of impeachment was called up in the House:

The Committee on the Judiciary, having had under consideration the resolution of the House directing them to prepare and report articles in support of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, for high crimes and misdemeanors in office, respectfully report the following articles and accompanying resolutions for the action of the House:

"Resolved, That the following articles be adopted and presented to the Senate in maintenance and support of the impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors in office of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War:" [Here followed the articles.]

These articles were considered in the House without any question being raised as to the propriety of considering them in Committee of the Whole. Under operation of the previous question the resolution adopting the articles, with the accompanying articles, was agreed to, a separate vote not being demanded on any article and no proposition to amend being made.

Then the resolution providing for the appointment of seven managers by ballot was considered, and Mr. Hiester Clymer proposed the following amendment in the nature of a substitute:

Strike out all after the word "resolved" and insert:

That Messrs. J. Proctor Knott, of Kentucky; Scott Lord, of New York; William P. Lynde, of Wisconsin; John A. McMahon, of Ohio; George A. Jenks, of Pennsylvania; William A. Wheeler, of New York; and George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, be, and they are hereby, appointed managers on the part of this House to conduct the impeachment exhibited against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to, and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

Thereupon Mr. Wheeler, of New York, asked to be excused from service, and the request was granted by the House.

Mr. Elbridge G. Lapham, of New York, was nominated to fill the vacancy, whereupon Mr. Eppa Hunton, of Virginia, expressed the opinion that the managers should be in accord with the sentiments of the House on the question, and asked if Mr. Lapham was thus qualified. Mr. Fernando Wood, of New York, said that in selecting managers they had not gone into any very severe examination of qualifications, assuming that they would represent the House in the opinions which it had expressed unanimously. Without further objection Mr. Lapham was chosen by the House as a manager.

Then, at the request of Mr. Knott, the name of Mr. Lord was placed at the head of the list of managers.

Of the managers, as thus chosen, the first five were Members of the majority party in the House and the remaining two were Members of the minority party.

On motion of Mr. Clymer the following resolutions were agreed to:

Resolved, That the articles agreed to by this House to be exhibited in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, in maintenance of their impeachment against him of high crimes and misdemeanors in office be carried to the Senate by the managers appointed to conduct said impeachment.

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House have appointed Mr. Scott Lord, of New York; Mr. J. Proctor Knott, of Kentucky; Mr. William P. Lynde, of Wisconsin; Mr. John A. McMahon, of Ohio; Mr. George A. Jenks, of Pennsylvania; Mr. Elbridge G. Lapham, of New York; and Mr. George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, managers to conduct the impeachment against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, and have directed the said managers to carry to the Senate the articles agreed upon by this House to be exhibited in maintenance of their impeachment against said William W. Belknap, and that the Clerk of the House do go with said message.

As first offered, the second resolution did not contain the names of the managers; but Mr. James A. Garfield, of Ohio, suggested that inasmuch as the Senate was always informed of the names of the managers of a conference, it seemed right that they should be similarly informed in this far more important proceeding. So the names were included.

The chairman of the managers having read the articles impeaching Secretary Belknap, laid them on the table of the Senate.

Having presented in the Senate the articles impeaching Secretary Belknap, the managers reported verbally in the House.

On April 3,[1] in the Senate, Mr. George M. Adams, Clerk of the House of Representatives, appeared at the bar of the Senate and said:

Mr. President, I am directed to inform the Senate that the House of Representatives has passed the following resolutions: [Here followed the resolutions.]

The President pro tempore said:

The Secretary will inform the House of Representatives that the Senate will receive the managers for the purpose of exhibiting articles of impeachment agreeably to notice received.

[1] Senate Journal, p. 378; Record, p. 2155.

The Clerk of the House thereupon withdrew.

On April 4,[1] in the House, the Secretary of the Senate delivered this message:

I am directed to inform the House that the Senate is ready to receive the managers appointed by the House of Representatives to carry to the Senate articles of impeachment against William W. Belknap, Secretary of War.

Soon after the receipt of this message Mr. Manager Lord, rising to a question of privilege,[2] asked if it was the wish of the House to accompany the managers in the presentation of the articles of impeachment. It was recalled that in the cases of Judge Humphreys and President Johnson the House had accompanied the managers; but, on the other hand, it was pointed out that the message of the Senate referred only to the managers. No proposition that the House attend was made and the matter dropped.

Soon after, in the Senate,[3] the managers of the impeachment on the part of the House of Representatives appeared at the bar (at 1 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) and their presence was announced by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The managers on the part of the House of Representatives are admitted and the Sergeant-at-Arms will conduct them to seats provided for them within the bar of the Senate.

The managers were thereupon escorted by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate to the seats assigned to them in the area in front of the Chair.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President, the managers on the part of the House of Representatives are ready to exhibit on the part of the House articles of impeachment against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will make proclamation.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. Hear ye, hear ye, hear ye. All persons are commanded to keep silence, on pain of imprisonment, while the House of Representatives is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States articles of impeachment against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

Mr. Manager Lord rose and read the articles of impeachment,[4] as follows:

Articles exhibited by the House of Representatives of the United States of America in the names of themselves and of all the people of the United States of America, against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, in maintenance and support of their impeachment against him for high crimes and misdemeanors while in said office.

ARTICLE I.

That William W. Belknap, while he was in office as Secretary of War of the United States of America, to wit, on the 8th day of October, 1870, had the power and authority, under the laws of the United States, as Secretary of War, as aforesaid, to appoint a person to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill, a military post of the United States; that said Belknap, as Secretary of War, as aforesaid, on the day and year aforesaid, promised to appoint one Caleb P. Marsh to maintain said trading establishment at said military post; that thereafter, to wit, on the day and year aforesaid, the said Caleb P. Marsh and one John S. Evans entered into an agreement in writing substantially as follows, to wit:

Articles of agreement made and entered into this 8th day of October, A. D. 1870, by and between John S. Evans, of Fort Sill, Indian Territory, United States of America, of the first part, and Caleb P. Marsh, of No. 51 West Thirty-fifth street, of the city, county, and State of New York, of the second part, witnesseth, namely:

"Whereas the said Caleb P. Marsh has received from Gen. William W. Belknap, Secretary of War of the United States, the appointment of posttrader at Fort Sill, aforesaid; and whereas the name of said John S. Evans is to be filled into the commission of appointment of said posttrader at Fort Sill, aforesaid, by permission and at the instance and request of said Caleb P. Marsh and for the purpose of carrying out the terms of this agreement; and whereas said John S. Evans is to hold said position of posttrader, as aforesaid, solely as the appointee of said Caleb P. Marsh and for the purposes hereinafter stated:

"Now, therefore, said John S. Evans, in consideration of said appointment and the sum of $1 to him in hand paid by said Caleb P. Marsh, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, hereby covenants and agrees to pay to said Caleb P. Marsh the sum of $12,000 annually, payable quarterly in advance, in the city of New York, aforesaid; said sum to be so payable during the first year of this agreement absolutely and under all circumstances, anything hereinafter contained to the contrary notwithstanding; and thereafter said sum shall be so payable, unless increased or reduced in amount, in accordance with the subsequent provisions of this agreement.

"In consideration of the premises, it is mutually agreed between the parties aforesaid as follows, namely:

"First. This agreement is made on the basis of seven cavalry companies of the United States Army, which are now stationed at Fort Sill aforesaid.

"Second. If at the end of the first year of this agreement the forces of the United States Army stationed at Fort Sill, aforesaid, shall be increased or diminished not to exceed one hundred men, then this agreement shall remain in full force and unchanged for the next year. If, however, the said forces shall be increased or diminished beyond the number of one hundred men, then the amount to be paid under this agreement by said John S. Evans to said Caleb P. Marsh shall be increased or reduced in accordance therewith and in proper proportion thereto. The above rule laid down for the continuation of this agreement at the close of the first year thereof shall be applied at the close of each succeeding year so long as this agreement shall remain in force and effect.

"Third. This agreement shall remain in force and effect so long as said Caleb P. Marsh shall hold or control, directly or indirectly, the appointment and position of posttrader at Fort Sill, aforesaid.

"Fourth. This agreement shall take effect from the date and day the Secretary of War, aforesaid, shall sign the commission of posttrader at Fort Sill, aforesaid, said commission to be issued to said John S. Evans at the instance and request of said Caleb P. Marsh and solely for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this agreement.

"Fifth. Exception is hereby made in regard to the first quarterly payment under this agreement, it being agreed and understood that the same may be paid at any time within the next thirty days after the said Secretory of War shall sign the aforesaid commission of posttrader at Fort Sill.

"Sixth. Said Caleb P. Marsh is at all times, at the request of said John S. Evans, to use any proper influence he may have with said Secretary of War for the protection of said John S. Evans while in the discharge of his legitimate duties in the conduct of the business as posttrader at Fort Sill, aforesaid.

"Seventh. Said John S. Evans is to conduct the said business of posttrader at Fort Sill, aforesaid, solely on his own responsibility and in his own name, it being expressly agreed and understood that said Caleb P. Marsh shall assume no liability in the premises whatever.

"Eighth. And it is expressly understood and agreed that the stipulations and covenants aforesaid are to apply to and bind the heirs, executors, and administrators of the respective parties.

"In witness whereof the parties to these presents have hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written.

"C. P. MARSH. [SEAL.]

"Signed, sealed, and delivered in presence of—
"E. T. BARTLETT."

That thereafter, to wit, on the 10th day of October, 1870, said Belknap, as Secretary of War, aforesaid, did, at the instance and request of said Marsh, at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, appoint said John S. Evans to maintain said trading establishment at Fort Sill, the military post aforesaid, and in consideration of said appointment of said Evans, so made by him as Secretary of War, as aforesaid, the said Belknap did, on or about the 2d day of November, 1870, unlawfully and corruptly receive from said Caleb P. Marsh the sum of $1,500, and that at divers times thereafter, to wit, on or about the 17th of January, 1871, and at or about the end of each three months during the term of one whole year, the said William W. Belknap, while still in office as Secretary of War, as aforesaid, did unlawfully receive from said Caleb P. Marsh like sums of $1,500, in consideration of the appointment of the said John S. Evans by him, the said Belknap, as Secretary of War, as aforesaid, and in consideration of his permitting said Evans to continue to maintain the said trading establishment at said military post during that time; whereby the said William W. Belknap, who was then Secretary of War, as aforesaid, was guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in office.

ARTICLE II.

That said William W. Belknap, while he was in office as Secretary of War of the United States of America, did, at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, on the 4th day of November, 1873, willfully, corruptly, and unlawfully take and receive from one Caleb P. Marsh the sum of $1,500, in consideration that he would continue to permit one John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill, a military post of the United States, which said establishment said Belknap, as Secretary of War, as aforesaid, was authorized by law to permit to be maintained at said military post, and which the said Evans had been before that time appointed by said Belknap to maintain; and that said Belknap, as Secretary of War, as aforesaid, for said consideration, did corruptly permit the said Evans to continue to maintain the said trading establishment at said military post. And so the said Belknap was thereby guilty, while he was Secretary of War, of a high misdemeanor in his said office.

ARTICLE III.

That said William W. Belknap was Secretary of War of the United States of America before and during the month of October, 1870, and continued in office as such Secretary of War until the 2d day of March, 1876; that as Secretary of War as aforesaid said Belknap had authority, under the laws of the United States, to appoint a person to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill, a military post of the United States, not in the vicinity of any city or town; that on the 10th day of October, 1870, said Belknap, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, did, at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, appoint one John S. Evans to maintain said trading establishment at said military post; and that said John S. Evans, by virtue of said appointment, has since, till the 2d day of March, 1876, maintained a trading establishment at said military post, and that said Evans, on the 8th day of October, 1870, before he was so appointed to maintain said trading establishment as aforesaid, and in order to procure said appointment and to be continued therein, agreed with one Caleb P. Marsh that, in consideration that said Belknap would appoint him, the said Evans, to maintain said trading establishment at said military post, at the instance and request of said Marsh, he, the said Evans, would pay to him a large sum of money, quarterly, in advance, from the date of his said appointment by said Belknap, to wit, $12,000 during the year immediately following the 10th day of October, 1870, and other large sums of money, quarterly, during each year that he, the said Evans, should be permitted by said Belknap to maintain said trading establishment at said post; that said Evans did pay to said Marsh said sum of money quarterly during each year after his said appointment, until the month of December, 1875, when the last of said payments was made; that said Marsh, upon the receipt of each of said payments, paid one-half thereof to him, the said Belknap. Yet the said Belknap, well knowing these facts, and having the power to remove said Evans from said position at any time, and to appoint some other person to maintain said trading establishment, but criminally disregarding his duty as Secretary of War, and basely prostituting his high office to his lust for private gain, did unlawfully and corruptly continue said Evans in said position and permit him to maintain said establishment at said military post during all of said time, to the great injury and damage of the officers and soldiers of the Army of the United States stationed at said post, as well as of emigrants, freighters, and other citizens of the United States, against public policy, and to the great disgrace and detriment of the public service.

Whereby the said William W. Belknap was, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in office.

ARTICLE IV.

That said William W. Belknap, while he was in office and acting as Secretary of War of the United States of America, did, on the 10th day of October, 1870, in the exercise of the power and authority vested in him as Secretary of War as aforesaid by law, appoint one John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill, a military post of the United States, and he, the said Belknap, did receive, from one Caleb P. Marsh, large sums of money for and in consideration of his having so appointed said John S. Evans to maintain said trading establishment at said military post, and for continuing him therein, whereby he has been guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in his said office.

Specification 1.—On or about the 2d day of November, 1870, said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and for continuing him therein.

Specification 2.—On or about the 17th day of January, 1871, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and for continuing him therein.

Specification 3.—On or about the 18th day of April, 1871, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 4.—On or about the 25th day of July, 1871, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 5.—On or about the 10th day of November, 1871, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 6.—On or about the 15th day of January, 1872, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 7.—On or about the 13th day of June, 1872, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 8.—On or about the 22d day of November, 1872, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 9.—On or about the 28th day of April, 1873, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,000, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 10.—On or about the 16th day of June, 1873, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,700, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 11.—On or about the 4th day of November, 1873, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 12.—On or about the 22d day of January, 1874, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 13.—On or about the 10th day of April, 1874, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 14.—On or about the 9th day of October, 1874, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 15.—On or about the 24th day of May, 1875, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 16.—On or about the 17th day of November, 1875, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 17.—On or about the 15th day of January, 1876, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $750, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

ARTICLE V.

That one John S. Evans was, on the 10th day of October, in the year 1870, appointed by the said Belknap to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill, a military post on the frontier, not in the vicinity of any city or town, and said Belknap did, from that day continuously to the 2d day of March, 1876, permit said Evans to maintain the same; and said Belknap was induced to make said appointment by the influence and request of one Caleb P. Marsh; and said Evans paid to said Marsh, in consideration of such influence and request and in consideration that he should thereby induce said Belknap to make said appointment, divers large sums of money at various times, amounting to about $12,000 a year from the date of said appointment to the 25th day of March, 1872, and to about $6,000 a year thereafter until the 2d day of March, 1876, all which said Belknap well knew; yet said Belknap did, in consideration that he would permit said Evans to continue to maintain said trading establishment and in order that said payments might continue and be made by said Evans to said Marsh as aforesaid, corruptly receive from said Marsh, either to his, the said Belknap's, own use or to be paid over to the wife of said Belknap, divers large sums of money at various times, namely: The sum of $1,500 on or about the 2d day of November, 1870; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 17th day of January, 1871; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 18th day of April, 1871; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 25th day of July, 1871; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 10th day of November, 1871; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 15th day of January, 1872; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 13th day of June, 1872; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 22d day of November, 1872; the sum of $1,000 on or about the 28th day of April, 1873; the sum of $1,700 on or about the 16th day of June, 1873; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 4th day of November, 1873; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 22d day of January, 1874; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 10th day of April, 1874; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 9th day of October, 1874; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 24th day of May, 1875; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 17th day of November, 1875; the sum of $750 on or about the 15th day of January, 1876; all of which acts and doings were while the said Belknap was Secretary of War of the United States, as aforesaid, and were a high misdemeanor in said office.

And the House of Representatives by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any further articles of accusation or impeachment against the said William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War of the United States, and also of replying to his answers which he shall make unto the articles herein preferred against him, and of offering proof to the same and every part thereof, and to all and every other article, accusation, or impeachment which shall be exhibited by them, as the case shall require, do demand that the said William W. Belknap may be put to answer the high crimes and misdemeanors in office herein charged against him, and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments may be thereupon had and given as may be agreeable to law and justice.

MICHAEL C. KERR,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Attest:

GEO. M. ADAMS,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

The reading of the articles of impeachment having been concluded, the President pro tempore informed the managers that the Senate would take proper order on the subject of the impeachment, of which due notice would be given to the House of Representatives.

The managers, by their chairman, Mr. Lord, then delivered the articles of impeachment at the table of the Secretary and withdrew.

Soon thereafter, in the House, the Speaker pro tempore [1] directed that business be suspended to receive a report from the managers on the part of the House of the impeachment of W. W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The managers appeared at the bar, when Mr. Lord said:

Mr. Speaker, the managers of impeachment beg leave to report to the House that the articles of impeachment prepared by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, have been exhibited and read to the Senate, and the Presiding Officer of that body stated to the managers that the Senate would take order in the premises, due notice of which would be given to the House of Representatives.[2]

At the organization of the Senate for the Belknap trial the oath was administered by the Chief Justice.

The Senate organized for the Belknap trial after the articles of impeachment had been presented.

The Senate, having organized for the Belknap trial, informed the House by message.

On April 5,[3] in the Senate, Mr. Edmunds offered this resolution, which was thereupon agreed to:

Ordered, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Chair to wait upon the Chief Justice of the United States and invite him to attend in the Senate Chamber at 1 o'clock p. m. this day, or, in case of his inability to attend, any one of the associate justices.

The Chair thereupon appointed Messrs. Edmunds and Allen G. Thurman, of Ohio, as the committee.

Soon thereafter the following proceedings occurred:

The Chief Justice of the United States, Hon. Morrison R. Waite, entered the Senate Chamber, escorted by Messrs. Edmunds and Thurman, the committee appointed for the purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Senate, according to its rule, will now proceed to the consideration of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War. The Chief Justice will take the seat provided for him at the right of the Chair.

The Chief Justice took a seat by the side of the President pro tempore of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will give attention while the constitutional oath is being administered.

The Chief Justice administered the oath to the President pro tempore, as follows:

[3] Senate Journal, pp. 394, 908, 909; Record, pp. 2212, 2215, 2216.

You do solemnly swear that in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, now pending, you will do impartial justice according to the Constitution and laws. So help you God.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will now call the roll of Senators alphabetically in groups of six, and Senators as they are so called will advance to the desk and take the oath.

After the oaths had been administered Mr. Frederick T. Frelinghuysen, of New Jersey, offered the following, which was agreed to:

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate is now organized for the trial of articles of impeachment against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, and is ready to receive the managers on the part of the House at its bar.

And in obedience thereto the Secretary delivered the following message at the bar of the House:[1]

Mr. Speaker, I am directed to inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is now organized for the trial of articles of impeachment against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, and it is ready to receive the managers of impeachment on the part of the House at its bar.

The House being notified that the Senate was organized for the trial of Secretary Belknap, the managers attended and demanded that process issue.

On the demand of the managers the Senate ordered process to issue against Secretary Belknap, fixing the day of return.

Having demanded of the Senate that process issue against Secretary Belknap, the managers reported verbally to the House.

At 1 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m. the managers of the impeachment on the part of the House of Representatives appeared at the bar and their presence was announced by the Sergeant-at-Arms.[2]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will conduct the managers to the seats provided for them within the bar of the Senate.

The managers were conducted to the seats assigned them within the space in front of the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Gentlemen managers, the Senate is now organized for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

Thereupon Mr. Manager Lord, chairman of the managers, rose and said:

We are instructed by the House of Representatives, as its managers, to demand that the Senate issue process against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War; that he answer at the bar of the Senate the articles of impeachment heretofore exhibited by the House of Representatives, through its managers, before the Senate.

Thereupon Mr. Edmunds offered the following, which was agreed to by the Senate:

Ordered, That a summons be issued, as required by the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting for the trial of impeachment, to William W. Belknap, returnable on Monday, the 17th day of the present month, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon.

[1] House Journal, p. 750; Record, p. 2228.

[2] Senate Journal, p. 909; Record of trial, p. 4.

Thereupon, after a discussion caused by the fact that the rules for impeachment trials provided for the return of the summons at 12.30, while the order just adopted fixed 1 o'clock as the hour, Mr. Edmunds moved that the Senate sitting for the trial of impeachment adjourn to Monday, the 17th instant at 12.30 o'clock. And this motion was agreed to, yeas 38, nays 10.

And thereupon the Senate resumed its legislative session.[1]

In the House meanwhile the managers had returned[2] and reported—that, in answer to the summons from the Senate, they proceeded to its bar, and that the Senate had fixed Monday, the 17th of this month, as the day on which the process against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, shall be returnable.

Ceremonies and forms of the return of the writ of summons against Secretary Belknap.

Secretary Belknap appeared in person and with counsel to answer the articles of impeachment.

The Chief Justice administered the oath to the Sergeant-at-Arms on the return of the writ of summons in the Belknap case.

On April 17[3] the following record appears:

The Chief Justice of the United States entered the Senate Chamber, escorted by Messrs. Edmunds and Thurman, the committee appointed for the purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 12 o'clock and 30 minutes having arrived, in pursuance of rule the legislative and executive business of the Senate will be suspended and the Senate will proceed the consideration of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Chief Justice took a seat by the side of the President pro tempore of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will make the opening proclamation.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. Hear ye, hear ye, hear ye. All persons are commanded to keep silence on pain of imprisonment while the Senate of the United States is sitting for the trial of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will now call the names of those Senators who have not been sworn, and such Senators, as they are called, will advance to the desk and take oath.

Certain Senators having been sworn,

On motion of Mr. Edmunds, it was Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is in its Chamber and ready to proceed with the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, and that seats are provided for the accommodation of the Members.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will invite the House accordingly.

The message was presently delivered[4] in the House of Representatives, where a discussion arose as to whether the House should attend or not, and as to the manner of attendance. Mr. Lord stated that the usual custom had been for the House to go over on the trial, but for some reason the Senate had seen fit to change the custom and invite the House on this day, and it seemed to him that the House should attend in a body, headed by the Speaker. Mr. George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, suggested that an examination of the precedents showed that it would be better to go over as a Committee of the Whole; and on his motion—the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, and proceeded in that capacity of the Senate Chamber.

Meanwhile, at 1 o'clock p. m., William W. Belknap entered the Senate Chamber, accompanied by his counsel, Hon. Jeremiah S. Black, Hon. Montgomery Blair, and Hon. M. H. Carpenter, who were conducted to the seats assigned them in the space in front of the Secretary's desk on the right of the Chair.

At 1 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m., the Sergeant-at-Arms announced the managers on the part of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The managers will be admitted and conducted to seats provided for them within the bar of the Senate.

The managers were conducted to seats provided in the space in front of the Secretary's desk on the left of the Chair, namely: Hon. Scott Lord, of New York; Hon. J. Proctor Knott, of Kentucky; Hon. William P. Lynde, of Wisconsin; Hon. J. A. McMahon, of Ohio; Hon. G. A. Jenks, of Pennsylvania; Hon. E. G. Lapham, of New York, and Hon. George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President, in accordance with the invitation extended, the House of Representatives has resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole and will attend upon this sitting of this court on being waited upon by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will wait upon the House of Representatives and invite them to the Chamber of the Senate.

At 1 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m., the Sergeant-at-Arms announced the presence of the Members of the House of Representatives, who entered the Senate Chamber preceded by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole House (Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania), into which that body had resolved itself to witness the trial, who was accompanied by the Speaker and Clerk of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will now read the minutes of the sitting on Wednesday, the 5th instant.

The Secretary read the Journal of proceedings of the Senate sitting for trial of the impeachment of Wednesday, April 5, 1876.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will now read the return of the Sergeant-at-Arms to the summons directed to be served.

The Secretary read the following return appended to the writ of summons:

The foregoing writ of summons addressed to William W. Belknap and the foregoing precept addressed to me were duly served upon the said William W. Belknap by delivering to and leaving with him true and attested copies of the same at No. 2022 G street, Washington City, the residence of the said William W. Belknap, on Thursday the 6th day of April, 1876, at 6 o'clock and 40 minutes in the afternoon of that day.

JOHN R. FRENCH,
Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that Rule 9 will be suspended for reasons already stated, and the Chief Justice will now administer the oath to the officer attesting the truth of this return.[1]

[1] The Rule No. 9 provided for the administration of the oath by the Presiding Officer, but as a doubt had arisen as to the legal competency of an oath administered by one not especially empowered by statute so to do, the Chief Justice had been invited to attend.

The Chief Justice administered the following oath to the Sergeant-at-Arms:

I, John R. French, do solemnly swear that the return made by me upon the process issued on the 6th day of April, by the Senate of the United States, against W. W. Belknap, is truly made, and that I have performed such service as therein described: So help me God.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee will please escort the Chief Justice to the Supreme Court Room.

The Chief Justice retired, escorted by the committee, Mr. Edmunds and Mr. Thurman.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will now call William W. Belknap, the respondent, to appear and answer the charges of impeachment brought against him.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. William W. Belknap, William W. Belknap, appear and answer the articles of impeachment exhibited against you by the House of Representatives.

William W. Belknap, accompanied by Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, Mr. Jeremiah S. Black, and Mr. Montgomery Blair, as counsel, having appeared at the bar of the Senate, were directed by the Presiding Officer to take the seats assigned them.

The Presiding Officer then informed the respondent that the Senate is now sitting for the trial of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, upon articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives, and will now hear him in answer thereto.

The answer of Secretary Belknap to the articles of impeachment.

The answer of Secretary Belknap demurred to the articles, alleging that he was not a civil officer of the United States when they were exhibited.

Form of announcing the appearance of counsel in the Belknap trial.

The answer of Secretary Belknap being presented, the Senate, on request, ordered a copy of the answer to be furnished to the managers.

The Senate allowed to the House time for preparation of a replication in the Belknap trial, and informed the House thereof by message.

The House determined, after respondent's answer, that it would be represented at the Belknap trial by its managers only.

Whereupon, Mr. Carpenter, of counsel, on behalf of the said William W. Belknap, made answer:

That William W. Belknap a private citizen of the United States and of the State of Iowa, in obedience to the summons of the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment to try the articles presented against him by the House of Representatives of the United States, appears at the bar of the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment and interposes the following plea; which I will ask the Secretary to read and request that it may be filed.

The Secretary read as follows:

In the Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

Upon articles of impeachment of the House of Representatives of the United States of America, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

And the said William W. Belknap, named in the said articles of impeachment, comes here before the honorable the Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment, in his own proper person, and says that this honorable court ought not to have or take further cognizance of the said articles of impeachment exhibited and presented against him by the House of Representatives of the United States, because, he says, that before and at the time when the said House of Representatives ordered and directed that he, the said Belknap, should be impeached at the bar of the Senate, and at the time when the said articles of impeachment were exhibited and presented against him, the said Belknap, by the said House of Representatives, he, the said Belknap, was not, nor hath he since been, nor is he now an officer of the United States; but at the said times was, ever since hath been, and now is a private citizen of the United States and of the State of Iowa; and this he, the said Belknap, is ready to verify; wherefore he prays judgment whether this court can or will take further cognizance of the said articles of impeachment.

WM. W. BELKNAP.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, District of Columbia, ss:

William W. Belknap, being first duly sworn on oath, says that the foregoing plea by him subscribed is true in substance and fact.

WM. W. BELKNAP.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 17th day of April, 1876.

DAVID DAVIS,
Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, Judge Jeremiah S. Black, Hon. Montgomery Blair, and myself also appear as counsel for Mr. Belknap.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will note the appearance of the respondent and the presence of the counsel named.

Mr. Manager Lord thereupon submitted this motion:

The Managers on the part of the House of Representatives request a copy of the plea filed by W. W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, and the House of Representatives desire time until Wednesday, the 19th instant, at 1 o'clock, to consider what replication to make to the plea of the said W. W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

It was ordered accordingly, and the Secretary was directed to notify the House of Representatives thereof.

Thereupon the Senate sitting for the trial adjourned to Wednesday, the 19th instant, at 12.30 o'clock.

The House, in Committee of the Whole House, returned to their Hall—and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. Randall reported that the committee, in pursuance of the order of the House, had attended the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment, in company with the Managers on the part of the House.[1]

Soon thereafter the Secretary of the Senate delivered a message as to the time set for the trial, which message was, on motion of Mr. Hoar, referred to the managers.

Later, on this day, Mr. Randall presented this resolution, which was agreed to without debate or division:[2]

Resolved, That in the future proceedings of the impeachment trial of W. W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, the House appear, in the prosecution of said impeachment before the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment by its managers only.

The replication of the House to the answer of respondent in the Belknap trial.

Forms and ceremonies of presenting in the Senate the replication in the Belknap trial.

The House, in their replication in the Belknap trial, alleged a new matter not set forth in the articles.

In the House, on April 19,[1] Mr. Lord, by direction of the managers, reported the replication, and without debate or division it was—Ordered, That the House adopt the replication to the answer of William W. Belknap, as now submitted by the managers.

Then it was

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate, by the Clerk of the House, informing the Senate that the House of Representatives has adopted a replication to the plea of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him, and that the same will be presented to the Senate by the managers on the part of the House.

This message was presently delivered in the Senate sitting for the impeachment, the sitting having been opened in due form and the respondent and his counsel being present. The managers presently attended and were assigned seats, whereupon, according to the record—[2]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Gentlemen managers. in accordance with the order of the Senate fixing the hour of 1 o'clock as the time at which it will hear you, the Senate is now ready to hear you.

Mr. Manager LORD. Mr. President, the House of Representatives having adopted a replication to the plea of William W. Belknap to the jurisdiction of this court, as advised by the resolution just read, the managers are instructed to present the replication to the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment, and to request that the same may be read by the Secretary and filed among the Senate's papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The replication will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read at follows:

In the Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

The replication of the House of Representatives of the United States in their own behalf, and also in the name of the people of the United States, to the plea of William W. Belknap to the articles of impeachment exhibited by them to the Senate against the said William W. Belknap.

The House of Representatives of the United States, prosecuting, on behalf of themselves and the people of the United States, the articles of impeachment exhibited by them to the Senate of the United States against said William W. Belknap, reply to the plea of said William W. Belknap, and say that the matters alleged in the said plea are not sufficient to exempt the said William W. Belknap from answering the said articles of impeachment, because they say that at the time all the acts charged in said articles of impeachment were done and committed, and thence continuously done, to the 2d day of March, A. D. 1876, the said William W. Belknap was Secretary of War of the United States, as in said articles of impeachment averred, and, therefore, that by the Constitution of the United States the House of Representatives had power to prefer the articles of impeachment, and the Senate have full and the sole power to try the same. Wherefore they demand that the plea aforesaid of the said William W. Belknap be not allowed, but that the said William W. Belknap be required to answer the said articles of impeachment.

[2] Senate Journal, pp. 913, 914; Record of trial, pp. 7, 8.

II.

The House of Representatives of the United States, so prosecuting in behalf of themselves and the people of the United States the said articles of impeachment exhibited by them to the Senate of the United States against the said William W. Belknap, for a second and further replication to the plea of the said William W. Belknap, say that the matters alleged in the said plea are not sufficient to exempt the said William W. Belknap from answering the said articles of impeachment, because they say that at the time of the commission by the said William W. Belknap of the acts and matters set forth in the said articles of impeachment he, said William W. Belknap, was an officer of the United States, as alleged in the said articles of impeachment; and they say that the said William W. Belknap, after the commission of each one of the acts alleged in the said articles, was and continued to be such officer, as alleged in said articles, until and including the 2d day of March, A. D. 1876, and until the House of Representatives, by its proper committee, had completed its investigation of his official conduct as such officer in regard to the matters and things set forth as official misconduct in the said articles, and the said committee was considering the report it should make to the House of Representatives upon the same, the said Belknap being at the time aware of such investigation and of the evidence taken and of such proposed report.

And the House of Representatives further say that, while its said committee was considering and preparing its said report to the House of Representatives recommending the impeachment of the said William W. Belknap for the matters and things set forth in the said articles, the said William W. Belknap, with full knowledge thereof, resigned his position as such officer on the said 2d day of March, A. D. 1876, with intent to evade the proceedings of impeachment against him. And the House of Representatives resolved to impeach the said William W. Belknap for said matters as in said articles set forth on said 2d day of March, A. D. 1876. And the House of Representatives say that by the Constitution of the United States the House of Representatives had power to prefer said articles of impeachment against the said William W. Belknap, and that the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment has full power to try the same.

Wherefore the House of Representatives demand that the plea aforesaid be not allowed, but that the said William W. Belknap be compelled to answer the said articles of impeachment.

MICHAEL C KERR,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Attest:

GEORGE M. ADAMS,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the replication will be filed. The Chair hears none.

2455. Belknap's impeachment continued.

Forms of rejoinder, surrejoinder, and similiter filed in the Belknap trial.

Form of application of respondent for time to prepare a rejoinder in the Belknap trial.

The later pleadings in the Belknap trial were filed with the Secretary of the Senate during a recess of the Senate sitting for the trial.

The surrejoinder of the House of Representatives in the Belknap trial was signed by the Speaker and attested by the Clerk.

Thereupon Mr. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, submitted in writing this motion:

In the Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

Upon articles of impeachment presented by the House of Representatives against the said William W. Belknap.

Mr. President, the respondent asks for copies of the replications this day filed by the managers and asks for time until Monday next to frame pleadings to meet the same.

WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

Mr. Edmunds thereupon proposed an order relating to the filing of a rejoinder which would have required the respondent to file at a time when the Senate would not be sitting for the trial. To this Mr. Carpenter objected, saying that in their pleadings they did not desire to deal with anything less than the court. They could not file with the House of Representatives, because they had no standing there. So, on suggestion of Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, Mr. Edmunds submitted a modified order, which was agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That the respondent file his rejoinder with the Secretary on or before the 24th day of April instant, who shall deliver a copy thereof to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, and that the House of Representatives file their surrejoinder, if any, on or before the 25th day of April instant, a copy of which shall be delivered by the Secretary to the counsel for the respondent.

Ordered, That the trial proceed on the 27th day of April instant, at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes afternoon.

Thereupon the Senate, sitting for the trial, adjourned to April 27.

On April 27 [1] the Senate at the appointed hour discontinued its legislative business and the session for the impeachment proceedings was opened with the usual proclamation by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The managers, and the respondent with his counsel, having attended, the President pro tempore directed the journal of the last session's proceedings to be read.

Then, the journal having been read, the President pro tempore directed the reading of the rejoinder filed by the respondent with the Secretary on the 24th instant under the orders of the Senate of the 19th instant:

In the Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

Upon articles of impeachment of the House of Representatives of the United States of America, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

And the said William W. Belknap saith that the replication of the House of Representatives first above pleaded to the said plea of him, the said Belknap, and the matters therein contained in manner and form as the same are above pleaded and set forth, are not sufficient in law for the said House of Representatives to have or maintain impeachment thereof against him, the said Belknap, and that he, the said Belknap, is not bound by law to answer the same.

And this the said defendant is ready to verify. Wherefore, by reason of the insufficiency of the said replication in this behalf, he, the said Belknap, prays judgment if the said House of Representatives ought to have or maintain this impeachment against him, etc.

WM. W. BELKNAP.

In the Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. WILLIAM W. BELKNAP

Upon articles of impeachment of the House of Representatives of the United States of America, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

And the said William W. Belknap, as to the second replication of the House of Representatives of the United States, secondly above pleaded, saith that the said House of Representatives ought not, by reason of anything in that replication alleged, to have or maintain the said impeachment against him, the said Belknap, because he says that it is not true, as in that replication alleged, that he, the said Belknap, was Secretary of War of the United States from any time until and including the 2d day of March, A. D. 1876, and of this he, the said Belknap, demands trial according to law.

[1] Senate Journal, pp. 915–920; Record of trial, pp. 8–10.

II.

And the said Belknap further saith, as to the said second replication of the House of Representatives of the United States, secondly above pleaded, that the said House of Representatives ought not, by reason of anything in that replication alleged, to have or maintain the said impeachment against him, the said Belknap, because he saith that it is not true, as in that replication alleged, that he, the said Belknap, was Secretary of War until the said House of Representatives, by any committee of the said House raised or instructed for that purpose, or having any authority from the House of Representatives in that behalf, had investigated the official conduct of him, the said Belknap, as Secretary of War, in regard to the matters and things set forth as official misconduct in the said articles of impeachment; and of this he, the said Belknap, demands trial according to law.

III.

And the said Belknap, as to the said second replication of the said House of Representatives of the United States, secondly above pleaded, further saith that the said House of Representatives ought not, by reason of anything in that replication alleged, to have or maintain the said impeachment against him, the said Belknap, because he says that at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, on the 2d day of March, A. D. 1876, at 10 o'clock and 20 minutes in the forenoon of that day, he, the said Belknap, resigned the office of Secretary of War, by written resignation under his hand, addressed and delivered to the President of the United States, and the President of the United States then and there accepted the said resignation, by acceptance in writing under his hand, then and there indorsed upon the said written resignation; so that the said Belknap then and there ceased to be Secretary of War of the United States, and since that time he, the said Belknap, has not been an officer of the United States, but has been a private citizen of the United States and of the State of Iowa, as stated by said Belknap in his said plea; and that at the time he, the said Belknap, resigned as aforesaid, and the said resignation was accepted as aforesaid, the said House of Representatives had not taken any proceeding for the investigation or examination of any of the charges set forth in the said articles of impeachment as official misconduct of him, the said Belknap, as Secretary of War; nor had the said House of Representatives raised any committee of the said House, nor directed nor instructed any committee of the said House, to make inquiry or investigation in that behalf.

And this the said Belknap is ready to verify. Wherefore he prays judgment if the said House of Representatives ought to have or maintain the said impeachment against him, the said Belknap

IV.

And the said Belknap, as to the said second replication of the House of Representatives of the United States, secondly above pleaded, further saith that the said House of Representatives of the United States, by reason of anything in that replication alleged, ought not to have or maintain the said impeachment against him, the said Belknap, because he says that when the said House of Representatives took the first proceeding in relation to the impeachment of him, the said Belknap, and when the matter was first mentioned in the said House—that is, in the afternoon of the 2d day of March, A. D. 1876—the said House of Representatives was fully advised and well knew that he, the said Belknap, had before then resigned the said office of Secretary of War, by resignation in writing, under his hand addressed and delivered to the President of the United States, and that the President of the United States had also before that time, as President as aforesaid, accepted the said written resignation, by acceptance in writing, signed by him and indorsed on the said written resignation, and that he, the said Belknap, was not then an officer of the United States, as the facts were.

And this he, the said Belknap, is ready to verify. Wherefore he prays judgment if the said House of Representatives ought to have or maintain the said impeachment against him, the said Belknap.

V.

And the said Belknap, as to the said second replication of the House of Representatives of the United States, secondly above pleaded, further saith that the said House of Representatives of the United States, by reason of anything in that replication alleged, ought not to have or maintain the said impeachment against him, the said Belknap, because he says that, although true it is that a certain committee of the said House, called the Committee on the Expenditures of the War Department, had been pretending to make some inquiry into or investigation of the matters and things set forth in said articles of impeachment as official misconduct of him, the said Belknap, but without any authority from or direction by the House of Representatives in that behalf, yet he, the said Belknap, says that said committee had not completed its said pretended investigation, but was engaged in the examination of witnesses, when said committee was informed that the said Belknap had resigned as Secretary of War, by resignation in writing, under his hand, addressed and delivered to the President of the United States, and that the President of the United States had accepted the said resignation by acceptance in writing, under his hand, indorsed upon the said written resignation; that said committee received the said information during and before the completion of the said pretended investigation into the alleged facts in that behalf, to wit, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon of the 2d day of March, A. D. 1876, and that thereupon the said committee declared that they, the said committee, had no further duty to perform in the premises.

And this the said Belknap is ready to verify. Wherefore he prays judgment if the said House of Representatives ought to have or maintain the said impeachment against him, the said Belknap.

VI.

And said Belknap, as to said second replication of the House of Representatives of the United States, secondly above pleaded, further saith that the said House of Representatives ought not, by anything in that replication alleged, to have or maintain said impeachment against him, said Belknap, because he says that, although true it is that he did resign his position as Secretary of War on the 2d day of March, A. D. 1876, at 10 o'clock and 20 minutes in the forenoon of that day, at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, by a resignation in writing, under his hand, addressed to and then and there delivered to the President of the United States, and the President of the United States did then and there accept said resignation, by acceptance in writing, under his hand, then and there by him indorsed upon said written resignation, nevertheless it is not true, as alleged in that replication, that he, said Belknap, resigned his said position with intent to "evade" any proceedings of said House of Representatives to impeach him, said Belknap; but, on the contrary thereof, he avers the fact to be that a standing committee of said House, known as the Committee on the Expenditures of the War Department, without any authority from or direction of said House of Representatives to examine, inquire, or investigate in regard to the matters and things set forth in said articles as official misconduct of him, said Belknap, had examined one Marsh, and he had made a statement to said committee, which said statement, if true, would not support articles of impeachment against him, said Belknap, but which said statement was of such a character in respect to other persons, some of whom had been and one of whom was so nearly connected with him, said Belknap, by domestic ties as greatly to afflict him, said Belknap, and make him willing to secure the suppression of so much of said statement as affected such other persons at any cost to himself, therefore he, said Belknap, proposed to said committee that if said committee would suppress that part of said statement which related to said other persons he, said Belknap, though contrary to the truth, would admit the receipt by him, said Belknap, of all the moneys stated by said Marsh to have been received by him from one Evans, mentioned in said statement, and paid over by said Marsh to any other person or persons, but said committee declined to accede to said proposition, and Hon Hiester Clymer, chairman of said committee, then declared to said Belknap that he, said Clymer, should move in the said House of Representatives, upon the statement of said Marsh, for the impeachment of him, said Belknap, unless the said Belknap should resign his position as Secretary of War before noon of the next day, to wit, March the 2d, A. D 1876; and said Belknap regarding this statement of said Clymer, chairman as aforesaid, as an intimation that he, said Belknap, could, by thus resigning, avoid the affliction inseparable from a protracted trial in a forum which would attract the greatest degree of public attention and the humiliation of availing himself of the defense disclosed in said statement itself which would cast blame upon said other persons, he yielded to the suggestion made by said Clymer, chairman as aforesaid, believing that the same was made in good faith by the said Clymer, chairman as aforesaid, and that he, said Belknap, would, by resigning his position as Secretary of War, secure the speedy dismissal of said statement from the public mind, which said statement, though it involved no criminality on his part, was deeply painful to his feelings, and did resign his said position as Secretary of War, as hereinbefore stated, at 10 o'clock and 20 minutes in the forenoon of the 2d day of March, A. D. 1876; and at 11 o'clock in the forenoon of the day and year last aforesaid he, said Belknap, caused said committee to be notified of his said resignation and of the acceptance thereof by the President of the United States as aforesaid; all of which was in pursuance and in consequence of the said suggestion so made by said Clymer; and thereupon said committee declared that they, the said committee, had no further duty to perform in the premises. And he, said Belknap, submits that, while said House of Representatives claims that said Clymer was acting on its behalf in said pretended examination of said Marsh, said House ought, in honor and in law, to be estopped to deny that said Clymer was also acting on behalf of said House in suggesting the resignation of him, said Belknap, as aforesaid, and ought not to be heard to complain of a resignation thus induced.

And this he, the said Belknap, is ready to verify. Wherefore he prays judgment if the said House of Representatives ought to have or maintain the impeachment against him, the said Belknap.

WM. W. BELKNAP.

The President pro tempore then said:

This rejoinder will be considered duly filed, if there be no objection. The Secretary will now read the surrejoinder of the House of Representatives to the rejoinder of William W. Belknap.

The Secretary read as follows:

In the Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

By the House of Representatives of the United States, April 25, 1876.

The House of Representatives of the United States, in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, say that the said first replication to the plea of the said William W. Belknap to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him as aforesaid, and the matters therein contained, in manner and form as the same are above set forth and stated, are sufficient in law for the said House of Representatives to have and maintain the said articles of impeachment against the said William W. Belknap, and that the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment has jurisdiction to hear, try, and determine the same; and the House of Representatives are ready to verify and prove the same, as the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment shall direct and award: Wherefore, inasmuch as the said William W. Belknap hath not answered the said articles of impeachment or in any manner denied the same, the said House of Representatives, for themselves and for all the people of the United States, pray judgment thereon according to law.

II.

And the said House of Representatives as to the first and second subdivisions of the rejoinder to the second replication of the House of Representatives to the plea of the defendant to the said articles of impeachment, wherein the said defendant demands trial according to law, the said House of Representatives, in behalf of themselves and all the people of the United States, do the like; and as to the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth subdivisions of the rejoinder of the said defendant to the said second replication, they say that the said House of Representatives, by reason of anything by the said defendant in the last-named subdivisions of said rejoinder above alleged, ought not to be barred from having and maintaining the said articles of impeachment against the said defendant, because they say that, reserving to themselves all advantage of exception to the insufficiency of the said subdivisions of said rejoinder to said second replication, they deny each and every averment in said several rejoinders to said second replication contained, or either of them, which denies or traverses the acts and intents charged against said defendant in said second replication, and they reaffirm the truth of the matters stated therein; and this the said House of Representatives pray may be inquired of by the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment.

Wherefore the said House of Representatives, in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, pray judgment thereon according to law.

MICHAEL C. KERR,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
GEO. M. ADAMS,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

The President pro tempore said:

The surrejoinder will be considered as duly filed also. The Senate sitting for the trial is now ready to hear the parties.

Mr. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, next closed the issue of fact on the plea to jurisdiction by submitting the following similiter:

In the Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

Upon articles of impeachment of the House of Representatives of the United States of America of high crimes and misdemeanors.

And the said Belknap, as to the surrejoinders of said House of Representatives to the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth rejoinders of the said Belknap to the second replication of said House of Representatives above pleaded, whereof said House of Representatives have demanded trial, the said Belknap doth the like.

WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

Mr. Manager Lord submitted[1] a motion relating to the giving of evidence on questions pertaining to the plea to the jurisdiction and to the carrying on of the trial as to the main issue.

2456. Belknap's impeachment continued.

The Senate declined to grant the motion of the counsel for Belknap that the trial be continued to a later date.

The Senate declined to consult the managers before passing on the application of respondent for a continuance of the Belknap trial.

The Senate in secret session passed on the motion for a continuance in the Belknap trial.

After this motion had been submitted by Mr. Lord, Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, offered[2] this motion:

That the further hearing and trial of this impeachment of William W. Belknap be continued to the first Monday of December next.

In argument in support of this the counsel for the respondent urged that in the existing political excitement a fair trial was not likely to result. The precedents of the Blount and Peck impeachments were cited to justify the postponement.

The Senate having retired for consultation (of which consultation the debates were not public and not reported), Mr. Edmunds moved that the motion for postponement be denied.

Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, moved to amend by substituting the following:

That the President pro tempore ask the managers if they desire to be heard on the pending motion of Mr. Carpenter, of counsel for respondent.

This motion was disagreed to, yeas 28, nays 31.

Mr. Edmunds's motion, that the request for a postponement be not granted, was agreed to, yeas 59, nays 0.

Thereupon the Senate returned to their Chamber and the President pro tempore said:

The Presiding Officer is directed to state to the counsel for the respondent that their motion is denied.

The Senate overruled the motion of the managers that the evidence on the question of the jurisdiction of the Senate in the Belknap case be given before the arguments relating thereto.

The Senate determined in the Belknap case to hear first the question of law as to jurisdiction.

The Senate denied the motion of the managers in the Belknap case to fix the time of answer and trial on the merits before decision on the demurrer.

The Senate ordered a discussion in argument on the right of the House to allege in the replication matters not touched in the articles.

References to American and English precedents in determining order of deciding the question of jurisdiction in the Belknap case.

The Senate in secret session determined on the time of having the arguments as to jurisdiction in the Belknap trial.

Thereupon the motion proposed previously by Mr. Manager Lord was taken up.[1]

In the Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

On motion of the managers,

Ordered, That the evidence on the questions pertaining to the plea to the jurisdiction of this court be given before the arguments relating thereto are heard, and if such plea is overruled that the defendant be required to answer the articles of impeachment within two days, and the House of Representatives to reply if they deem it necessary within two days; and that the trial proceed on the next day after the joining of issue.

In support of this Mr. Manager Lord argued:

With the permission of the court, Mr. President, I will give the following reasons why we think this order should be entered:

All of the issues of law and fact relate to the question of jurisdiction. It is but a single question, upon which the Senate can make but one decision, and the facts pertaining thereto should be proved before the arguments, so that the questions of law and of fact may be considered and decided at the same time. This is the course in all legal tribunals in which questions of law and fact are decided by the same judge or judges.

Now let me refer to some authorities on this point:

"In cases where the jury are to decide on both the law and the fact a general verdict may be rendered on the whole matter." (Starkie's Law of Libel, p. 203.)

In the case of Baylis v. Laurance (11 Adolphus and Ellis, 920), referred to by Starkie on the same page, it was held that the law was the same in regard to both civil and criminal cases.

The same author, page 580, states:

"A jury sworn to try the issue may give the general verdict of guilty or not guilty upon the whole matter put in issue, * * * and shall not be required or directed by the court or judge * * * to find the defendant or defendants guilty merely on the proof of the publication."

When by the Constitution the sole power to try impeachments was conferred upon the Senate without any direction as to the mode of procedure, it must have been intended that the rules governing the House of Lords when sitting as a court of impeachment, so far as applicable, should control the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment.

Mr. Erskine, before the Court of King's Bench, in the case of the Dean of Asaph, in regard to the abolition of the king's court and the distribution of its powers, says:

[1] Senate Journal, pp. 920–926; Record of trial, pp. 9, 10, 15–19.

"The barons preserved that supreme superintending jurisdiction which never belonged to the justices, but to themselves only as the jurors in the king's court."

And in a note to his argument found in Goodrich's British Eloquence, page 659, it is said:

"During a trial before the House of Peers every peer present on the trial has always been judge both of the law and the fact; hence no special verdict can be given on the trial of a peer."

Bouvier, in his Law Dictionary, volume 2, page 540, says:

"A special verdict is one by which the facts of the case are put on the record and the law is submitted to the judges."

See also Bacon's Abridgment, Verdict, D, A.

A special finding or verdict is therefore only necessary when the questions of fact are found in one tribunal and the law is applied by another.

But there is a direct authority on this question from a court of impeachment only second in dignity to this high tribunal. The court of impeachment of the State of New York is composed of the president of the senate, who is the lieutenant-governor, of the senators, and of the judges of the court of appeals. In the case of the People of the State of New York against George G. Barnard, then one of the justices of the supreme court (see vol. 1, pp. 106–108), the respondent interposed a plea to the jurisdiction on the ground that the articles of impeachment were not adopted by the assembly by a vote of the majority of all the members elected thereto, as required by the constitution. A replication to the plea was filed that the assembly did impeach the respondent by a vote of a majority of all the members elected thereto. Witnesses were then examined in regard to this question on both sides; counsel were heard for the respondent in support of the plea, and for the prosecution in opposition; after which the president stated that the question before the court was whether the plea of the respondent should be sustained. Upon the decision not to sustain the plea replications were filed, and the trial on the merits proceeded.

This precedent sustains the motion in this case more fully for the reason that the respondent in that case more than a month before he interposed the plea to the jurisdiction had pleaded to the merits by filing a general answer denying each and every allegation in the articles of impeachment; but discovering a month afterwirds, as he thought, that the articles of impeachment had not been properly presented, on the ground that a majority of the members elected to the assembly had not concurred therein, he put in a plea to the jurisdiction, and the proceedings were had which I have already stated.

Therefore we submit to this honorable court that the managers, by asking the entry of this order, have suggested the proper method of trial.

In opposition, on April 28, Mr. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, argued:

The first part of this order, "That the evidence on the questions pertaining to the plea to the jurisdiction of this court be given before the arguments relating thereto are heard," we have no objection to. It is a matter of total indifference to us what is the order which the Senate may make in that particular. Whether the testimony shall be taken and the argument on the facts and the law in regard to the jurisdiction of the court be heard together, or whether they shall be proceeded with at different times is a matter of indifference to us.

To the residue of the order, however, we do seriously object, upon several grounds. In the first place, we object to the managers controlling this case on both sides. We are perfectly willing that they should ask such orders as they please for their own government and their own pleadings; but we object to their fixing or asking any order in regard to our pleadings. This part of the order is:

"And if such plea is overruled, that the defendant be required to answer the articles of impeachment within two days."

I suppose that means answer the articles on the merits.

"And the House of Representatives to reply, if they deem it necessary, within two days; and that the trial proceed on the next day after the joining of issue."

I submit to this honorable court that a proper reply to the managers of the House in regard to this part of the proposed order would be the famous reply which Coke made to the King: "When the question arises and is debated, I will do what is fit and proper for a judge to do; and further, I decline to pledge myself to Your Majesty." When this plea to the jurisdiction shall be disposed of, the defendant may demur to the articles of impeachment, or may not, as he shall be advised; and what will be the circumstances of this court, or of the counsel, or even of the managers, who, although numerous, are not incorporated and are still mortal, this court can not to-day determine. They may not want to make their reply to whatever we may say so speedily as they now think.

In the next place, if the court please, while, as I say, we shall not attempt to make any delays in this case beyond what are absolutely necessary, the argument of the question of the jurisdiction of this court can not be made properly on the day indicated in this order.

Mr. Carpenter then gave reasons, such as the preoccupation of counsel in other duties, the difficulty in getting books of authority, etc., to show why the arguments should be delayed.

Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, proposed the following:

Ordered, That the Senate proceed first to hear and determine the question whether W. W. Belknap, the respondent, is amenable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office. The motion that testimony be heard touching the exact time of such resignation, and touching the motive and purpose of such resignation, is reserved without prejudice till the question above stated has been considered.

In opposition to the resolution proposed by Mr. Conkling, Mr. Manager Lord argued:

Mr. President and Senators: It seems to me that under the authorities adduced yesterday such a course of procedure would be protracting the trial and entirely unnecessary. Several authorities were produced yesterday to show that a special finding or verdict is only necessary when the questions of fact are found in one tribunal and the law is applied by another. This question of jurisdiction is a single question, and it ought not to be divided and subdivided. The evidence should be in before the judgment of the court is taken on the question of jurisdiction; and this I understand the other side concede. Very great embarrassment might arise; very great delays might ensue from dividing this question. I cited yesterday an authority in the State of New York, to which I will again call the attention of the Senators—the Barnard case.

The court of impeachment in that State, composed of the president of the senate, the lieutenant-governor, the senators, and the judges of the court of appeals, had precisely this question before them. A plea to the jurisdiction was interposed, as follows:

"And the said respondent, in his own proper person and by his counsel, John H. Reynolds and William A. Beach, comes and says that this court ought not to have or take further cognizance of the articles of impeachment, or any or either of them, presented in this court against him, because, he says, that the said articles of impeachment were not, nor were any nor was either of them, adopted by the assembly of this State by a vote of a majority of all the members elected thereto, as required by section 1 of article 6 of the constitution of this State."

A replication was put in to that plea, asserting—

"That it is not true that the articles of impeachment now presented against the said respondent do not appear to be and are not articles of impeachment adopted by the assembly of the State, but that the said articles do appear to be and are articles of impeachment adopted by the said assembly."

Then Edward M. Johnson and Charles R. Dayton were called and sworn on the part of the respondent. Hon. C. P. Vedder and Hon. Thomas G. Alvord were called and sworn on the part of the prosecution, these being respectively members or officers of the house. Counsel then argued the case, Messrs. Beach and Reynolds, of counsel for respondent, and Mr. Van Cott, of counsel for the prosecution.

The president stated that the question before the court was whether the plea of the respondent should be sustained.

Mr. Lewis moved that the chamber be cleared for private consultation.

The president put the question whether the court would agree to said motion, and it was determined in the affirmative.

The president put the question whether the court would sustain said plea of the respondent, and it was determined in the negative, as follows:

Chief Judge Church, of the court of appeals; Judge Allen, also of the court of appeals, and Senator Murphy in that case voted in the affirmative; the other Senators in the negative. I refer to this case of The People v. Barnard to show that in a court of impeachment composed of the senators of the State of New York and the judges of the court of appeals of that State the precise order was taken for which we move; the evidence was in before the question of jurisdiction was passed upon. Why should we be driven to one single question when there are three or four, and all of them, I apprehend, exceedingly important questions in this case? Perhaps in one view it may be the question of the case whether the defendant resigned for the purpose of evading this impeachment. Why should we try one question at one time and try another question at another time?

Mr. Carpenter argued for the respondent:

Mr. President and Senators, the pleadings proper in this case consist of the articles of impeachment, the plea to the jurisdiction, and the first replication of the House of Representatives, to which there is a demurrer by us and a joinder by the managers. Strictly speaking, that is the only issue that could be made in this case. The honorable managers, however, saw fit, without asking leave, to file two replications, instead of one, to our plea. We of course did not care how fully they went into this question; we were ready to follow them in disregard of technical pleading.

I never heard of a case in a court where a single plea had led to an issue of law and fact or where a declaration or any proceeding whatever was followed by two issues, one of law and one of fact, that the court did not always first dispose of the question of law. That being disposed of, the question of fact may or may not be necessary to be inquired into. While on the part of Mr. Belknap we make no objection to this proceeding, its regularity is a question for the court to determine. It seems to me that the more regular proceeding is that indicated by the order offered by the Senator from New York, that the law of this question should be first settled. If we had been captious about pleading, and had moved the court to strike out this second replication, which is drawn not according to common-law form, but according to the free-and-easy style of the New York code, this court would have stricken it out as having been improperly filed, permission not having been granted to reply double. We did not object because we did not care for forms, and we followed them after their kind in our reply to their pleas. But certainly the course most in harmony with the method pursued in courts of law would be to settle the law upon this point first. If the Senate has no jurisdiction over a man who is not in office at the time the impeachment commences, that ends the question. That is a mere question of law; and we shall contend, of course, that any officer of the Government has a perfect right to resign at any moment and that the motives of a man's resignation can not affect the legal consequences which follow the act of resignation. The Supreme Court of the United States has held where a citizen who wishes to have a litigation with a citizen of his own State moves into another State for the express purpose of giving the Federal courts jurisdiction, that is no objection to the jurisdiction; that a man may change his residence from one State to another for the purpose of obtaining a footing in a Federal court, as well as he may change it for the purpose of improving his health or his financial condition.

I do not regard the issues made as of any substantial consequence to this case. We care nothing about them. We are willing to try them or not try them, as the court directs. But the question is whether this man was in office at the time he was impeached by the House of Representatives? That is fully presented by the articles, by our plea to the jurisdiction, and by the first, which is the only regular, replication on the part of the House and our demurrer thereto. If the Senate shall be of opinion that none but a person in office can be impeached, of course that ends this proceeding. At all events, the method suggested by the order last offered is the method which should be pursued in a court of law. It will be borne in mind that we interposed the first demurrer, and are therefore entitled to open and close in the argument.

The Senate having retired for consultation (of which the proceedings, but not the debates, are reported in the Journal and record of trial), consideration was first given to a motion by Mr. Edmunds to strike out the second sentence of the pending order and insert:

And that the managers and counsel in such argument discuss the question whether the issues of fact are material.

Mr. Allen G. Thurman, of Ohio, moved the following amendment, which was agreed to:

Add to the words proposed by Mr. Edmunds to be inserted the following:

And whether the matters in support of the jurisdiction alleged by the House of Representatives in the pleadings subsequent to the articles of impeachment can be thus alleged if the same are not averred in said articles.

Then Mr. Edmunds's motion, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. Thurman moved further to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved" and in lieu thereof inserting:

That the Senate will first hear the evidence on the issues of fact relating to the question of jurisdiction, and after hearing the same will fix a time for hearing the argument upon the questions of law and fact relating to such jurisdiction.

The amendment was rejected.

Thereupon Mr. Conkling's resolution, as amended, was agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That the Senate proceed first to hear and determine the question whether W. W. Belknap, the respondent, is amenable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office; and that the managers and counsel in such argument discuss the question whether the issues of fact are material, and whether the matters in support of the jurisdiction alleged by the House of Representatives in the pleadings subsequent to the articles of impeachment can be thus alleged if the same are not averred in said articles.

2458. Belknap's trial continued.

The Senate by rule determined the order and time of arguments, and the numbers of counsel and managers to speak, on the plea to jurisdiction in the Belknap trial.

Thereupon Mr. Edmunds moved the following:

Ordered, That the hearing proceed on the 4th day of May, 1876; and that three of the managers and three of the counsel for the respondent be heard thereon, as follows: One counsel for the respondent shall open and shall be followed by one manager, and he shall be followed by one counsel for the respondent, who shall be followed by two managers, and one counsel for the respondent shall close the argument; and that such time be allowed for argument as the managers and counsel may desire.

Motions to amend by changing the date from the 4th to the 15th, 16th, and 8th were severally disagreed to, the last-named date, the 8th, being negatived by a vote of yeas 23, nays 32.

Mr. Conkling then moved to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved" and in lieu thereof inserting—

That the hearing proceed on the 4th day of May, 1876, at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.; that the opening and close of the argument be given to the respondent; that three counsel and three managers may be heard in such order as may be agreed upon between themselves, and that such time be allowed for argument as the managers and counsel may desire.

After debate,

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution of Mr. Edmunds, as amended, was then agreed to.

Thereupon the Senate returned to the Senate Chamber and the President pro tempore directed the two orders to be reported.

On May 4,[1] the next session of the Senate sitting for the trial, Mr. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, suggested an adjournment until May 15. Thereupon Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, offered this order:

[1] Senate Journal, pp. 928, 929; Record of trial, pp. 27, 28.

Ordered, That this court adjourn until Monday, May 15, at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m., and that the argument of the question of jurisdiction be confined to eight hours on each side.

Mr. Aaron A. Sargent, of California, moved to amend by striking out that portion of the order limiting the time of the arguments, and the amendment was agreed to, without division. The order as amended was then disagreed to, yeas 21, nays 40.

Thereupon Mr. Sherman offered the following:

Ordered, That this court adjourn until Monday, May 15, at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.; and that the argument of the question of jurisdiction be confined to nine hours on each side, to be divided between them as the managers and counsel may agree.

This order was disagreed to, yeas 22, nays 38.

The arguments thereupon began [1] and continued during May 5 and 6 and for a portion of May 8. Mr. Black, of counsel for the respondent, opened, and was followed by Mr. Manager Lord, who was followed by Mr. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent. Messrs. Managers Knott, Jenks, and Hoar followed Mr. Carpenter, and then Mr. Black closed for the respondent. On May 6 [2] Mr. Manager Knott, after speaking some time, stated that he was unable to proceed further, on account of indisposition, and asked the indulgence of the Senate to conclude his argument on Monday, May 8. This leave was granted; and Mr. Manager Jenks continued the argument on May 6.

The Senate decided that it had jurisdiction to try the Belknap impeachment case, although the respondent had resigned the office.

In the Belknap case the Senate decided that respondent's plea in demurrer was insufficient, and that the articles were sufficient.

While deliberating on the question of jurisdiction in the Belknap case the Senate notified the managers and counsel that their attendance was not required.

In the Belknap trial the Senate declined to permit the debates in secret session to be recorded.

Each Senator was permitted to file a written opinion on the question of jurisdiction in the Belknap trial.

After the conclusion of the arguments, on May 8,[3] it was Ordered, That until further notice the attendance before the Senate, sitting for the trial of the impeachment, of the managers and the respondent will not be required.

Thereupon the Senate adjourned to Monday, May 15.

From May 15 to May 29 [4] the Senate in secret session deliberated on the pending question. The record of the proceedings only appear in the Journal; but none of the speeches are printed. On May 16 [5] Mr. William B. Allison, of Iowa, proposed a motion "that the consultations and opinions expressed in secret session be taken down by the reporters and printed in confidence for the use of Senators;" but on the next day, when the motion was called up, the Senate refused to consider it.

On May 29,[1] on motion of Mr. William Pinkney Whyte, of Maryland, it was Ordered, That each Senator be permitted to file his opinion in writing upon the question of jurisdiction in this case on or before the 1st day of July, 1876, to be printed with the proceedings in the order in which the same shall be delivered, and the opinions pronounced in the Senate shall be printed in the order in which they were so pronounced.

Also the following resolutions, proposed by Mr. Allen G. Thurman, of Ohio, were, after minor amendments, agreed to,[2] the first by a vote of yeas 37, nays 29; the second by a vote of yeas 45, nays 4, and the third by 35 yeas to 22 nays:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate William W. Belknap, the respondent, is amenable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office before he was impeached.

Resolved, That the House of Representatives and the respondent be notified that on Thursday, the 1st day of June, 1876, at 1 o'clock p. m., the Senate will deliver its judgment, in open Senate, on the question of jurisdiction raised by the pleadings, at which time the managers on the part of the House and the respondent are notified to attend.

Resolved, That at the time specified in the foregoing resolution the President of the Senate shall pronounce the judgment of the Senate as follows: "It is ordered by the Senate, sitting for the trial of the articles of impeachment preferred by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, that the demurrer of said William W. Belknap to the replication of the House of Representatives to the plea to the jurisdiction filed by said Belknap be, and the same hereby is, overruled; and, it being the opinion of the Senate that said plea is insufficient in law and that said articles of impeachment are sufficient in law, it is therefore further ordered and adjudged that said plea be, and the same hereby is, overruled and held for naught;" which judgment thus pronounced shall be entered upon the Journal of the Senate sitting as aforesaid.

Before the second resolution was agreed to Mr. Isaac P. Christiancy, of Michigan, proposed the following resolution, but withdrew it after debate:

Whereas the Constitution of the United States provides that no person shall be convicted on impeachment without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present; and whereas more than one-third of all the members of the Senate have already pronounced their conviction that they have no right or power to adjudge or try a citizen holding no public office or trust when impeached by the House of Representatives; and whereas the respondent, W. W. Belknap, was not when impeached an officer, but a private citizen of the United States, and of the State of Iowa; and whereas said Belknap has, since proceedings of impeachment were commenced against him, been indicted and now awaits trial before a judicial court for the same offenses charged in the articles of impeachment, which indictment is pursuant to a statute requiring in case of conviction (in addition to fine and imprisonment) an infliction of the utmost judgment which can follow impeachment in any case, namely, disqualification ever again to hold office:

Resolved, That in view of the foregoing facts it is inexpedient to proceed further in the case.

On June 1,[3] in open session of the Senate, sitting for the trial, the President pro tempore announced the decision on the question of jurisdiction:

On the question of jurisdiction raised by the pleadings in this trial, it is ordered by the Senate sitting for the trial of the articles of impeachment preferred by the House of Representatives against

[2] For the arguments on the questions involved in these resolutions, see section 2007 of this volume.

[3] Senate Journal, p. 947; Record of trial, pp. 158–161.

William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, that the demurrer of said William W. Belknap to the replication of the House of Representatives to the plea to the jurisdiction filed by said Belknap be, and the same hereby is, overruled; and, it being the opinion of the Senate that said plea is insufficient in law and that said articles of impeachment are sufficient in law, it is therefore further ordered and adjudged that said plea be, and the same hereby is, overruled and held for naught.

The question of jurisdiction being settled, the Senate gave Secretary Belknap ten days to answer on the merits.

The Senate provided that in default of answer from respondent on the merits, the Belknap trial should proceed as on a plea of not guilty.

The Senate fixed the time of proceedings with the evidence in the Belknap trial before respondent's answer on the merits.

In the Belknap trial managers and counsel were directed to furnish one another with their lists of witnesses.

Thereupon Mr. William Pinkney Whyte, of Maryland, proposed the following:

Ordered, That W. W. Belknap is hereby ordered to plead further or answer the articles of impeachment within ten days from this date.

Mr. Francis Kernan, a Senator from New York, proposed this amendment:

Resolved, That in default of an answer within ten days by the respondent to the articles of impeachment, the trial shall proceed as on a plea of not guilty.

Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, proposed this:

Ordered, That this court adjourn until Tuesday next, and in the meantime the defendant have leave to plead, answer, or demur herein.

The Senate, sitting for the trial, having adjourned to June 6,[1] on that day[2] the order proposed by Mr. Whyte came up for consideration, and on motion of Mr. Sherman it was amended by striking out the words "is hereby ordered to plead further," and inserting the words "have leave to plead further."

Thereupon, at the suggestion of Mr. Manager Scott Lord, Mr. Allen G. Thurman, a Senator from Ohio, proposed to amend by adding thereto:

And that, in default of an answer to the merits within ten days by respondent to the articles of impeachment, the trial shall proceed as upon a plea of not guilty.

This amendment was agreed to, yeas 35, nays 7.

Thereupon, after further amendment at the suggestion of Mr. Whyte, the order was agreed to by a vote of yeas 33, nays 4, in this form:

Ordered, That W. W. Belknap have leave to answer the articles of impeachment within ten days from this date; and that, in default of an answer to the merits within ten days by respondent to the articles of impeachment, the trial shall proceed as upon a plea of not guilty.

Thereupon Mr. Manager Lord proposed the following:

Resolved, That on the 6th day of July, 1876, the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment will proceed to hear the evidence on the merits in the trial of this case.

---

[1] Senate Journal, pp. 948–951; Record of trial, pp. 162–169.

[2] On this day also counsel for respondent raised a question affecting the recently made decision as to the jurisdiction.

Thereupon several propositions were made as to the time of proceeding with the evidence, the counsel for the respondent asking for a much longer time. Mr. Francis M. Cockrell, of Missouri, proposed June 19 instant [this day being the 6th], but the proposition was disagreed to, yeas 19, nays 27. A proposition made by Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, fixing the date as July 6 was agreed to, yeas 36, nays 9. Then the order was agreed to as follows:

Ordered, That on the 6th of July, 1876, at 1 o'clock p. m., the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment will proceed to hear the evidence on the merits of the trial in this case.

Then it was further

Ordered, That the managers furnish to the defendant, or his counsel, within four days, a list of witnesses, as far as at present known to them, that they intend to call in this case; and that, within four days thereafter, the respondent furnish to the managers a list of witnesses, as far as known, that he intends to summon.

Thereupon the Senate, sitting for the trial, adjourned to June 16, that day being selected in order to provide for the answer, which was to be filed within ten days, if at all.

In the Belknap trial respondent declined to plead on the merits, but filed a protest against the continuance of the trial.

In the Belknap trial the right of the Senate to take jurisdiction by a majority vote was the subject of protest.

A protest filed on behalf of respondent in the Belknap trial was signed by respondent and his counsel.

The Senate, after debate and close division, permitted the filing of a protest by respondent in the Belknap trial.

The Senate considered in secret session the protest of respondent in the Belknap impeachment.

On June 16,[1] Mr. Jeremiah S. Black, of counsel for the respondent, announced that they declined to put in any plea, but asked that this paper be filed:

In the Senate of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

And now, to wit, this 16th day of June, 1876, the said William W. Belknap comes into court, and being called upon to plead further to the said articles of impeachment, doth most humbly and with profoundest respect represent and show to this honorable court that on the 17th day of April last past he did plead to the said articles of impeachment, and in his said plea did allege that at the time when the House of Representatives of the United States ordered the said impeachment, and at the time when the said articles of impeachment were exhibited at the bar of the Senate against him, the said Belknap, he, the said Belknap, was and ever thereafter had been not a public officer of the United States, but a private citizen of the United States and of the State of Iowa; and that the plea aforesaid and all the mat ters and things therein contained were by him, said Belknap, fully verified by proofs, namely, by admissions of the said House of Representatives before said court; and the said Belknap further represents and shows to the court here that the truth and sufficiency of the plea pleaded by him as aforesaid were thereupon debated by the managers of the said House of Representatives and the counsel of this respondent, and thereupon submitted to this court for its determination and judgment thereon; and that such proceedings were thereupon had in this court on that behalf in this cause; that afterwards, to wit, on the

[1] First session Forty-fourth Congress, Senate Journal, pp. 952, 954, 955; Record of trial, pp. 169–173.

29th day of May last past, the members of this court, to wit, the Senators of the United States sitting as a court of impeachment as aforesaid, did severally deliver their several judgments, opinions, and votes on the truth and sufficiency in law of the said plea, when and whereby it was made duly to appear that only thirty-seven Senators concurred in pronouncing said plea insufficient or untrue; whereas twenty-nine Senators sitting in said court, by their opinions and votes, affirmed and declared their opinion to be that said plea was sufficient in law and true in point of fact; so that the said Belknap in fact saith that, on the day and year last aforesaid, twenty-nine Senators sitting in said court declared therein that the said Belknap having ceased to be a public officer of the United States by reason of his resignation of the office of Secretary of War of the United States before proceedings in impeachment were commenced against him by the House of Representatives of the United States, the Senate can not take jurisdiction of this cause; and that seven Senators did not vote upon said question, and only thirty-seven Senators, by their votes, declared their opinion to be that the Senate could take jurisdiction of said cause. And afterwards thirty-seven Senators sitting in said court, and no more, concurred in a resolution declaring that "in the opinion of the Senate William W. Belknap is amenable to trial on impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office," and that twenty-nine of said Senators sitting in said court, by their votes, affirmed and declared their opinion to be to the contrary thereof. And afterwards, on the day and year last aforesaid, it was proposed in said court that the President pro tempore of the said Senate should declare the judgment of the said Senate, sitting as aforesaid, to be that said plea of said respondent should be held for naught, and a vote was taken upon said proposition; and, as said vote showed, two-thirds of the said Senators present did not concur therein; but, on the contrary thereof, only thirty-six Senators did concur therein, and twenty-seven Senators then and there present, and voting on said proposition, did by their votes dissent from and vote against said proposition. All of which appears more fully and at large upon the record of this court in this cause, to which record he, said Belknap, prays leave to refer.

Therefore the said Belknap, referring to the Constitution of the United States, article 1, section 3, clause 6, which provides that "no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the Members present" (meaning on trial on impeachment), avers that his said plea has not been overruled or held for naught by the Senate sitting as aforesaid, no such judgment having been concurred in by two-thirds of the Senators sitting in said court and voting thereon; but, on the contrary thereof, as the vote aforesaid fully shows, the said plea of the said respondent was sustained, and its truth in fact and sufficiency in law duly affirmed by the said Senate sitting as aforesaid, more than one-third of the Senators of said Senate, sitting as aforesaid, having by their votes so declared, to wit, twenty-seven Senators as aforesaid, and said twenty-seven Senators having by their votes declared and affirmed their opinion to be that said plea of said respondent was true in fact, and was sufficient in law to prevent the Senate sitting as aforesaid from taking further cognizance of said articles of impeachment.

Wherefore the respondent avers that he has already been substantially acquitted by the Senate sitting as aforesaid; and that he, the said respondent, is not bound further to answer said articles of impeachment; the said order requiring this respondent to answer over not having been made with the concurrence of two-thirds of the said Senators sitting as aforesaid and voting upon the question of the passage of said order; and said order having been passed with the concurrence only of less than two-thirds of the said Senators sitting as aforesaid and voting on the question of making and passing said order, the said order ought not to have been entered of record as an order of said court of impeachment in this cause; and said order appearing upon the whole record of said cause to be null and void, as an order of said court.

And the said respondent prays the court now here, as he has before formally moved said court, to vacate said order; and the said respondent hereby prays said court that he may be hence dismissed.

WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

MATT. H. CARPENTER,
J. S. BLACK,
MONTGOMERY BLAIR,
Of Counsel for said Respondent.

Mr. George F. Edmunds, a Senator from Vermont, objected to the filing of the paper at present, and Mr. Manager Lord entered a formal objection:

Mr. President and Senators, the objection of the managers to filing this paper is that it is in direct contravention of the order of the Senate, as we view it. The order of the Senate was that on this day the respondent should plead to the merits or that the case should go to trial as upon a plea of not guilty. The Senate have not forgotten that the learned counsel who makes this motion stated distinctly in this tribunal at the last hearing that the question now raised could not be settled until the final determination of the case, for it is utterly impossible to tell at this time what the organization of the Senate will be then. The managers then said, and say now, that on this point we are prepared to argue the question at a proper time, but it seems entirely premature to attempt to argue it now, when it is impossible, as I have already said, to tell what the organization of the Senate will be when the verdict is to be taken. How many it will take to make two-thirds of the Members present at that time it is impossible now to tell; and I repeat the counsel stated emphatically that the question could not be determined until then. He now comes here, declines to plead, and asks that this rather extraordinary paper be filed. And we say there is no precedent for filing it, there is no reason for filing it, and it is a violation of the order of the Senate.

Mr. Montgomery Blair, of counsel for the respondent, said:

We wish a formal paper on the records of this body showing to the Senate and to the country the position and attitude we take upon that subject, and we think that now is the proper time. Of course, we do not say that we stand here to prevent the Senate from proceeding to the trial of the facts. We can not do that, because they have already said—and we take it that what they have said they mean—that, if we do not on this occasion file a plea to the merits of this case, they would proceed and put in a plea of the general issue for us themselves; and we expect that now, as my colleague has said to you. All we ask is that this paper, which states formally the attitude that we hold and shall claim to hold to the end of this trial, shall be noted on the records of this body. I think that any impartial tribunal would grant us that liberty of claiming the right to argue as matter of law that this court has already decided this question in its action upon the special plea heretofore put in. I do not call for any argument from the managers now or at any time hereafter (if they choose to permit it) upon this question.

On June 19,[1] in secret session, Mr. John Sherman, a Senator from Ohio, submitted an order, of which the first portion was as follows:

Ordered, That the paper presented by the defendant on the 16th instant be filed in this cause.

Mr. Allen G. Thurman, of Ohio, moved to amend by inserting after the word "be" the word "not." The amendment was disagreed to, yeas 24, nays 24.

Thereupon the order as proposed by Mr. Sherman was agreed to, yeas 26, nays 24. So the paper was ordered filed.

After settling the question of jurisdiction, the Senate overruled respondent's motion for a continuance of the Belknap trial.

The Senate determined that an impeachment might proceed only while Congress was in session.

On June 17[2] Mr. Black, of counsel for the respondent, proposed this order:

Ordered, That this case be now continued until some convenient day in the month of November

On June 19 the Senate, in secret session, considered the order, and on motion of Mr. Allen G. Thurman, of Ohio, it was, without division, Ordered, That the application of the respondent for postponement of the time for proceeding with trial be overruled.

[1] Senate Journal, pp. 954, 955; Record of trial, pp. 172, 173.
[2] Senate Journal, pp. 952-954, Record of trial, pp. 171, 172.

On June 16[1] Mr. Manager Lord had proposed the following:

Ordered, That the respondent, W. W. Belknap, shall not be allowed to make any further plea or answer to the articles of impeachment preferred against him on the part of the House of Representatives, but that the future proceedings proceed as upon a general plea of not guilty.

But subsequently he modified it to this form:

Ordered, That W. W. Belknap having made default to plead or answer to the merits within the time fixed by the order of the Senate, the trial proceed as upon a plea of not guilty, in pursuance of the former order.

On June 19 Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, in secret session, presented an order, the first portion of which provided for the filing of the paper presented by counsel for respondent, and the second portion of which,

Ordered, That * * * the defendant having failed to answer to the merits within ten days allowed by the order of the Senate of the 6th instant, the trial shall proceed on the 6th of July next as upon a plea of not guilty.

Mr. William B. Allison, of Iowa, proposed an amendment substituting "19th day of November" for "6th day of July." This was disagreed to, yeas 9, nays 37.

On motion of Mr. Conkling, by a vote of yeas 21, nays 19, the words "Provided, That the impeachment can only proceed while Congress is in session" were added.

Then, as amended, the portion of the order as given was agreed to, as follows, by a vote of yeas 21, nays 16:

And the defendant having failed to answer to the merits within ten days allowed by the order of the Senate of the 6th instant, the trial shall proceed on the 6th of July next as upon a plea of not guilty: Provided, The impeachment can only proceed while Congress is in session.

The Senate provided that subpœnas for respondent's witnesses in the Belknap trial should be issued on recommendation of a committee.

An approved number of witnesses for respondent in the Belknap trial were summoned at public expense.

Thereupon Mr. George F. Edmunds proposed the following, which was agreed to[2] by unanimous consent:

Ordered, That the Secretary issue subpœnas that may be applied for by the respondent for such witnesses to be summoned at the expense of the United States as shall be allowed by a committee, to consist of Senators Frelinghuysen, Thurman, and Christiancy, and that subpœnas for all other witnesses for the respondent shall contain the statement that the witnesses therein named are to attend upon the tender on behalf of the respondent of their lawful fees.

This order was apparently in response to a letter from the Chief Clerk of the Senate, presented on June 16,[3] transmitting a list of witnesses to be summoned on behalf of the respondent, which list had been filed in his office.

The opening address and presentation of testimony in the Belknap impeachment.

Counsel for respondent made no opening address before presenting testimony in the Belknap trial.

Forms and ceremonies of opening the proceedings of the Senate on a day of the Belknap trial.

The Senate daily informed the House of its readiness to proceed with the Belknap trial.

On July 6,[1] the day set for the trial to proceed, the proceedings opened with the usual formalities. In the Senate the President pro tempore said:

The hour of 12 o'clock having arrived, pursuant to the order of the Senate made on June 19 the legislative and executive business of the Senate will be suspended and the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The usual proclamation was made by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Messrs. Lord, Lynde, McMahon, Jenks, Lapham, and Hoar, of the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, appeared and were conducted to the seats assigned them.

The respondent appeared with his counsel, Messrs. Blair, Black, and Carpenter.

The President pro tempore said:

The Secretary will notify the House of Representatives that the Senate is ready to proceed with the trial and that seats are provided for their accommodation.[2]

The Secretary read the Journal of proceedings of the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap of Monday, June 19, 1876.

The President pro tempore said:

The Senate in trial is now ready to proceed.

Mr. Manager William P. Lynde then made the opening address on behalf of the House of Representatives, after which witnesses were called and sworn, and after examination by the managers were cross-examined by counsel for the respondent.

On July 12[3] the testimony presented by the managers was closed, and the President pro tempore said:

The defense will proceed, the case being closed on the part of the managers.

Thereupon at once, without any opening address, the counsel for the respondent began the introduction of testimony.

On July 19[4] the testimony for the respondent was concluded. The managers announced that they had nothing in rebuttal.

2465. Belknap's impeachment continued.

In the Belknap trial the Senate permitted three managers and three counsel to argue on the final question, in such order as might be agreed on.

The Senate declined to restrict the time of final arguments in the Belknap trial.

[4] Senate Journal, p. 983; Record of trial, p. 285.

In the Belknap trial the closing speech of the final arguments was by one of the managers.

The illness of counsel or managers was certified to as reason for disarranging the order of final argument in the Belknap trial.

In the Belknap trial the witnesses were discharged before the final arguments.

Thereupon [1] Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, asked for an order permitting three of the counsel for the respondent to be heard in final argument instead of two, as provided in Rule XXI.

Mr. George F. Edmunds, a Senator from Vermont, offered this order:

Ordered, That three persons on each side be allowed six hours for summing up, to be arranged between them.

Mr. Roscoe Conkling, a Senator from New York, proposed to amend by striking out all after the word "Ordered," and inserting:

That three managers and three counsel for the respondent may be heard in the concluding argument, in the order in which they state to the Senate they have agreed.

Mr. Edmunds moved to amend the amendment of Mr. Conkling by adding—and that the argument be limited to six hours on each side.

This amendment was disagreed to, ayes 15, noes 29.

Then, without division, Mr. Conkling's substitute was agreed to, and the original order as amended by the substitute was also agreed to without division.

Then the President pro tempore said:

Will the Senate allow the Chair to state that the Chair understands the witnesses on both sides can be discharged? He makes that announcement so that they can leave.

On July 20 [2] the President pro tempore announced that the arguments would begin, and that the managers would have the opening. Then it was announced that as Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, was detained by illness, it had been arranged between the managers and counsel for respondent that Mr. Montgomery Blair, of counsel for the respondent, should open, thereby relieving Mr. Carpenter of the misfortune of not hearing the speech of the manager, to whom he was to reply. At the conclusion of Mr. Blair's address a motion to adjourn was disagreed to. Thereupon Mr. Jeremiah S. Black, of counsel for respondent, said it would be a hardship to have an argument from the managers in the absence of Mr. Carpenter. It was suggested that an argument made this day would be in print in the morning in time for counsel to examine it before replying. Thereupon Mr. Manager William P. Lynde proceeded in argument.

On the next day, July 21, [3] Mr. Manager Lynde having concluded his argument on the preceding day, Mr. Black, of counsel for the respondent, submitted a motion that the Senate sitting for the trial adjourn until the 24th, justifying the motion by the following affidavit:

United States Senate sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES v. WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, County of Washington, ss:

Personally appeared before me D. W. Bliss, who, being sworn according to law, says that he has been the family physician of Matt. H. Carpenter for seven years when in Washington; that he is now under my care and seriously ill with acute gastritis (inflammation of the stomach); that he has been confined to his bed for the past thirty-six hours, and is not able to leave his room to-day, and I state my belief that he will be able to resume his duties on Monday, the 24th instant.

D. W. BLISS, M. D.

Subscribed and sworn before me this 21st day of July, A. D. 1876.

[SEAL.] A. E. BOONE, Notary Public.

Mr. Black's motion was agreed to, yeas 34, nays 5.

On the assembling of the Senate for the trial, on July 24,[1] Mr. Manager Scott Lord presented an affidavit showing:

United States Senate sitting as a court of impeachment.

THE UNITED STATES v. WILLIAM W BELKNAP.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, County of Washington, ss:

Personally appeared before me, D. W. Bliss, M. D., a practicing physician, who, being sworn according to law, said that Hon. A. G. Lapham has been under his professional care during the past three days and unable to leave his bed by reason of acute cellulitis and perineal abscess, and he will not, in my opinion, be able to resume his official duties before Wednesday, the 26th instant.

D. W. BLISS, M. D.

Sworn and subscribed to before me this 24th day of July, 1876.

A. E. BOONE, Notary Public.

Mr. Manager Lord stated that the managers were prepared to go on in Mr. Lapham's absence, but preferred not to, and asked an adjournment to the 26th. The Senate declined to adjourn, whereupon Mr. Manager Lord asked that Mr. Lapham's argument might be printed. And the argument was ordered printed.

Mr. Manager George A. Jenks next proceeded in argument,[2] and was followed [3] by Mr. Jeremiah S. Black, of counsel for respondent.

On July 25 and 26 [4] Mr. Matthew H. Carpenter, of counsel for respondent, submitted argument.

Following Mr. Carpenter, Mr. Manager Scott Lord, on behalf of the House of Representatives, closed the argument.[5]

The Senate in secret session adopted an order to govern the voting on the articles in the Belknap impeachment.

There was much deliberation over the form of the final question in the Belknap trial.

The voting on the articles in the Belknap impeachment was without debate, but each Senator was permitted to file an opinion.

The Senate in the Belknap trial declined to renounce the practice of deliberating in secret session.

On July 31,[1] as the Senate sitting for the trial was about to determine its method of procedure, Mr. Hannibal Hamlin, a Senator from Maine, proposed such amendment to the rules as would prevent secret sessions; but the Senate, by a vote of 23 yeas to 32 nays, declined to consider it. Then, on motion of Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, and by a vote of yeas 32, nays 25, the doors were closed for deliberation. Thereupon the following occurred:

Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, submitted the following order for consideration:

Ordered, That when called to vote whether the articles of impeachment or either of them are sustained, any Senator who votes in the negative shall be at liberty to state, if he chooses, that he rests his vote on the absence of guilt proved in fact, or on the want of jurisdiction, as the case may be; and the vote shall be entered in the Journal accordingly.

Mr. Edmunds moved to amend by striking out all after the word "ordered" and inserting:

That on Tuesday next, the 1st day of August, at 12 o'clock meridian, the Senate shall proceed to vote, without debate, on the several articles of impeachment. The presiding officer shall direct the Secretary to read the several articles successively, and after the reading of each article the presiding officer shall put the question following, viz: "Mr. Senator ———, how say you? Is the respondent, William W. Belknap, guilty or not guilty of a high crime or high misdemeanor, as the charge may be, as charged in this article?" Whereupon such Senator shall rise in his place and answer "guilty" or "not guilty" only. And each Senator shall be permitted to file within two days after the vote shall have been so taken his written opinion, to be printed with the proceedings.

Mr. John Sherman, of Ohio, moved to amend the amendment of Mr. Edmunds by striking out the word "only" after "guilty," and in lieu thereof inserting:

And each Senator shall be at liberty to state the ground of his vote in a single sentence, which shall be entered on the Journal.

Mr. Aaron A. Sargent, of California, moved to amend the amendment of Mr. Sherman by inserting in lieu of the words proposed to be inserted:

Any Senator who votes in the negative shall be at liberty to state if he chooses that he rests his vote on the absence of guilt proved in fact, or on the want of jurisdiction, as the case may be; and any Senator who votes in the affirmative may add that he holds the vote of a majority heretofore in favor of jurisdiction binding on him, and the vote shall be entered on the Journal accordingly.

Mr. Edmunds moved to amend the order proposed by Mr. Conkling by striking out all after the word "that" and in lieu thereof inserting:

Each Senator may in giving his vote state his reasons therefor, occupying not more than one minute, which reasons shall be entered in the Journal in connection with his vote.

Mr. Conkling moved to amend the amendment of Mr. Edmunds by adding thereto the words:

And immediately following his name and vote.

The amendment of Mr. Conkling to Mr. Edmunds's amendment was agreed to.

On the question to agree to the order of Mr. Edmunds as amended, it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. Edmunds then withdrew the amendment first offered by him to the order proposed by Mr. Conkling.

[1] Senate Journal, pp. 987–991; Record of trial, pp. 341, 342.

The question then being on the order of Mr. Conkling as amended, as follows:

Ordered, That each Senator may, in giving his vote, give his reasons therefor, occupying not more than one minute, which reasons shall be entered in the Journal in connection with his vote and immediately following his name and vote,

It was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. Edmunds submitted the following order for consideration:

Ordered, That on Tuesday next, the 1st day of August, at 12 o'clock meridian, the Senate shall proceed to vote without debate on the several articles of impeachment. The presiding officer shall direct the Secretary to read the several articles successively, and after the reading of each article the presiding officer shall put the question following, namely: "Mr. Senator ———, how say you? Is the respondent, William W. Belknap, guilty or not guilty of a high crime," or "high misdemeanor," as the charge may be, "as charged in this article?" Whereupon such Senator shall rise in his place and answer "guilty" or "not guilty," with his reasons, if any, as provided in the order already adopted; and each Senator shall be permitted to file within two days after the vote shall have been so taken his written opinion, to be printed with the proceedings.

Mr. John J. Ingalls, of Kansas, moved to amend the order by striking out all after the word "impeachment," in line 4, and in lieu thereof inserting:

And that in taking the final question the presiding officer shall call each Senator by name in alphabetical order and upon each article propose as follows:

"Mr. Senator ———, how say you, is the impeachment under this article sustained?"

Whereupon each Senator shall rise in his place and answer "yea" or "nay," and may, as provided in the order already adopted, state the ground of his vote.

The question being taken on this amendment by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 24, nays 27.

So the amendment of Mr. Ingalls was rejected.

The question recurring on the order of Mr. Edmunds, Mr. William B. Allison, of Iowa, demanded a division of the question; and the question being put on the first branch of the order, namely:

Ordered, That on Tuesday next, the 1st day of August, at 12 o'clock meridian, the Senate shall proceed to vote, without debate, on the several articles of impeachment,

It was agreed to.

The question being on the second clause of the order of Mr. Edmunds, Mr. Ingalls moved to amend the clause by inserting in lieu thereof the following:

And that in taking the final question the presiding officer of the Senate shall call each Senator by name in alphabetical order, and upon each article propose as follows, that is to say: "Mr. Senator ———, how say you, is the impeachment under this article sustained?"

Whereupon each Senator shall rise in his place and answer "yea" or "nay," and may also, as provided in the order already adopted, state the grounds of his vote; and each Senator may, within two days thereafter, file his opinion in writing, to be published in the printed proceedings of the case.

Mr. Edmunds demanded a division of Mr. Ingalls's amendment; and the question being put on the first branch thereof, it was disagreed to—yeas 24, nays 26.

The question being put in the second branch of the amendment of Mr. Ingalls—namely, strike out all of the order of Mr. Edmunds after "impeachment" and in lieu thereof insert—

Whereupon each Senator shall rise in his place and answer "yea" or "nay," and may also, as provided in the order already adopted, state the grounds of his vote; and each Senator may, within two days thereafter, file his opinion in writing, to be published in the printed proceedings of the case,

It was disagreed to.

The question recurring on the order of Mr. Edmunds, it was agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That on Tuesday next, the 1st day of August, at 12 o'clock meridian, the Senate shall proceed to vote, without debate, on the several articles of impeachment. The Presiding Officer shall direct the Secretary to read the several articles successively, and after the reading of each article the presiding officer shall put the question following, namely: "Mr. Senator ——, how say you? Is the respondent, William W. Belknap, guilty or not guilty of a high crime" or "high misdemeanor," as the charge may be, "as charged in this article?" Whereupon such Senator shall rise in his place and answer "guilty" or "not guilty" with his reasons, if any, as provided in the order already adopted.

And each Senator shall be permitted to file within two days after the vote shall have been so taken his written opinion, to be printed with the proceedings.

The Senate, sitting for the trial, thereupon adjourned.

The managers alone attended in the Senate on the day the Senate rendered judgment in the Belknap case.

The respondent in the Belknap trial attended throughout until the time of rendering judgment.

The President pro tempore announced the result of the vote on each article and the acquittal of respondent on each.

The vote on the final question in the Belknap trial was affected conclusively by opinions as to the question of jurisdiction.

Having announced the result of the voting in the Belknap case, the President pro tempore directed the entry of a judgment of acquittal.

The adjournment without day of the Senate sitting for the Belknap trial was pronounced after vote of the Senate.

On August 1[1] the Senate, sitting for the trial, began its proceedings with the usual formalities. The usual message[2] was sent to the House of Representatives; but as usual the managers alone appeared, the House adhering to its resolution made early in the trial. Mr. Matt. H. Carpenter, of counsel for the respondent, appeared. The respondent himself, who had attended with his counsel throughout the trial, was not present either on this or the preceding day.

After the Journal had been read the President pro tempore announced that according to the order already adopted the Senate would now proceed to vote on the several articles. The voting then began, the Secretary reading each article, and each Senator rising in his place and pronouncing his decision, either with or without the permitted explanation.

The result of the voting was as follows:

	Guilty.	Not guilty.
Article I	35	25
Article II	36	25
Article III	36	25
Article IV	36	25
Article V	37	25

[1] Senate Journal, pp. 992–1012; Record of trial, pp. 342–357.

[2] House Journal, p. 1361.

After the vote on each article the President pro tempore made announcement in form as follows:

On this article 37 Senators vote "guilty" and 25 Senators vote "not guilty." Two-thirds of the Senators present not sustaining the fifth article, the respondent is acquitted on this article.

An analysis of the reasons given with the votes shows that of those voting "guilty," 2 believed that the Senate had no jurisdiction, but gave their verdict in good faith, since by vote jurisdiction had been assumed. Of those voting "not guilty" 3 announced that they did so on the evidence, while 22 announced that they voted not guilty because they believed the Senate had no jurisdiction. One Senator stated that he declined to vote because he believed they did not have jurisdiction. He did not ask to be excused from voting.

At the conclusion of the voting the President pro tempore announced:

This concludes the action of the Senate on all the articles of the impeachment. The Chair will call the Senate's attention to Rule 22, which provides:

"And if the impeachment shall not upon any of the articles presented be sustained by the votes of two-thirds of the members present, a judgment of acquittal shall be entered."

If there be no objection to complying therewith, the Secretary will be directed to enter a judgment of acquittal. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it will be so entered.

The Senate, sitting for the impeachment, then voted, on motion of Mr. George F. Edmunds, a Senator from Vermont, to adjourn without day, and the President pro tempore said:

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, stands adjourned without day.

At the conclusion of the Belknap trial the managers presented to the House a written report of the judgment and certain features of the trial.

On August 2,[1] in the House of Representatives, Mr. Manager Scott Lord presented the following report in writing, which was read to the House and ordered printed:

That the defendant, William W. Belknap, has been acquitted on all the articles presented against him, less than two-thirds of the Senators present voting "guilty." The final vote was 61; 37 of the Senators voted "guilty," 23 "not guilty for want of jurisdiction," 1 "not guilty,"[2] and 1 criticised a portion of the articles of impeachment, and stated that the offenses charged in other of the articles were not proved beyond a reasonable doubt. A change of 5 votes would have resulted in the conviction of the defendant by the two-thirds vote required by the Constitution.

The question of jurisdiction, raised by the plea of the defendant, was the first point presented to the court of impeachment. After a protracted and exhaustive argument, the court held that it had jurisdiction, notwithstanding the resignation of the defendant; and the managers proceeded to prove the offenses charged in the articles of impeachment, and after proving them so conclusively that only two[3] Senators in any manner questioned the guilt of the defendant, the minority of the Senate refused to be governed by the deliberate judgment of the majority, that it had jurisdiction, and, in the form and mode before referred to, prevented the conviction of the defendant.

[1] House Journal, p. 1373, Record; pp. 5082, 5083.

[2] Three voted "not guilty"—Messrs. Conover, Patterson, and Wright. (See pp. 355–357 of Record of trial.) The number voting "not guilty for want of jurisdiction" was 22, and 1, Jones, of Florida, declined to vote because he considered the Senate had no jurisdiction.

[3] Three Senators voted not guilty.

While exercising the power to vote "not guilty," it was practically asserted that there was no converse to the proposition, and therefore that Senators had no legal right to vote "guilty," however satisfied of the guilt of the accused.

Notwithstanding this result, the managers believe that great good will accrue from the impeachment and trial of the defendant. It has been settled thereby that persons who have held civil office in the United States are impeachable, and that the Senate has jurisdiction to try them, although years may elapse before the discovery of the offense or offenses subjecting them to impeachment. To such as are or may hereafter be among the civil officers of the United States, who have no higher plane of integrity than the rule that "honesty is the best policy," and it is conceded they are comparatively few, this decision will be a constant warning that impeachable offenses, though not discovered for years, may result in impeachment, conviction, and public disgrace. To settle this principle, so vitally important in securing the rectitude of the class of officers referred to, is worth infinitely more than all the time, labor, and expense of the protracted trial closed by the verdict of yesterday.

This report was evidently unanimous, and at the conclusion of the reading Messrs. Managers George F. Hoar and Elbridge G. Lapham addressed the House briefly affirming strongly the positions taken by the report.

2469. The impeachment and trial of Charles Swayne, judge of the northern district of Florida.

A Member, rising in his place, impeached Judge Swayne both on his own responsibility and on the strength of a legislative memorial.

Discussion as to the degree of definiteness of charges required to justify the House in ordering an investigation.

The House declined to have the impeachment of Judge Swayne considered by a committee before ordering an investigation.

Form of resolution instructing the Judiciary Committee to examine the charges against Judge Swayne.

On December 10, 1903,[1] Mr. William B. Lamar, of Florida, claiming the floor for a question of privilege, said:

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the impeachment of a civil officer by this House is a question of privilege. I have made a joint resolution adopted by the legislature of the State of Florida a part of the resolution which I desire to submit to this House for its adoption. In pursuance of this joint resolution of the legislature of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, I impeach Charles Swayne, judge of the northern district of the State of Florida, of high crimes and misdemeanors; and the resolution which I have prepared in accordance with former proceedings of this House in like cases:

[1] Second session Fifty-eighth Congress, Journal, p. 37; Record, pp. 95, 103.

"Whereas the following joint resolution was adopted by the legislature of the State of Florida:

"Senate joint resolution in reference to Charles Swayne, judge of the United States court for the northern district of Florida.

"Be it resolved by the legislature of the State of Florida:

"Whereas Charles Swayne, United States district judge of the northern district of Florida, has so conducted himself and his court as to cause the people of the State to doubt his integrity and to believe that his official actions as judge are susceptible to corrupt influences and have been so corruptly influenced;

"Whereas it also appears that the said Charles Swayne is guilty of a violation of section 551 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in that he does not reside in the district for which he was appointed and of which he is judge, but resides out of the State of Florida and in the State of Delaware or State of Pennsylvania, in open and defiant violation of said statute, and has not resided in the northern district of Florida, for which he was appointed, in ten years, and is constantly absent from said district, only making temporary visits for a pretense of discharging his official duties;

"Whereas the reputation of Charles Swayne as a corrupt judge is very injurious to the interests of the entire State of Florida, and his constant absence from his supposed district causes great sacrifice of their rights and annoyance and expense to litigants in his court;

"Whereas it also appears that the said Charles Swayne is not only a corrupt judge, but that he is ignorant and incompetent, and that his judicial opinions do not command the respect or confidence of the people;

"Whereas the administration of the United States bankruptcy act in the court of said Charles Swayne and by his appointed referee has resulted in every instance in the waste of the assets of the alleged bankrupt by being absorbed in unnecessary costs, expenses, and allowances, to the great wrong and injury of creditors and others, until such administration is, in effect, legalized robbery and a stench in the nostrils of all good people:

"Be it resolved by the house of representatives of the State of Florida (the senate concurring), That our Senators and Representatives in the United States Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to cause to be instituted in the Congress of the United States proper proceedings for the investigation of the proceedings of the United States circuit and districts court for the northern district of Florida by Charles Swayne as United States judge for the northern district of Florida, and of his acts and doings as such judge, to the end that he may be impeached and removed from such office.

"Be it resolved further, That the secretary of state of the State of Florida be, and is hereby, instructed to certify to each Senator and Representative in the Congress of the United States, under the great seal of the State of Florida, a copy of this resolution and its unanimous adoption by the legislature of the State of Florida.

"STATE OF FLORIDA, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

"UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of Florida, ss:

"I, H. Clay Crawford, secretary of state of the State of Florida, hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and exact copy of senate joint resolution in reference to Charles Swayne, judge of the United States court for the northern district of Florida, passed by the legislature of Florida, session of 1903, and on file in this office.

"Given under my hand and the great seal of the State of Florida at Tallahassee, the capital, this the 7th day of September, A. D. 1903.

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire and report whether the action of this House is requisite concerning the official misconduct of Charles Swayne, judge of the United States district court for the northern district of Florida, and say whether said judge has held terms of his court as required by law; whether he has continuously and persistently absented himself from the said State, and whether his acts and omissions in his office of judge have been such as in any degree to deprive the people of that district of the benefits of the court therein to amount to a denial of justice; whether the said judge has been guilty of corrupt conduct in office, and whether his administration of his office has resulted in injury and wrong to litigants of his court.

"And in reference to this investigation the said committee is hereby authorized and empowered to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, take testimony, and to employ a clerk and stenographer, if necessary, to send a subcommittee whenever and wherever it may be necessary to take testimony for the use of said committee. And the said subcommittee while so employed shall have the same powers in respect to obtaining testimony as are herein given to said Committee on the Judiciary, with a sergeant-at-arms, by himself or deputy, who shall serve the processes of said committee and subcommittee and execute its orders, and shall attend the sittings of the same as ordered and directed thereby. And that the expense of such investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House."

Mr. Charles H. Grosvenor, of Ohio, raised the question that the specifications made by the Member from Florida were not sufficiently specific; and after debate Mr. Lamar said:

I charge this judge, first, with continued, persistent, and, if you please, pernicious absenteeism from his district; second, with corrupt official conduct, based upon several matters. * * * Third, I charge Judge Swayne with maladministration of judicial matters in his court, so much so as to embarrass bankrupts and annihilate the assets of litigants and others appearing within his jurisdiction

Renewed objection being made that charges should be more definite and better substantiated in order to initiate proceedings so important, Mr. John F. Lacey, of Iowa, moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

After debate the motion of Mr. Lacey was disagreed to, ayes 53, noes 129.

The resolution was then agreed to without division.

The resolution impeaching Judge Swayne was reported from a divided committee.

The committee investigating Judge Swayne took testimony in the Judge's district as well as in Washington.

In the investigation of the conduct of Judge Swayne the accused was present in person with counsel and argued his own case.

In investigating the conduct of Judge Swayne both complainants and accused were permitted to introduce sworn testimony.

On March 25, 1904, Mr. Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on the Judiciary, presented the report[1] of that committee. The report says:

Testimony was taken in Pensacola, Tallahassee, and Jacksonville, Fla., and in the city of Washington upon several days. At all the hearings the Hon. Charles Swayne was present himself and by counsel, except at the last hearings in Washington, when he appeared in propria persona and argued his case before the subcommittee. All the witnesses asked for by the complainants and the respondent were sworn. Their evidence was reduced to writing and is presented with this report.

Specifications of the particular matters covered by the general charges were furnished the committee by the complainants. They were as follows:

Specification 1.—That the said Charles Swayne, judge of the United States court in and for the northern district of Florida, for ten years, while he has been such judge, was a nonresident of the State of Florida, and resided in the State of Delaware. That he never pretended to reside in Florida until May, 1903. That during said time of his nonresidence, by such nonresidence, he has caused great inconvenience, annoyance, injury, and expense to litigants in his court, not so much by failure to hold terms of court as by failing to be in reach for the disposition of admiralty and chancery matters and other matters arising between terms of court needing disposition.

Specification 2.—That said Charles Swayne, as such judge, appointed one B. C. Tunison as United States commissioner; that it was charged that it was an improper appointment, and that testimony was offered to such effect before said appointment.

[1] House Report No. 1905.

Specification 3.—That the said Charles Swayne, as such judge, appointed and maintains one John Thomas Porter as United States commissioner at Marianna, but that said Porter does not reside at Marianna, but at Grand Ridge, 16 miles away, and is never at Marianna or at his office except when notified of an arrest, necessitating people having business with the United States commissioner, often at expense and inconvenience, to go to Grand Ridge, and necessitating the holding of prisoners often for a day or two, at their inconvenience, and in imprisonment at the expense of the Government, until said Porter sees fit to come to Marianna.

The said Swayne, although there is great necessity for a commissioner at Marianna, has refused to appoint such.

Specification 4.—That said Swayne, in the administration of his court, has been guilty of great partiality and favoritism to one B. C. Tunison, mentioned in specification No. 2, and a practicing attorney in said court. That so great and well known has this partiality and favoritism become that it has created the general impression that to succeed in that court before the said Swayne it is necessary to retain the said Tunison.

Specification 5.—That said Swayne has been guilty of oppression and tyranny in his office, incorrectly and oppressively and without just cause imprisoning one W. C. O'Neal, one E. T. Davis, and one Simeon Belding upon feigned, fictitious, and false charges of contempt of his said court.

Specification 6.—That said Charles Swayne has willfully, negligently, and corruptly maladministered bankruptcy cases in his court, to the extent that the assets of bankrupts have, in all or nearly all cases, been squandered and dissipated in paying extraordinary fees and expenses, and never paying any dividends to creditors.

Specification 7.—That said Charles Swayne was guilty of oppression and tyranny in his office to one Charles Hoskins, upon an alleged contempt resulting in the suicide of the said Hoskins, and said alleged contempt proceedings being brought for the purpose of breaking down and injuring one W. R. Hoskins, who was charged in said court with involuntary bankruptcy, but who was defending and resisting such charge.

Specification 8.—That said Swayne corruptly purchased a house and lot in the city of Pensacola while the said house and lot was in litigation in his court.

Specification 9.—Ignorance and incompetency to hold said position. Under this specification many illustrations could be given, among them a case in which he took jurisdiction in admiralty in violation of the treaty between the United States and Sweden and Norway; and in one case, that of Sweet v. Owl Commercial Company, in which he charged the jury to exactly and diametrically conflicting theories of law.

Specification 11.—That said Swayne, by reason of his absence from the State, failed to hold the term of court which should have been held at Tallahassee in the fall of the year 1902, during the months of November or December.

Specification 12.—That the said Charles Swayne has been guilty of conduct unbecoming an upright judge, in that he has procured as indorsers on his note, for the purpose of borrowing money, attorneys and litigants having cases pending in his court.

Specification 13.—That the said Charles Swayne has been guilty of maladministration in the affairs of the conduct of his office; that he has discharged people convicted of crime in his court. Illustration, case of Alonzo Love, convicted in the year of 1902, of perjury.

The committee found that the evidence sustained the first, fourth, fifth, and seventh specifications, and concluded:

The charges and specifications not covered by the foregoing findings were not proved by sufficient evidence to warrant action upon them.

Upon the whole case it is plain that Judge Swayne has forfeited the respect and confidence of the bar of his court and of the people of his district who do business there. He has so conducted himself as to earn the reputation of being susceptible to the malign influence of a man of notoriously bad character. He has shown himself to be harsh, tyrannical, and oppressive, unmindful of the common rule of a just and upright judge. He has continuously and persistently violated the plain words of a statute of the United States, and subjected himself to punishment for the commission of a high misdemeanor. He has fined and imprisoned members of his bar for a constructive contempt without the authority of law and without a decent show of reason, either through inexcusable ignorance, a malicious intent to injure, or a wanton disposition to exercise arbitrary power. He has condemned to a term of imprisonment in the county jail a reputable citizen of the State of Florida over whom he had no jurisdiction, who was guilty of no thought of a contempt of his court, for no offense against him or in the presence of the court, or "in obstruction of any order, rule, command, or decree," and after the accused had purged himself on oath.

For all those reasons Charles Swayne has been guilty of misbehavior in his office of judge and grossly violated the condition upon which he holds this honorable appointment. The honor of the judiciary, the orderly and decent administration of public justice, and the welfare of the people of the United States demand his impeachment and removal from the high place which his conduct has degraded.

It is vitally necessary to maintain the confidence of the people in the judiciary. A weak executive or an inefficient or even dishonest legislative branch may exist, for a time at least, without serious injury to the perpetuity of our free institutions, but if the people lose faith in the judicial branch, if they become convinced that justice can not be had at the hands of the judges, the next step will be to take the administration of the law into their own hands and do justice according to the rule of the mob, which is anarchy, with which freedom can not coexist.

The Committee on the Judiciary recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Charles Swayne, judge of the district court of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, be impeached of high misdemeanor."

A minority of the committee composed of Messrs. J. N. Gillett, of California, Robert M. Nevin, of Ohio, D. S. Alexander, of New York, George A. Pearre, of Maryland, Charles E. Littlefield, of Maine, and Richard W. Parker, of New Jersey, joined in minority views dissenting from the conclusions of the committee, and holding that the evidence did not justify impeachment.

The impeachment of Judge Swayne was postponed to the next session of Congress for further investigation.

In the second investigation Judge Swayne testified on his own behalf and was cross-examined.

The rule as to the pertinency of evidence to the charges was enforced in the investigation of Judge Swayne's conduct.

The closing arguments in the Swayne investigation were heard before the subcommittee which had taken the evidence.

On April 7, 1904,[1] Mr. Palmer offered as a question of privilege the following, which was agreed to without division:

Resolved, That the consideration of the resolution (No. 274) reported by the Committee on the Judiciary in the matter of the impeachment of Charles Swayne, judge of the district court of the United States in the northern district of Florida, be postponed until the 13th day of December, 1904, and that the Committee on the Judiciary be, and it is hereby, authorized to take such further testimony as may be offered by the complainants or the respondent, and report the same to the House, with its conclusions thereon. The said committee and subcommittee shall have all the authority conferred by the original resolution (No. 86), and the further authority to take testimony when Congress is not in session.

In accordance with this resolution a subcommittee composed of Messrs. Palmer, Clayton, and Gillett took testimony at various times from February 13 to November 29, 1904.[2] In the course of these proceedings[3] Judge Swayne, besides having counsel, also appeared for himself, offered evidence, and cross-examined witnesses; and Hon. B. S. Liddon appeared for the complainants. In the course of the testimony Judge Swayne made "a statement to the stenographer," which is published with the evidence, and later it appears that "Charles Swayne, having been recalled, testified as follows." [1] After he had concluded his direct statement he was cross-examined by Mr. Liddon at length.[2]

[1] Record, p. 4431.

[3] See page 211 of testimony.

As to the character of the testimony permitted in the examination before the subcommittee, the chairman, Mr. Palmer, stated [3] that no testimony would be received on irrelevant questions or on charges which, if proven, would not be considered grounds of impeachment. Hearsay testimony was, on objection, ruled out.[4] On the question of relevancy one notable ruling was made.[5] Judge Swayne was charged with having certified as expenses sums greater than he had actually expended. His counsel attempted to introduce documents to show that other Federal judges did likewise. This evidence was excluded by the subcommittee on the ground that it was not relevant to Judge Swayne's case. In the course of the proceedings a question arose as to whether the briefs or arguments should be heard before the subcommittee or before the whole Judiciary Committee.[6] In fact, they were heard before the subcommittee.

On December 9, 1904,[7] Mr. Palmer reported from the Judiciary Committee the testimony, with the following resolution, adopted by a majority of the committee:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary respectfully report to the House the testimony taken in the case of Charles Swayne since Congress adjourned, with the conclusion that in their opinion said testimony strengthens the case against the said Charles Swayne.

The minority views, submitted by Mr. Richard Wayne Parker, of New Jersey, and concurred in by Messrs. John J. Jenkins, of Wisconsin; D. S. Alexander, of New York; Vespasian Warner, of Illinois; Charles E. Littlefield, of Maine; Lot Thomas, of Iowa; J. N. Gillett, of California, and George A. Pearre, of Maryland, contended that the additional evidence weakened rather than strengthened the case, except as to the charge as to false certificates of expenses of travel. On this point the minority say:

Evidence as to the alleged practice of other judges in this respect was offered and excluded, and we think properly. It would have been competent for him, when a witness in his own behalf, to have stated why he made those certificates. As a witness he answered and explained every other charge. This charge he made no effort as a witness to answer or explain. The inference from the record, on general principles, is that the charge is admitted to be true and that he has no answer or explanation thereto. Whether a satisfactory explanation can be made we do not say. We must take the record as it stands.

Upon this record, unanswered and unexplained, we are of the opinion that in this particular an impeachable offense has been made out.

Form of resolutions impeaching Judge Swayne and directing that the impeachment be carried to the bar of the Senate.

The House decided that the articles impeaching Judge Swayne should be prepared by a select committee.

Constitution of the committee to carry the Swayne impeachment to the Senate.

The Speaker, in the committee to draw the articles in the Swayne case, gave minority representation to those opposed generally to the impeachment.

On December 13, 1904,[1] the reports were considered in the House, the pending resolution being:

Resolved, That Charles Swayne, judge of the district court of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, be impeached of high misdemeanor.

At the conclusion of the debate, on motion of Mr. Palmer, the House agreed to the following amendment:

Amend by striking out all after the word "Resolved" and inserting "That Charles Swayne, judge of the district court of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors."

The previous question was then ordered on the amendment and original resolution by a vote of ayes 198, noes 61. The amendment was then agreed to, and then the resolution as amended was agreed to without division.

Then, on motion of Mr. Palmer, it was—

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to go to the Senate and at the bar thereof, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States, to impeach Charles Swayne, judge of the district court of the United States for the northern district of Florida, of high crimes and misdemeanors in office, and to acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will in due time exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him and make good the same; and that the committee do demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of said Charles Swayne to answer said impeachment.

Mr. Palmer then offered [2] the following:

Resolved, That a committee of seven be appointed to prepare and report articles of impeachment against Charles Swayne, judge of the district court of the United States for the northern district of Florida, with power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Mr. Palmer explained that this resolution was in accordance with all the precedents except that of the Belknap case, wherein the Judiciary Committee had framed the articles.

Mr. Charles E. Littlefield, of Maine, proposed this amendment:

Strike out "a committee of seven is appointed" and insert "the Committee on the Judiciary be empowered."

The question being taken, the amendment was disagreed to, ayes 113, noes 140. Then the original resolution was agreed to without division.

On the same day [1] the Speaker [2] appointed the following committee to carry the impeachment to the bar of the Senate: Messrs. Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania; John J. Jenkins, of Wisconsin; J. N. Gillett, of California; Henry D. Clayton, of Alabama, and David H. Smith, of Kentucky. All of these were members of the Committee on the Judiciary, two of them belonged to the minority party in the House, and two had signed the minority views which accompanied the report from the Judiciary Committee.

On December 14 [3] the Speaker announced the appointment of the following committee to prepare articles of impeachment: Messrs. Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania; J. N. Gillett, of California; Richard Wayne Parker, of New Jersey; Charles E. Littlefield, of Maine; Samuel L. Powers, of Massachusetts; Henry D. Clayton, of Alabama, and David A. De Armond, of Missouri. Three of these gentlemen had signed the minority views on the question of impeachment. The minority party in the House was also represented by three members of the committee.

Forms and ceremonies of presenting the Swayne impeachment in the Senate.

On December 14,[4] in the Senate, a message from the House of Representatives by Mr. W. J. Browning, its Chief Clerk, was delivered, as follows:

Mr. President, I am directed by the House of Representatives to communicate to the Senate the following resolution:

"Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to go to the Senate, and, at the bar thereof, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States, to impeach Charles Swayne, judge of the district court of the United States, for the northern district of Florida, of high crimes and misdemeanors in office, and to acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will in due time exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him and make good the same, and that the committee do demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of said Charles Swayne to answer said impeachment.

"The Speaker announced the appointment of Mr. Palmer of Pennsylvania, Mr. Jenkins of Wisconsin, Mr. Gillett of California, Mr. Clayton of Alabama, and Mr. Smith of Kentucky, members of said committee."

The Assistant Sergeant-at-Arms (B. W. Layton) announced the presence of the committee from the House of Representatives.

The President pro tempore [5] said:

The Senate will receive the committee from the House of Representatives.

The committee from the House of Representatives was escorted by the Sergeant-at-Arms (D. M. Ransdell) to the area in front of the Vice-President's desk, and its chairman, Mr. Palmer, said:

Mr. President, in obedience to the order of the House of Representatives we appear before you, and in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States of America we do impeach Charles Swayne, judge of the district court of the United States for the northern district of Florida, of high crimes and misdemeanors in office; and we do further inform the Senate that the House of Representatives will in due time exhibit articles of impeachment against him and make good the same. And in their name we demand that the Seante shall take order for the appearance of the said Charles Swayne to answer the said impeachment.

The President pro tempore said:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee of the House of Representatives, the Chair begs to assure you that the Senate will take proper order in the premises, notice of which will be given to the House.

The committee of the House of Representatives thereupon retired from the Chamber.

On the same day, in the Senate,[1] Mr. Orville H. Platt, of Connecticut, presented the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the message of the House of Representatives relating to the impeachment of Charles Swayne be referred to a select committee to consist of five Senators to be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The President pro tempore thereupon appointed Messrs. Platt, of Connecticut; Clarence D. Clark, of Wyoming; Charles W. Fairbanks, of Indiana; Augustus A. Bacon, of Georgia, and Edmund W. Pettus, of Alabama.

In the House of Representatives, on the same day,[2] the committee appointed to go to the Senate and at the bar thereof and, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States, to impeach Judge Charles Swayne, appeared at the bar of the House.

Mr. Palmer being recognized, reported verbally:

Mr. Speaker, in obedience to the order of the House, we proceeded to the bar of the Senate, and, in the name of this body and of all the people of the United States, we impeached, as we were directed to do, Charles Swayne, judge of the district court of the United States for the northern district of Florida, of high crimes and misdemeanors in office, and we demanded that the Senate should take order to make him appear before that body to answer for the same; and announced that the House would soon present articles of impeachment and make them good, to which the response was: "Order shall be taken."

On December 15,[3] in the Senate, Mr. Platt, from the select committee, reported the following, which was agreed to by the Sentae:

Whereas the House of Representatives, on the 14th day of December, 1904, by five of its Members (Mr. Palmer, of Pennsylvania; Mr. Jenkins, of Wisconsin; Mr. Gillett, of California; Mr. Clayton, of Alabama, and Mr. Smith, of Kentucky), at the bar of the Senate impeached Charles Swayne, judge of the district court of the United States for the northern district of Florida, of high crimes and misdemeanors in office, and informed the Senate that the House of Representatives will in due time exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him and make good the same; and likewise demanded that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said Charles Swayne to answer the said impeachment: Therefore, Ordered, That the Senate will, according to its standing rule and orders in such cases provided, take proper order thereon (upon the presentation of the articles of impeachment), of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives herewith.

On the same day,[4] in the House, the message was received, and having been read, was ordered to lie on the table.

The articles impeaching Judge Swayne were reported from a divided committee and agreed to by a divided House.

On January 10, 1905,[1] Mr. Palmer, from the select committee appointed to prepare articles of impeachment, presented the report of the majority of that committee as follows:

The select committee appointed to prepare and report articles of impeachment against Charles Swayne, judge of the district court of the United States for the northern district of Florida, appointed December 13, 1904, submit the following report:

That the evidence heretofore taken in the matter of the impeachment of Charles Swayne, judge of the district court of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, sustains twelve articles of impeachment, which are submitted herewith, with the recommendation that they be adopted by the House and exhibited to the Senate. [Here followed the articles.]

Messrs. Littlefield, Parker, and Gillett filed minority views. Messrs. Littlefield and Parker in their views said:

The House must establish the truth of these articles, by competent testimony, beyond reasonable doubt.

The only articles which, in our judgment, the record as it now stands would sustain are based upon the certificates of expenses. As to these it was claimed in the hearings that other judges have construed the law as it was construed by Judge Swayne, and evidence was offered to establish that claim and excluded.

We dissent from all the other articles, and especially as to those based upon the contempt proceedings in the Davis, Belden, and O'Neal cases. These cases clearly involved willful and marked contempt of court, and demanded exemplary and summary punishment from any self-respecting court.

The charge as to nonresidence is not supported by such evidence as warrants the adoption of articles in that regard.

The use of the private car, which is the proper subject of adverse criticism, taking into account the fact that there is no intimation or claim that any judicial act was influenced, or attempted to be influenced thereby, is not of such gravity as to justify impeachment proceedings therefor.

The car incident occurred more than ten years ago, and no residence question has existed for more than four years. No statute of limitations can apply, but the great proceeding of impeachment is not to be used as to stale charges not affecting the moral character or the present fitness of the officer to perform his duty.

Mr. Gillett concurred in these views except as to the certificates of expenses, saying:

I concur in all that is said in the foregoing "Views of the minority" except as to the certificates for expenses. At the hearing before the committee Judge Swayne offered to prove the custom and practice of the Federal judges in making certificates for their reasonable expenses for travel and attendance when holding court out of their district, the purpose being to show a judicial construction of the statute under which these expenses were allowed. This offer was denied by the committee and all inquiry upon this subject shut off.

Therefore, for this reason, the record is silent upon matters which, in my judgment, should have been submitted to the consideration of this House. The record is silent as to the custom and practice of other judges in this particular, as to the construction which they placed upon the statute, and as to the construction which the disbursing and auditing officers of the Government gave it.

The intent with which Judge Swayne made these certificates is of controlling importance, and all of the facts and circumstances surrounding the matter, the practice and customs of other judges, and the construction placed upon the statute by them and by the Government, if any, are and were proper subjects of inquiry. While the record is silent on these questions, for the reason above stated, still it appears from official records, some of which have been furnished to me by the Treasury Department, that a majority of the district and circuit judges in five circuits, selected at random, make out certificates for $10 a day, and in two of these districts every judge made out such certificates.

I am inclined to believe that where a practice has been so general these judges acted in good faith with an honest belief that a fair construction of the statute gave them $10 a day for an allowance for travel and attendance while attending court out of their district, and I also feel that this House would with great reluctance pass a resolution impeaching them all; and if not all, why one?

On this article my mind is not satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that Judge Swayne, in following a practice so well established by so many honorable men, committed a criminal offense for which he should either be prosecuted or impeached, and giving him the benefit of this doubt I can not consent to any impeachment on that ground.

On January 12, 13, 16, 17, and 18,[1] the articles were debated at length, and on the latter day the question was taken first on a motion of Mr. Charles E. Littlefield, of Maine, to lay the first three articles on the table. This motion was disagreed to,[2] yeas 159, nays 167.

Then the question was taken on agreeing to the first three articles (relating to the false certificates), and they were agreed to—yeas 165, nays 160.

The question was next taken on the fourth and fifth articles, a division of the question being demanded so as to vote on those two articles separated from the remaining articles.

Then, by unanimous consent, it was permitted that the House, by a single vote, should pass on two similar amendments which Mr. Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, proposed, the one to article 4 and the other to article 5. Mr. Olmsted explained the amendments as follows:

The change which I propose is perhaps not very material; but it may be. He is charged in article 4 and again in article 5, as they now stand, with having appropriated to his own use, under a claim of right, the car of a certain railroad company and the provisions therein under the claim that, being in the hands of a receiver, he had a right to use them. Now, the facts are, according to the testimony of Judge Swayne himself and of Mr. Axtell, attorney for the receiver, that Judge Swayne did not appropriate the car, nor demand it, nor claim it as a right. It was the receiver's own suggestion. The receiver tendered Judge Swayne the car and the provisions therein, and Judge Swayne accepted them.

The question being taken, Mr. Olmsted's amendments were disagreed to without division.

Then, by yeas 162, nays 138, articles 4 and 5 were agreed to.

Articles 6 and 7 were then agreed to, yeas 159, nays 136.

Articles 8, 9, 10, and 11, were agreed to, without division.

Also articles 12 and 13 were agreed to without division.

Forms of resolutions authorizing the appointment of managers of the Swayne impeachment and directing the articles to be exhibited in the Senate.

Constitution of the managers of the Swayne impeachment.

Then, on motion of Mr. Palmer, the following resolutions were severally agreed to:[3]

Resolved, That seven managers be appointed by the Speaker of this House to conduct the impeachment against Charles Swayne, judge of the district court of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida.

[3] House Journal, pp. 162, 163; Record, p. 1058.

Resolved, That the articles agreed to by this House to be exhibited in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States against Charles Swayne, judge of the district court of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, in maintenance of their impeachment against him of high crimes and misdemeanors in office be carried to the Senate by the managers appointed to conduct said impeachment.

On January 21,[1] the Speaker announced the appointment of the following managers:

Messrs. Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania; Samuel L. Powers, of Massachusetts; Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania; James B. Perkins, of New York; Henry D. Clayton, of Alabama; David A. De Armond, of Missouri, and David H. Smith, of Kentucky.

Four of the managers belonged to the majority party in the House and three to the minority. All but two were members of the Judiciary Committee. The entire number were favorable to the impeachment, and all had voted for all the articles of impeachment so far as appeared by record votes, except Mr. Powers, who was absent, and Mr. Olmsted, who answered present on the roll call on articles 4 and 5. He voted for the other articles. Mr. Powers was of the committee which framed the articles, and joined in the report favorable to them.

The managers having been appointed, Mr. Palmer offered this resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House has appointed Mr. Palmer, Mr. Powers, of Massachusetts, Mr. Olmsted, Mr. Perkins, Mr. Clayton, Mr. De Armond, and Mr. Smith, of Kentucky, managers to conduct the impeachment against Charles Swayne, judge of the district court of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, and have directed the said managers to carry to the Senate the articles agreed upon by this House to be exhibited for maintenance of their impeachment against said Charles Swayne, and that the Clerk of the House do go with said message.

On the same day [2] the message was transmitted to the Senate and received there. Thereupon, on motion of Mr. Platt, of Connecticut, it was Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is ready to receive the managers appointed by the House for the purpose of exhibiting articles of impeachment against Charles Swayne, judge of the district court of the United States for the northern district of Florida, agreeably to the notice communicated to the Senate.

On January 23,[3] Mr. Palmer, in the House, claiming the floor for a matter of privilege, offered the following resolution, which was agreed to by the House:

Resolved, That the managers on the part of the House in the matter of the impeachment of Charles Swayne, district judge of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, be, and they are hereby, authorized to employ a clerk, stenographer, and messenger, and to incur such expense as may be necessary in the preparation and conduct of the case, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The articles of impeachment of Judge Charles Swayne.

Having exhibited in the Senate the articles impeaching Judge Swayne, the managers reported verbally to the House.

On January 24,[4] in the Senate, at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m. the managers of the impeachment, on the part of the House of Representatives, of Judge Charles Swayne appeared below the bar of the Senate, and the Assistant Sergeant-at-Arms (Alonzo H. Stewart) announced their presence as follows:

I have the honor to announce the managers on the part of the House of Representatives to conduct the impeachment against Charles Swayne, judge of the United States district court for the northern district of Florida.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The managers on the part of the House will be received, and the Sergeant-at-Arms will assign them their seats.

The managers were thereupon escorted by the Assistant Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate to the seats assigned to them in the area in front of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will make proclamation.

The Sergeant-at-Arms (D. M. Ransdell) made proclamation as follows:

Hear ye, hear ye, hear ye. All persons will keep silence, on pain of imprisonment, while the House of Representatives is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States articles of impeachment against Charles Swayne, judge of the district court of the United States for the northern district of Florida.

Mr. Manager PALMER. Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Mr. Manager.

Mr. Manager PALMER. The managers on the part of the House of Representatives are ready to exhibit articles of impeachment against Charles Swayne, district judge of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, as directed by the House, in the words and figures following:[1]

Articles exhibited by the House of Representatives of the United States of America, in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States of America, against Charles Swayne, a judge of the United States, in and for the northern district of Florida, in maintenance and support of their impeachment against him for high crimes and misdemeanor in office.

ARTICLE 1. That the said Charles Swayne, at Waco, in the State of Texas, on the 20th day of April, 1897, being then and there a United States district judge in and for the northern district of Florida, did then and there, as said judge, make and present to R. M. Love, then and there being the United States marshal in and for the northern district of Texas, a false claim against the Government of the United States in the sum of $230, then and there knowing said claim to be false, and for the purpose of obtaining payment of said false claim, did then and there as said judge, make and use a certain false certificate then and there knowing said certificate to be false, said certificate being in the words and figures following:

"UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Northern District of Texas, ss:

"I, Charles Swayne, district judge of the United States for the northern district of Florida, do hereby certify that I was directed to and held court at the city of Waco, in the northern district of Texas, twenty-three days, commencing on the 20th day of April, 1897; also, that the time engaged in holding said court, and in going to and returning from the same, was twenty-three days, and that my reasonable expenses for travel and attendance amounted to the sum of two hundred and thirty dollars and ——— cents, which sum is justly due me for such attendance and travel.

"CHAS. SWAYNE, Judge.

"WACO, May 15, 1897.

"Received of R. M. Love, United States marshal for the northern district of Texas, the sum of 230 dollars and no cents in full payment of the above account.

"$230. "CHAS. SWAYNE."

when in truth and in fact, as the said Charles Swayne then and there well knew, there was then and there justly due the said Swayne from the Government of the United States and from said United States marshal a far less sum, whereby he has been guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor in his said office.

ART. 2. That the said Charles Swayne, having been duly appointed, confirmed, and commissioned as judge of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, entered upon the duties of his office, and while in the exercise of his office as judge, as aforesaid, the said Charles Swayne was entitled by law to be paid his reasonable expenses for travel and attendance when lawfully directed to hold court outside of the northern district of Florida, not to exceed $10 per diem, to be paid upon his certificate by the United States marshal for the district in which the court was held, and was forbidden by law to receive compensation for such services. Yet the said Charles Swayne, well knowing these provisions, falsely certified that his reasonable expenses for travel and attendance were $10 per diem while holding court at Tyler, Tex., twenty-four days commencing December 3, 1900, and seven days going to and returning from said Tyler, Tex., and received therefor from the Treasury of the United States, by the hand of John Grant, the United States marshal for the eastern district of Texas, the sum of $310, when the reasonable expenses incurred and paid by the said Charles Swayne for travel and attendance did not amount to the sum of $10 per diem.

[1] The articles were enrolled on parchment, following the practice of the early trials. In the later trials of Johnson and Belknap the articles had been engrossed on ordinary white paper.

Wherefore the said Charles Swayne, judge as aforesaid, misbehaved himself and was and is guilty of a high crime, to wit, the crime of obtaining money from the United States by a false pretense, and of a high misdemeanor in office.

ART. 3. That the said Charles Swayne having been duly appointed, confirmed, and commissioned as judge of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, entered upon the duties of his office, and while in the exercise of his office of judge as aforesaid was entitled by law to be paid his reasonable expenses for travel and attendance when lawfully directed to hold court outside of the northerns district of Florida, not to exceed $10 per diem, to be paid upon his certificate by the United States marshal of the district in which the court was held, and was forbidden by law to receive any compensation for such services. Yet the said Charles Swayne, well knowing these provisions, falsely certified that his reasonable expenses for travel in going to and coming from and attendance were $10 per diem while holding court at Tyler, Tex., thirty-five days from January 12, 1903, and six days going to and returning from said Tyler, Tex., and received therefor from the Treasury of the United States, by the hand of A. J. Houston, the United States marshal for the eastern district of Texas, the sum of $410, when the reasonable expenses of the said Charles Swayne incurred and paid by him during said period were much less than said sum.

Wherefore the said Charles Swayne, judge as aforesaid, misbehaved himself and was and is guilty of a high crime, to wit, obtaining money from the United States by a false pretense, and of a high misdemeanor in office.

ART. 4. That the said Charles Swayne having been duly appointed, confirmed, and commissioned as judge of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, entered upon the duties of his office, and while in the exercise of his office as judge as aforesaid heretofore, to wit, A. D. 1893, did unlawfully appropriate to his own use, without making compensation to the owner, a certain railroad car, belonging to the Jacksonville, Tampa and Key West Railroad Company, for the purpose of transporting himself, his family, and friends from Guyencourt, in the State of Delaware, to Jacksonville, Fla., the said railroad company being at the time in the possession of a receiver appointed by said Charles Swayne, judge as aforesaid, on the petition of creditors.

The said car was supplied with provisions by the said receiver, which were consumed by said Swayne and his friends, and was provided with a conductor or porter at the cost and expense of said railroad company, and with transportation over connecting lines. The expenses of the trip were paid by the said receiver out of the funds of the said Jacksonville, Tampa and Key West Railroad Company, and the said Charles Swayne, acting as judge, allowed the credit claimed by the said receiver for and on account of the said expenditure as a part of the necessary expenses of operating said road. The said Charles Swayne, judge as aforesaid, used the said property without making compensation to the owner, and under a claim of right, for the reason that the same was in the hands of a receiver appointed by him.

Wherefore the said Charles Swayne, judge as aforesaid, was and is guilty of an abuse of judicial power and of a high misdemeanor in office.

ART. 5. That the said Charles Swayne was duly appointed, commissioned, and confirmed as judge of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, and entered upon the duties of said office, and while in the exercise of his office of judge as aforesaid heretofore, to wit, A. D. 1893, did unlawfully appropriate to his own use, without making compensation to the owner, a certain railroad car belonging to the Jacksonville, Tampa and Key West Railroad Company for the purpose of transporting himself, his family, and friends from Jacksonville, Fla., to California, said railroad company being at the time in the possession of a receiver appointed by the said Charles Swayne, judge as aforesaid, on the petition of creditors.

The car was supplied with some provisions by the said receiver, which were consumed by the said Swayne and his friends, and it was provided with a porter at the cost and expense of the railroad company and also with transportation over connecting lines. The wages of said porter and the cost of said provisions were paid by the said receiver out of the funds of the Jacksonville, Tampa and Key West Railroad Company, and the said Charles Swayne, acting as judge as aforesaid, allowed the credits claimed by the said receiver for and on account of the said expenditures as a part of the necessary expenses of operating the said railroad. The said Charles Swayne, judge as aforesaid, used the said property without making compensation to the owner under a claim of right, alleging that the same was in the hands of a receiver appointed by him and he therefore had a right to use the same.

Wherefore the said Charles Swayne, judge as aforesaid, was and is guilty of an abuse of judicial power and of high misdemeanor in office.

ART. 6. That the said Charles Swayne, having been duly appointed and confirmed, was commissioned district judge of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida on the 1st day of April, A. D. 1890, to serve during good behavior, and thereafter, to wit, on the 22d day of April, A. D. 1890, took the oath of office and assumed the duties of his appointment, and established his residence at the city of St. Augustine, in the State of Florida, which was at that time within the said northern district. That subsequently, by an act of Congress approved the 23d of July, A. D. 1894, the boundaries of the said northern district of Florida were changed, and the city of St. Augustine and contiguous territory were transferred to the southern district of Florida; whereupon it became and was the duty of the said Charles Swayne to change his residence and reside in the northern district of Florida and to comply with the five hundred and fifty-first section of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which provides that—

"A district judge shall be appointed for each district, except in cases hereinafter provided. Every judge shall reside in the district for which he is appointed, and for offending against this provision shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor."

Nevertheless the said Charles Swayne, judge as aforesaid, did not acquire a residence, and did not, within the intent and meaning of said act, reside in his said district, to wit, the northern district of Florida, from the 23d day of July, A. D. 1894, to the 1st day of October, A. D. 1900, a period of about six years.

Wherefore the said Charles Swayne, judge as aforesaid, willfully and knowingly violated the aforesaid law and was and is guilty of a high misdemeanor in office.

ART. 7. That the said Charles Swayne, having been duly appointed and confirmed, was commissioned district judge of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida on the 1st day of April, A. D. 1890, to serve during good behavior, and thereafter, to wit, on the 22d day of April, A. D. 1890, took the oath of office and assumed the duties of his appointment, and established his residence at the city of St. Augustine, in the State of Florida, which was at that time within the said northern district. That subsequently, by an act of Congress of the United States approved the 23d day of July, A. D. 1894, the boundaries of the said northern district of Florida were changed, and the city of St. Augustine, with the contiguous territory, was transferred to the southern district of Florida, whereupon it became and was the duty of the said Charles Swayne to change his residence and reside in the northern district of Florida, as defined by said act of Congress, and to comply with section 551 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which provides that—

"A district judge shall be appointed for each district, except in cases hereinafter provided. Every judge shall reside in the district for which he is appointed, and for offending against this provision shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor."

Nevertheless, the said Charles Swayne, judge as aforesaid, totally disregarding his duty as aforesaid, did not acquire a residence, and within the intent and meaning of said act did not reside in his said district, to wit, the northern district of Florida, from the 23d day of July, A. D. 1894, to the 1st day of January, A. D. 1903, a period of about nine years.

Wherefore the said Charles Swayne, judge as aforesaid, willfully and knowingly violated the aforesaid law, and was and is guilty of a high misdemeanor in office.

ART. 8. That the said Charles Swayne, having been appointed, confirmed, and duly commissioned as judge of the district court of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, entered upon the duties of said office, and while in the exercise of his office as judge, as aforesaid, to wit, while performing the duties of a judge of a circuit court of the United States, heretofore, to wit, on the 12th day of November, A. D. 1901, at the city of Pensacola, in the county of Escambia, in the State of Florida, did maliciously and unlawfully adjudge guilty of a contempt of court and impose a fine of $100 upon and commit to prison for a period of ten days E. T. Davis, an attorney and counselor at law, for an alleged contempt of the circuit court of the United States.

Wherefore the said Charles Swayne, judge as aforesaid, misbehaved himself in his office of judge, and was and is guilty of an abuse of judicial power and of a high misdemeanor in office.

ART. 9. That the said Charles Swayne, having been appointed, confirmed, and duly commissioned as judge of the district court of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, entered upon the duties of said office, and while in the exercise of his office as judge as aforesaid, to wit, while performing the duties of a judge of a circuit court of the United States heretofore, to wit, on the 12th day of November, A. D. 1901, at the city of Pensacola, in the county of Escambia, in the State of Florida, did knowingly and unlawfully adjudge guilty of a contempt of court and impose a fine of $100 upon and commit to prison for a period of ten days E. T. Davis, an attorney and counselor at law, for an alleged contempt of the circuit court of the United States.

Wherefore the said Charles Swayne, judge as aforesaid, misbehaved himself in his office of judge and was and is guilty of an abuse of judicial power and of a high misdemeanor in office.

ART. 10. That the said Charles Swayne, having been appointed, confirmed, and duly commissioned as judge of the district court of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, entered upon the duties of said office, and while in the exercise of his office as judge as aforesaid, to wit, while performing the duties of a judge of a circuit court of the United States heretofore, to wit, on the 12th day of November, A. D. 1901, at the city of Pensacola, in the county of Escambia, in the State of Florida, did maliciously and unlawfully adjudge guilty of a contempt of court and impose a fine of $100 upon and commit to prison for a period of ten days Simeon Belden, an attorney and counselor at law, for an alleged contempt of the circuit court of the United States.

Wherefore the said Charles Swayne, judge as aforesaid, misbehaved himself in his office of judge and was and is guilty of an abuse of judicial power and of a high misdemeanor in office.

ART. 11. That the said Charles Swayne, having been appointed, confirmed, and duly commissioned as judge of the district court of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, entered upon the duties of said office, and while in the exercise of his office as judge as aforesaid, to wit, while performing the duties of a circuit judge of the United States heretofore, to wit, on the 12th day of November, A. D. 1901, at the city of Pensacola, in the county of Escambia, in the State of Florida, did knowingly and unlawfully adjudge guilty of contempt of court and impose a fine of $100 upon and commit to prison for a period of ten days Simeon Belden, an attorney and counselor at law, for an alleged contempt of the circuit court of the United States.

Wherefore the said Charles Swayne, judge as aforesaid, misbehaved himself in his office as judge and was and is guilty of an abuse of judicial power and of a high misdemeanor in office.

ART. 12. That the said Charles Swayne, having been duly appointed, confirmed, and commissioned as judge of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, entered upon the duties of his office, and while in the exercise of his office of judge heretofore, to wit, on the 9th day of December, A. D. 1902, at Pensacola, in the county of Escambia, in the State of Florida, did unlawfully and knowingly adjudge guilty of contempt and did commit to prison for the period of sixty days one W. C. O'Neal, for an alleged contempt of the district court of the United States for the northern district of Florida.

Wherefore the said Charles Swayne, judge as aforesaid, misbehaved himself in his office of judge, as aforesaid, and was and is guilty of an abuse of judicial power and of a high misdemeanor in office.

And the House of Representatives by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any further articles of accusation or impeachment against the said Charles Swayne, judge of the United States court for the northern district of Florida, and also of replying to his answers which he shall make unto the articles herein preferred against him, and of offering proof to the same and every part thereof, and to all and every other article or accusation or impeachment which shall be exhibited by them as the case shall require, do demand that the said Charles Swayne may be put to answer the high crimes and misdemeanors in office herein charged against him, and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments may be thereupon had and given as may be agreeable to law and justice.

J. G. CANNON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Attest:
A. MCDOWELL, Clerk.

The articles of impeachment were handed to the Secretary of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will take proper order in the matter of the impeachment of Judge Swayne, and communicate to the House of Representatives its action.

The managers thereupon withdrew from the Chamber.

Having returned to the House,[1] the managers appeared at the bar, and Mr. Palmer reported orally:

Mr. Speaker, the managers of impeachment beg leave to report to the House that the articles of impeachment prepared by the House of Representatives against Charles Swayne, district judge of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, have been exhibited and read to the Senate, and the Presiding Officer of that body stated to the managers that the Senate would take order in the premises, due notice of which would be given to the House of Representatives.[2]

The organization of the Senate for the Swayne impeachment trial.

The oath to the Senators for the Swayne trial was administered by the Chief Justice.

At the request of the President pro tempore the Senate elected a Presiding Officer for the Swayne impeachment trial.

The Senate being organized for the Swayne impeachment, the House was notified by message.

In the Senate, after the retirement of the managers, Mr. Platt, of Connecticut, offered the following resolutions, which were severally agreed to:[3]

Ordered, That the articles of impeachment presented this day by the House of Representatives be printed for the use of the Senate.

Ordered, That at 2 o'clock this afternoon the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the articles of impeachment of Charles Swayne, judge of the United States district court for the northern district of Florida, presented this day.

Ordered, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Chair to wait upon the Chief Justice of the United States and invite him to attend in the Senate Chamber at 2 o'clock this day, to administer to Senators the oath required by the Constitution, in the matter of the impeachment of Charles Swayne, or in case of his inability to attend, any one of the associate justices.

In accordance with the last resolution, Messrs. Charles W. Fairbanks, of Indiana, and Augustus O. Bacon, of Georgia, were appointed as the committee.

Later, on the same day, in the Senate,[4] the President pro tempore[5] requested that he be relieved of the duty of presiding at the trial. Thereupon, Mr. John C. Spooner, of Wisconsin, offered this resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That in view of the statement just made to the Senate by the President pro tempore of his inability, because of recent illness, to discharge the duties of his office, other than those involved in presiding over the Senate in legislative and executive session, the Hon. Orville H. Platt, Senator from the State of Connecticut, be, and he is hereby, appointed presiding officer on the trial of the impeachment of Charle Swayne, district judge of the United States for the northern district of Florida.

A message announcing this action was transmitted to the House.[1]

At 2 o'clock p. m., on motion of Mr. Platt, of Connecticut, Rule III of the Senate, sitting for impeachment trials, providing that the presiding officer should administer the oath, was suspended.[2]

Then [3] the presence of the Chief Justice of the United States, Hon. Melville W. Fuller, was announced by the Assistant Sergeant-at-Arms.

The Chief Justice entered the Senate Chamber, escorted by Mr. Fairbanks and Mr. Bacon, the committee appointed for the purpose, and was conducted by them to a seat by the side of the President pro tempore.

Mr FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, the committee appointed by the Senate to wait upon the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States and request him to administer to Senators the oath required by the Constitution in the matter of the impeachment of Judge Charles Swayne report that they have discharged that duty. The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, complying with the request of the Senate, is now present in the Senate and ready to administer the oath required to be administered to the members of the Senate sitting in the trial of impeachments.

The Chief Justice administered the oath to the President pro tempore as follows:

You do solemnly swear that in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of Charles Swayne, judge of the district court of the United States for the northern district of Florida, now pending, you will do impartial justice according to the Constitution and laws. So help you God.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut will please present himself as Presiding Officer of the Senate while in court and take the necessary oath.

Mr. Platt, of Connecticut, advanced to the Vice-President's desk, and the oath was administered to him by the Chief Justice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll, and as their names are called Senators will present themselves at the desk in groups of ten, and the oath will be administered to them.

The oath having been administered to all the Senators present, Mr. Platt, of Connecticut, thereupon took the chair, and announced:

Senators, the Senate is now sitting for the trial of the impeachment of Charles Swayne, judge of the United States district court in and for the northern district of Florida.

Then, on motion of Mr. Charles W. Fairbanks, of Indiana, the following resolution was agreed to:

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate is now organized for the trial of articles of impeachment against Charles Swayne, judge of the United States district court for the northern district of Florida, and is ready to receive the managers on the part of the House at its bar.

This message was delivered in the House soon after.[4]

Ceremonies of demanding that process issue in the Swayne impeachment.

The Senate having ordered, on demand of the managers, that process issue against Judge Swayne, the managers returned and reported verbally to the House.

Then, on the same day,[1] in the Senate, at 2 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m., the managers of the impeachment on the part of the House of Representatives appeared at the bar and their presence was announced by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will conduct the managers to the seats provided for them within the bar of the Senate.

The managers were conducted to the seats assigned them within the space in front of the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Gentlemen managers, the Senate is now organized for the trial of the impeachment of Charles Swayne, United States judge in and for the northern district of Florida.

Mr. Manager Palmer rose and said:

Mr. President, we are instructed by the House of Representatives, as its managers, to demand that the Senate shall issue process against Charles Swayne, district judge of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, that he answer at the bar of the Senate the articles of impeachment heretofore exhibited by the House of Representatives through its managers.

Then, on motion of Mr. Fairbanks, the following resolutions were severally agreed to:

Ordered, That a summons be issued, as required by the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting for the trial of impeachment of Charles Swayne, returnable on Friday, the 27th day of the present month, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon.

Ordered, That the Senate, sitting for the trial of impeachment of Charles Swayne, adjourn until Friday, the 27th instant, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Presiding Officer then said:

The order having been agreed to, the Senate, sitting for the trial of the impeachment, stands adjourned until 1 o'clock on Friday, the 27th instant. The Senate will resume its legislative session.

Mr. Platt, of Connecticut, thereupon vacated the chair, which was resumed by the President pro tempore.

On January 26,[2] in the House, Mr. Palmer, on behalf of the managers, reported orally:

Mr. Speaker, I have the honor to report on behalf of the managers in the matter of the impeachment of Charles Swayne, district judge of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, that the Senate has organized for the trial of the impeachment; that in the name of the House of Representatives and in behalf of all the people of the United States, the managers have demanded of the Senate that process be issued against Charles Swayne, judge as aforesaid, to answer to the articles hereinbefore exhibited against him at the bar of the Senate; and that the Senate has advised us that process will be issued against him in that behalf returnable on the 27th instant, at 1 o'clock p. m.

Proceedings on the return of the writ of summons in the Swayne impeachment.

In response to the writ of summons, Judge Swayne entered appearance by his counsel.

In the Swayne impeachment, in response to the motion of respondent's counsel, the Senate granted time after the appearance to present the answer.

The managers and respondent in the Swayne case were directed to furnish a list of their witnesses to the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate.

The oath to Senators in the Swayne impeachment trial was administered by the Presiding Officer after the organization was completed.

On January 27,[1] in the Senate, the President pro tempore said:

The hour of 1 o'clock, to which the Senate sitting as a court in the impeachment of Judge Charles Swayne adjourned, has arrived. Will the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Platt] please take the chair?

Mr. Platt, of Connecticut, thereupon took the chair as Presiding Officer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will make the opening proclamation.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. Hear ye, hear ye, hear ye. All persons are commanded to keep silence on pain of imprisonment while the Senate of the United States is sitting for the trial of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against Charles Swayne, judge of the district court of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will now call the names of those Senators who have not been sworn, and such of those Senators as are present in the Chamber will, as their names are called, advance to the desk and take the oath.

The Secretary called the names of the Senators who had not been heretofore sworn, whereupon Senators Blackburn, Depew, Dryden, Knox, and McLaurin advanced to the area in front of the Secretary's desk, and the oath was administered to them by the Presiding Officer.[2]

Mr. Charles W. Fairbanks, of Indiana, then offered this resolution, which was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is sitting in its Chamber and ready to proceed with the trial of the impeachment of Charles Swayne.[3]

At 1 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m. the Assistant Sergeant-at-Arms announced the managers on the part of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The managers will be admitted and conducted to the seats provided for them within the bar of the Senate.

The managers were conducted to seats provided in the space in front of the Secretary's desk on the left of the Chair, namely: Hon. Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania; Hon. Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania; Hon. James B. Perkins, of New York; Hon. Henry D. Clayton, of Alabama; Hon. David A. De Armond, of Missouri, and Hon. David H. Smith, of Kentucky.

At 1 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m. Hon. Anthony Higgins and Hon. John M. Thurston, counsel for the respondent, Charles Swayne, entered the Senate Chamber and were conducted to the seats assigned them in the space in front of the Secretary's desk on the right of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the minutes of the proceedings of the last session of the Senate while sitting in the trial of the impeachment of Charles Swayne.

The Secretary read the Journal of proceedings of the Senate, sitting for the trial of the impeachment, of Tuesday, January 24, 1905.

---

[1] Senate Journal, p. 346; Record, pp. 1449–1451.

[2] The House managers called the attention of the Senate to the law permitting the Presiding Officer to administer the oath.

[3] This message was duly received in the House, Record, p. 1479.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will now read the return of the Sergeant-at-Arms to the summons directed to be served.

The Secretary read the following return appended to the writ of summons:

The foregoing writ of summons, addressed to Charles Swayne, and the foregoing precept, addressed to me, were duly served upon the said Charles Swayne by delivery to and leaving with him true and attested copies of the same at 1215 Tatnall street, Wilmington, Del., the residence of Henry G. Swayne, on Tuesday, the 24th day of January, 1905, at 7 o'clock and 45 minutes in the afternoon of that day.

DANIEL M. RANSDELL,
Sergeant-at-Arms United States Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will now administer to the Sergeant-at-Arms an oath in support of the truth of his return.

The Secretary (Mr. Charles G. Bennett) administered the following oath to the Sergeant-at-Arms:

You, Daniel M. Ransdell, Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate of the United States, do solemnly swear that the return made by you upon the process issued on the 24th day of January, 1905, by the Senate of the United States against Charles Swayne, is truly made, and that you have performed such service as therein described: So help you God.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. I do so swear.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will make proclamation.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. Charles Swayne, Charles Swayne, Charles Swayne, judge of the district court of the United States for the northern district of Florida: Appear and answer to the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against you.

Mr. HIGGINS. Mr. President, on behalf of the respondent, Charles Swayne, I beg to enter the following appearance:

To the honorable the Senate of the United States, sitting as a Court of Impeachment:

I, Charles Swayne, judge of the district court of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, now present in the city of Washington, having been served with a summons to be in the city of Washington on the 27th day of January, 1905, at 1 o'clock afternoon, to answer certain articles of impeachment presented against me by the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States, do hereby enter my appearance by my counsel, Anthony Higgins and John M. Thurston, who have my warrant and authority therefor, and who are instructed by me to ask this court for a reasonable time for the preparation of my answer to said articles.

CHARLES SWAYNE.

Dated at Washington, D. C., this 27th day of January, A. D. 1905.

I ask this be filed, and I submit a copy for the managers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be placed on file.

Mr. THURSTON. On behalf of the respondent we make the following motion:

In the Senate of the United States, sitting as a court of impeachment. The United States of America v. Charles Swayne. Upon articles of impeachment presented by the House of Representatives of the United States of America.

The respondent, by his counsel, now comes and moves the court to grant him the period of seven days in which to prepare and present his answer to the articles of impeachment presented against him herein.

ANTHONY HIGGINS.
JOHN M. THURSTON.

Then, on motion of Mr. Fairbanks, it was Ordered, That the respondent present his answer to the articles of impeachment at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes post meridian on the 3d day of February next.

Also, on motion of Mr. Fairbanks, at the suggestion of the managers, it was Ordered, That lists of witnesses be furnished the Sergeant-at-Arms by the managers and the respondent, who shall be subpœnaed by him to appear on the 10th day of February, at 1 o'clock post meridian.

A proposition of the managers that the trial proceed on the 13th of February was objected to by counsel for respondent, who suggested the 10th of February instead, and it was not pressed.

Then, on motion of Mr. Fairbanks, the Senate, sitting for the trial of the impeachment, adjourned until Friday, February 3, 1905, at 12.30 o'clock p. m.

The managers on the part of the House and the counsel for the respondent withdrew from the Chamber.

The President pro tempore resumed the Chair.

Forms and ceremonies in the Senate at the session for receiving respondent's answer in the Swayne case.

Proclamation of the Sergeant-at-Arms at opening of session of the Senate sitting for the Swayne impeachment trial.

At the presentation of the answer in the Swayne case the respondent was represented by his counsel.

Rule of the Senate in the Swayne trial for submitting of requests or applications by managers or counsel.

Rule governing the Senators in the Swayne trial as to colloquys and questions.

On February 3,[1] in the Senate,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.). The hour has arrived to which the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment adjourned, and the Senator from Connecticut will please take the chair.

Mr. Platt, of Connecticut, assumed the chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Platt, of Connecticut). The Senate is now sitting for the trial of the impeachment of Charles Swayne, a judge of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida. The Sergeant-at-Arms will make proclamation.

The Sergeant-at-Arms made proclamation as follows:

Hear ye, hear ye, hear ye. All persons are commanded to keep silence, on pain of imprisonment, while the Senate of the United States is sitting for the trial of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives of the United States against Charles Swayne, judge of the district court of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida.

The oath was then administered to certain Senators not previously sworn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will notify the managers, if they are in waiting, that the Senate is ready to proceed.

At 12 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m. the managers on the part of the House of Representatives were announced, and they were conducted by the Assistant Sergeant-at-Arms to the seats assigned them in the area in front of the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will also notify the counsel for the respondent.

Mr. Anthony Higgins and Mr. John M. Thurston, counsel for the respondent, entered the Chamber and were assigned to the seats provided for them in the area in front of the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Journal of the proceedings of the last session of the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of Charles Swayne will now be read.

[1] Senate Journal, p. 347; Record, pp. 1818–1832.

The Journal of the proceedings of the Senate sitting as a court on Friday, January 27, 1905, was read and approved.

Then, on motion of Mr. Augustus O. Bacon, a Senator from Georgia, it was—Ordered, That in all matters relating to the procedure of the Senate sitting in the trial of the impeachment of Charles Swayne, judge of the district court of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, whether as to form or otherwise, the managers on the part of the House, or the counsel representing the respondent, may submit a request or application orally to the Presiding Officer, or, if required by him or requested by any Senator, shall submit the same in writing.

In all matters relating immediately to the trial, such as the admission, rejection, or striking out of evidence, or other questions usually arising in the trial of causes in courts of justice, if the managers or counsel for the respondent desire to make any application, request, or objection, the same shall be addressed directly to the Presiding Officer and not otherwise.

It shall not be in order for any Senator to engage in colloquy, or to address questions either to the managers on the part of the House or the counsel for the respondent, nor shall it be in order for Senators to address each other, but they shall address their remarks directly to the Presiding Officer.

The answer of Judge Swayne to the articles of impeachment.

Judge Swayne's answer was signed by himself and his counsel.

The answer of Judge Swayne as to the first seven articles raised a question as to the jurisdiction of the Senate to try the charges.

Then Mr. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, said:

Mr. President, counsel for the respondent now come, and for answer of said Charles Swayne under impeachment herein say:

And the said Charles Swayne, named in said articles of impeachment, comes before the honorable Senate of the United States, sitting as a court of impeachment, and says that this honorable court ought not to have or take further cognizance of the first of said articles of impeachment so exhibited and presented against him, because, he says, the facts set forth in said first article do not, if true, constitute an impeachable high crime and misdemeanor as defined in the Constitution of the United States.

And now, not waiving the foregoing plea to the jurisdiction of the honorable Senate of the United States, sitting as a court of impeachment, as to said first article, the said respondent, saving to himself all advantages of exception to said first article, for answer thereto saith:

He admits that on the 20th day of April, 1897, at Waco, in the State of Texas, acting as United States judge in and for the northern district of Florida, he made and presented to R. N. Love, the United States marshal in and for the northern district of Texas, the certificate in writing as set forth in the said first article, and did then and there receive from the said R. N. Love, United States marshal as aforesaid, the sum of $230 in full payment of the account certified to as aforesaid, and the respondent says that he then and there believed, and still believes and insists, that, under the true meaning and intent of the statutes of the United States allowing the expenses of a district judge of the United States for travel and expenses while holding court outside of his own district, the said claim was just and in strict accordance with the provisions of the law of Congress in that respect enacted; and he denies that he then and there knew or believed said claim to be false, as set forth in said article; and he denies that he signed and presented the said certificate for the purpose of obtaining payment of any false claim; and he denies that he then and there made and used a false certificate knowing or believing said certificate to be false. [Etc., specifying at length.]

* * * And respondent says that he attaches to this, his answer to the said article 1, copies of certificates of the honorable the Secretary of the Treasury, marked, respectively, Exhibits A et seq., and asks that the same be accepted and taken as a part of this his answer to the said article 1. * * *

These exhibits were attached, not at the end of the answer, but at the end of article first.

To articles second and third, which related to the offense set forth in article 1, answer was made in similar form.

As to article 4, the answer says:

And the said Charles Swayne, named in the articles of impeachment, says that this honorable court ought not to have or take further cognizance of the fourth of said articles of impeachment so exhibited and presented against him, because, he says, the facts set forth in the said fourth article do not, if true, constitute an impeachable high crime and misdemeanor as defined in the Constitution of the United States.

And now, not waiving the foregoing plea to the jurisdiction of the honorable Senate of the United States, sitting as a court of impeachment, as to said fourth article, the said respondent, saving to himself all advantages of exception to said fourth article, for answer thereto saith:

He admits that he was duly appointed, confirmed, and commissioned as a district judge of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, and that he had entered upon the duties of his office prior to 1893 and had continued in the performance of the duties and in the exercise of his office of judge up to the present time.

He denies that at the time specified in said article 4, to wit, A. D. 1893, he did unlawfully appropriate to his own use, without making compensation to the owner, a certain railway car belonging to the Jacksonville, Tampa and Key West Railroad Company, for the purposes stated in said article 4, or for any other purpose or purposes whatsoever; and as to the true facts of the transaction referred to in said article 4, he says, etc.

To article 5, which related to the same offense as article 4, a similar answer was given.

As to article 6 the answer was:

And the said Charles Swayne, named in said articles of impeachment, says that this honorable court ought not to have or take further cognizance of the sixth of said articles of impeachment so exhibited and presented against him, because, he says, the facts set forth in said sixth article do not, if true, constitute an impeachable high crime and misdemeanor as defined in the Constitution of the United States.

And now, not waiving the foregoing plea to the jurisdiction of the honorable Senate of the United States, sitting as a court of impeachment, as to said sixth article, the said respondent, saving to himself all advantages of exceptions to said sixth article, for answer thereto saith:

He admits that prior to the year 1900 he had been duly appointed, confirmed, and commissioned as judge of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, and had entered upon the duties of his office, and that he was in the exercise of his office as judge as aforesaid at all times in the said article specified and as therein alleged.

The respondent denies that he did not acquire a residence in the northern district of Florida and did not, within the intent and meaning of the five hundred and fifty-first section of the Revised Statutes of the United States, reside in said district from the 23d day of July, 1894, to the 1st day of October, 1900; and denies that he violated said section; and denies that he was and is guilty of a high misdemeanor in office as charged in said article 6.

The respondent further says, etc.

As to article 7, which related to the same offense as set forth in article 6, the answer is similar.

As to the remaining articles, relating to the contempt cases, the answer begins as to each with a saving clause, and proceeds generally as follows:

And the said respondent, saving to himself all advantages of exception or otherwise to article 8 of the said articles of impeachment, for answer thereto saith:

He admits that prior to the 12th day of November, A. D. 1901, he had been duly appointed, confirmed, and commissioned as a district judge of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, and had entered upon the duties of his office prior to said date, and continued in the performance of the duties and in the exercise of his office of judge up to the present time, and he says that at all the times mentioned in said article 8 he was exercising and performing the duties of a district judge in and for the northern district of Florida, and that on the 12th day of November, A. D. 1901, he was holding a session of the district and circuit court of said district at the city of Pensacola, in the State of Florida, and he admits that on said date he did adjudge guilty of contempt of court and impose a fine of $100 upon and commit to prison for a period of ten days one E. T. Davis, an attorney and counselor at law, as set forth in said article 8, but he denies that said judicial action on his part was malicious or unlawful, and, on the contrary, he insists and asserts that said judgment was rendered and said sentence imposed by him from a high sense of judicial and public duty, and that upon the proceedings then pending and heard before him he could not have done otherwise than to have adjudged the said E. T. Davis guilty of the contempt of court stated in said article 8.

Respondent, further answering, says, etc.

And in conclusion the form of the answer was:

And this respondent, in submitting to this honorable court this his answer to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him, respectfully reserves leave to amend and add to the same from time to time as may become necessary or proper and when said necessity and propriety shall appear.

CHAS. SWAYNE.

ANTHONY HIGGINS,
JOHN M. THURSTON,
Of Counsel for Respondent.

2482. The Swayne impeachment continued.

Forms of procedure of authorizing, preparing, and presenting the replication in the Swayne impeachment trial.

Mr. Manager Palmer then asked [1] that the following order be agreed to:

Ordered, That the managers have time until Monday next, at 2 p. m., to consult the House of Representatives on the subject of filing exceptions, demurrer, or replication to the answer of the respondent, and that they be furnished with a copy of the said answer.

Mr. Charles W. Fairbanks, a Senator from Indiana, proposed instead an order which, after a reference to the precedent of the Belknap trial, and some modification as to time, was agreed to as follows:

Ordered, That the managers on the part of the House be allowed until the 6th day of February instant, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, to present a replication, or other pleading, of the House of Representatives to the answer of the respondent. That any subsequent pleadings, either on the part of the managers or of the respondent, shall be filed with the Secretary of the Senate, of which notice shall be given to the House of Representatives and the respondent respectively, so that all pleadings shall be closed on or before the 9th day of February instant, and that the trial shall proceed on the 10th day of February instant, at 2 o'clock p. m.

Then, on motion of Mr. Manager Palmer, the following order was agreed to:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate communicate to the House of Representatives an attested copy of the answer of Charles Swayne, judge of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, to the articles of impeachment, and also a copy of the foregoing order.

After an order had been made for printing the articles and the answer as documents, the Senate, "sitting as a court of impeachment," [2] adjourned until Monday, February 6, 1905, at 2 o'clock p. m.

The managers on the part of the House and the counsel for the respondent retired from the Chamber.

The President pro tempore resumed the chair.

On February 4 [3] a message from the Senate transmitted to the House an attested copy of the respondent's answer, which was referred to the managers.

[2] These words appear in the Record. The Senate Journal (p. 359) speaks of the "Senate sitting for the trial."

The message also transmitted the resolution of the Senate fixing a time for the filing of the replication and further pleadings.

On February 6,[1] in the House, Mr. Palmer, from the managers, reported the following replication, which was agreed to without debate or division:

Replication by the House of Representatives of the United States of America to the answer of Charles Swayne, judge of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives.

The House of Representatives of the United States have considered the several answers of Charles Swayne, district judge of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, to the several articles of impeachment against him by them exhibited in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, and reserving to themselves all advantage of exception to the insufficiency, irrelevancy, and impertinency of his answer to each and all of the several answers of impeachment exhibited against the said Charles Swayne, judge as aforesaid, do deny each and every averment in said several answers, or either of them, which denies or traverses the acts, intents, crimes, or misdemeanors charged against Charles Swayne in said articles of impeachment or either of them; and for replication to said answer, do say that said Charles Swayne, district judge of the United States in and for the northern district of Florida, is guilty of the high crimes and misdemeanors mentioned in said articles, and that the House of Representatives are ready to prove the same.

Then, on motion of Mr. Palmer, it was also—

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate by the Clerk of the House informing the Senate that the House of Representatives has adopted a replication to the answer of Charles Swayne, judge of the northern district of Florida, to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him and that the same will be presented to the Senate by the managers on the part of the House.

And also, that the managers have authority to file with the Secretary of the Senate, on the part of the House, any subsequent pleadings they shall deem necessary.

This message was communicated to the Senate very soon thereafter,[2] and received during the legislative session.

On the same day, at 2 p. m., the Senate[3] went into session for the trial in the usual form, and after the reading of the Journal, the Presiding Officer laid before the Senate sitting for the trial the message which had been received during the legislative session.

Thereupon Mr. Palmer, for the managers, who were in attendance, presented and read the replication.

Thereupon the Presiding Officer asked:

Have the managers anything further to offer?

Mr. Manager Palmer replied:

Nothing to offer to-day, sir.

The Presiding Officer then said:

Have counsel for the respondent anything to offer?

Mr. Higgins replied:

Should we be advised there is anything further to offer we assume it can be done without a formal meeting of the Senate. It would be merely to join issue, in technical phrase.

The Presiding Officer rejoined:

It may, under the order which has already been adopted, be filed with the Secretary.

Then, on motion of Mr. Augustus O. Bacon, a Senator from Georgia, it was—Ordered, That the Senate sitting in the trial of impeachment of Charles Swayne adjourn until Friday, the 10th instant, at 1 o'clock p. m.

Forms and ceremonies in the Swayne trial during the presentation of testimony.

The House of Representatives, although invited by the Senate, did not at any time attend the Swayne trial.

The respondent attended during the presentation of testimony and the arguments in the Swayne trial.

Instance wherein a witness was examined on the question of issuing process for a witness in the Swayne trial.

On February 10,[1] in the Senate sitting for the trial, Mr. Augustus O. Bacon, a Senator from Georgia, presented the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Ordered, That the pleadings in the matter of the impeachment of Charles Swayne having been closed, the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is ready to proceed with the trial of said impeachment according to the rule heretofore communicated to the House, and that provision has been made for the accommodation of the House of Representatives and its managers in the Senate Chamber.[2]

At 1 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m. the managers on the part of the House of Representatives were announced, and they were conducted by the Assistant Sergeant-at-Arms to the seats assigned them in the area in front of the Secretary's desk.

The respondent, Charles Swayne, accompanied by his counsel, Mr. Anthony Higgins and Mr. John M. Thurston, entered the Chamber and took the seats provided for them in the area in front of the Secretary's desk.

The Presiding Officer. The Journal of the proceedings of the last session of the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of Charles Swayne will now be read.

The Journal of the proceedings of the Senate sitting as a court on Monday, February 6, 1905, was read and approved.

The Presiding Officer. The Presiding Officer will inquire of the Sergeant-at-Arms whether the names of the witnesses have been furnished him by the managers on the part of the House and by the counsel for the respondent, and whether those witnesses have been summoned for attendance at this time?

The Sergeant-at-Arms. Mr. President, the names of the witnesses for both the managers on the part of the House of Representatives and the respondent have been furnished me and have been served, and many of the witnesses are now in the city.

Then, on motion of Mr. Charles W. Fairbanks, a Senator from Indiana, the following orders were severally agreed to:

Ordered, That the proceedings of the Senate sitting in the trial of impeachment of Charles Swayne be printed daily for the use of the Senate as a separate document.

---

[1] Senate Journal, p. 360; Record, p. 2229.

[2] No action was taken by the House, and it did not attend the proceedings at any time.

Ordered, That the daily sessions of the Senate sitting in the trial of impeachment of Charles Swayne, shall, unless otherwise ordered, commence at 2 o'clock in the afternoon and continue until 5 o'clock in the afternoon.

Then, on suggestion of Mr. Manager Palmer, the names of the witnesses were called over to ascertain their presence.

Then Mr. Manager Palmer stated:

Mr. President, in the case of Joseph H. Durkee, of Jacksonville, Fla., we have a certificate of a physician stating that he is not able to attend. The certificate was sent to the Presiding Officer and by him handed to me, and it has been exhibited to counsel on the other side.

Mr. Durkee is a witness who has been subpœnaed by both sides, and is a material and important witness. I have a witness present who will testify with respect to Mr. Durkee's present condition, and I ask that Mr. B. S. Liddon be summoned to testify what Mr. Durkee's present condition is, for the purpose of moving for an attachment.

Thereupon Mr. Liddon was examined under oath; and then the Presiding Officer announced that the Senate would take into account the issuance of an attachment.

Then Mr. Manager Palmer opened the case for the House of Representatives, setting forth what the managers expected to prove.

Then the introduction of testimony on behalf of the managers began.

This presentation of testimony continued until February 20,[1] when Mr. Manager Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, announced that the case of the managers was in.

Immediately thereafter Mr. Anthony Higgins, of counsel for the respondent, proceeded[2] with the opening address in respondent's case. He not only outlined the defense, but entered somewhat into argument on the legal features of the case. Mr. Higgins consumed the remainder of the session on that day, and spoke some time the next day.[3]

The introduction of testimony on behalf of the respondent then began and continued from day to day.

On February 23[4] the Senate agreed to the following:

Ordered, That the session of the Senate sitting this day in the trial of the impeachment of Charles Swayne shall continue until 6 o'clock, when a recess shall be taken until 8 o'clock, and the session shall be continued until 10 o'clock unless otherwise ordered.

The Senate limited the time of the final arguments in the Swayne impeachment trial.

The Senate, after deliberation, permitted written arguments to be filed in the Swayne case, but only in such way as would permit reply.

Rebuttal evidence was offered by the managers in the Swayne trial.

Order of final arguments in the Swayne case.

On the same day,[5] Mr. Charles W. Fairbanks, a Senator from Indiana, offered the following:

Ordered, That the managers be allowed five hours for the argument of the case, the time to be divided between them as they may agree, but the concluding oral argument shall be by one manager and shall not exceed one hour.

Ordered, That counsel for the respondent be allowed five hours for the argument of the case, the time to be divided between them as they may agree.

[3] Record, pp. 2975–2979.
[4] Record, p. 3142.
[5] Record, pp. 3142–3145.

These orders were agreed to, but presently the vote was reconsidered on suggestion that the managers would prefer a different division of their time, so that the closing argument might be longer than an hour. So an amendment was adopted to provide that the closing argument by the manager should not exceed one hour and forty minutes. As amended the order was then agreed to.

Thereupon Mr. Manager Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, offered the following motion:

That any of the managers or counsel for respondent having all or any portion of his argument in manuscript, may deliver a copy of the same to the reporter, and any portion thereof which for lack of time or to save the time of the Senate the managers or counsel shall omit to deliver or read shall be incorporated by the reporter as part of the argument delivered, and any manager who does not address the court may file an argument before the close of the discussion.

Mr. Palmer explained the reasons for this motion:

I wish to explain the reason why we ask for this privilege. We have made no objection to curtailing the time, though this is the first time in the history of impeachment trials where the time of the managers has been curtailed. To be sure, the rule of the Senate provides that a case shall be closed by two managers, but there has never been any limit of time. We have consented to curtail the time of the gentlemen who are to speak in this case so that some of them shall have forty-five, some fifty, and some sixty minutes. Of course they will not be able to go over the case and do themselves or the case justice in that length of time. Their arguments can be printed in the Record and can be read afterwards by anybody who desires to read them.

Again, it was ordered by the Senate the other day that a brief on the part of the counsel for respondent should be printed, and a brief of 48 pages was printed about ten days ago, but we never got a chance to look at it until this morning, when it was printed in the Record. That brief pertains to jurisdictional affairs, and it is particularly desired to print a brief of the law of the case to meet the brief on the part of the gentlemen on the other side.

In the course of argument by Senators, Mr. John C. Spooner, of Wisconsin, said:

I can see no objection to the publication or the printing in the Record of any argument on one side which the other side seasonably will have opportunity to peruse and to answer.

This is a case which involves, of course, the interests of the people. It involves vitally the interests of the respondent. Whether technically this is a court or not, it pronounces a sentence or judgment. It is a court or a tribunal of first instance and of last resort. There is no appeal from its decision. If it commits an error, there is no reviewing tribunal.

Nowhere in any judicial tribunal in the country, I think, in a matter involving not simply the right to hold an office, but the right ever to hold an office of honor, trust, or emolument, would it be tolerated that an argument should be made and communicated to the court without opportunity to counsel on the other side to reply to it as fully as they might be advised.

Now, if the managers have some argument to submit in answer to the brief which is printed in the Record this morning, that, I should think, would be entirely proper to be printed, but that the managers shall be permitted to submit to the Senate, after the counsel for the respondent have finished their argument, further argument on any of these charges or these articles I think is against the justice of judicial procedure.

Mr. John W. Daniel, of Virginia, said:

Mr. President, my disposition would be to vote for any reasonable request made by the managers or by counsel for the respondent here, but I could under no circumstances vote affirmatively on that request. In my opinion it violates the fundamental principles of English and American law. Every accused person is entitled to be present with his counsel, to have an opportunity to hear every charge and every word of argumentative speech that is made against him, and also to have opportunity to respond thereto. It seems to me that a statement of the case carries an enforcement of its justice. If that request were granted a most serious and grave argument might appear in print after this case was heard, presenting it in aspects which had not occurred either to the accused, to his counsel, or to any of his judges.

In response to these suggestions the proposed order was modified and agreed to as follows:

That any of the managers or counsel for respondent having all or any portion of his argument in manuscript may deliver a copy of the same to the reporter, and any portion thereof, which for lack of time or to save the time of the Senate, the managers or counsel shall omit to deliver or read, shall be incorporated by the reporter as part of the argument delivered, and any manager who does not address the court may file an argument before the close of the discussion: Provided, That all briefs and arguments shall be printed before the closing argument for the respondent begins.

On February 23,[1] at the evening session, counsel for the respondent announced that their case was closed.

The managers then began the presentation of rebuttal evidence.

The rebuttal evidence being concluded, and the managers having, in accordance with permission already given, submitted a brief to be printed, Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, on this day (February 23)[2] offered on behalf of the respondent, and by reason of the approaching end of the Congress with consequent pressure of legislative business, to submit the case without argument. This offer was declined by the managers.

Mr. Manager Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, then began the arguments in closing.

On February 24[3] Mr. Manager James B. Perkins, of New York, argued; and was followed by Messrs. Managers Henry D. Clayton, of Alabama, and Samuel L. Powers, of Massachusetts, and they were followed on the same day by Mr. Anthony Higgins, of counsel for the respondent.

On February 25[4] Mr. John M. Thurston, of counsel for the respondent, argued; and then, on the same day, Mr. Manager David A. De Armond, of Missouri, closed the case for the House of Representatives and the people.

The Senate in secret session framed the rule for voting on the articles impeaching Judge Swayne.

The respondent did not attend when the articles in the Swayne case were voted on in the Senate.

Forms of voting on the articles and declaring the result in the Swayne impeachment.

Judgment of acquittal entered in the Swayne case by direction of the Presiding Officer.

The Swayne trial being concluded, the Senate, on motion, adjourned without day.

The Senate announced to the House by message the acquittal of Judge Swayne.

Then, on the same day,[1] on motion of Mr. Charles W. Fairbanks, a Senator from Indiana, it was ordered that the doors be closed for deliberation.

The managers on the part of the House, the respondent, and counsel for the respondent retired from the Chamber.

The Senate proceeded to deliberate with closed doors, and at the expiration of one hour and thirty-five minutes the doors were reopened.

While the doors were closed,

Mr. Augustus O. Bacon, of Georgia, submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That on Monday next, the 27th day of February, at 10 o'clock a. m., the Senate shall proceed to vote, without debate, on the several articles of impeachment. The Presiding Officer shall direct the Secretary to read the several articles of impeachment in their regular order. After the reading of each article the Presiding Officer shall put the question following: "Senators, how say you, is the respondent, Charles Swayne, guilty or not guilty as charged in this article?" The Secretary will proceed to call the roll for the response of Senators.

Whereupon, when his name is called, each Senator shall arise in his place and give his response "guilty" or "not guilty," and the Secretary shall record the same.

Resolved, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives of the foregoing.

On February 27,[2] in the Senate, the following occurred:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 10 o'clock having arrived, to which the Senate sitting in the impeachment trial adjourned, the Senator from Connecticut will please take the chair.

Mr. Platt, of Connecticut, assumed the chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Platt, of Connecticut). The Senate is now sitting in the impeachment trial of Charles Swayne. The Sergeant-at-Arms will make proclamation.

The Sergeant-at-Arms made the usual proclamation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will see if the managers on the part of the House are in attendance.

The managers on the part of the House (with the exception of Mr. Powers, of Massachusetts, and Mr. Perkins) appeared and were conducted to the seats assigned them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will see if the respondent and his counsel are in attendance.

Mr. Higgins and Mr. Thurston, the counsel for the respondent, entered the Chamber and took the seats assigned them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Journal of the last trial day will be read.

The Journal of the proceedings of the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of Charles Swayne Friday, February 24, was read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the first article of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against Charles Swayne.

The Secretary read the first article of impeachment, as follows: * * *

The article having been read, the Presiding Officer put the question:

Senators, how say you, is the respondent, Charles Swayne, guilty or not guilty as charged in this article?

---

[1] Senate Journal, p. 365; Record, p. 3383.

[2] Senate Journal, pp. 365–369; Record, pp. 3467–3472.

The roll was then called, Senators answering "guilty" or "not guilty." In the same manner the verdict was taken on each article, with result as follows:

	Guilty.	Not guilty.
Article I	33	49
Article II	32	50
Article III	32	50
Article IV	13	69
Article V	13	69
Article VI	31	51
Article VII	19	63
Article VIII	31	51
Article IX	31	51
Article X	31	51
Article XI	31	51
Article XII	35	47

After the vote on the first article the Presiding Officer announced:

Senators, upon Article 1 of the impeachment of Charles Swayne 33 Senators have voted "guilty" and 49 Senators have voted "not guilty." Two-thirds of the Senators present not having voted "guilty," Charles Swayne, the respondent, stands acquitted of the charges contained in the first article.

A similar announcement was made after the vote on each article.

At the conclusion of the voting, after the result on the twelfth article had been recorded, the Presiding Officer said:

The Presiding Officer, following the precedent in the Belknap impeachment case, calls the attention of the Senate to the twenty-second rule of procedure and practice in the trial of impeachments, which provides:

"And if the impeachment shall not, upon any of the articles presented, be sustained by the votes of two-thirds of the members present, a judgment of acquittal shall be entered; but if the person accused in such articles of impeachment shall be convicted upon any of said articles by the votes of two-thirds of the members present, the Senate shall proceed to pronounce judgment, and a certified copy of such judgment shall be deposited in the office of the Secretary of State."

If there is no objection, the Presiding Officer will direct the Secretary to enter a judgment of acquittal according to the rule. The Chair hears no objection. The Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Senate having tried Charles Swayne, judge of the district court of the United States for the northern district of Florida, upon twelve several articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives, and two-thirds of the Senators present not having found him guilty of the charges contained therein: It is therefore Ordered and adjudged, That the said Charles Swayne be, and he is, acquitted of the charges in said articles made and set forth.

Mr. Charles W. Fairbanks, of Indiana, said:

Mr. President, I move that the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of Charles Swayne adjourn without day.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 11 o'clock and 40 minutes a. m.) the Senate sitting upon the trial of the impeachment of Charles Swayne adjourned without day.

The managers on the part of the House and the counsel for the respondent retired from the Chamber.

The President pro tempore resumed the chair.

On the same day,[1] in the House, this message was received:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
February 27, 1905.

The Senate having tried Charles Swayne, judge of the district court of the United States for the northern district of Florida, upon twelve several articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives, and two-thirds of the Senators present not having found him guilty of the charges contained therein: It is therefore Ordered and adjudged, That the said Charles Swayne be, and he is, acquitted of the charges in said articles made and set forth.

Attest:

CHARLES G. BENNETT, Secretary.

The managers made no report to the House.

2486. The inquiry into the conduct of Judge George Turner in 1796.

In 1796 the House discontinued impeachment proceedings against a Territorial judge on assurance that he would be prosecuted in the courts.

Opinion of Attorney-General Charles Lee as to impeachment of a Territorial judge holding office during good behavior.

Advice of Attorney-General Lee as to mode of instituting and continuing impeachment proceedings.

On receipt of a petition containing charges against a judge, the House, in 1796, instituted an investigation.

* See Volume VI, Chapter CCII.

On April 25, 1796,[1] a petition was presented in the House from sundry inhabitants of the county of St. Clair, in the Territory northwest of the Ohio River, stating certain grievances and inconveniences to which they had been subjected by the unwarrantable conduct of George Turner, one of the judges of the said Territory, in the exercise of his official duties, and praying that such relief might be granted in the premises as should seem meet to the wisdom of Congress. This petition specified that the judge held a court "unknown to and contrary to the laws of the Territory" at a remote and inconvenient place; that he imposed heavy fines and forfeitures; that he denied the right reserved to the people by the constitution of the Territory, especially as regarded the descent and conveyance of property, and the use of the French language; and that he managed the affairs of interstate persons to the damage of the heirs and creditors.

The House referred the petition to a committee composed of Messrs. Theophilus Bradbury, of Massachusetts; Nicholas Gilman, of New Hampshire; Thomas Hartley, of Pennsylvania; John Heath, of Virginia, and Alexander D. Orr, of Kentucy.

On May 5,[2] the committee were discharged from further consideration of the petition and the same was referred to the Attorney-General for his opinion thereon.

On May 9,[3] Charles Lee, the Attorney-General, transmitted his opinion:

That the charges exhibited in the petition against Judge Turner, and especially the first, second, and fifth, are of so serious a nature as to require that a regular and fair examination into the truth of them should be made, in some judicial course of proceeding; and if he be convicted thereof, a removal rom office may and ought to be a part of the punishment. His official tenure is during good behavior; and, consequently, he can not be removed until he be lawfully convicted of some malversation in office. A judge may be prosecuted in three modes for official misdemeanors or crimes: by information, or by an indictment before an ordinary court, or by impeachment before the Senate of the United States. The last mode, being the most solemn, seems, in general cases, to be best suited to the trial of so high and important an officer; but, in the present instance, it will be found very inconvenient, if not entirely impracticable, on account of the immense distance of the residence of the witnesses from this city [Philadelphia]. In the prosecution of an impeachment, such rules must be observed as are essential to justice; and, if not exactly the same as those which are practiced in ordinary courts, they must be analogous, and as nearly similar to them as forms will permit. Thus, before an impeachment is sent to the Senate, witnesses must be examined, in solemn form, respecting the charges, before a committee of the House of Representatives, to be appointed for that purpose, as in a case of indictment witnesses are examined by a grand jury. Upon the trial the witnesses must give their testimony before the Senate, as in a case of indictment they do before the ordinary court and petit jury; so, also, perhaps, it would be proper that some responsible person or persons should undertake to answer the costs of trial to the accused, in the event of his acquittal. It ought to be remarked that, if the mode of impeachment be deemed preferable, the aforesaid petition, subscribed by forty-nine citizens, may be regarded as sufficient inducement to the House to appoint a committee of inquiry, with authority to examine witnesses and report the substance of their testimony respecting the charges therein set forth, at the present or next session; and, if the report of the testimony will warrant an impeachment, articles are to be directed to be drawn and presented to the Senate, who will appoint a time of trial, giving reasonable notice thereof to the accused and to the accusers, etc.

However, the Attorney-General is of opinion that it will be more advisable, on account of the expense, the delay, the certain difficulty, if not impossibility, of obtaining the attendance here of the witnesses who reside in the Territory northwest of the Ohio, about the distance of 1,500 miles, that the prosecution should not be carried on by impeachment, but by information on indictment before the supreme court of that Territory, which is competent to the trial; and he prays leave to inform the House that, in consequence of affidavits stating complaints against Judge Turner, of oppressions and gross violations of private property, under color of his office, which have been lately transmitted to the President of the United States, the Secretary of State has been by him instructed to give orders to Governor St. Clair to take the necessary measures for bringing that officer to a fair trial, respecting those charges, before the court of that Territory, according to the laws of the land; which course is also recommended to be pursued relative to the matters charged in said petition.

Judge Turner was one of three supreme court judges, "any two of whom to form a court, who shall have a common-law jurisdiction, * * * and their commissions shall continue in force during good behavior."[1]

The report of the Attorney-General was, on May 10,[2] referred to a committee composed of the same members originally appointed to consider the petition, and they were directed to "examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House."

On February 16, 1797,[3] a memorial was presented from Judge Turner praying that the House enter upon an investigation of the allegations and charges brought against him in the petition. On February 22[4] this memorial was referred to the same committee.

On February 27[5] that committee reported that the case should come to a hearing before the court of the Territory, where the judge would have an opportunity of defending himself.

The report was laid on the table and not acted on further.[6]

2487. The inquiry into the conduct of Judge Peter B. Bruin, in 1808.

Instance of proceedings looking to the impeachment of a judge of a Territory.

The investigation of Judge Bruin's conduct was set in motion by charges preferred by a Territorial legislature.

The House in the Bruin case declined to impeach before it had made an investigation by its own committee.

Instance wherein a Delegate was made chairman of a committee to investigate the conduct of a judge.

On April 11, 1808,[7] the Speaker presented to the House sundry resolutions of the legislative council and house of representatives of the Mississippi Territory, preferring certain charges against Peter B. Bruin, presiding judge of the Territory, and instructing Mr. George Poindexter, Delegate in Congress from the said Territory, to impeach the said judge, and pledging themselves, "in behalf of the people of this Territory, to substantiate and make good" the said charges, which were specified as "neglect of duty and drunkenness on the bench."

[6] It appears that Jonathan Return Meigs was appointed Judge on February 12, 1798, but the records of the State Department do not show whose place he took. The appointment of Judge Meigs was made two years after the proceedings in the House against Judge Turner.

[7] First session Tenth Congress, Journal, p. 204; Annals, p. 2068; American State Papers (miscellaneous), Vol. I, pp. 921, 922.

Mr. Poindexter thereupon presented resolutions as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report articles of impeachment against Peter B. Bruin, one of the judges of the superior court of the Mississippi Territory; and that the said committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

In the debate it was objected by Mr. Timothy Pitkin, jr., of Connecticut, that it would hardly be dignified for the Congress to proceed to an impeachment on the authority of a resolution of the legislature of a State or Territory. A committee should first be appointed to inquire into the propriety of impeaching. Mr. John Rhea, of Tennessee, drew a distinction between the legislature of a State and that of a Territory, and, furthermore, did not consider the resolutions of a legislature conclusive evidence of fact.

Thereupon Mr. Poindexter modified his resolution by striking out the words "prepare and report," and inserting the words "inquire into the expediency of preferring." He further stated that he had seen Judge Bruin on the bench in a state of intoxication.

On April 18[1] the House further amended the resolution, and agreed to it, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the conduct of Peter B. Bruin, a judge of the superior court of the Mississippi Territory, and report whether, in their opinion, he hath so acted, in his official capacity, as to require the interposition of the Constitutional powers of this House; and that the said committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

The committee were appointed as follows: Messrs. Poindexter, Samuel W. Dana, of Connecticut; Jesse Wharton, of Tennessee; Benjamin Howard, of Kentucky; Jeremiah Morrow, of Ohio; Joseph Calhoun, of South Carolina; and John Campbell, of Maryland.

On April 21[2] Mr. Morrow reported a resolution which, after amendment, was agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That George Poindexter, chairman of the said committee, be authorized to cause to be taken before a magistrate or other proper officer such depositions in relation to the official conduct of the said judge as, in his judgment, may be material to the inquiry, having first notified the said Bruin of the time and place, or places, of taking such depositions, so that he may give his attendance; and that the depositions so taken be laid before Congress at their next session.

On April 25 this session of Congress adjourned.

It does not appear that the matter was again taken up. On March 7, 1809, as the records of the State Department show, Francis Xavier Martin was appointed judge, indicating the death or resignation of Judge Bruin.

It appears that the judges of the court of Mississippi Territory, like the judges of the territory northwest of the Ohio, held office "during good behavior," such being the provision of the statutes.[3] 2488. The inquiry into the conduct of Judge Harry Toulmin, in 1811.

Instance of proceedings looking to the impeachment of a judge of a Territory.

The inquiry as to Judge Toulmin was set in motion by action of a grand jury forwarded by a Territorial legislature.

[1] Journal, p. 277; Annals, p. 2189. [2] Journal, p. 286; Annals, p. 2251. [3] 1 Stat. L., pp. 51, 550.

In Judge Toulmin's case the House, after investigating in a preliminary way, declined to order a formal investigation.

On December 16, 1811,[1] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from Cowles Mead, speaker of the house of representatives of the Mississippi Territory, inclosing the copy of a presentment against Harry Toulmin, judge of the superior court for the Washington district, in said Territory,[2] made by the grand jury of Baldwin County, specifying charges against the said judge, which were read and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. George Poindexter, Delegate from Mississippi Territory, also presented a copy of the same presentment; which was ordered to lie on the table.

On December 19[3] Mr. Poindexter submitted this resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the conduct of Harry Toulmin, judge of the district of Washington, in the Mississippi Territory, and report whether, in their opinion, he hath so acted, in his official capacity, as to require the interposition of the constitutional powers of this House; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

On December 21[4] Mr. Poindexter withdrew the resolution, and moved that the letter of Cowles Mead, with the accompanying papers, be referred to a select committee to consider and report thereon to the House.

The committee was appointed as follows: Messrs. Poindexter, John Rhea, of Tennessee, John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina; John Taliaferro, of Virginia; Abijah Bigelow, of Massachusetts, and Epaphroditus Champion, of Connecticut.

On January 14, 1812,[5] sundry documents in refutation of the charges were presented and referred to the committee. Also on February 1[6] other papers of a similar tenor were presented and referred. On March 19 and 25 also, similar papers were referred.

On March 11[7] a motion of Mr. Rhea that the committee be discharged from consideration of the subject was decided in the negative, and on April 13 a motion that the committee be directed to report was likewise decided in the negative.

On May 21[8] Mr. Poindexter, from the committee, reported—

That the charges contained in the presentment aforesaid have not been supported by evidence; and from the best information your committee have been enabled to obtain on the subject it appears that the official conduct of Judge Toulmin has been characterized by a vigilant attention to the duties of his station, and an inflexible zeal for the preservation of the public peace and tranquillity of the country over which his judicial authority extends. They therefore recommend the following resolution:

"Resolved, That it is unnecessary to take any further proceeding on the presentment of the grand jury of Baldwin County, in the Mississippi Territory, against Judge Toulmin."

This report was concurred in by the House.

2489. The inquiry into the conduct of Judges William P. Van Ness, Mathias B. Tallmadge, and William Stephens, in 1818.

Judge William Stephens having resigned his office, the House discontinued its inquiry into his conduct.

In 1818 the House inquired into the official conduct of Judges William P. Van Ness and Mathias B. Tallmadge, of the district courts of New York, and William Stephens of the district court of Georgia.[1] The committee found that Judge Van Ness had shown some remissness in not exercising constant vigilance over the money of the court, which had been purloined by the clerk, and in not vigorously enforcing the provisions of the law and rules of the court. There were also complaints against some decisions and orders of Judge Van Ness, "but the respect which this committee entertains for the constitutional rights of a judge, and for the laws which provide adequate remedies for any errors he may commit, forbids their questioning any judicial opinions." The committee say that they have discovered nothing which furnishes "any ground for the constitutional interposition of the House."[2] The inquiry into the conduct of Judge Van Ness was instituted by a resolution reported from the Judiciary Committee, who had been examining the conduct of the clerk of the court, and found some circumstances connected with the judge's conduct which justified investigation.[3] And the names of Judges Tallmadge and Stephens had been added by way of amendment to the resolution of inquiry.

On November 24, 1818,[4] on motion of Mr. John C. Spencer, of New York, it was Ordered, That the committee appointed at the last session of Congress, to inquire into the official conduct of certain judges of the courts of the United States, be discharged from so much of their duty as relates to the conduct of William Stephens, who has resigned his office of judge of the court of the United States for the district of Georgia.

On February 17, 1819,[5] Mr. Spencer reported on the case of Judge Tallmadge, who was charged with having omitted to hold the terms of the district court for which he was appointed, according to law. The committee found that at certain times he had omitted sessions, but say:

It appears satisfactorily, from the testimony of several physicians, and of the Hon. Nathan Sanford, given on a former inquiry into the conduct of Judge Tallmadge, that in 1810 his health became extremely delicate, and that very great exertion of body, or any unusual agitation of mind, invariably produced severe sickness, so as to disqualify him for any official duties; and that his life was prolonged by visiting a more genial climate in the winter season.

On entering upon the duties of his office in 1805, Judge Tallmadge encountered a mass of business which had accumulated from the ill health and the death of his predecessor, and from the want of any judge in the court for the time immediately preceding his appointment. The sickness of Judge Patterson, who should have presided in the circuit court, materially increased the labors of the district judge.

The committee are of opinion that there is nothing established in the official conduct of Judge Tallmadge to justify the constitutional interposition of the House.

The report was laid on the table.

2490. The investigations into the conduct of Judge Joseph L. Smith, in 1825 and 1826.

The House decided to investigate the conduct of Judge Smith, on assurance of a Territorial Delegate that the person making the charges was reliable.

Instance wherein charges were presented against a judge in three Congresses.

On February 3, 1825,[1] Mr. Richard K. Call, Delegate from Florida Territory, presented this resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire whether either of the judges of the district courts of Florida have received fees for their services not authorized by law; and, if any, what other malpractices have been committed by the said judges, or either of them; and that the said committee be authorized to compel the attendance of persons and the production of papers to promote this investigation.

In support of this resolution Mr. Call presented a letter addressed to himself by Edgar Macon, United States attorney for East Florida, in response to a request made by Mr. Call for information.

At the May term of the superior court of East Florida—

Says Mr. Macon's letter—in 1824 Judge Smith established a number of rules for the government of the practice of his court, by which provision is made for the transacting and doing of much business in vacation, which previously had been done in term, viz, such as making orders for commissions to take foreign testimony, and hearing and deciding on motions for amending pleadings, etc., and other matters and questions generally aiding in the usual progress of a suit; for all which services, when performed, Judge Smith has charged fees. I have paid them, and I believe every attorney of his (Judge Smith's) court has done the same. It is proper to mention that in the United States and Territorial cases Judge Smith has never charged fees.

Mr. Call vouched for the reliability of Mr. Macon's word, and asked that the resolution be agreed to.

The House, without division, agreed to the resolution.

On February 28[2] Mr. William Plumer, jr., of New Hampshire, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted a report, saying that the committee were—not able to perceive how any law of the Territory can authorize the judge to receive any compensation in the shape of fees for his official services in the place which he holds under the authority of the United States. The distance of the parties, however, from the seat of government, renders it wholly impracticable to make any investigation into the particular circumstances of the case during the present session of Congress. The committee therefore pray that they may be discharged from any further consideration of the resolution.

The report was read and laid on the table.

At the beginning of the next Congress on December 27, 1825,[3] Mr. Joseph M. White, Delegate from Florida, presented the petition of Joseph L. Smith, judge of the supreme court of said Territory, praying that his conduct as judge might be inquired into, and that his character might be freed from the public imputation to which it had been subjected.

Mr. White also presented the petition of Edgar Macon charging Judge Smith with malfeasance and corruption in office, and praying that the charges might be investigated by Congress.

These papers were ordered referred to the Judiciary Committee.

On January 9[1] Mr. White presented a memorial of the legislative council of Florida soliciting an investigation of the charges preferred against Judge Smith.

This paper also was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

On February 7, 1826,[2] Mr. John C. Wright, of Ohio, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported that the committee had examined the petition, memorial, and evidence offered, and asked that they be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

This report was agreed to by the House.

On January 11, 1830,[3] Mr. White presented a memorial addressed to the President of the United States, and sundry documents signed by the citizens of East Florida, charging Judge Smith with tyrannical and oppressive conduct, and imploring his removal from the office of judge.

These papers were referred to the Judiciary Committee, but it does not appear that they were ever reported on.[4]

2491. The investigations into the conduct of Judge Buckner Thurston, in 1825 and 1837.

The investigations into the conduct of Judge Thurston were set in motion by memorials.

Form of memorial praying for the impeachment of Judge Thurston, in 1837.

The House sometimes refers for preliminary inquiry a memorial praying impeachment and sometimes orders investigation at once.

In 1825 the House preferred that charges against a judge should be investigated by a committee.

During the investigation of Judge Thurston with a view to impeachment he was present and cross-examined witnesses.

On February 21, 1825,[5] Mr. James Strong, of New York, presented a petition of John P. Van Ness complaining of the official conduct of Buckner Thurston, one of the associate judges of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, and praying that the subject of his complaint might be inquired into by Congress.

The petition was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, but on February 24 the reference was changed to the Judiciary Committee.

On February 28[1] Mr. William Plumer, jr., of New Hampshire, from the Judiciary Committee, submitted a report that the committee—

Having investigated the matter of the memorial, they are unanimously of opinion that there is nothing in the conduct of Judge Thurston which requires the interposition or reprehension of this House. They therefore ask to be discharged from the further consideration of this memorial.

The report was laid on the table.

On January 30, 1837,[2] the Speaker presented a memorial of Richard S. Coxe and William L. Brent, of the District of Columbia, praying an investigation into the judicial conduct of Judge Thurston. The memorial in part was as follows:

Should this memorial be referred to the appropriate committee we pledge ourselves to prove to the satisfaction of Congress—

1. That Judge Thurston is grossly and avowedly ignorant and regardless of the law which it is his duty to administer.

2. That he is habitually inattentive and neglectful in the discharge of his official duties.

3 That his deportment on the bench is rude, insolent, and undignified, and calculated to bring the administration of the law into contempt.

4 That he is habitually rude and insolent toward his brethren on the bench, to their great annoyance and to the hindrance of justice.

5 That he is habitually rude, insolent, and quarrelsome toward the members of the bar; constantly in a state of irritation and excitement, applying to them, without cause or provocation, the most harsh and vulgar epithets in our vocabulary.

6. That, in these different modes, he incessantly interferes with the administration of justice, gratifies his own personal passions at the expense of truth and justice, involves the Government and the community in enormous expenses and vexatious delays, and employs his official power and station in outraging the feelings and illegally and unjustly injuring those who may accidentally become the objects of his infuriate resentment.

7. That on several occasions he has, from the bench, actually invited members of the bar to leave the court and enter into a personal encounter with him.

8. That he is, from want of professional information, from his neglect of his duties, from his furious and ungovernable temper, wholly unfit for the station he occupies.

These general heads of accusations, with all the necessary details of time, place, person, and circumstance, we tender ourselves ready and prepared to establish by the most plenary proof.[3]

On January 31[4] Mr. Francis Thomas, of Maryland, proposed this resolution, which was agreed to by the House:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be authorized to send for persons and papers, and to inquire into the truth of the charges made in the memorial of William L. Brent and Richard S. Coxe, complaining of the official conduct of Buckner Thruston, one of the judges of the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia.

On March 3,[5] the last day of the Congress, Mr. Thomas reported from the committee, without recommendation of any kind, the testimony taken before the committee. The report was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

The report shows that many witnesses were examined, and that Judge Thurston was permitted to cross-examine.

Judge W. Cranch, an associate of Judge Thurston, having been called upon to testify in this case, objected on behalf of himself and Judge Morsell to giving testimony, on account of their official relations to the respondent, but the committee overruled this objection.

It does not appear that any action was taken further than the printing of the report.

The records of the State Department indicate that Judge Thurston remained in office until he died, on August 30, 1845. On October 3, 1845, James Dunlop was appointed judge.

2492. The investigation into the conduct of Judge Alfred Conkling in 1829.

In the case of Judge Conkling the memorial preferring charges was referred to the Judiciary Committee for examination before an investigation was ordered.

Views of the minority of the Judiciary Committee, in 1830, as to offenses amounting to high misdemeanor.

On February 16, 1829,[1] Mr. Selah R. Hobbie, of New York, presented a memorial of Martha Bradstreet, of the State of New York, preferring charges against Alfred Conkling, judge of the district court of the United States for the northern district of New York, as grounds for an impeachment of the said judge.

This memorial was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On February 23 the House ordered the committee discharged from consideration of the memorial and gave the memorialist leave to withdraw.

In the next Congress, on February 22, 1830,[2] on motion of Mr. Churchill C. Cambreleng, of New York, it was ordered that the memorial of Martha Bradstreet in relation to Judge Conkling be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On March 22[3] Mr. Cambreleng presented a memorial of Martha Bradstreet, preferring additional charges and praying to be permitted to substantiate them. This memorial was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

On March 26[4] the Judiciary Committee were granted leave to sit during sessions of the House for the purpose of investigating the matters set forth in the memorial.

On April 3[5] Mr. Charles A. Wickliffe, of Kentucky, from the Committee on the Judiciary made an unfavorable report on the memorial, finding no cause for impeachment. This report was concurred in by all the members of the committee except Mr. Warren R. Davis, of South Carolina. Presumably those concurring were Messrs. James Buchanan, of Pennsylvania; Henry R. Storrs, of New York; Thomas T. Bouldin, of Virginia; William W. Ellsworth, of Connecticut, and Edward D. White, of Louisiana. Mr. Davis dissented, and on April 8[6] filed minority views. He states in his views that the memorialist presented thirty-three charges for misdemeanors in office. The majority had concluded that there was nothing in the charges or in the testimony adduced to support them that required the constitutional interposition of the House. The minority believed that two charges were supported by adequate testimony, and if true amounted to a high misdemeanor:

(a) His causing the name of John L. Tillinghast to be struck from the rolls of the said court, for having expressed out of court his opinion of the said Judge Conkling.

(b) His having thereby illegally and unconstitutionally assumed to himself the power to act as judge in his own cause. And, in pursuit of his object, violated the immemorial course and practice of courts of justice, and disregarded even the form of law. And this for the mere gratification of his private revenge.

Mr. Davis argued at some length in support of his claim that the two specifications, as supported by the evidence, contained matter amounting to misdemeanor in office.

The report of the majority was laid on the table, and no further action appears.

2493. The investigation of the conduct of Benjamin Johnson, a judge of the superior court of the Territory of Arkansas, in 1833.

In 1833 the Judiciary Committee held that a Territorial judge was not a civil officer of the United States within the meaning of the Constitution.

On January 15, 1833,[1] the Speaker submitted to the House a letter from Egbert Harris, of the Territory of Arkansas, inclosing charges and specifications made by William Cummins against Benjamin Johnson, one of the judges of the superior court of the Territory of Arkansas.

Mr. Ambrose H. Sevier, Delegate from Arkansas, presented sundry documents exculpatory of Judge Johnson.

The letter of Mr. Harris and the other papers were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On February 8[2] Mr. John Bell, of Tennessee, presented the report of the committee on the memorial. The committee included besides Mr. Bell, Messrs. William W. Ellsworth, of Connecticut; Henry Daniel, of Kentucky; Thomas F. Foster, of Georgia; Wm. F. Gordon, of Virginia; Samuel Beardsley, of New York, and Richard Coulter, of Pennsylvania.

The report first dealt with a preliminary question:

A majority of the committee are strongly inclined to the opinion that such an officer is not a proper subject of trial by impeachment. Some of the reasons upon which that opinion may be supported will be stated.

The Constitution, in Article II, section 4, provides that "all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office by impeachment." The institution by Congress of those political corporations, denominated, in the language of our legislation upon that subject, Territorial governments, is only authorized by a very liberal construction of the general power given by the Constitution to Congress over the public domain. But, admitting that exercise of power to be well enough founded, still, can a judge of such a government be said to be an officer of the United States within the meaning of the clause already quoted? Should the doubt thrown out by the committee upon this point appear to the House to be without reasonable foundation, they think they will be fully sustained in the opinion, that, whether liable to impeachment or not, the practice of impeaching subordinate officers, and especially such as hold their offices by a tenure not more firm and durable than the judge of a Territorial court, would soon be found highly inconvenient and injurious to the public interest. The judge whose conduct in the present instance is alleged to be such as to call for the exercise of the impeaching power of the House, holds his office for a term of four years only, and may, by the express provision of the act of Congress establishing his office, be removed at any time within that term by the President. The trial by impeachment is the highest and most solemn in its nature known in the administration of public justice. It is established for high political purposes, and would seem to be proper only against judges who hold their offices during good behavior, and other high officers of the Government, for such crimes or misdemeanors as the public service and interest require to be punished by removal from office.

[2] Journal, p. 290; Report No. 88.

Proceeding to the merits of the case, the report says:

The general charges against him are favoritism or partiality to particular counsel in the trial of causes, irritability of temper and rudeness on the bench toward his brother judges and the bar; incapacity, manifested by a vacillating and inconsistent course of judicial decision, and habitual intemperance.

The committee did not find these charges well sustained, and furthermore they found decided and unequivocal testimony in favor of the judge.

The report was laid on the table.

2494. The investigation into the conduct of Judge P. K. Lawrence, in 1839.

The proceedings in the case of Judge Lawrence were set in motion by a memorial setting forth specific charges.

The memorial setting forth charges against Judge Lawrence was referred for examination before an investigation was ordered.

The House referred the charges made against Judge Lawrence, in 1839, to a select committee instead of to the Judiciary Committee.

A select committee recommendeed the impeachment of Judge P. K. Lawrence, in 1839.

The investigation into the conduct of Judge P. K. Lawrence, in 1839, was entirely ex parte.

On January 7, 1839,[1] Mr. Henry Johnson, of Louisiana, presented a memorial of Duncan N. Hennen, a citizen of the State of Louisiana, making charges of high crimes and misdemeanors against P. K. Lawrence, judge of the district court of the United States for the eastern district of of Louisiana, and praying that the House of Representatives would inquire into the facts whether the said Judge Lawrence, in the exercise of the high trust and confidence reposed in him, had not been guilty of corrupt, malicious, and dangerous abuses of power.

The memorial set forth specifically that the memorialist had been appointed clerk of the said court in 1834, and had served until May 18, 1838, when Judge Lawrence sent him a letter of removal and informing him that John Winthrop had been appointed in his place; that the memorialist, being advised that Judge Lawrence had acted without power, refused to deliver the records of the court to the said Winthrop; that Judge Lawrence had issued a writ without authentication of the seal of the court, commanding the marshal to seize the records; that the memorialist, as clerk of the district court, became ex officio clerk of the circuit court for the ninth circuit; that on May 21, 1838, both the memorialist and the said

Winthrop presented themselves, each as clerk, before the circuit court, Judge John McKinley and the aforesaid Judge Lawrence, sitting; that the memorialist objected, when arguments were to be heard on the rival claims, to Judge Lawrence sitting in the matter, (a) because he professed to have formed and delivered an opinion on the question; (b) because, from expressions in the letter of removal, he had confessed partiality toward the said Winthrop; (c) because there was no need of the said Judge Lawrence passing on the case since memorialist was willing to acquiesce if Judge McKinley held the removal legal; (d) and because a difference of opinion between the judges would lead to adjournment of court until a final decision by the Supreme Court of the United States; that Judge Lawrence persisted in sitting, and there resulted a difference of opinion between him and his associates; that Judge McKinley held that the removal was illegal and that the memorialist was de jure and de facto clerk, to which Judge Lawrence dissented; that the circuit court adjourned without transaction of business; that the memorialist continued in possession of the seals and records of both courts, and that the records of the district court were not seized by the marshal under the writ until the next June; that in November 19, 1838, at the holding of the circuit court, in the absence of Judge McKinley, Judge Lawrence declined to allow the memorialist's deputy to perform the duties of clerk, but made a rule in a civil cause calling upon the deputy to produce the records, and on the succeeding day committed the deputy to prison for alleged contempt; that after release by habeas corpus the deputy was a second time committed for refusing to deliver the records; that the said proceedings were in violation of the act of April 29, 1802, providing "that imprisonment is not allowed, nor punishment in any case inflicted, where the judges of the said court are divided in opinion upon the question touching such imprisonment;" that the said proceedings of Judge Lawrence to take the records were made after the Supreme Court of the United States had granted a rule requiring Judge Lawrence to show cause why the memorialist should not be allowed to discharge the duties of the office; that Judge Lawrence had caused a new seal, not in form required by law, to be made; that Judge Lawrence, on November 26, 1838, had issued a writ authorizing the seizure of the records of the circuit court wheresoever found, thus illegally authorizing a seizure out of his district; that Judge Lawrence had refused to obey a mandate of the Supreme Court in a certain case, giving out that the Supreme Court had grossly mistaken the law; that he had illegally absented himself from his district; that he had for five years been notoriously and inveterately addicted to the intemperate use of ardent spirits, and that by his course in regard to the clerkship he had suspended the administration of justice for a judicial year.

This memorial was signed by the memorialist, but the signature was not attested.

Mr. Johnson asked that the memorial be referred to a select committee. Although it was suggested that the Judiciary Committee should consider it, Mr. Johnson's motion was agreed to, and the committee was composed of Mr. Johnson and Messrs. John Pope, of Kentucky; Thomas T. Whittlesey, of Connecticut; John Campbell, of South Carolina; George W. Owens, of Georgia; William B. Calhoun, of Massachusetts; and George C. Dromgoole, of Virginia.

On January 21,[1] on motion of Mr. Johnson, it was:

Resolved, That the select committee appointed to inquire into the charges of high crimes and misdemeanors against P. K. Lawrence, judge of the district court of the United States for the State of Louisiana, be authorized to send for persons and papers.

On February 11,[2] Mr. Johnson submitted the report of the committee. This report consisted largely of affidavits and records of testimony taken in Louisiana. It is all ex parte. The report concludes:

That, in consequence of the evidence * * * they are of the opinion that Philip K. Lawrence, judge of the district court of the United States for the eastern and western districts of Louisiana, be impeached for high misdemeanors in office.

It was ordered that the report be considered on February 21, but the Congress was nearing its close and no action by the House appears.

On September 3, 1841, as the records of the State Department show, Theodore H. McCaleb was appointed judge of this district.

2495. The investigations into the conduct of John C. Watrous, United States judge for the district of Texas.

The House, in 1852, on the strength of a memorial setting forth charges, investigated the conduct of Judge Watrous with a result favorable to him.

In the investigation of 1852 Judge Watrous, the accused, was permitted to appear before the committee with counsel. (Footnote.)

The conduct of Judge Watrous was the subject of reports, favorable and unfavorable, in four Congresses.

On February 13, 1852,[3] Mr. Abraham W. Venable, of North Carolina, from the committee on the Judiciary reported a resolution as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be authorized to send for persons and papers, with authority to examine witnesses,[4] under oath, in relation to the charges made against John C. Watrous, judge of the United States court for the district of Texas.

Mr. Venable explained that a memorial of William Alexander, a lawyer of Texas, had been presented to the House, charging Judge Watrous with practicing law and receiving fees in the State of Texas touching matters which had come before and been decided upon by himself, with adjudicating cases in which he was personally interested, and with certain violations of the laws of Texas militating against his judicial purity.

The resolution was agreed to by the House.

On August 27 [5] the Speaker laid before the House a letter from Judge Watrous, wherein he stated that the pending inquiry was preventing the decision of important cases in his court, and asked for speedy action by the House. This communication was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and then, on motion of Mr. Richardson Scurry, of Texas, it was Ordered, That the Committee on the Judiciary have leave to report upon the case of the said Judge John C. Watrous at any time.

[4] In his answer filed with the Judiciary Committee in 1858 (first session Thirty-fifth Congress, House Report No. 540, p. 18) Judge Watrous makes a statement which shows that during these proceedings in 1852 he was present with counsel before the committee. It also appears that witnesses were examined at that time (p. 437 of Report No. 540).

At the next session of Congress, on January 13, 1853,[1] Mr. William A. Howard, of Michigan, presented additional evidence in the case, which was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

On February 28,[2] Mr. Venable submitted the report of the committee, which was as follows:

That after an examination of much documentary evidence, as well as many witnesses, summoned from Texas, they do not recommend that articles of impeachment be directed by this House against the said John C. Watrous.

This report was laid on the table.

2496. The Watrous investigation continued.

In the investigation of 1856 the Judiciary Committee made a report favoring impeachment on the strength of memorials and without the power to compel testimony being given by the House.

The memorials submitting the charges against Judge Watrous, in 1856, were accompanied by a large amount of documentary evidence.

The investigation of the conduct of Judge Watrous, in 1856, was conducted entirely ex parte, but the evidence was documentary and voluminous.

In the Watrous investigation of 1856 the Judiciary Committee, following precedents, reported the evidence but made no specific charges.

The Watrous report of 1856 led to a debate as to the propriety of ex parte investigations and to a citation of English and American precedents.

It appears that a report impeaching a civil officer was not considered, in 1856, privileged to be made at any time. (Footnote.)

On July 30, 1856,[3] Mr. Miles Taylor, of Louisiana, presented the memorial of Jacob Mussina, a citizen of Louisiana, praying for an investigation into the conduct of Judge Watrous; and on August 6, Mr. Peter H. Bell, of Texas, presented a memorial of Eliphas Spencer, of Texas, asking for the impeachment of Judge Watrous. These papers were referred to the Judiciary Committee.

The memorial of Jacob Mussina, who was a party to a chancery suit litigated in Judge Watrous's court in Galveston, set forth in detail charges of conduct oppressive and partial and in entire disregard of the well-established rules of law and evidence and the rights of litigants. The memorial of Eliphas Spencer, who was interested in a tract of land in Texas, charged Judge Watrous with entering into a conspiracy for the purpose of fraudulently and corruptly adjudicating and determining the validity of a certain grant, by means of which the said judge himself secured the title of a portion of the land, or the proceeds of the sale of it.

The two memorials were accompanied by a mass of records and documents, among which was a joint resolution of the legislature of Texas, approved March 20, 1848, charging Judge Watrous with improper conduct, and suggesting corrupt acts, and requesting him to resign his office.

It is not wholly certain from the report of the Judiciary Committee whether or not they sought evidence beyond the documents furnished with the memorials. If they did, it was purely documentary. It does not appear that they asked the House for authority to take testimony, and they did not take any, unless documentary.

On February 2, 1857,[1] Mr. Lucian Barbour, of Indiana, asked a suspension of the rules to enable him to report from the Committee on the Judiciary,[2] and on February 9, by a vote of yeas 156, nays 32, the rules were suspended and the report was made, accompanied by this resolution:

Resolved, That John C. Watrous, United States district judge for the district of Texas, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors.

In their report, which was unanimous with the exception of one dissenting member, two members being absent, the committee say:

Upon referring to the proceedings in cases of former impeachments, the committee find that specific charges of impeachment have not been preferred in the report of the committee to the House; but in most cases they have simply reported the testimony, with a resolution that the accused be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors. Specific charges have been preferred afterwards, when the Senate has signified its readiness to proceed with the trial. The committee would, however, state very briefly the substance of the charges in the petitions and the grounds upon which they have resolved to report the resolution.

After reviewing the charges, the report concludes:

The committee have examined numerous records, consisting of pleadings, orders of court, affidavits, and depositions, and after a patient and laborious research they have reluctantly come to the conclusion that the conduct of Judge Watrous in the cases above referred to can not be explained without supposing that he was actuated by other than upright and just motives; that in his disregard of the well-established rules of law and evidence he has put in jeopardy and sacrificed the rights of litigants, and in acquiring a title to property in litigation, or held by adverse possession, he has given just cause of alarm to the citizens of Texas for the safety of private rights and property, and of their public domain, and has debarred them from the rights of an impartial trial in the Federal courts of their own district.

The report having been read, two questions at once arose. Mr. Howell Cobb, of Georgia, asked if the testimony had been printed and declared that he should be unwilling to act on the resolution presented by the committee until he had been enabled to read the testimony.

Mr. Humphrey Marshall, of Kentucky, desired, as a member of the Judiciary Committee, to state that he had had nothing to do with the proceedings resulting in the report, since he had come to the conclusion that the investigation ought not to proceed without notice to the party. Mr. John A. Quitman, of Mississippi, said he was unwilling to assist in bringing on the expense and trouble of an impeachment trial without the strongest probable cause, and he was not willing to take as probable cause the strongest ex parte testimony where the opposite party had not been heard. Mr. John S. Caskie, of Virginia, cited the precedents in the cases of Judge Peck and Warren Hastings, and while not claiming that it was absolutely incumbent for a committee charged with the consideration of a memorial praying an impeachment to give notice to the person against whom the charges were made and allow him to cross-examine witnesses before them, yet such was evidently the fair and judicious course.

Mr. George A. Simmons, of New York, speaking for the committee, said:

I am perfectly aware that in many such cases, in perhaps the majority of cases of impeachment, the party accused has been before the committee just as both parties are sometimes examined before magistrates. But there have been one or two cases in the House where the party accused has not been before the committee. It seems to me to be the opinion of the House—and probably well-founded on the Constitution—that a judge can not be displaced incidentally by remodeling his jurisdiction, or anything of that sort, although it was once done by Mr. Jefferson on a very large scale, to the satisfaction of the Democratic party. Notwithstanding that, the committee have come to the conclusion that it is the sense of the House, as it is undoubtedly the opinion of commentators, such as Judge Story, that there is no way to get rid of a judge, however unpopular he may be, however destitute he may be of the confidence of the people, unless by impeachment. The committee think that an impeachment ought to lie in all cases where there is a want of good behavoir. It is not necessary to prove him guilty of high treason, or of highway robbery, or of some indelicate crime. It is enough that he has not fulfilled his duty as a judge in all respects so as to entitle himself to the confidence of the people. * * * It does not always follow that a man must be present when he is indicted by a grand jury. Neither does it always follow that because he is indicted he must be convicted. There undoubtedly should be prima facie evidence sufficient before the grand jury to satisfy them that the man whom they indict is guilty of the crime, just as there should be sufficient prima facie evidence in cases of impeachment—which are analogous—to show that the judge has failed in good official behavior.

Mr. Abram Wakeman, of New York, said:

The evidence is almost entirely of a documentary character, and if there is no other reason that alone would absolve the committee from the necessity of calling Judge Watrous before them. They are also of opinion that it was not within their province or their duty, in reference to the charge placed in their hands, to compel or require the attendance of Judge Watrous at this stage of the proceeding. They were called upon to inquire whether there was a prima facie case of corruption against him. If there was, they considered it their duty to present him before the Senate of the United States, where his case could be properly heard and tried. If * * * we were under an obligation to investigate and pronounce a decision upon this case, Judge Watrous would have two trials—first, before the Committee on the Judiciary, where he would be under the necessity of calling witnesses and counter witnesses, and the committee would stand in the capacity of judges, in the first instance, to try the guilt or innocence of Judge Watrous. * * * In one case of impeachment alone, where a judge was charged with high crimes or misdemeanors, was he summoned before the committee prior to the presentation of his case to the House.

Mr. Wakeman later stated this case specifically—that of Judge Pickering.

The House, without division, decided that the testimony should be printed, and that the consideration of the resolution should be postponed to Saturday, February 21.

On that day it was announced that a delay had occurred at the printing office and the testimony had not yet been printed. Mr. Caskie urged that the matter should be allowed to go over to the next Congress. A few days only remained of this Congress, and if they should agree to the resolution of impeachment new men would have to carry on the trial, as very few of this House were elected to the next, and not a single member of the Judiciary Committee had been returned.

Mr. Barbour, however, moved that the matter be postponed to Saturday, February 28, and this motion was agreed to.

But on February 28 only three legislative days remained to the Congress, and the resolution was not considered.

In 1857 memorials before the House in a preceding Congress were reintroduced as a basis for investigation of the conduct of Judge Watrous.

The Watrous investigation of 1857 was limited in its scope by the withdrawal from the Judiciary Committee of a memorial containing certain charges.

In the Watrous investigation of 1857, the committee being equally divided, reported the evidence and two propositions, each supported by minority views.

In the investigation of 1857 the committee formally permitted Judge Watrous to file a written explanation and cross-examine witnesses in person or by counsel.

The committee investigating Judge Watrous, in 1857, appears to have informally permitted the accused to adduce testimony.

Discussion of the proper mode of examination in an investigation with a view to impeachment.

In the Watrous investigation of 1857 the written explanation of the accused was printed as part of the report.

An argument that judges may be impeached for any breach of good behavior.

After the report on his conduct by a committee, Judge Watrous presented to the House a memorial embodying his defense, and it was ordered printed and laid on the table.

At the beginning of the next Congress, on December 17, 1857,[1] Mr. Guy M. Bryan, of Texas, presented the memorial of Eliphas Spencer, praying for the impeachment of Judge Watrous; and on the next day[2] Mr. Miles Taylor, of Louisiana, reintroduced the memorial of Jacob Mussina, which had been presented in the preceding Congress.

On January 15, 1858,[3] Mr. George S. Houston, of Alabama, from the Committee on the Judiciary, presented this resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be authorized to send for persons and papers and examine witnesses on oath in relation to the charges made against John C. Watrous, judge of the United States court for the western district of the State of Texas.

On February 18[4] Mr. Bryan presented resolutions of the legislature of Texas, which were referred to the Judiciary Committee; and on February 23[5] Mr. John H. Reagan, of Texas, presented the memorial of William Alexander on the same subject, and it was referred to the same committee.

On May 15[6] Mr. Horace F. Clark, of New York, from the Committee on the Judiciary, moved that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of William Alexander. He said that in investigating the charges made in the memorials of Jacob Mussina and Eliphas Spencer the committee had taken up the matter de novo, as they were not satisfied with the methods of the committee in the preceding Congress. But they found that the allegations in the memorial of Alexander had been investigated by the committee in the Thirty-second Congress, and the committee had reported against impeachment proceedings. Therefore, with the great amount of labor involved in hearing the other charges, the committee did not wish to pursue the Alexander charges. It was urged also that the committee in the preceding Congress had taken no notice of the Alexander charges. Mr. John H. Reagan urged that the Alexander charges should be investigated, especially in the view that articles of impeachment might be prepared.

The House, on May 17, agreed to the motion of Mr. Clark that the committee be discharged.

On June[1] Mr. Houston presented the report of the committee, which was simply to the effect that they were equally divided, one portion recommending a resolution that Judge Watrous be impeached and the other portion a resolution that the testimony did not afford sufficient grounds for impeachment.

On June 7[2] both portions of the committee, by permission of the House, presented minority views, which gave the respective opinions of the two portions.

The regular report, although giving no opinions, was accompanied by the record of the evidence and also by record of certain proceedings. It appears that on January 8[3] Mr. Houston, chairman of the committee, addressed a letter to Judge Watrous informing him of the reference of the memorials, and notifying him that the subject-matter would be taken up on February 2, next. To this Judge Watrous replied:

> I most respectfully ask to be informed whether, at the approaching investigation by the committee, * * * I may be permitted to be present, together with my counsel. And I also desire to be informed whether the investigation will be confined to the testimony against me, or will be extended to all sources of information which are necessary to a proper understanding of the case. * * * Should a full and fair investigation of both sides of the case be determined on, I should take great pleasure (if permitted to do so) in furnishing a list of witnesses, whose testimony will put the whole case before the committee.

To this the committee replied by this resolution:

> Resolved, That Hon. John C. Watrous be informed that the Committee on the Judiciary will, on Tuesday, the 2d day of February, 1858, take up for investigation and action the memorials of Jacob Mussina and Eliphas Spencer, and that the committee will receive from the said John C. Watrous at any time previous to the said 2d day of February any explanation in writing relative to the charges contained in said memorials, and that after having made such communication in answer to said charges, the said John C. Watrous will be permitted by himself or counsel to cross-examine witnesses who may be examined before said committee.

Mr. Horace F. Clark, of New York, one of the four members of the committee who found against impeachment, while concurring with his three associates on the question of fact, filed supplemental views, in which he said:[4]

> I am not satisfied to vote an impeachment upon the ascertainment of what is commonly termed probable causes; nor do I regard the principles of common law relative to proceedings before grand juries applicable to cases of impeachment under the Constitution of the United States. The House of Representatives ought, in my judgment, to look beyond a prima facie case, and failing to discover in the evidence disclosed any fact inconsistent with judicial integrity on the part of Judge Watrous, and finding satisfactory explanations of the circumstances from which suspicions of such integrity may have arisen, should decline subjecting the accused to the expense and hazard of an impeachment.

Although the committee did not give in express terms permission for Judge Watrous to call witnesses on his own behalf, yet he did so. One witness, Robert Hughes, was called and examined in chief by Judge Watrous, and afterwards cross-examined by the committee.[1] And also Robert Hughes, apparently the same person, was on March 2[2] given leave by the committee to appear as counsel for Judge Watrous. With him as counsel was associated Mr. Caleb Cushing.[3]

In the course of a later debate, Mr. Mason W. Tappan, of New Hampshire, a member of the committee, said:[4]

Testimony was taken on both sides. A long and tedious examination was had. Judge Watrous was permitted to come in and defend his cause and to produce witnesses.

And Mr. Horace F. Clark, of New York, another member of the committee, said further:[5]

The committee determined that it was their province * * * to look into the facts of the case beyond the point necessary to ascertain whether there did or did not exist that technical probable cause which, under the well-settled principles of the common law, justifies a magistrate in holding a person for trial, or may, perhaps, justify a grand jury in finding a bill of indictment. * * * The committee applied, in its broadest sense, that generous maxim, audi alteram partem. * * * They determined to break down all the barriers which, it is admitted by professional men, the rigid rules of the common law sometimes throw in the way of the search after truth.

Judge Watrous's explanation, which treated only questions of fact, was printed as part of the report.

The minority views signed by the four members favoring impeachment, Messrs. Henry Chapman, of Pennsylvania; Charles Billinghurst, of Wisconsin; Miles Taylor, of Louisiana, and George S. Houston, of Alabama, found from the evidence[6]—

That while holding the office of district judge of the United States he engaged with other persons in speculating in immense tracts of land situated within his judicial district, the titles to which he knew were in dispute, and where litigation was inevitable.

That he allowed his court to be used as an agent to aid himself and partners in speculation in land and to secure an advantage over other persons with whom litigation was apprehended. That he sat as judge on the trial of cases where he was personally interested in questions involved, to which may be added a participation in the improper procurement of testimony to advance his own and partner's interests.

Also they concluded as to another charge urged against him:

Every irregular and wrongful decision of the judge [in the Cavazos case dealt with in the Mussina memorial] was in favor of the complainants and against the defendant, Mussina, and those occupying a similar position, and was to their particular injury. By maintaining the proceeding as one rightfully brought on the chancery side of the court, these defendants were illegally deprived of their right to a trial by jury, and were compelled to submit to an adjudication upon their rights to the property in such a manner that the decision would be final and conclusive as to the title of the property, instead of one upon the right of possession, which would at once have been pronounced, on the law side of the court, in an action of ejectment. By maintaining jurisdiction over the case, when a portion of the defendants as well as plaintiffs were aliens, these defendants were deprived of their rights to have the questions involved in it decided by the courts of Texas, to whose jurisdiction they were rightfully amenable, and whose laws were to govern in that decision. By admitting incompetent witnesses to testify, their rights were affected by evidence given by persons who had an interest in the litigation adverse to theirs. And, finally, they are prevented from having the decision against them reviewed in the appellate court by the failure of the judge to perform his full duty to them in facilitating the exercise of the right of appeal, given to them by law, from motives of public policy, for their own private advantage, and that, too, when there is some reason to believe that the decree by the court is not in conformity with the principles of law as recognized in Texas. Such a course of action continued through the whole progress of a cause, in favor of some of the parties and against others, is, to our minds conclusive evidence of the existence of a purpose on the part of the judge to favor one party or set of parties at the expense and to the injury of others, which is inconsistent with an upright, honest, and impartial discharge of the judicial functions. And this, we believe, constitutes a breach of the "good behavior" upon which, by the Constitution, the tenure of the judicial office is made to depend.

The Constitution of the United States declares that "the judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behavior." Does not this necessarily imply that their offices are to determine, and they are to be removed when they are guilty of a breach of "good behavior?" Clearly so. But how are they to be removed? No power of removal is vested in the Executive, nor is there any provision in the Constitution of the United States like that to be found in many if not all the State constitutions, by which the Executive is authorized to remove on the address of two-thirds of the members of the two houses of the legislature. The only mode of removal of judges known to the Constitution is by impeachment, and it therefore necessarily follows that whenever a judge has, in the course of his official conduct, been guilty of actions which are inconsistent with an impartial discharge of the high duties intrusted to him, then it is both the right and duty of this House to proceed in the only way known to the Constitution to effect the removal of the magistrate who misuses or abuses the trust reposed in him for the public good.

The other minority views, concurred in by Messrs. Charles Ready, of Tennessee; Mason W. Tappan, of New Hampshire; Burton Craige, of North Carolina, and Horace F. Clark, of New York, concluded from an examination of the testimony that many of the charges were "utterly frivolous," that some of them were not proven or attempted to be proven, and "that none of them establish, import, or imply, upon the evidence, the commission of any act of malfeasance in office, nor any high crime or misdemeanor." The four members saw nothing in the case but the "resentfulness of two disappointed litigants."

One minority had recommended this resolution:

Resolved, That John C. Watrous, United States district judge for the district of Texas, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors.

The other minority recommended:

Resolved, That the testimony taken before the Committee on the Judiciary in the case of the Hon. John C. Watrous, judge of the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Texas, is insufficient to justify the preferment of articles of impeachment against him for high crimes and misdemeanors in office.

On June 10,[1] at the suggestion of the Judiciary Committee, the House postponed further consideration of the subject to the next session of Congress.

At the same time a memorial from Judge Watrous, which had already been placed on the desks of Members and appears to have embodied a defense of his conduct, was ordered to be laid on the table and printed.

[1] Journal, pp. 1075, 1076; Globe, pp. 2908–2910.

In the Watrous case the House discussed whether or not ascertainment of probable cause justified proceeding in impeachment.

As to what are impeachable offenses was a subject of argument in the Watrous case.

After the investigation of 1857 the House decided that the evidence did not justify the impeachment of Judge Watrous.

At the next session the subject was debated at length from December 9 to 15.[1] The principal portion of the debate was on the strength of the evidence to sustain the facts alleged; but two other questions were touched on at some length:

1. Whether the ascertainment of probable cause was sufficient ground for the House to proceed in an impeachment.

Messrs. Chapman and Houston argued[2] at some length in opposition to the views advanced by Mr. Clark. Mr. Clark[3] had argued that the case could not be sent to the Senate on proof short of what would be sufficient to convict. Mr. Houston combated that view, referring to the argument of Mr. Wirt in the Peck trial as conclusive on the point that the action of the House was similar to that of a grand jury; that while the investigation of the House was not necessarily ex parte, the office of the House was not to ascertain whether the party was guilty or innocent of the charges preferred against him, but whether the proof was sufficient to make the case worthy of a further trial. Mr. Chapman called attention to the fact that the trial of the case belonged to the Senate under the Constitution and to the Senate alone. If the House advanced one step beyond the ascertainment of probable cause it was plunged into the trial. The House, in the exercise of its discretion, might examine witnesses on both sides, but there must be a boundary line marking the powers of the House and Senate, and there was no line to be observed, except the ascertainment of probable cause. "Such I understand to have been the views," he said, "entertained in the case of Judge Peck and the case of Judge Chase, of Macclesfield in 1705, in the case of Warren Hastings in 1778, and of Lord Melville in 1805. Probable cause is such a state of facts and circumstances as would induce a cautious man to believe that the party charged is guilty of the offense.[4]

2. As to what are impeachable offenses.

The point was argued at considerable length. In his memorial to the House Judge Watrous had made the point that impeachable acts were only such as were also punishable by the ordinary laws of the land. This view was sustained in argument by Messrs. James A. Stewart, of Maryland,[5] Clark B. Cochrane, of New York,[6] and Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia.[7]

On the other hand, Messrs. John Cochrane, of New York,[8] Miles Taylor, of Louisiana,[1] Clement L. Vallandigham, of Ohio,[2] and John A. Bingham, of Ohio,[3] argued that the power of impeachment was broader, and went to an ascertainment of whether or not he had offended against the dignity of the people of the United States, transgressed the grave obligations of his office, or soiled the purity of the ermine. Mr. Bingham discussed especially the precedent of the Peck trial in this particular.

On December 15[4] a motion was made to strike out all after the word "resolved" in the resolution for impeachment, and insert the text of the second minority resolution, declaring the testimony insufficient to justify impeachment. This amendment was agreed to, yeas 111, nays 91. Then the resolution as amended was agreed to, yeas 112, nays 87.

So the House decided that the evidence did not justify impeachment proceedings.

Memorials which had been before preceding Congresses were reintroduced as a basis of the Watrous investigation of 1860.

A minority of the Judiciary Committee were authorized to take testimony in the Watrous case.

In the Watrous investigation of 1860 the Judiciary Committee proceeded ex parte.

In the Watrous investigation of 1860 the Judiciary Committee, without special leave, considered the evidence and reports in preceding Congresses relating to this case.

The Judiciary Committee reported, in 1860, in favor of the impeachment of Judge Watrous.

On March 8, 1860,[5] during the next Congress, the memorial of Jacob Mussina was again introduced by Mr. Miles Taylor, of Louisiana, and that of Eliphas Spencer was presented by Mr. Andrew J. Hamilton, of Texas; and on March 12[6] the memorial of William Alexander, first presented in 1851, was again presented by Mr. Hamilton. All these papers were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On March 28[7] the House gave the Judiciary Committee authority to send for persons and papers and to examine witnesses on oath or affirmation.

On May 18[8] Mr. John Hickman, of Pennsylvania, stated that the committee found itself obliged to sit during sessions of the House, and therefore it was very difficult to keep a quorum. Hence he proposed this resolution, which was agreed to by the House without objection:

Resolved, That a minority of the Committee on the Judiciary be, and are hereby, authorized to take the testimony of all witnesses in the matter of the petitions heretofore referred to said committee praying the impeachment of Hon. John C. Watrous, a judge of the United States for the eastern district of Texas.

On May 21[9] the House empowered the committee to print the memorial and testimony taken and to be taken in the case.

On December 17, 1860,[1] at the second session of the Congress, Mr. John H. Reynolds, of New York, asked unanimous consent to submit the report of the committee.[2] Mr. Horace Maynard, of Tennessee, reviewed the former proceedings in this case, intimated that the Committee on the Judiciary had been organized to further this impeachment, and declared that the time of the session was required for "the gravest and most important questions, going to the very existence and perpetuity of our Union." Therefore he objected.

On December 20[3] Mr. Reynolds submitted the report, which concluded:

Resolved, That John C. Watrous, United States district judge for the eastern district of Texas, be impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors.

The committee say in their report:

That in view of the previous proceedings touching the matters committed to them, they entered upon the investigation at the first session of the present Congress in the belief that it was of the highest importance to the public interest, as well as to the accused, that some definite result should be reached, and some action taken which should be regarded as final. In the Thirty-fifth Congress much time was expended by the Judiciary Committee in the investigation of the charges preferred, upon which Judge Watrous was heard by person and by counsel before the committee, a large amount of testimony was taken, and the committee were equally divided on the question of impeachment. The House, upon a consideration of the case, refused to adopt the resolution for an impeachment. Upon the present investigation the committee came to the conclusion to proceed ex parte, and they have accordingly taken additional evidence only in support of the charges against the accused. They have also considered the evidence before them taken during the Thirty-fifth Congress and the reports made to the House thereon, * * * and their proceedings are more properly to be regarded as a continuation of the former investigation than as an entirely original one. The additional evidence taken by the committee during the present Congress in respect to the charges upon which four members of the Judiciary Committee of the Thirty-fifth Congress recommended the adoption of a resolution of impeachment does not materially change the facts as they then appeared. But considerable evidence has been produced showing the connection of Judge Watrous with transactions of a character unfitting a judicial officer or an honest man, and which may not only present an independent ground of misbehavior deserving impeachment, but tends also to shed light upon the nature of his associations and private interests.

The committee adopt the conclusions of the four members who favored impeachment in the preceding Congress as to the charges in the Mussina and Spencer memorials, and then proceed to discuss the charges of the Alexander memorial, which they consider established and as justifying impeachment.

The report was postponed to December 27 but was not taken up on that day, and thereafter successive attempts to take it up on January 16, January 21, and January 28, 1861, failed,[4] through the objections of individual Members.

The Congress expired on March 3 and the report was not considered.

Amos Morrell was appointed judge on February 5, 1872, for the eastern district of Texas, and the records of the State Department show that this was the first appointment after the investigation of Judge Watrous.

2500. The investigation of the conduct of Judge Thomas Irwin in 1859.

Judge Irwin having resigned before the report of an investigation, the House discontinued proceedings.

On January 13, 1859,[1] the House authorized the Judiciary Committee to investigate charges made against Judge Thomas Irwin, of the United States district court of the western district of Pennsylvania. On January 28[2] Mr. George S. Houston, of Alabama, reported from that committee that pending the investigation, "they had satisfactory evidence before them that the said judge had this day resigned his said office, and that the committee now ask the further direction of the House."

There was some discussion as to the publication of the testimony already taken; but as it had been taken only on one side it was thought best not to print it. Then, on motion of Mr. John S. Phelps, of Missouri, it was—

Ordered, That the said committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, and that the same be laid on the table.

2501. The investigation into the conduct of Henry A. Smythe, collector of the port of New York.

The House declined to institute impeachment proceedings before a committee had examined specially whether or not there was ground for impeachment.

A question as to the expediency of impeaching an officer removable by the Executive.

It is for the House to say whether or not a person whose conduct is being investigated shall be allowed to appear before the committee by counsel.

The House declined to ask of the Executive the removal of an officer whom a committee had found delinquent.

On March 15, 1867,[3] the House had directed the Committee on Public Expenditures to inquire into the conduct of Henry A. Smythe, collector of the port of New York, and to report thereon to the House if in their opinion the said Smythe had been guilty of bribery or other crimes and misdemeanors.

On March 25, 1867,[4] the Speaker, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from Mr. Smythe, requesting that he might be permitted to appear with counsel to produce and examine witnesses before the committee.

Thereupon, Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, proposed the following:

Resolved, That the request of Henry A. Smythe, now collector of the port of New York, asking the privilege and permission to appear by counsel before the Committee on Public Expenditures, in defense of his conduct as collector, now being examined into by said committee, be granted.

Considerable discussion was occasioned by this proposition. It was urged that it was not the custom of the House to allow persons implicated by investigations before a committee to appear, especially by counsel, and Mr. Hulburd, while saying that his committee had allowed any person to come before them and produce witnesses under such circumstances, yet they had not allowed counsel, and should not do so without the consent of the House. Mr. John Covode, speaking from experience as chairman of an important investigating committee, said that he never allowed parties to appear by counsel except in one case, when Judge Black, a member of Mr. Buchanan's cabinet, was allowed counsel in a case where he was indirectly interested. On the other hand, it was recalled that in the Thirty-ninth Congress both Mr. Conkling and General Fry had appeared before the investigating committee by counsel; that in the investigation of the infringement of the privileges of the House by General Houston, he was allowed to appear with counsel; in the Thirty-seventh Congress a Member against whom charges had been made was allowed to appear by counsel; in the Thirty-fifth Congress Judge Watrous had also appeared with counsel, and also in a former Congress Judge Irwin had done the same. Mr. John A. Bingham, of Ohio, argued that the House ought always to judge of the propriety of allowing the official under investigation to appear; but in this case, of a subordinate officer of the Government, incapable in the nature of things of influencing the House or its committee, he should be allowed to appear by counsel.

The House, by a vote of 80 yeas to 35 nays, voted to suspend the rules for the consideration of the resolution, and then agreed to it.

On March 21, 1867,[1] Mr. Calvin T. Hulburd, of New York, from the Committee on Public Expenditures, had reported this resolution:

Resolved, That it is the sense of this House that Henry A. Smythe should be immediately removed from the office of collector of the port of New York, and that the Clerk of the House cause a certified copy of this resolution to be laid before the President of the United States.

Objection was made by Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, that the House should not request from the Executive the removal of any officer, but should proceed by impeachment. On March 22[2] Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, moved to amend by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting—

That it is the sense of this House that Henry A. Smythe, collector of the port of New York, ought to be impeached; and that the Committee on Public Expenditures proceed forthwith to prepare articles of impeachment.

Objection was made to this amendment, especially by Mr. Samuel Shellabarger, of Ohio, that there was no precedent in the history of the Government for proceeding to an impeachment without investigation by a committee charged with finding whether or not there was ground for articles of impeachment. A question was also raised by Mr. Fernando Wood, of New York, as to whether the House ought to proceed to impeach an officer whom the President (or the President and Senate as provided under the tenure of office act) could remove. The right of the House to impeach such an officer was not disputed, but the expediency was questioned.

[1] Journal, p. 80; Globe, pp. 255, 256.

[2] Globe, pp. 282–285.

In accordance with the suggestions made, Mr. Stevens modified his amendment to read as follows:

That the testimony taken by the Committee on Public Expenditures relating to the conduct of Henry A. Smythe, collector of the port of New York, be referred to the said committee, with a view to ascertain whether or not said Smythe has been guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors sufficient to justify his impeachment; and if said committee find from that and other evidence that he has been thus guilty, then to proceed and prepare articles of impeachment, and report the same to this House; and that they have leave to send for persons and papers.

On March 22 and 23[1] this amendment was considered and agreed to. The resolution as amended was then agreed to also.

On February 20, 1868,[2] on motion of Mr. Hulburd, the House agreed to a resolution empowering the committee to inquire into the receipts of Mr. Smythe in his official capacity, with authority to send for persons and papers.

It does not appear that the committee reported.

2502. The proposition to inquire into the conduct of William B. West, consul at Dublin.

The House declined to order an investigation of Consul West on evidence presented by a Member and referred the subject to a committee.

Mr. Speaker Colfax held that in order to be received as privileged a resolution must positively propose impeachment.

On December 2, 1867,[3] Mr. William E. Robinson, of New York, proposed as a question of privilege this resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to inquire into the conduct of William B. West, American consul at Dublin, in Ireland, regarding American prisoners in that city, and to report thereon forthwith, to the end that if he has been guilty of conduct which would be liable to impeachment this House may take measures to have articles of impeachment presented to the Senate.

Mr. John F. Farnsworth, of Illinois, raised the question of order that no question of privilege was involved.

The Speaker[4] held that as the resolution did not positively propose impeachment, it did not present a question of privilege.

Thereupon Mr. Robinson modified the resolution to read as follows:

Resolved, That William B. West, consul of the United States at Dublin, Ireland, be impeached before the Senate.

Mr. Robinson presented copies of correspondence between Mr. West and one Patrick J. Condon, who had been held as a political prisoner in Ireland, and other documents, which he considered as showing that Mr. West had not been sufficiently aggressive in maintaining the rights of American citizens abroad.

After debate on the general question of the rights of citizenship, the resolution was, on motion of Mr. Nathaniel P. Banks, of Massachusetts, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

It does not appear that further action was taken.

2503. The House, on the strength of a newspaper statement, ordered an investigation looking toward the impeachment of a justice of the Supreme Court.—On January 30, 1868,[1] Mr. Glenni W. Scofield, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, presented the following:

Whereas it is editorially stated in the Evening Express, a newspaper published in this city, on the afternoon of Wednesday, January 29, as follows:

"At a private gathering of gentlemen of both political parties, one of the justices of the Supreme Court spoke very freely concerning the reconstruction measures of Congress, and declared in the most positive terms that all these laws were unconstitutional, and that the court would be sure to pronounce them so. Some of his friends near him suggested that it was quite indiscreet to speak so positively, when he at once repeated the views in a more emphatic manner."

And whereas several cases under said reconstruction measures are now pending in the Supreme Court: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire into the truth of the declarations therein contained, and to report whether the facts as ascertained constitute such a misdemeanor in office as to require this House to present to the Senate articles of impeachment against said "justice of the Supreme Court," and the committee may have power to send for persons and papers, and have leave to report at any time.

Objection was made that a newspaper charge was insufficient ground for action by the House. Mr. Scofield disclaimed any knowledge himself. The House agreed to the preamble and resolution, yeas 97, nays 57.

On June 18[2] Mr. George S. Boutwell, of Massachusetts, by instructions of the committee, moved that it be discharged from further consideration of the resolution, and that the same be laid on the table. This motion was agreed to without division or debate.

2504. The impeachment of Mark H. Delahay, United States district judge for Kansas.

The House voted to investigate the conduct of Judge Delahay after the Judiciary Committee had examined the charges in a memorial.

The Judiciary Committee was empowered in the Delahay case to take testimony in Kansas through a subcommittee.

In the investigation into the conduct of Judge Delahay he was permitted to present testimony.

On March 19, 1872,[3] Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on the Judiciary, proposed a resolution, which was agreed to without debate:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby, authorized to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to take testimony in the matter of the memorial and charges against Mark H. Delahay, district judge of the United States district for the State of Kansas.

On May 28[4] Mr. John A. Bingham, of Ohio, from the Judiciary Committee, reported the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to further investigate the charges against the character and official conduct of M. H. Delahay, United States district judge for the district of Kansas, and for that purpose a subcommittee shall be authorized to sit during the recess of Congress, and may proceed to Kansas, subpœna witnesses, send for persons and papers, administer oaths, take testimony, and employ a clerk and reporter, the expense of which shall be paid from the contingent fund of the House on the order of the chairman.

In another case, relating to Judge Charles T. Sherman, Mr. Butler, citing the case of Judge Delahay, said that this subcommittee heard in Kansas such witnesses as Judge Delahay chose to have summoned.[1]

2505. Delahay's impeachment continued.

The House, without division, voted to impeach Judge Delahay for improper personal habits.

The House voted the impeachment of Judge Delahay at the end of one Congress, intending to present articles in the next.

Forms and ceremonies for carrying of the impeachment of Judge Delahay to the Senate.

The Speaker gave the minority party representation on the committee to carry the impeachment of Judge Delahay to the Senate.

The impeachment of Judge Delahay was carried to the Senate by a committee of three.

On February 28, 1873,[2] Mr. Butler reported this resolution from the Judiciary Committee:

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to go to the Senate, and at the bar thereof, in the name of the House of Representatives, and of all the people of the United States, to impeach Mark H. Delahay, judge of the United States district court for the district of Kansas, of high crimes and misdemeanors in office, and acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him and make good the same, and that the committee do demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of said Mark H. Delahay to answer to said impeachment.

Two questions arose from this report:

1. Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, asked if the Judiciary Committee, in view of the fact that the Congress was about to expire, had settled the question whether or not the next House of Representatives could present the articles of impeachment, of which this House might notify them. Mr. Butler said:

The Committee on the Judiciary do not expect to prepare articles of impeachment against Judge Delahay and present them for trial at this session. In the earliest case of impeachment of a judge in this country, in 1803, the case of Judge Pickering, which was in all respects like this, this exact question arose and was settled. One House presented articles of impeachment to the Senate and another House at the next session prosecuted those articles, as will be done in this case. We do not expect any other action except the formal presentation of the articles of impeachment to the Senate. The Senate is a perpetual court of impeachment, and in presenting these articles we act only as a grand jury.

2. As to the offense for which the impeachment was to be the remedy, Mr. Butler stated that—

The most grievous charge, and that which is beyond all question, was that his personal habits unfitted him for the judicial office; that he was intoxicated off the bench as well as on the bench. This question has also been decided by precedent. That was the exact charge against Judge Pickering, of New Hampshire, who, with one exception, is the only judge who has been impeached.

Mr. Butler then had read testimony showing that the judge had sentenced prisoners when intoxicated, to the great detriment of judicial dignity.

[2] Third session Forty-second Congress, Journal, p. 512; Globe, pp. 1899, 1900.

There was also a question as to certain alleged corrupt transactions, but Mr. Daniel W. Voorhees, of Indiana, said it was not proven to the satisfaction of several members of the committee that there was any malfeasance. Mr. Butler said:

The committee agree that there is enough in his personal habits to found a charge upon, and that is all there is in this resolution.

The resolution of impeachment was then agreed to without division.

On March 3[1] the Speaker announced the appointment of Mr. Butler, Mr. John A. Peters, of Maine, and Mr. Clarkson N. Potter, of New York, members of the committee. Two of these were members of the majority party in the House, and the third represented the minority.

On the same day[2] the committee appeared at the bar of the Senate and, having been announced, advanced toward the area in front of the Secretary's desk, and Mr. Butler said:

Mr. President, in obedience to the order of the House of Representatives, this committee of the House appear at the bar of the Senate of the United States, and do impeach Mark H. Delahay, district judge of the United States district court for the district of Kansas, in the name of the House of Representatives and all the people of the United States, for high crimes and misdemeanors in office. And we do further acquaint the Senate, by the order of the House, that the House will in due time furnish particular articles against said Delahay and make good the same. And this committee is further charged by the House to demand of the Senate that they will take order for the appearance of Mark H. Delahay, as such judge, to answer the same.

The Presiding Officer[3] said:

The Senate will take order in the premises, of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.

Later, on the same day, on motion of Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, it was Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate will receive articles of impeachment against Mark H. Delahay, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Kansas, this day impeached by the House of Representatives before it of high crimes and misdemeanors, whenever the House of Representatives shall be ready to receive the same.

Meanwhile the committee had returned to the House of Representatives, where Mr. Butler, the chairman, submitted the following written report:[4]

That, in obedience to the order of the House, the committee have been to the Senate, and, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States, have impeached Mark H. Delahay, district judge of the United States for the district of Kansas, of high crimes and misdemeanors; and have acquainted the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles against him, and make good the same. And further, that the committee have demanded that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said Mark H. Delahay to answer to the said impeachment.

A message was also received[5] in the House from the Senate in these terms:

The Senate is ready to receive articles of impeachment against Mark H. Delahay, judge of the United States district court for the State of Kansas.

No further proceedings took place. On March 10, 1874, as shown by the records of the State Department, Cassius G. Foster was appointed judge to fill a vacancy in this district.

2506. The investigation of the conduct of Edward H. Durell, United States district judge for Louisiana.

Instance wherein the House ordered an investigation of the conduct of a judge without a statement of charges, but in a case wherein common fame had made the facts known.

Instances wherein the House gave authority to prepare articles of impeachment at the time the investigation was ordered.

On January 13, 1873,[1] Mr. William D. Kelley, of Pennsylvania, moved that the rules be suspended so as to enable him to submit and the House to consider and agree to this resolution:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be instructed to inquire into the conduct of Edward H. Durell, judge of the United States district court for the district of Louisiana, and ascertain and report whether, in the opinion of the committee, he has, for the purpose of overthrowing or controlling the government of the State of Louisiana, usurped jurisdiction not vested in the said district court by the Constitution or laws of the United States; and to report articles proposing the impeachment of the said Edward H. Durell if, in the judgment of the committee, he has abused his judicial functions by such usurpation of jurisdiction and unlawful interference with the constitutional privileges and rights of the people of said State; and that the committee have power to send for persons and papers.

The question being put, the rules were suspended, and the resolution was presented. And thereupon it was agreed to, without debate or division.

On January 21[2] Mr. Jeremiah M. Wilson, of Indiana, from the Committee on the Judiciary, stated that there was some uncertainty in the resolution first adopted, and asked for the adoption of the following:

Resolved, That in addition to the inquiries heretofore directed by the House to be made into the official conduct of Judge E. H. Durell, the Judiciary Committee be instructed further to inquire whether said Durell should be impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors in office, and that said committee have leave to report at any time.

The resolution was agreed to by the House without division.

Instance wherein a House committee charged with an investigation examined testimony taken before a Senate committee.

The Durell investigation was postponed in the Forty-second Congress because there was no time to permit Judge Durell to present testimony.

On March 3,[3] the last day of the Congress, Mr. John A. Bingham, of Ohio, submitted the report of the committee:

That they have examined to some extent the voluminous testimony taken before the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate of the United States, and the bills, petitions, processes, and orders pending before said district court, and the action of said E. H. Durell thereon; and upon the legality and propriety of that action the most serious questions arise, and if the time at which this matter was brought before your committee by testimony permitted that proper investigation which ought to be had in a subject of so grave importance, your committee would proceed thereto.

It has been the practice of the Committee on the Judiciary to hear the accused in matters of impeachment whenever thereto requested, by witnesses or by counsel, or by both, as in their discretion would seem proper. Judge Durell has appeared before your committee and asked to be heard. At that hour in the session there was no time in which he could be heard, and for this reason only no further action has been taken by your committee.

We therefore report back the resolution with the recommendation that it be referred to the next House of Representatives for consideration, and that your committee be discharged from the further consideration thereof.

The report was laid on the table and ordered printed by the House.

A subcommittee, with power to send for persons and papers, was sent to Louisiana to investigate the conduct of Judge Durell.

A majority of the Judiciary Committee reported in favor of impeaching Judge Durell, principally for usurpation of power.

At the beginning of the next Congress, on December 17, 1873,[1] Mr. Jeremiah M. Wilson, of Indiana, submitted this resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to inquire and report to the House whether Judge E. H. Durell, judge of the district court of the United States for the southern district of Louisiana, shall be impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors; and that said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers.

On December 19[2] Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, from the Judiciary Committee, reported the following resolution, which was agreed to by the House:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and is hereby, authorized to send a subcommittee of two members of said committee to New Orleans for the purpose of taking testimony in the matter of the impeachment of Judge E. H. Durell, heretofore referred to said committee, and that said subcommittee have power to send for persons and papers and to employ a stenographer.

Mr. Butler explained that the charges against Judge Durell related to bankruptcy proceedings, and that unless the committee should be sent it might be necessary to have the bankruptcy records brought to Washington, or have copies of them made. Such a task would be long and expensive.

On June 17, 1874,[3] very near the end of the session, Mr. Wilson submitted the report of the majority of the committee, consisting of Messrs. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts; Jeremiah M. Wilson, of Indiana; Alexander White, of Alabama; Charles A. Eldredge, of Wisconsin; Clarkson N. Potter, of New York, and Hugh J. Jewett, of Ohio. The report begins:

Among the charges brought to the notice of your committee were those of drunkenness and the improper procurement of money by means of his judicial office. These charges are not sustained by the testimony, in the opinion of your committee, and therefore will not be further noticed.

The report finds more serious certain charges relating to the bankruptcy business of the court. Judge Durell had appointed E. E. Norton "official assignee in bankruptcy," and the latter had taken possession of the assets and estates of bankrupts in about 1,300 cases. "His charges were outrageously extortionate and seem to have been generally framed to absorb the estate," says the report; and it further cites an order by Judge Durell which prevented scrutiny into such charges. Norton also was found to have collusion with the auctioneers who made sales of bankrupt property, receiving more than $20,000 therefrom. The committee could not trace these facts directly to the knowledge of Judge Durell, although some testimony tended to show such knowledge. After citing evidence the report continues:

The manner in which Norton was managing these affairs and the extortionate charges he was making were the subject of severe criticism in the newspapers of the city of New Orleans.

The most intimate social relations existed between Judge Durell and Norton during all of this time. Judge Durell spent much of his time at Norton's house in the city of New Orleans. They traveled North together in the summer and spent much of their time together while North, returning South again together when the summer was over.

These facts so notorious in regard to the management of so important trusts as those of the bankrupt estates, when taken in connection with the order hereinbefore referred to, lead to the inevitable conclusion by your committee that Judge Durell must have been cognizant of them, and therefore a corrupt party thereto, or that he was grossly negligent in the discharge of his official duties, so that, quacumque via data, he comes under a like condemnation.

And, finally, the report discusses a charge growing out of the Louisiana election of November 4, 1872. William P. Kellogg, Republican candidate for governor at that election, filed a bill in the United States circuit court against the then Governor Warmouth, McEnery, the Democratic candidate for governor, and certain others, alleging frauds for the purpose of disfranchising colored voters, and such an illegal purging of the State registration board as would enable the destruction of the evidence of the frauds; and therefore Mr. Kellogg prayed that a writ of injunction should issue, enjoining Warmouth from canvassing the returns except in the presence of the unpurged returning board, called the Lynch board. Warmouth filed answer denying the allegations. The motion for an injunction was heard and submitted on December 4, and on December 6 Judge Durell granted the injunction restraining Warmouth as prayed for in the bill. The report, after setting forth these preliminary facts, continues:

In his opinion the judge speaks of Kellogg's bill as a bill "to preserve evidence." Assuming that this court had the power, by virtue of the acts of Congress, to preserve the evidence relating to the election of State officers, that end would have been answered and that power exercised by the injunction which prevented the destruction of the ballots, certificates, and evidences in question; and that was, as the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections have said in their report of January, 1873, "the utmost that the court had authority upon this bill to do." The Constitution and acts of Congress gave no color of authority to a Federal court to determine what were the proper officers of the State or to restrain those who claimed to be so from action in respect of State matters.

On the 20th of November Warmouth signed an act passed by the last legislature which until that time he had delayed signing, which act appointed Wiltz, Deferiet, and others a returning board, and subsequently he submitted to them the votes and returns, which were compiled by that board, and they returned certifying the McEnery ticket as elected, and Warmouth, as governor, on the 4th of December, made proclamation thereof accordingly.

About these facts there is no dispute whatever.

The legislature thus declared to have been elected were about to assemble in the State house on the 6th of December. About 9 o'clock on the evening of the 5th of December Judge Durell sent for S. B. Packard, the United States marshal for the district. Packard went to his room. The judge told him to send for Mr. Billings and Mr. Beckwith, Kellogg's solicitors; that he proposed issuing an order for the occupation of the State house. The solicitors were sent for; they came, and the judge told them the same thing, and after some consultation the preparation of the order was set about. Judge Durell dictated it to Mr. Billings, who wrote it down, and the marshal's deputy, De Klyne, made a clean copy of the order thus dictated. The judge then signed it and delivered it to Packard, who thereupon set about executing it, which he did by calling on General Emory for a detachment of Federal troops, which occupied the State house that same night. This occupation resulted in securing the State government to Kellogg. This order declared that, whereas Warmouth had, in violation of the restraining order herein, issued the following proclamation and returns of certain persons claiming to be a board of returning officers, all in violation and contempt of the said restraining order, as follows, to wit [setting out the proclamation and returns], and proceeded:

Now, therefore, in order to prevent the further obstruction of the proceedings in this cause, and further to prevent a violation of the orders of this court, to the imminent danger of disturbing the public peace, it is hereby ordered that the marshal of the United States for the district of Louisiana shall forthwith take possession of the building known as the Mechanics' Institute, and occupied as the State house for the assembling of the legislature therein, in the city of New Orleans, and hold the same subject to the further order of this court; and meanwhile to prevent all unlawful assemblage therein under the guise or pretext of authority claimed by virtue of pretended canvass and returns made by said pretended returning officers, in contempt and violation of said restraining order; but the marshal is directed to allow the ingress and egress to and from the public offices in said buildingof persons entitled to the same.

E. H. DURELL, Judge.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., December 5, 1872.

And it contained no other pretenses, recitals, or reasons for its issue.

It will be observed that none of the persons who composed the Wiltz and Deferiet board were members of the Lynch board, or named or mentioned in Kellogg's bill or Judge Durell's injunction. The act under which the Wiltz board was appointed seems to have been wholly overlooked, and no effort was made to restrain or prevent action under it; and although the judge declared that his midnight order was intended to prevent the obstruction of the proceedings in the Kellogg suit, and the violation of the orders of the court, the fact was these orders had not been violated nor the proceedings obstructed, nor was it possible that the canvass and return by the Deferiet board could obstruct or defeat the proceedings in that case, unless the object of that case was not, as pretended, to preserve evidences of right, but really to determine the validity of State elections. But the law had conferred and could confer no such power on a Federal court, and any proceedings to that end were necessarily coram non judice and void.

The report discusses at length the alleged usurpation practiced by Judge Durell, concluding:

Such action, from whatever motive, is at variance with every principle of good government, is calculated to confound and subvert the distinctions between the State and Federal governments, and to overthrow the Constitution itself, without which neither Judge Durell nor any other judge has any rightful authority whatever.

Therefore the committee reported these resolutions:

Resolved, That Edward H. Durell, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors in office.

Resolved, That a committee of two be appointed to go to the Senate, and, at the bar thereof, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States, to impeach Edward H. Durell, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana, of high crimes and misdemeanors in office, and acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will in due time exhibit particular articles of impeachment and make good the same; and that the committee do demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of said Edward H. Durell to answer to said impeachment.

Resolved, That a committee of seven be appointed to prepare and report articles of impeachment against Edward H. Durell, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana, with power to send for persons, papers, and records, and to take testimony under oath.

Mr. Lyman Tremain, of New York, submitted minority views, which were concurred in by Messrs. William P. Frye, of Maine; John Cessna, of Pennsylvania, and Jasper D. Ward, of Illinois, dissenting from the majority report and recommending the discontinuance of all proceedings.

Mr. Luke P. Poland, of Vermont, filed individual views, saying:

First. In relation to the midnight order, although he believes the judge had no proper legal jurisdiction to make it, still he is not able to find that the judge acted corruptly or with any belief that he was going beyond his jurisdiction in making it. The law under which he acted was new and no rules or precedents had been established under it. The whole people were excited, the times were violent and turbulent, and judicial calmness or correctness could hardly be expected.

Second. The evidence seems to establish that some of the officers of Judge Durell's court were guilty of very corrupt practices, and that he was not watchful to scrutinize their conduct, but there is no claim that he ever shared in any of the proceeds of their gains and no direct evidence that he knowingly sanctioned or approved their action.

Third. Where the evidence obtained by substantially an ex parte examination only secures a bare majority of the committee, it does not appear to me that the public interest will be furthered by presenting articles of impeachment to the Senate for trial.

A few days after this report was submitted this session of Congress adjourned without further action on it.

Judge Durell having resigned, the House discontinued impeachment proceedings.

Discussion of the effect of resignation of the officer upon impeachment proceedings.

Discussion of usurpation of power as a ground for impeachment.

At the next session, on January 7, 1875,[1] the resolutions came before the House, and it was then announced that Judge Durell had resigned his office, and that his resignation had been accepted.

A discussion arose as to two points:

1. As to the sentiments of the committee on the charges against Judge Durell.

Mr. Benjamin F. Butler said that he had favored impeachment solely because of the midnight order. He did not consider the other charges proven. As to the midnight order, he said:

That seemed to me not within the enforcement act. There was no bill under the enforcement act to put that order in action, but simply a proceeding to perpetuate testimony. It seemed to me so gross an exercise of power that if the judge did not know he was exceeding his powers he ought to have known it. And, in either case, if he did know, of course he was wrong; and if he did not know, he ought to have known, and therefore he did not conduct himself well in office. And upon that ground I voted as I did. * * * He acted upon his own motion, without any motion or argument before him, and that is what makes the gravamen of the offense charged against him; for without motion of the counsel for the complainant on this bill of equity, he, upon his own consideration and judgment, acted, and without any moving cause except in his own mind. * * * Now, while I will not hold a judge to be impeachable where he simply makes a mistake, yet if a judge, clearly outside of all possible jurisdiction, interferes with the liberty of a single citizen, I will hold him impeachable.

Mr. Lyman Tremain, of New York, who at the previous session had been one of the minority dissenting from impeachment, said that he had studied the case during the recess and had come to the conclusion that if the resolutions came to a vote he should vote for them, because of the midnight order. After reviewing the history of that order, Mr. Tremain said:

Instead of being a judicial order, it seems to me to be a military order, an order which it seems was afterwards upheld and supported by the troops of the United States, and which it may therefore be fairly assumed was contemplated and intended to be so used. I find also that the marshal testifies that the judge gave him discretionary power by an oral direction to determine what persons should be admitted to the State-house and what persons should be excluded; thus deputing, not in writing, this vast discretionary power, and clothing the marshal with it. I can not believe that such an order as that can be justified by any consideration of charity.

Messrs. Storm and Poland, who had been of the dissenting minority, stated their belief that the order was wrong, but they did not consider that a wrongful intent was established. "Because this judge made an order he had no legal jurisdiction to make," said Mr. Poland, "it by no means follows he is amenable to impeachment, unless it can be established that that order was made corruptly or made with a knowledge on his part—with a belief that he was exceeding his legal jurisdiction."

Mr. Jeremiah M. Wilson stated that he believed the general opinion of those concurring in the majority report, was that Judge Durell was also impeachable for the irregularities in the bankruptcy proceedings.

2. As to the power to impeach a person who has resigned.

Mr. Butler stated that he had no doubt, as the Constitution imposed the punishment of disability for holding office thereafter, that the impeachment might proceed. But Judge Durell was an old man and there would be no practical benefit in going on with this case. Mr. Luke P. Poland stated that, while he had not examined the matter carefully, he had a very strong impression that the resignation would not avail as a legal obstacle to prevent the House from continuing the proceedings. It was a matter for the discretion of the House, according to the circumstances of the case.

Mr. Tremain said he had examined the question with considerable care, and he had very serious doubt "whether the House has any Constitutional power whatever to proceed by impeachment after the officer has resigned, his resignation has been accepted, and his successor has been appointed. The power to impeach rests entirely upon the Constitution of the United States. The whole system of English parliamentary impeachment, with the tremendous powers possessed by Parliament, has been superseded by our Constitution." Mr. Tremain said that the whole subject had been discussed by Judge Story, whose Commentaries he quoted in support of his view.

The question was taken on laying the resolutions on the table, and the motion was agreed to, yeas 129, nays 69. So the proceedings were discontinued.

2510. The inquiry as to the conduct of Schuyler Colfax, Vice-President of the United States.

In the Colfax case the majority of the Judiciary Committee concluded that the power of impeachment was rather remedial than punitive.

Discussion as to whether or not a civil officer may be impeached for an offense committed prior to his term of office.

A proposition to investigate the conduct of an officer and prepare articles of impeachment was held to be privileged.

On February 20, 1873,[1] Mr. Fernando Wood, of New York, proposed as a question of privilege, the following:

Resolved, That the testimony reported to this House by the special committee appointed under the resolution of the House of Representatives of December 2, 1872, for the investigation of charges of bribery in influencing Members of the House of Representatives, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report articles of impeachment against Schuyler Colfax, Vice-President of the United States, if in its judgment there is evidence implicating that officer and warranting impeachment.

Mr. Horace Maynard, of Tennessee, asked if a question of privilege was presented.

The Speaker[1] stated that such a question had been presented.

Mr. James N. Tyner having raised the question of consideration, the House, by a vote of yeas 105, nays 109, voted not to consider it.

Thereupon Mr. Tyner presented this resolution, which was agreed to without debate or division:

Resolved, That the testimony taken by the Committee of this House, of which Mr. Poland, of Vermont, is chairman, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to inquire whether anything in such testimony warrants articles of impeachment of any officer of the United States not a Member of this House, or makes it proper that further investigation should be ordered in this case.

This resolution was offered as involving a question of privilege, and its status as such was not questioned.

On February 24 Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, submitted the report[2] of the committee. This report, so far as it related to the subject of impeachment, was concurred in by Messrs. John A. Bingham, of Ohio, Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, Charles A. Eldredge, of Wisconsin, John A. Peters, of Maine, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, of Pennsylvania, Daniel W. Voorhees, of Indiana, and Jeremiah M. Wilson, of Indiana. Mr. Clarkson N. Potter, of New York, dissented.

For the purpose of applying the principles and precedents, the committee assumed all that could be inferred from the testimony in regard to the Vice-President, Schuyler Colfax, who was the official referred to. They assumed that in the winter of 1867–68 he purchased of Oakes Ames stock of the Credit Mobilier at par when it was known to be worth much more than par; and that, from 1867 to 1869, while holding such stock, and while the House was considering subjects affecting the value of that stock, he presided over the House as Speaker. They found it undisputed that Mr. Colfax became interested in the Credit Mobilier before he became Vice-President, and that the motives which impelled the transaction were expected to operate upon him only as a Member of the House. Continuing, the committee say:

But we are to consider, taking the harshest construction of the evidence, whether the receipt of a bribe by a person who afterwards becomes a civil officer of the United States, even while holding another official position, is an act upon which an impeachment can be grounded to subject him to removal from an office which he afterwards holds. To elucidate this we first turn to the precedents.

Your committee find that in all cases of impeachment or attempted impeachment under our Constitution there is no instance where the accusation was not in regard to an act done or omitted to be done while the officer was in office. In every case it has been heretofore considered material that the articles of impeachment should allege in substance that, being such officer, and while in the exercise of the duties of his office, the accused committed the acts of alleged inculpation.

The committee then cite briefly the impeachments of Judges Pickering, Chase, Peck, and Humphries, and President Johnson, in each of which the offense charged occurred during the term of office. Of impeachments under the State constitutions

[1] James G. Blaine, of Maine, Speaker.

[2] House Report No. 81, third session Forty-second Congress; Globe, p. 1651.

the rule seemed to be the same, unless the recent cases of Judges Barnard and McCunn, in New York, might present some exceptional features. In the Parliament of England, also, the committee found the same rule prevailing in all years since the rights of the subject and the principles of law and justice have become established.

From this so nearly "invariable current of precedent and authority" the committee turn to inquire:

What is the nature and what the objects of impeachments under our Constitution? Are they punitive or remedial? Or, in other words, is impeachment a constitutional remedy for removing obnoxious persons from office and preventing their again filling office, or a power given for punishing an officer, while he is an officer, for some crime alleged to have been committed by him before he was such officer?

The report answers these questions as follows:

Your committee are very strongly inclined to the opinion that impeachment was intended by the framers of the Constitution to be wholly remedial and not punitive, except as an incident to the judgment, because we find that the Constitution limits the judgment in impeachment by strongly restrictive words: "Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit, under the United States."

If such judgment is a punishment for an alleged high crime and misdemeanor, then why does the same article provide for the punishment of the accused a second time for the same offense? Because the words we have quoted are followed by the provision: "But the party convicted shall, nevertheless, be subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law."

This, therefore, would leave the party who had been removed from office and disqualified from holding office by the judgment of impeachment, if that is a punishment for his crime, to be the second time punished for the same offense, which is contrary to natural justice, against Magna Charta, and is most positively forbidden by the fifth article of amendment to the Constitution.

This article also throws some further light on this subject, because in its nervous language it enacts that "No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless upon presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger."

Nor does it appear that this view is affected by the exception in section 2, Article III, of the Constitution, that the trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury; this exception being necessary only to make the instrument consistent in all its parts with itself, as it had already provided that the impeached could be tried by jury for his crime.

Again, we find impeachment to be remedial in this, that it only provides, as a further consequence, disqualification for office, by which the evil is cured; that thereafter the Government may not have an officer who has so far forgotten his obligations to his official oath and to his duty as a citizen as to have been removed from office for high crimes and misdemeanors; again, by vote of the electors or appointment by the Executive, put in place of honor or trust.

We are also inclined to believe that proceedings of impeachment were intended to be remedial and not punitive, because we have already seen that if punitive at all an entirely inadequate punishment has been provided by the judgment; because the very highest offenses are triable by impeachment, such as treason and bribery, and the sentence may be only removal from an office whose term extends for a few days only, as in the case under consideration.

Again, we are brought to the conclusion that proceedings of impeachment are remedial and not punitive, because, in the case of Judge Pickering, before referred to, impeached for habitual intoxication, the officer was condemned because he became incapacitated for the performance of the duties of his office, and we find that impeachment is the only means known to our Constitution by which a civil officer of the United States, elected by the people, or a judge appointed by the Executive, can be removed from office. And certainly habitual intoxication, while it may not be a crime at common law or by statute, in a private person, may readily enough seem to be a very high crime and misdemeanor in a high civil officer, wholly incapacitating him from performing all his duties; so much so as to be made by the Articles of War a ground for removing an officer from the military service.

Again, your committee are inclined to believe that impeachment is not punitive, because, although an officer may have been tried and convicted of a high crime, yet he may be impeached for that very crime as a remedy for public mischief, and thus, in the converse of the proposition above stated, be twice punished for the same offense.

If the conclusions to which your committee have arrived in this regard are correct, it will readily be seen that the remedial proceedings of impeachment should only be applied to high crimes and misdemeanors committed while in office, and which alone affect the officer in discharge of his duties as such, whatever may have been their effect upon him as a man, for impeachment touches the office only and qualifications for the office, and not the man himself.

The report was made in the House, February 24, and was briefly debated, after which it was postponed to February 26. But it was not considered that day, and does not appear to have been taken up thereafter.[1]

2511. The investigation into the conduct of Charles T. Sherman, district judge of the United States for the northern district of Ohio.

The House declined to vote the impeachment of a judge who had not been heard before the investigating committee.

Discussion of precedents in relation to ex parte investigations with a view to impeachment, including the case of President Johnson.

On February 22, 1873,[2] Mr. Ellis H. Roberts, of New York, presented as a question of privilege, and at the request of the Committee on Ways and Means, this resolution:

Resolved, That the evidence taken by the Committee on Ways and Means, under their authority to send for persons and papers in matters under examination pending before said committee, arising out of business referred to them by the House, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to examine so much thereof as relates to Charles T. Sherman, judge of the district court of the United States for the northern district of Ohio, and determine whether further investigation of the conduct of said Sherman should not be had with a view of presenting articles of impeachment, if such investigation should, in their judgment, justify such action.

Without any question as to whether or not the resolution was privileged, and without division, the House agreed to it.

On March 3,[3] the last day of the Congress, Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported that the testimony had come to the committee on the preceding day. There was therefore no time for the accused or his counsel to be heard, and as it had become the established practice of the Judiciary Committee to give such hearings in cases of impeachment, they reported the testimony back, to be placed on file for the consideration of the next House. Therefore Mr. Butler proposed this resolution:

Resolved, That the testimony be placed on file for the consideration of the next House of Representatives, and that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same.

Mr. Clarkson N. Potter, of New York, proposed the following as a substitute:

Whereas it appears by the letters of Charles T. Sherman, a judge of the district court of the United States for the northern district of Ohio, that he proposed to corruptly control legislation for money, to be paid to him by the stock exchange of New York, and subsequently insisted on such payment on the ground of such control, and threatened adverse legislation if the same was not paid; and whereas it further appears by the testimony of said Sherman before the Committee on Ways and Means of this House that his said pretenses of power to control legislation and his said assertions of services he had rendered in this respect were false: Therefore,

[3] Journal, pp. 571, 572; Globe, pp. 2122–2127.

Resolved, That a committee of three Members of this House be appointed by the Speaker to go to the Senate and at the bar thereof, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States, to impeach Charles T. Sherman, judge of the district court of the United States for the northern district of Ohio, of high misdemeanors in office, and acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will in due time exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him and make good the same; and that said committee do demand that the Senate take further order for the appearance of the said Charles T. Sherman to answer to said impeachment.[1]

The presentation of this proposed substitute caused an issue to be joined as to whether or not an officer ought to be impeached without an opportunity to be heard. It was explained that Judge Sherman had appeared before the Ways and Means Committee only as a witness, to answer such questions as were asked, and without power to explain or adduce evidence in his own behalf.

Those who favored delay to permit Judge Sherman to be heard seemed generally to consider that his conduct merited impeachment, Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, saying that he did not see how he could make a satisfactory explanation, yet he believed that the opportunity should be given him.

Mr. Butler said that in the cases of Judges Pickering and Chase the opportunity to be heard was not given, but it had been conceded in "the case of Judge Watrous, in the case of Judge Peck, in the case even of Andrew Johnson." There was dissent at this statement as to President Johnson, and Mr. Butler qualified it by saying:

> He was notified of what was going on, but never asked to appear.[2]

Mr. Butler went on to say that in the case of Judge Delahay they did not hear counsel, but sent a subcommittee to Kansas to hear such witnesses as Judge Delahay might choose to summon. Judge Busteed was heard by himself and by counsel. In this case Judge Sherman had made application to be heard, but the committee had no time to hear him.

Mr. Potter read letters of Judge Sherman which appeared to support the allegations of the preamble, and urged the adoption of the substitute.

After further debate the preamble and substitute were disagreed to by a vote of 32 ayes and noes not counted.

Then the resolution proposed by Mr. Butler was agreed to without division.

The records of the State Department show that Martin Walker was appointed judge of this district on November 25, 1873, and the vacancy was occasioned by the resignation and death of Judge Sherman.[3]

2512. The investigation into the conduct of Richard Busteed, United States district judge for Alabama.

The majority of the Judiciary Committee recommended the impeachment of Judge Busteed, principally for nonresidence.

A question as to the authority of Congress to make nonresidence of a judge an impeachable offense.

---

[1] At this stage the simple resolution to impeach is usually presented. The above form is used after impeachment has been voted, to provide for taking the charge to the Senate.

[2] Globe, p. 2123.

[3] John Sherman's Recollections, Vol. II, p. 726.

Judge Busteed having resigned, the House discontinued impeachment proceedings.

On December 15, 1873,[1] Mr. E. Rockwood Hoar, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire and report whether the action of this House is requisite concerning the official conduct of the judge of the United States district court for the district of Alabama; and especially whether said judge has held terms of his court required by law; whether he has continuously and persistently absented himself from the said State; and whether his acts and omissions in his office of judge have been such as in any degree to deprive the people of that State of the benefit of a district court therein, and amount to a denial of justice.

On December 17,[2] Mr. Jeremiah M. Wilson, of Indiana, submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom has been referred[3] the resolution requiring said committee to inquire into the conduct of the judge of the district court of the United States of the district of Alabama, shall have power to send for persons and papers.

On June 20, 1874,[4] Mr. Wilson presented the report of the committee for printing and recommitment.

The official referred to in these proceedings was Judge Richard Busteed.

It appears incidentally from the report that at least one witness was called at Judge Busteed's request, and was examined by "Mr. Busteed," which would suggest that the respondent acted in person or was represented by some attorney of the same name. Some of the testimony elicited shows pretty conclusively that Judge Busteed examined the witness personally.

Three charges appear in this case:

1. That Judge Busteed did not reside in the district as required by the acts of September 24, 1789, and December 18, 1812, the latter of which provided that "any person offending against the injunction or prohibition of this act shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor."

The majority of the committee determined that the residence required by these laws was an actual residence. They say that Judge Busteed was appointed in 1865, being then a resident and large property owner in New York. Soon after his appointment he leased for three years a residence in Mobile, Ala., and removed his family there to reside. The report assumes that this removal was with the intent of becoming a permanent resident of the State. About two years afterwards, the house becoming untenantable, he abandoned his lease, his family came North, and have not since returned to Alabama. For the past seven years his family had not been in Alabama. The testimony showed that Judge Busteed had in New York real estate and personal property to a total value of about $300,000, including a house, but that he had no real estate in Alabama, and that his personal effects consisted of "a carpet, a music box, and a double-barreled gun." He lived with a relative in the New York house much of the year, going to Alabama in the fall to hold court, and returning in June, as soon as the courts were over. From this testimony the majority of the committee concluded that Judge Busteed was no resident of Alabama, "but only a sojourner from time to time for the purpose of holding terms of court."

[4] Journal, p. 1262; Record, p. 5316; House Report No. 773.

2. The evidence showed much irregularity in holding courts—that in each division of the district he had frequently failed to hold the courts at the terms created by law. In one of them he had held no court since the spring of 1872, and in none of them had he held any court since the spring of 1873. Besides this, before those dates he held his courts irregularly, sometimes omitting altogether to hold them, being absent from the State. The committee concluded that the plea of ill health was not a sufficient excuse for these numerous and continued absences from duty.

3. It was also charged that Judge Busteed had used improperly the money of the United States and his official position to promote his personal interests. The committee found this charge sustained in respect to the remission of a fine by the judge in his court in order to relieve himself of a libel suit in the State courts.

Therefore the majority of the committee, Messrs. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts; Jeremiah M. Wilson, of Indiana; Luke P. Poland, of Vermont; Alexander White, of Alabama; Charles A. Eldredge, of Wisconsin; Clarkson N. Potter, of New York, and Hugh J. Jewett, of Ohio, concurred in recommending this resolution:

Resolved, That Richard Busteed, judge of the district court of the United States for the southern, middle, and northern districts of Alabama, be impeached for misdemeanors in office.[1]

Messrs. John Cessna, of Pennsylvania; William P. Frye, of Maine; Jasper D. Ward, of Illinois, and Lyman Tremain, of New York, dissented from the conclusion of the majority of the committee.

Soon after this report was printed the session of Congress ended.

At the next session, on January 7, 1875,[2] the report was taken up. In the meantime Judge Busteed had resigned his office and the resignation had been accepted.

Mr. Tremain expressed a doubt as to whether or not nonresidence was an impeachable offense. "High crimes and misdemeanors" must be taken to mean such offenses as were high crimes and misdemeanors when the Constitution was framed. It might be doubted whether a subsequent law proposing to make a specific offense a high crime or high misdemeanor would be constitutional.

This report being taken up immediately after the disposition of the Durell case, Messrs. Butler and Wilson took occasion to emphasize their opposition to the theory that an officer might escape impeachment by resignation.

The question being taken on discharging the Committee on the Judiciary from the consideration of the subject and laying it on the table, the motion was agreed to without division. So the proceedings were discontinued.

2513. The investigation into the conduct of William Story, United States judge for the western district of Arkansas.

Memorials containing charges against Judge Story were referred to the Judiciary Committee for examination before the House voted a formal investigation.

On February 26, 1874,[1] Mr. James G. Blaine, of Maine, presented to the House memorials of James S. Robinson, of Fort Smith, Ark., and of Ben. T. Du Vol, James S. Gage, and others, practicing attorneys of Fort Smith, containing charges and specifications against William Story, judge of the United States district court for the western district of Arkansas. These memorials were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and under the rule were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On April 28[2] Mr. Jeremiah M. Wilson, of Indiana, from the Committee on the Judiciary, stated that the memorials presented contained nineteen specifications. The committee had been examining the case for some time, but now needed further authority, and he proposed this resolution, which was agreed to by the House without division:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire whether Judge William F. Story, judge of the district court of the United States for the western district of Arkansas, shall be impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors, and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

On June 20, 1874,[3] Mr. John Cessna, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on the Judiciary, presented a resolution providing that the evidence taken in this matter by the Judiciary Committee be furnished by the Clerk of the House to the Attorney-General, Secretary of the Treasury, and Third Auditor and First Comptroller of the Treasury, "for their information and guidance, with the recommendation that such action be taken by the said Departments as will restore to the Treasury of the United States any moneys wrongfully paid to any of the officers of said court, and to prevent any such wrongful payments hereafter." This resolution was agreed to with an amendment including also a copy of testimony taken before the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

2514. The investigation into the conduct of George F. Seward, late consul-general at Shanghai.

The Seward investigation was set in motion by a memorial.

In the Seward investigation the respondent was represented by counsel and in person before the committee.

An opinion of the Judiciary Committee that a person under investigation with a view to impeachment may not be compelled to testify.

An instance wherein a committee charged with the investigation reported articles with the resolution of impeachment.

On January 23, 1878,[4] the Speaker laid before the House a communication from John C. Myers, late consul-general at Shanghai, China, asking that an investigation might be had concerning the administration of the consulate-general at Shanghai, during the terms in office of Hon. George F. Seward, present minister to China; O. B. Bradford, vice-consul-general and consular clerk; and himself as consul-general.

The memorial was first referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, but later the reference was changed to the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department.

The Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, by a resolution of January 11, 1878,[1] had been empowered generally to investigate the affairs of the State Department, and under this authority they proceeded to take testimony on the subject of the memorial.

It appears[2] that counsel was permitted to represent Mr. Seward before the committee, and later the investigation was suspended in order that Mr. Seward might leave his post and appear before the committee to assist in cross-examination of witnesses. The committee, however, made the condition of this concession, that Mr. Seward should produce papers in his possession relating to the consul-generalship at Shanghai during his incumbency of the office. Mr. Seward did not produce the papers, did not obey a subpœna duces tecum, and declined the oath as a witness, urging that the fifth amendment to the Constitution provided that "no person shall be compelled, in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself."

The issue thus raised was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, who reported on March 3, 1879,[3] Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, making the report. The general question of the production of papers was discussed,[4] and also the report said on the question of testimony:

> Investigations looking to the impeachment of public officers have always been finally examined before the Judiciary Committee of the House, so far as we are instructed; and it is believed that the case can not be found as a precedent where the party charged has ever been called upon and compelled to give evidence in such case. We distinguish this case from the case of an ordinary investigation for legislative purposes, where all parties are called upon to give such evidence (oral or written) as may tend to throw light upon the subject of investigation; but even in those cases it was early held that a person called as a witness, and not a party charged before the committee, was not bound to criminate himself; and a statute familiar to the House, for the protection of witnesses under such circumstances, from having the evidence given used against them, was passed.
> In making an investigation of the facts charged against an officer of the United States looking to impeachment, the House acts as the grand inquest of the nation to present that officer for trial before the highest court known to our Constitution—the Senate of the United States—for such punishment as may be constitutionally imposed upon him, which is very severe in its penalties, and even then does not exonerate the party from further prosecution before the proper courts for offenses against the laws.

On March 1, 1879,[5] before the report of the Judiciary Committee had been submitted to the House, Mr. Springer presented the report of the majority of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department.[6] The report consisted of seventeen articles of impeachment, charging that as judge of the consular court, while consul-general, he had corruptly received money in the settlement of estates and in other judicial matters; that he had converted to his own use certain funds intrusted to him as consul-general; that he had used his official influence to promote the construction of a railway in violation of law and treaty; that he had converted to his own use fees belonging by law to the marshal of the consulate, by virtue of an unlawful agreement with the said marshal; that he had, by means of falsified accounts, converted to his own use certain premiums of exchange; that he unlawfully took the salary of his office as consul-general after he had become minister of the United States to China, and while receiving the salary of the latter office; that as minister to China he unlawfully suspended John C. Myers, then being consul-general at Shanghai, and procured the appointment of one Oliver B. Bradford to the place, for the purpose "to secrete and conceal the crimes committed as aforesaid;" and that he had neglected willfully to render true and just quarterly accounts of his office, and embezzled the public moneys of the United States; that as minister to China he unlawfully endeavored to procure and did procure the release of Oliver B. Bradford from the consular jail, whither he had been committed for embezzlement, and permitted him to go at liberty; and that he unlawfully took from the consulate-general at Shanghai certain account books, the property of the United States, and carried them away "with intent to conceal, destroy, or steal the same, and ever since has and still does conceal the same, and refuses to deliver the same up as required by law."

The committee therefore recommended this resolution:

Resolved, That George F. Seward, late consul-general of the United States of America at Shanghai, China, and now envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America to China, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors while in office.

Two other resolutions accompanied, providing for presentation of the impeachment in the Senate and for the appointment of a committee to frame articles of impeachment.

Mr. Solomon Bundy, of New York, presented views of the minority, with this resolution:

Whereas, in view of the great importance of the subject and matters embraced in the report of the majority of the committee in the matter of the proposed impeachment of George F. Seward for alleged high crimes and misdemeanors, and the complicated questions of law involved therein: Therefore

Resolved, That the matters embraced in such report, together with the evidence in the case, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On March 3,[1] the last day of the Congress, the House, by a vote of yeas 132, nays 109, voted to consider the report; but thereafter dilatory proceedings prevented action on it.

2515. The investigation into the conduct of Oliver B. Bradford, late vice-consul-general at Shanghai.

A question as to whether a vice-consul-general is such an officer as is liable to impeachment.

The Bradford investigation was set in motion by a memorial in which charges were preferred.

[1] Journal, pp. 621, 622.

On March 22, 1878,[1] Mr. William M. Springer, of Illinois, from the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, to whom had been referred a memorial of John C. Myers relating to the affairs of the consulate-general at Shanghai, China, reported a recommendation that Oliver B. Bradford, late vice-consul-general at Shanghai, China, and now holding the office of postal agent of the United States at Shanghai, and also the office of consular clerk of the United States assigned at Shanghai, be impeached at the bar of the Senate of high crimes and misdemeanors in office. The committee transmitted with their report the testimony taken, and also as part of their report, ten articles of impeachment, setting forth the charges against the said Bradford: (1) That in abuse of his official position he became interested in the construction of a railroad in China, violating treaties between the United States and China, and in violation of acts of Congress; (2) that in the construction of the said railroad he used his official position to further a fraudulent scheme; (3) that in five specified cases he has used his office to exercise oppressive, extortionate, and corrupt activity against American citizens; (4) that he embezzled a letter from the post-office at Shanghai; (5) that he unlawfully took from the post-office and opened another letter; (6) that he transmitted a false salary voucher to the United States Treasury to cover the withholding of a portion of the salary of an employee; (7) that as disbursing officer he defrauded the United States Government; (8) that he again was guilty of fraud as disbursing officer; (9) that he embezzled a sum of money belonging to the United States; (10) and that he unlawfully deposited to his own account a sum of money belonging to the United States.

In view of these specifications the committee recommended this resolution:

Resolved, That Oliver B. Bradford, now consular clerk of the United States, assigned to Shanghai, China, and postal agent of the United States at Shanghai, China, and late vice-consul-general of the United States at Shanghai, China, and late clerk of the consular court of the United States at Shanghai, China, be impeached by the House of Representatives at the bar of the Senate, for high crimes and misdemeanors while in office.

Mr. Springer announced in the report that two members of the committee, Messrs. Mark H. Dunnell, of Minnesota, and Solomon Bundy, of New York, entertained grave doubts whether Mr. Bradford was such an officer as was liable under the Constitution to impeachment. All of the committee agreed that the evidence sustained the charges. In view of the constitutional question involved, Mr. Springer moved that the whole subject be referred to the Judiciary Committee. This motion was agreed to without division.

2516. The investigation of the conduct of Henry W. Blodgett, United States judge for the northern district of Illinois.

In the case of Judge Blodgett the House ordered an investigation upon the presentation of a memorial specifying charges.

In the investigation of Judge Blodgett both the complainants and the respondent were represented by counsel and produced testimony before the committee.

The most liberal latitude was allowed in the examination of witnesses before the committee which investigated the conduct of Judge Blodgett.

[1] Second session Forty-fifth Congress, Journal, p. 1127; Record, p. 3667, House Report No. 818.

The committee and the House acted adversely on a proposition to impeach Judge Blodgett for an act in excess of his jurisdiction, bad faith not being shown.

On January 7, 1879,[1] Mr. Carter H. Harrison, of Illinois, presented the memorials of certain citizens of Chicago asking for the appointment of a special committee to visit that city and investigate certain charges, therein set forth, against Henry W. Blodgett, district judge of the northern district of Illinois. Mr. Harrison also presented a preamble and resolution, which, after amendment, was agreed to by the House, giving the Judiciary Committee authority to investigate the charges.

On March 3,[2] Mr. J. Proctor Knott, of Kentucky, presented the report of the committee.

As to the method of investigation the report says:

That during the taking of the testimony herewith submitted, Judge Blodgett and Messrs. Cooper, Knickerbocker, and Sheldon, upon whose memorial the resolution recited above was introduced and adopted, were present in person and with counsel. Both parties were permitted to introduce evidence, and the most liberal latitude was allowed to each in the examination of witnesses to the end that every fact bearing directly or remotely upon the subject under consideration might be clearly ascertained. In order to facilitate the investigation as much as possible, however, and to enable the committee to confine the testimony within reasonable limits, and present it to the House in something like a systematic form, the memorialists were requested to present their charges and specifications in writing, which was accordingly done, and copies thereof delivered to Judge Blodgett with the request that he would file written answers thereto, if such answers should be deemed by him necessary or desirable.

The report then discusses the charges, which were:

1. That Judge Blodgett had entered into a dishonest conspiracy to defraud, by aid of his acts as judge, the creditors of a certain corporation.

2. That he had improperly attempted to prevent the grand jury from finding an indictment against one Homer N. Hibbard, for perjury.

3. That while holding the office of judge he had knowingly borrowed and converted to his own personal use money belonging to or deposited in the registry of his court.

4. That as judge he had willfully employed the power and authority of the court to perpetrate acts of gross judicial oppression upon the rights of a private citizen, and sanction and direct the commission of a flagrant trespass which constituted a criminal offense under the laws of the State of Illinois, punishable by fine and imprisonment.

5. That in administering the bankrupt law he had willfully violated the letter and spirit of the law by making an unlawful use of his power as judge to enrich his friends and favorites, to the reproach and scandal of the court.

6. That he had corruptly used his official position to aid a conspiracy to defraud the stockholders of a certain insurance company, by enabling certain persons to buy up the stock at a discount.

The committee found in general that the charges were not sustained by the evidence; but in discussing the fourth charge they say:

It may be conceded that Judge Blodgett acted in this instance in excess of his jurisdiction. * * * However justly, therefore, Judge Blodgett may be amenable to criticism or censure on account of his action in this matter * * * it is impossible to see how he can be held liable to impeachment therefor, unless it can be shown that he did not act in good faith for the best interests of those concerned, as he understood them, but with such malice and corruption as to render his act in the premises an official misdemeanor.

In view of all the evidence the committee, without dissent, recommended this resolution:

Resolved, That the charges against Henry W. Blodgett, United States district judge for the northern district of Illinois, be laid on the table, and the House take no further action thereon.

This resolution was agreed to by the House without division.

2517. The investigation into the conduct of Aleck Boarman, United States judge for the western district of Louisiana.

A Member of the House presented specific charges against Judge Boarman to the Judiciary Committee, which had been empowered to investigate the judiciary generally.

A subcommittee visited Louisiana and took testimony against and for Judge Boarman.

The Member who lodged charges against Judge Boarman conducted the case against him before the subcommittee.

Judge Boarman made a sworn statement or answer to the committee investigating his conduct in 1890, but did not testify.

The inquiry of 1890 into the conduct of Judge Boarman was conducted according to the established rules of evidence.

In 1890 the Judiciary Committee concluded that Judge Boarman should be impeached for an act in violation of the statute.

On March 1, 1890,[1] Mr. William C. Oates, of Alabama, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom had been referred, on February 18, 1890, a resolution providing for an investigation of "the practice of certain United States district courts and other officers in criminal cases," reported the resolution with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. To show the desirability of such investigation the report cites a letter from the Attorney-General to the chairman of the committee and letters from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and one of the Auditors of the Treasury. In addition to these letters numerous complaints had been made by persons seeming to be well informed and reputable; and also there had been complaints in the newspapers. Therefore an investigation seemed to the committee desirable, and they recommended a substitute amendment providing for a general investigation, including "maladministration or corrupt official conduct of any of the officers connected with the judicial department of the Government."

On April 1[2] the House agreed to the resolution with the proposed amendment; and on September 16[3] the committee was given authority to continue its investigation through the recess of Congress.

[3] Journal, p. 1046.

On February 17, 1891,[1] Mr. Albert C. Thompson, of Ohio, submitted the report of the committee. This report dealt generally with the subject referred to the committee, and also presented an ascertainment of fact in relation to Aleck Boarman, district judge for the western district of Louisiana. The report states that while the committee were investigating the general subject a letter was, in May, 1890, addressed to the chairman of the committee by Mr. C. J. Boatner, Member of the House from the Fifth District of Louisiana, preferring seven specific charges against Judge Boarman, and asking that a date be fixed when the charges might be substantiated by witnesses. Thereupon a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary visited Shreveport and New Orleans and took testimony relating to the charges. Both Judge Boarman and Mr. Boatner were present at Shreveport, but neither attended at New Orleans. Mr. Boatner conducted the examination of witnesses called to sustain the charges, and Mr. Albert H. Leonard appeared as counsel for Judge Boarman. The report further says:

The subcommittee before whom the testimony was taken aimed to admit nothing inadmissible under the well-established rules of evidence, but, notwithstanding the care exercised, much is found in the record that is not legal evidence. In reaching the conclusions, however, hereinafter stated, the committee endeavor to eliminate from their consideration those matters that are plainly hearsay and neighborhood gossip, and base their judgment, it is believed, upon substantial and trustworthy evidence.

Judge Boarman did not testify before the subcommittee, nor did he introduce any oral testimony whatever, except that of Mr. Albert H. Leonard and a "statement" made by Mr. M. C. Elstner, the latter being entirely personal to Mr. Elstner himself and having no bearing upon any of the issues raised. The answer of Judge Boarman, hereinbefore referred to, is given its full legal effect, as an answer, and is taken to be true except in those particulars wherein its averments are overcome by countervailing legal testimony.

The answer of Judge Boarman, filed at the first meeting of the committee, is printed in the report, and begins as follows:

In the matter of certain charges and complaints made by C. J. Boatner against Aleck Boarman, judge, western district of Louisiana, to the subjudiciary committee of the House of Representatives, sitting at Shreveport, La., the Hon. A. C. Thompson, chairman.

Respondent, in answer to said charges, respectfully makes the following answer and statements under oath:

He denies each and every allegation made against him, except what is hereinafter admitted.

First charge. Respondent denies, etc.

* * * * * * *

Respondent submits this answer to said charges, and respectfully asks now, as he has, to the knowledge of the committee, heretofore done, that such a thorough investigation shall be made as will best subserve the public interest.

ALECK BOARMAN.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this November 17, 1890.

[SEAL.] J. B. BEATTIE, Clerk.

Upon the filing of the answer Mr. Boatner asked and was granted leave to amend the charges against Judge Boarman by the addition of another specification.

The committee concluded as to all the charges except the fourth that while there was much in the testimony warranting severe criticism of his acts yet he should be acquitted; but on the fourth charge the committee were unanimous that he should be impeached. This charge was that he had "used for his own purposes the funds paid into the registry of his court, and has unlawfully and corruptly failed and refused to decide causes in which the funds in dispute were or should have been in the registry of his court, and also (additional charge) that the respondent repeatedly borrowed money from the marshal of this court, contrary to law." The report quotes sections 995, 996, and 5505 of the Revised Statutes, and rule 42 governing district courts in admiralty cases, and says:

The committee profoundly regret that from the evidence taken and fully appearing in the record there appears to have been no attempt on the part of Judge Boarman to comply with the statute and the rules of court as to moneys paid to the clerk. His practice in this regard, if not criminal, is reprehensible in the extreme.

Therefore the committee, without dissent, reported this resolution:

Resolved, That Aleck Boarman, judge of the United States district court for the western district of Louisiana, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors.

The House considered the resolution on February 28,[1] which was next to the last legislative day of the Congress, but the debate, which was entirely in favor of impeachment, was not concluded, and the resolution failed to be acted on.

In 1892 the House referred to the Judiciary Committee the evidence taken in the Boarman investigation of 1890 as material in a new investigation.

At the investigation of 1892 Judge Boarman testified and was cross-examined before the committee.

The second investigation of Judge Boarman having revealed an absence of bad intent in his censurable acts, the committee and the House decided against impeachment.

A Member who had preferred charges against Judge Boarman declined, as a member of the Judiciary Committee, to vote on his case.

In the first session of the next Congress, on January 13, 1892,[2] Mr. Boatner submitted a resolution directing an investigation of the charges against Judge Boarman and it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On January 30[3] Mr. Oates reported from the committee, in lieu of that resolution, a preamble reciting the proceedings in the former Congress, especially citing the fact that the evidence taken was not ex parte, and that the respondent had been present in person or by counsel when it was taken, and a resolution referring the report made in the last Congress, the charges and the evidence, to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to investigate the same thoroughly, and further providing: "And for the purpose of making the investigation hereby ordered the said Committee on the Judiciary may adopt and use as legal evidence the testimony taken as aforesaid," and "may take and consider any additional and explanatory evidence of a legal character which may be offered either for or against said judge."

[2] First session Fifty-second Congress, Journal, p. 26.

[3] Journal, p. 49; Record, p. 689.

This resolution was agreed to, and the committee made the investigation

On June 1,[1] Mr. Oates submitted the report of the committee.

As to the manner of investigation the report shows that it was conducted by a subcommittee, and says:

> Your committee found it unnecessary to take any additional testimony after having adopted that taken by its predecessor in the Fifty-first Congress. Upon due inquiry it was found that there were no other witnesses to be examined in behalf of the Government touching the said charges, and therefore the said judge was notified that if he had any exculpatory or explanatory evidence which he wished to offer that he should have the opportunity of doing so. He then came to Washington, appeared before said special subcommittee, and gave his testimony.

A reference to the printed testimony[2] shows that Judge Boarman testified at length and was then cross-examined by members of the committee. He explained his conduct as to the various charges.

The committee investigated the seven former charges and one new one. The committee found in favor of the judge as to the new charge; and also found in his favor as to the old charges, including that numbered four, on which the committee had found against him in the preceding Congress. As to the fourth charge the report says:

> It will be seen in this testimony that the judge claims to have been entirely ignorant of the existence of this statute. (Sec. 5505 relating to receiving from the clerk money belonging to the registry.) He says that it looks like a humiliating confession for a judge to make, and the committee agree with him in that statement. Ignorantia legis non excusat is a maxim of the law, applicable alike to the ignorant and the learned. It can not, therefore, be taken as any excuse whatever for his conduct in this case. He is, by his own confession, technically guilty of embezzlement. There are, however, extenuating circumstances. Wheaton, the clerk, was upon his death bed when he gave the judge the orders * * * for this money. He told the judge that he was going to die, and that this money belonged in the registry of the court, and he did not wish it to go into his succession or estate. The judge swears that his motive in receiving the money was to preserve it unincumbered for the suitors who would be entitled to it when the distribution was decreed; and while he admits that he may have converted a part of it to his own use, if he did he replaced it with the new clerk, and thus those who were entitled to it received their money. While, therefore, the taking of the money by the judge was a statutory embezzlement, it can not be said from the evidence that he took it lucri causa, or with dishonest intent.

The committee find the second branch of the fourth charge—relating to corrupt failure to decide cases—not sustained.

The committee found that judge Boarman's conduct had not been such as to absolve him from censure, but they failed to find that he "had been influenced by corrupt or dishonest motives." Therefore they asked to be discharged from further consideration of the case.

The report also says:

> Hon. C. J. Boatner, now a member of this committee, having preferred the charges against Judge Boarman in the Fifty-first Congress, declined to vote on any of the propositions embraced in the foregoing report.

The report of the committee was concurred in by the House without division.

2519. The inquiry into the conduct of J. G. Jenkins, United States circuit judge for the seventh circuit.

The investigation of the conduct of Judge Jenkins was suggested by a resolution offered by a Member and referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Form of resolution authorizing the investigation into the conduct of Judge Jenkins.

Instance wherein a majority of the Judiciary Committee reported a resolution censuring a judge for acts not shown to be with corrupt intent.

On February 5, 1894,[1] Mr. Lawrence E. McGann, of Illinois, proposed a resolution to investigate and report whether or not the Hon. J. G. Jenkins, judge of the United States circuit court for the seventh circuit, has abused the powers and process of said court or oppressively exercised the same to oppress the employees of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. This resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On March 6, 1894,[2] Mr. Charles J. Boatner, of Louisiana, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary of the House be, and is hereby, authorized to speedily investigate and inquire into all the circumstances connected with the issuance of writs of injunction in the case of the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, complainant, against the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, defendant, in the United States circuit court for the eastern district of Wisconsin, and the several matters and things referred to in the resolution introduced on the 5th day of February, instant, charging illegalities and abuse of the process of said court therein and report to this House whether in any of said matters or things the Hon. J. G. Jenkins, judge of said court, has exceeded his jurisdiction in granting said writs, abused the powers or process of said court, or oppressively exercised the same, or has used his office as judge to intimidate or wrongfully restrain the employees of the Northern Pacific Railway Company, or the officers of the labor organizations with which said employees or any of them were affiliated, in the exercise of their rights and privileges under the laws of the United States; and if so, what action should be taken by this House or by Congress.

On June 8[3] Mr. Boatner submitted the report of the committee. This report relates the history of the appointment of receivers for the Northern Pacific Railroad Company by Judge Jenkins, in conjunction with other judges in whose territory the property lay; of the successive reductions of the wages of employees made by the receivers; of great dissatisfaction which finally arose among the employees affected; and finally the issuance of a writ of injunction by Judge Jenkins, on application of the receivers, restraining the employees "from combining and conspiring to quit, with or without notice, the service of the said receivers, with the object and intent of crippling the property in their custody or embarrassing the operation of the said railroad, and from so quitting the service of the said receivers with or without notice as to cripple the property or prevent or hinder the operation of the said railroad." This writ was followed by a second writ prohibiting the representatives of labor organizations from "ordering, recommending, approving, or advising others to quit the service of the receivers."

Although witnesses and the judge himself in an opinion denied that there was an intention to coerce the services of the employees, yet the majority of the committee find this explanation inconsistent with the words used, and hold that

[3] House Report No. 1049.

Judge Jenkins's writs were "not sustained either by reason or authority," were "in violation of a constitutional provision, an abuse of judicial power, and without authority of law." The report of the majority continues:

> The testimony adduced before us fails to show any corrupt intent on the part of the judge.

The majority, in conclusion, recommend the adoption of this resolution—

> Resolved, That the action of Judge James G. Jenkins in issuing said order of December 19, 1893, being an order and writ of injunction, at the instance of the receivers of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, directed against the employees of said railroad company, and in effect forbidding the employees of said Northern Pacific Railroad Company from quitting its service under the limitations therein stated, and in issuing a similar order of December 22, 1893, in effect forbidding the officers of labor organizations with which said employees were affiliated from exercising the lawful functions of their office and position, was an oppressive exercise of the process of this court, an abuse of judicial power, and a wrongful restraint upon said employees and the officers of said labor organizations; and that said orders have no sanction in legal precedent, were an invasion of the rights of American citizens, and contrary to the genius and freedom of American institutions, and therefore deserving of the condemnation of the American people.

The minority views, signed by Messrs. William A. Stone, of Pennsylvania; George W. Ray, of New York; H. Henry Powers, of Vermont, and Thomas Updegraff, of Iowa, hold that if Judge Jenkins acted corruptly he should be impeached, while if he erred honestly the wrong would be righted by an appellate tribunal, and conclude:

> To propose that a judge, who, as the majority declare, had no "corrupt intent" and "who sincerely believes" in his conclusions, shall, without impeachment, be censured by the legislative branch of the Government, is to confound all distinctions between the legislative and judicial powers and create a side tribunal of appeal where justice would be for sale to the suitor who could poll the largest vote.

It does not appear that the resolution was acted on by the House.

2520. The investigation into the conduct of Augustus J. Ricks, United States judge for the northern district of Ohio.

The House ordered an investigation of the conduct of Judge Ricks on the strength of charges preferred in a memorial.

In the investigation of Judge Ricks the respondent made a statement before the committee and offered testimony in his behalf.

The majority of the Judiciary Committee reported a resolution censuring Judge Ricks.

On January 7, 1895,[1] Mr. Tom L. Johnson, of Ohio, presented the memorial of Samuel J. Ritchie, praying for the impeachment of Augustus J. Ricks, United States district judge for the northern district of Ohio. This memorial was referred under the rule.

On the same day Mr. Johnson, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution, which was agreed to without debate and without the reading of the memorial or any statement of its contents beyond the mere announcement by Mr. Johnson that it was "the memorial of Samuel J. Ritchie, praying for the impeachment of Augustus J. Ricks," etc.:

> Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby, instructed to investigate the charges against the Hon. Augustus J. Ricks, United States district judge for the northern district of Ohio, contained in the memorial of Samuel J. Ritchie, presented to the House this day, and report what action in their judgment should be taken thereon.

[1] Third session Fifty-third Congress, Journal, pp. 50, 51; Record, p. 709.

On January 25[1] Mr. George P. Harrison, of Alabama, from the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted a report, accompanied by this resolution:

Resolved, That while the committee is not satisfied that Judge Augustus J. Ricks has been guilty of any wrong committed while judge that will justify it in reporting a resolution of impeachment, yet the committee can not too strongly censure the practice under which Judge Ricks made up his accounts.

Minority views were presented by Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, of Texas, accompanied by these resolutions:

Resolved, That Augustus J. Ricks, judge of the United States court of the northern district of Ohio, be impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary is hereby instructed to prepare without unnecessary delay and report to this House suitable articles of impeachment against the said Augustus J. Ricks, judge of the United States court for the northern district of Ohio.

It appeared from the report and the minority views that at first the committee, by a vote of seven to six, had agreed to recommend impeachment, one member being present and not voting and three being absent. But before a report was made in accordance with this vote an order was agreed to inviting Judge Ricks to appear before the committee, and also providing for the testimony of such other witnesses as might be called. It was "after hearing the statement of Judge Ricks on his own behalf, and the testimony of Martin W. Sanders," that the committee, by a vote of nine to seven, one member being absent, agreed to the resolution reported by the majority.

It appears further from the report that the committee took testimony at Cleveland, Ohio, through a subcommittee, and in Washington before the whole committee. This testimony was such as was offered both against and in behalf of Judge Ricks.

The minority views were concurred in by Messrs. Joseph W. Bailey, of Texas; Edward Lane, of Illinois; Thomas R. Stockdale, of Mississippi; David A. De Armond, of Missouri; D. B. Culberson, of Texas; Thomas Updegraff, of Iowa, and C. J. Boatner, of Louisiana. The charges which they discussed were:

First. That as judge the said Augustus J. Ricks had defrauded the United States out of certain moneys, which he appropriated to his own use.

Second. That he corruptly persuaded Martin W. Sanders, his successor in the clerk's office, to omit from his emolument report fees which ought to have been included in it.

Third. That he approved the emolument report of said Martin W. Sanders, knowing it to be incorrect.

The minority found that the third charge was not reasonable, and that the second in the form made was not sustained by the evidence, although he had evidently taken fees to which he was not entitled. But on the first charge they concluded that the evidence sustained the guilt of the judge. The minority discuss at some length the evidence which led them to their conclusion.

The report was made near the close of the Congress, and it does not appear that any action was taken on it.

2521. Definition and precedence of questions of privilege.

Questions of privilege have precedence of all motions except the motion to adjourn.

Form and history of Rule IX.

The House rules define questions of privilege in Rule IX:

> Questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings; second, the rights, reputation, and conduct of Members individually in their representative capacity only; and shall have precedence of all other questions, except motions to adjourn.

This was a new rule framed in the revision of 1880,[2] and has not been changed essentially since that date. The object of the rule was to prevent the large consumption of time which resulted from Members getting the floor for all kinds of speeches under the pretext of raising a question of privilege.[3] As first framed, the motions for a recess and to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn were included with the motion to adjourn as having precedence of a question of privilege. These motions were dropped in the Fifty-first Congress, and, although restored in the Fifty-second and Fifty-third, were again dropped in the Fifty-fourth.

2522. A question of privilege supersedes consideration of the original question, and must first be disposed of.—Jefferson's Manual, in the latter portion of Section XXXIII, provides:

> A matter of privilege arising out of any question, or from a quarrel between two Members, or any other cause, supersedes the consideration of the original question, and must be first disposed of.

2523. It has long been the practice of the House to give a question of privilege precedence over all other business.—On February 6, 1836,[1] on motion of Mr. John M. Patton, of Virginia, the rules were suspended by a two-thirds vote in order to enable him to present for the consideration of the House a resolution returning to Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, the petition of Rachel Steers and eight other women of Fredericksburg, Va., presented by him on a preceding day, and received and laid on the table by the House.

Pending the question on this resolution, Mr. Waddy Thompson, of South Carolina, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Hon. John Quincy Adams, by the attempt just made by him to introduce a petition purporting on its face to be from slaves, has been guilty of a gross disrespect to this House, and that he be instantly brought to the bar to receive the severe censure of the Speaker.

(Mr. Adams had informed the Speaker that he had such a petition immediately before Mr. Patton had moved suspension of the rules.)

During debate on the resolution moved by Mr. Thompson, Mr. Adams raised a question as to the propriety of the resolution displacing other business.

The Speaker[2] stated that the subject-matter of the resolution moved by Mr. Thompson, being a question of privilege, it would, until disposed of, take precedence over all other business.

2524. A question of privilege has precedence at a time set apart by a special order for other business.

An alleged attempt of a doorkeeper to detain and arrest a Member who was about to leave the Hall was held to involve a question of privilege, no authority having been given the doorkeeper so to act.

On August 9, 1890,[3] the House had just adopted a resolution from the Committee on Rules making the Indian appropriation bill a special order immediately and for two hours.

Thereupon Mr. Benjamin A. Enloe, of Tennessee, claimed the floor on a question of personal privilege.

Mr. Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois, made the point of order that the adoption of the resolution created a special order, and that for two hours nothing was in order except to consider the Senate amendments to the Indian appropriation bill.

After debate on the said point of order and question of privilege, the Speaker[4] overruled the said point of order on the following grounds:

The rights and privileges of all the Members of the House, in the discharge of their functions, are sacred, and the House can undertake no higher duty than the conservation of all those rights and privileges intact. And even if the case arises under dubious circumstances, it is proper for the House to pause and give suitable heed to any question which any Member raises with regard to his rights and privileges as a Member. It is for the House alone to determine what they are.

In this case the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Enloe] has embodied his complaint and the remedy therefor in the shape of a resolution for the House to pass upon, if it be a question of privilege. The Chair thinks that the question ought to be passed upon by the House. The rules of the House make provision for obtaining and for the retention of a quorum of its Members in cases provided for under the rules. In order to accomplish that the rules of the House require, whenever a call of the House is ordered, that the doors shall be closed. Such closing of the doors, in the opinion of the Chair, is to prevent any Member from going out. It is done for the purpose of keeping such Members as are already here, and retaining those who may be brought here after having been sent for by the order of the House. But that is the opinion which the Chair entertained as an individual Member of the House.

The Speaker of the House has issued no order with regard to the matter; but in response to a question of the Doorkeeper, or one of his assistants, as to the meaning of the rule, the Chair stated that to be his opinion, and the Doorkeeper has acted upon it, apparently, subject always and of course to the decision of the House upon an examination. As this resolution raises the question of privilege directly, which may be disposed of by the House, the Chair rules that it is admissible, and is before the House for consideration.

Mr. Enloe thereupon submitted, as a question of personal privilege, the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That George E. Minot, assistant doorkeeper of the House of Representatives, be arrested and brought to the bar of the House to answer for a breach of the privileges of a Member of the House in laying hands upon and attempting to arrest Hon. B. A. Enloe, a Member of this House and a Representative from the Eighth district of Tennessee, without authority of law and in violation of the Constitution of the United States.

On motion of Mr. Witthorne, by unanimous consent the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to inquire into the facts and report thereon to the House.

On December 8, 1890,[1] the committee reported as follows:

The committee find that on the 9th day of August last, the House being in session, Mr. Minot, who is a messenger for the House, under the Doorkeeper, was stationed at the western extremity of the passageway leading by the wash room. This passageway leads into the corridor extending north and south on the west side of the Hall of the House of Representatives, and at the point of intersection there is no door.

On the occasion referred to in the resolution, while the House was under call, Mr. Enloe, a Member of the House, having answered to his name, passed out of the Hall of the House through the doorway next west of the Speaker's chair, all other doors being closed, and approached the place where Mr. Minot was stationed, with the purpose of passing into the corridor and thence to Statuary Hall.

Mr. Minot, having been instructed by Assistant Doorkeeper Houk to prevent Members passing out at that point during calls of the House, informed Mr. Enloe that he was instructed to not allow Members to pass. Mr. Enloe inquired who gave the order, and was told that it came from the Speaker. (In this, however, Mr. Minot was mistaken.) Mr. Enloe said he would go through, and did. During the conversation Mr. Minot undoubtedly placed his hand on Mr. Enloe's arm or shoulder, although he does not remember that he did so, and it is quite likely he was not conscious of the fact at the time it occurred. One of the witnesses, a Member of the House, who was standing by, describes Mr. Minot's touch as an appeal to Mr. Enloe or a means of arresting his attention.

Mr. Minot did not attempt or intend to arrest or to detain Mr. Enloe by force. He was not rude or uncivil, and only seems to have been desirous of doing his duty as he understood it.

Your committee, after due consideration of the subject, believe that Mr. Enloe was not, under the rules of the House, liable to arrest, under the circumstances, and had there been any attempt to arrest him a case of breach of privilege might have arisen which would call for action; but your committee do not think the facts in this case disclose any breach of privilege or call for any action on part of the House, and therefore recommend that said resolution lie on the table.

The House agreed to the report.

[1] Second session Fifty-first Congress, Record, p. 218.

2525. On January 21, 1857,[1] Mr. James L. Orr, of South Carolina, arose to report from the select committee to investigate charges that Members of the House had entered into corrupt combinations for the purpose of passing and preventing the passage of certain measures during the present Congress, stating that he rose to a question affecting the privileges of the House. Thereupon Mr. Galusha A. Grow, of Pennsylvania, made the point of order that a question of privilege could not override a special order of the House, as the House was acting under a suspension of the rules.

The Speaker[2] ruled that the question of privilege overruled the special order.

2526. A question of privilege takes precedence of a motion merely privileged under the rules.—On January 10, 1846,[3] Mr. Hannibal Hamlin, of Maine, made the privileged motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Pending this motion Mr. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky, as a question of privilege, presented a resolution for the dismissal of the Printer of the House.

Mr. Hamlin having raised a question as to the precedence of the pending questions, the Speaker[4] said that the motion submitted by the gentleman from Maine was undoubtedly a privileged motion, which could at any time be made by the rule; but there was this difference between the two motions: That of the gentleman from Maine was a privileged question, and the other was a question of privilege, and must put everything else aside.

2527. On January 24, 1842,[5] Mr. Henry A. Wise, of Virginia, rose and submitted that—

> The House having allowed Mr. Adams, by its vote, to defend himself from a charge contained in a paper or petition in his possession, and to read a portion of a letter of Mr. Wise, to prove that he (Mr. Wise) had also made the same or a similar charge, and to comment upon that portion of the letter, Mr. Wise now asks the privilege and the permission of the House to reply to the remarks of Mr. Adams and to speak in his own defense and to the question of privilege raised by Mr. Adams.

Mr. Joseph R. Underwood, of Kentucky, submitted as a question of order the following:

> That his request can not be received or entertained without a suspension of the rules regulating the order of business.

The Speaker[6] decided that the motion submitted by Mr. Wise having been stated as a question of privilege, he considered it in order to submit the question to the House without a suspension of the rules, leaving it for the House to determine whether it was a question of privilege.

An appeal having been taken, the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The record of the debates quotes the Speaker as saying that questions of privilege were always questions for the House and not the Chair to decide.

2528. The latest decision does not admit the soundness of earlier rulings that a matter merely privileged by a rule relating to the order of business may supersede an actual question of privilege.—On January 8, 1894,[1] Mr. Thomas C. Catchings, of Mississippi, called up a report from the Committee on Rules proposing a resolution for the consideration of the tariff bill, on which the previous question had been ordered.

Mr. Charles A. Boutelle, of Maine, asked that a resolution relating to actions of the President in relation to Hawaii, which had already been decided to present a question of privilege, and which had been reported adversely from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, be first considered, and submitted the point that the resolution involved a question of privilege and therefore took precedence over the privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The Speaker[2] held that the resolution reported from the Committee on Rules was already before the House for consideration; that under the rules it presented a privileged question of the highest degree, and that no other business was in order until it should be finally disposed of. The Speaker therefore declined to recognize Mr. Boutelle for the consideration of his resolution.

Mr. Boutelle stated that he appealed from the decision of the Chair.

The Speaker declined to entertain the appeal upon the ground mentioned in the foregoing decision.

2529.—On February 2, 1894,[3] Mr. Thomas C. Catchings, of Mississippi, submitted from the Committee on Rules a privileged report proposing a time for the consideration of a resolution of the House relative to Hawaiian affairs.

Mr. Charles A. Boutelle, of Maine, submitted the point of order that a resolution heretofore presented by him presented a question of privilege and therefore took precedence of the report of the Committee on Rules.

The Speaker[2] overruled the point of order upon the ground that the Committee on Rules, under the rules of the House, had the right to report on the order of business at any time, and on the further ground that the very report from that committee just submitted provided for the consideration of the privileged question submitted by Mr. Boutelle.

2530. On July 8, 1897,[4] Mr. John Dalzell, of Pennsylvania, being recognized, proposed to present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. James Hamilton Lewis, of Washington, demanded recognition for a question which he claimed to be of the highest privilege, and made the point of order that a question of privilege had precedence of a report from the Committee on Rules.

After debate the Speaker[5] said:

The Chair is very far from ruling that there may not be a question of privilege which may interfere with the right of the Committee on Rules to report, although subsequent to the Fifty-first Congress, and consequently subject to any decision which was made at that time, a rule was adopted providing that it shall always be in order to call up for consideration a report from the Committee on Rules. Although the Speaker occupying the chair at the time when this rule was adopted, and who made the first rulings under it, decided that no question of privilege could interfere with the operation of the rule, the present occupant of the chair was never entirely satisfied that that was so; but the gentleman from Washington [Mr. Lewis] having now stated his proposition, namely, that we are not a House, the Chair overrules the point as dilatory, and the Clerk will read the pending report from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. Lewis having appealed, the Speaker declined to entertain the appeal.

2531. A question of personal privilege has been given precedence over privileged Senate amendments remaining to be disposed of after the rejection of a conference report.—On February 26, 1901,[1] the House had disagreed to the conference report on the naval appropriation bill, and was considering motions relating to the several Senate amendments to the bill, when Mr. John J. Lentz, of Ohio, claimed the floor on a question of personal privilege relating to the Congressional Record.

Mr. Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois, made the point of order that a question of privilege might not interfere with a conference report.

The Speaker[2] said that he would hear the gentlemen from Ohio, as it would readily be seen that matters might arise which would have to be considered at once.

Mr. Lentz then went on to say that the copy of a speech, which he had left with the Public Printer for insertion in the Record, had not appeared in the Record, but, as he had been informed, had been delivered to the Speaker, and by the Speaker delivered to the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Charles H. Grosvenor. He asked upon what authority that could be done.

After discussion, the Speaker held that before further action could be taken a distinctive proposition must be presented to the House.

Thereupon Mr. James D. Richardson, of Tennessee, offered this resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker has no right to withhold from the Record the speech of a Member made on a general leave to print.

Mr. Cannon renewed his point of order, urging that this was not a question of privilege, and that the privileged matter before the House could not be interrupted.

The ruling of the Speaker on the point of order made by Mr. Cannon was as follows:

* * * The Chair desires to say in regard to the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois that there are privileged questions and questions of privilege. The gentleman submits a privileged question, but the gentleman from Ohio submits a question of privilege, and the Chair would be very loath to hold that the question of privilege should not be considered.

2532. Although the previous question had been ordered on a motion to reconsider, it was held that a question of privilege might be debated.—On July 10, 1840,[3] the previous question had been ordered on a motion to reconsider the vote of the previous day whereby the House had rejected the resolution of the Senate (No. 16) authorizing the President of the United States to accept certain presents from the Imaum of Muscat and the Sultan of Morocco.

At this point Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House, by delivering, privately, a resolution from the Senate which had been acted upon by this House, to be returned to the Senate, to a Member of this House, thereby retaining it from the Senate, has violated his official duty as Clerk of this House.

[2] David B. Henderson, of Iowa, Speaker.

[3] First session Twenty-sixth Congress, Journal, p. 1242; Globe, p. 519.

An inquiry being made as to whether this resolution was open to debate, the previous question having been ordered on the motion to reconsider, the Speaker [1] stated that, this being a question of privilege, suspended the motion to reconsider, and was open to debate.

Mr. Hopkins L. Turney, of Tennessee, having taken an appeal, the decision of the Chair was sustained, yeas 86, nays 66.

2533. Only one question of privilege may be pending at a time.—On March 1, 1877,[2] during proceedings incident to the count of the electoral vote, Mr. Fernando Wood, of New York, submitted this resolution:

Resolved, That the vote of Henry N. Sollace, claiming to be an elector from the State of Vermont, be not counted.

Mr. Earley F. Poppleton, of Ohio, claimed the floor as the objector in the joint meeting to the vote of Henry N. Sollace as an elector from the State of Vermont.

Mr. Bernard G. Caulfield, of Illinois, claimed the floor upon a question of high privilege.

The Speaker [3] declined to entertain the motion of Mr. Caulfield at this time, on the ground that but one question of privilege could be pending at a time.

Mr. Poppleton was thereupon recognized.

2534. A question of privilege relating to the conduct of several Members being before the House, one of them may not claim the floor by asserting a question of personal privilege.—On March 9, 1904,[4] the House was considering a resolution of privilege relating to the conduct of certain Members in relation to transactions in the Post-Office Department. This resolution was being considered under the terms of a special order limiting the time of debate and giving control of the time to representatives of the majority and minority.

Mr. Henry A. Cooper, of Wisconsin, rising to a parliamentary inquiry, asked:

Would not each Member of the House of Representatives whose name appears in this report be entitled to address the House as a matter of personal privilege, in view of the heading of the pages of the report "Charges concerning Members of Congress?"

The Speaker [5] said:

The Chair will say, in answer to the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman, that that matter will be ruled upon when it arises. In the opinion of the Chair it is not in order at this time.

Later, on the same day, Mr. Ebenezer J. Hill, of Connecticut, demanded time in his own right as a matter of personal privilege.

The Speaker [5] said:

One question of privilege is already before the House. The Chair is of opinion that there can not be but one question of privilege at a time. * * * The Chair can not recognize the gentleman on a question of privilege when there is a question of privilege already before the House.

[5] Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois, Speaker.

On March 11,[1] the resolution being still before the House, Mr. James A. Tawney, of Minnesota, rising to a parliamentary inquiry, said:

I understand, Mr. Speaker, that every Member of the House who is named in this report can rise to a question of personal privilege, and occupy as much time as he wants. Is not that the fact? If so, the debate should be extended sufficiently to allow Members who desire to speak on the proposition to do so.

The Speaker[2] said:

The Chair ruled on that question on a former case. This is a question of the highest privilege and is entitled to consideration. Another question of privilege can not take this question from the floor of the House, or prevent the House from deciding this question when it desires to do so. The House has determined by special order when it will decide this question of privilege.

2535. Whenever a question of privilege is pending it may be called up by any Member, but may be postponed by a vote of the House.—On January 8, 1851,[3] Mr. William Strong, of Pennsylvania, called up the resolution reported from the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the memorial of Jared Perkins, which resolution was read, and is as follows:

Resolved, That George W. Morrison is entitled to the seat which he now holds as a Representative from the Third Congressional district of New Hampshire.

Mr. George W. Jones, of Tennessee, made the point of order that it was not competent for any one Member to call up this question for the consideration of the House, but that it must be brought up on a motion made for that purpose.

The Speaker[4] stated that whenever a question of privilege is called for it must be taken up by the House,[5] although it may be postponed by a vote of the House. Such had been the practice of the House. He therefore overruled the point of order.

From this decision of the Chair Mr. Jones appealed. The decision of the Chair was sustained.

2536. While the Speaker should not entertain every motion which may be offered as a matter of privilege, he should submit to the House whatever relates to the privileges of the House or a Member.—On July 5, 1850,[6] the Journal of Wednesday having been read, Mr. Joshua R. Giddings, of Ohio, stated that he rose to a question of privilege, and submitted to the House a communication from a Washington correspondent in the Boston Atlas of the 2d instant, charging him with having abstracted from the files of the Post-Office Department certain papers relating to the appointment of postmaster at Oberlin, Ohio.

The same having been read, Mr. Giddings was proceeding to make remarks thereon, when Mr. George W. Jones, of Tennessee, raised the question of order, that the said communication did not involve a question of privilege, and, consequently, that its consideration by the House was not in order.

The Speaker[4] decided that when a Member rises upon the floor, and brings before the House a matter relating to the privileges either of the House or a Member, the question must be entertained by the Chair, so far as to submit to the House to determine whether it is a question of privilege or not. The Chair would not entertain every motion which a Member might think proper to say was a question of privilege; but it is the duty of the Chair to see that the matter relates to the privileges either of the House or a Member. When it does so, as in the present case, then, under the precedents in the Twenty-ninth and Thirtieth Congresses, the Speaker holds it to be his duty to entertain it as a privileged question to the extent of submitting it to the House to determine whether it is a question of privilege or not for its consideration.

From this decision of the Chair Mr. Robert Toombs,[1] of Georgia, appealed; and, after debate, Mr. Van Dyke moved that the appeal be laid upon the table, which was done.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained, and it was accordingly submitted to the House to determine whether the said subject did involve a question of privilege. After debate, the previous question was ordered and the main question put: Does the subject-matter brought before the House by the Member from Ohio involve a question of privilege for the consideration of the House? And it was decided in the negative, yeas 71, nays 89.[2]

2537. On January 21, 1842,[3] Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, presented a petition of thirty-eight citizens of the county of Habersham, in the State of Georgia, praying the House to adopt such measures as, in the wisdom of the House, it may seem fit and proper, for the removal of Hon. John Quincy Adams from the head of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and the substitution of any other Member of the House in his place.

Mr. Adams claimed the right to be heard on the subject-matter of the petition, as it involved, in his opinion, his privilege as a Member of this House.

Mr. Henry A. Wise called on the Speaker to decide, as a question of order, whether the subject before the House involved a question of privilege.

The Speaker[4] answered that there was no question of order involved; and as to whether the question of privilege was involved, that was a matter for the House itself to decide.

This was acquiesced in by the House.

The House, without coming to a decision of the question of privilege, allowed Mr. Adams to be heard.

[1] The Globe (p. 1334) shows that Mr. Toombs, in appealing from the decision, held that the rules of the House provided that when a question was made it should be decided by the Chair. The Speaker was the organ of the House. He was to decide in the first instance, and the House would overrule his decision if it was wrong. But the idea that the House were a tribunal, independent of the action of the Chair, to which any Member might submit a question which he might declare to be a question of privilege, and by means of which character precedence was to be given to it over all other business, was a doctrine to which he could not assent.

2538. The statement by a Member that a certain thing "is rumored" is sufficient basis for raising a question of privilege.

An alleged corrupt combination between Members of the House and the Executive was investigated as a question of privilege.

On February 16, 1867,[1] Mr. John Wentworth, of Illinois, as a question of privilege, submitted the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas the President of the United States has been impeached by a Member of this House of high crimes and misdemeanors, and the Committee on the Judiciary have been instructed to inquire into the facts upon which said impeachment was based, with power to send for persons and papers, and report them to this House in order, if thought warrantable, that the President may be arraigned for trial thereon by the Senate; and

Whereas while the Committee on the Judiciary are examining witnesses with relation to said high crimes and misdemeanors of which the President has been impeached, with a view of making a report to this House for its disinterested action, it has for some time been rumored, and has at last been asserted in public newspapers, that certain Members of this House, who are bound to act impartially upon the report of said committee when presented, are now holding, and have been for some time holding, private meetings with a view to a corrupt bargain, whereby, in violation of their oaths, they have pledged and are pledging themselves in advance to act adversely to said report if unfavorable to the President, and also to act adversely to certain other measures pending before this House to which they have heretofore been favorable, provided the President himself will do certain things to which he has heretofore declared himself hostile, and refrain from doing certain things to which he has heretofore declared himself favorable: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire, etc.

Mr. Charles A. Eldridge, of Wisconsin, having raised a point of order against the reception of the resolution, the Speaker[2] said:

The Chair rules that this is unquestionably a question of privilege. The resolution states that it is rumored that certain Members of this House have been guilty of corrupt bargaining, acting in violation of their oaths, and that they have changed their views for corrupt motives. Although the resolution states that "it is rumored," still when a Member rises in his seat and states that it is so rumored, and introduces a resolution for an inquiry into the facts introduced, he of course makes himself the responsible author of the charge. The Chair, therefore, decides that it is a question of privilege.

The preamble and resolution were then agreed to, yeas 80, nays 40.

On February 25 Mr. John Hill, of New Jersey, presented a preamble reciting that the integrity of Members in the discharge of their official duties was of the utmost importance to the public, that that integrity ought not to be assailed except upon the gravest reason, and quoting the preamble and resolution presented on the 16th instant by Mr. Wentworth. Accompanying this preamble were the following resolutions, which were agreed to by the House:

Resolved, That the select committee of three appointed under said resolution be instructed to report immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow any evidence that may be in possession of said committee or any Member thereof relating to the corrupt bargain referred to in the preamble to said resolution.

Resolved further, That Hon. John Wentworth be requested at the same time to furnish to this House the newspaper assertions and a statement of the rumors in relation to said corrupt bargain referred to in the preamble to said resolution.

Accordingly, on February 27, the select committee reported that they had not discovered any evidence and were discharged. Mr. Wentworth did not make a statement other than to submit the report.

[2] Schuyler Colfax, of Indiana, Speaker.

2539. A question of privilege may be based on a communication received by telegraph.—On December 21, 1876,[1] the Speaker laid before the House a telegram from Mr. William R. Morrison, of Illinois, chairman of the special committee on Louisiana affairs, communicating the record of proceedings in the case of E. W. Barnes, a recusant witness.

Thereupon Mr. J. Proctor Knott, of Kentucky, submitted a resolution directing the Speaker to issue a warrant directing the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House, either by himself or deputy, to arrest and bring to the bar of the House without delay E. W. Barnes to answer for contempt.

Mr. John A. Kasson, of Iowa, made the point of order that there was no legal or proper parliamentary ground for adopting an order of arrest of an American citizen based upon a telegraphic copy of an alleged report of a committee of Congress, without any official certificate of its accuracy and without verification of the signatures to the alleged copy, all the signatures being made by an alleged telegraphic operator and without any other verification.

The Speaker[2] overruled the point of order, on the ground that the telegram came to him through the usual channel of telegraphic communication and presented every evidence of authenticity, and believing it to be genuine, and that it presented a question of high privilege, he had accordingly laid it before the House for its action.

The resolution was then agreed to.

2540. Under the later rulings a question of privilege may be raised in Committee of the Whole as to a matter then occurring in that committee.—On April 25, 1890,[3] the House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. Charles Tracey, of New York, claimed the floor on a question of privilege.

Mr. Benjamin Butterworth, of Ohio, made the point of order that the question of privilege was not in place in Committee of the Whole.

The Chairman[4] said:

> The question of privilege can only be raised at this time on a matter that occurred in Committee of the Whole.

2541. On May 17, 1890,[5] the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, considering the bill (H. R. 9416) to reduce the revenue and equalize the duty on imports, and for other purposes.

Mr. Thomas M. Bayne, of Pennsylvania, having read a letter from a citizen, James Campbell, in which certain statements were made in regard to Mr. William D. Bynum, of Indiana, the latter rose to a question of personal privilege on account thereof.

Mr. Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois, made the point of order that a question of privilege was not involved, and also that a question of personal privilege touching the right of a Member of the House of Representatives could only be made in the House of Representatives and not in the Committee of the Whole. There was no Journal in the Committee of the Whole; there was no record in the Committee of the Whole. There was no power in the Committee of the Whole to arrest, punish, censure, or expel; all that could only be done in the House of Representatives, where alone a question of personal privilege could be presented.

The Chairman [1] said:

The rules of the House, so far as possible, are applicable to the Committee of the Whole. Now, can it possibly be that if a Member of the House is assailed here in Committee of the Whole House he must wait until to-morrow morning or until some subsequent day before he can be heard to defend himself? * * * The Chair is of opinion that a question of privilege extends very far beyond anything which requires the action of the House.

A Member may rise and deny that he has made a certain statement without invoking any action of the House, simply permitting the denial to go into the Record. He would have the right to do that as a question of privilege. * * *

The rule is that in order to constitute a question of personal privilege the attack must be made upon the Member in his representative capacity. Now, what are the facts before this committee? On one of the days of this session the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. Wilson, and the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Bynum, assailed (the Chair uses that term as expressive of the general generic nature of the remarks of the gentlemen) the character of a citizen of the country. That citizen now sends a letter which is intended to have some effect; whatever the ultimate effect may be, the intention is manifest:

"I see by the Associated Press report of the proceedings in Congress yesterday that Messrs. McMillin, Bynum, and Wilson made an attack on me personally. In relation to the statement of Mr. McMillin"—

Thereupon the statement proceeds with a view of furnishing a denial and refutation of the attack thus made in a representative capacity by gentlemen on the floor. The Chair is, therefore, of opinion that this is a reflection upon gentlemen in their representative capacity and is a question of privilege 2542. On April 8, 1892,[2] the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. Seth L. Milliken, of Maine, rose to a question of privilege.

Mr. James D. Richardson, of Tennessee, made the point of order that the gentleman's matter of privilege should come up in the House and not in Committee of the Whole.

The Chairman [3] sustained the point of order.[4]

2543. On March 25, 1898,[5] the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, considering the naval appropriation bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. Charles S. Hartman, of Montana, claimed the floor on a question of personal privilege.

Mr. Nelson Dingley, of Maine, made the point of order that no question of personal privilege could be raised in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Charles H. Grosvenor, of Ohio, and Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, of Texas, called attention to the precedent of May 17, 1890.[6]

[7] James S. Sherman, of New York, Chairman.

The Chair will rule, complying with the precedent which the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Texas state was made in the Fifty-first Congress. He will be governed by that ruling, and will hear the gentleman from Montana, provided he desires to speak upon the matter of personal privilge which has arisen now.

2544. On January 30, 1899,[1] the bill (H. R. 11022) for the reorganization of the Army of the United States was under consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. Jerry Simpson, of Kansas, demanded recognition on a question of personal privilege.

Mr. John A. T. Hull, of Iowa, rising to a parliamentary inquiry, said:

Can a Member rise to a question of personal privilege in Committee of the Whole?

The Chairman[2] said:

Only on a matter that arises at the time in the Committee of the Whole.

2545. During a call of the House, when a quorum is not present, a question of privilege may not be presented unless it be something connected immediately with the proceedings.—On February 21, 1893,[3] during a call of the House, Mr. John Lind, of Minnesota, claimed the floor on a question of privilege, and proceeded to read the declaration of a political convention relative to a certain bill (H. R. 9350) pending before the House.

Mr. James D. Richardson, of Tennessee, made the point of order that no question of privilege was presented.

The Speaker[4] sustained the point of order, holding that no question of privilege could be presented except such as might arise out of the call of the House, in which the House was then engaged, saying:

The Chair will state to the gentleman that when there is no quorum present, and when the House is acting under a call, no question of privilege, in the judgment of the Chair, can be called up unless it is something that is connected immediately with the proceedings, or arises out of the position of the body at the time. Any other question of privilege which the gentleman might desire to present could not now be brought before the House; for there are not present enough Members to constitute a House, although there are enough present under the Constitution to order a call of the House.

2546. In presenting a question of personal privilege the Member is not required in the first instance to make a motion or offer a resolution; but such is not the rule in presenting a case involving the privileges of the House.

A paper offered as involving a question of privilege should be read to the House rather than privately by the Speaker before a decision is made regarding its privilege.

A mere proposition to investigate, even though impeachment may be a possible consequence, does not involve a question of privilege.

On February 1, 1886,[5] Mr. Lewis Hanback, of Kansas, rising to a question of personal privilege, asked that a paper which he sent to the desk be read. The reading having proceeded for a time, Mr. Clifton R. Breckinridge, of Arkansas, made the point of order that no question of privilege was raised.

The Speaker [1] said:

The Chair thinks the practice has been for a gentleman who rises to a question of privilege and asks to have a paper read to at least state that there is something in the paper which involves a question of that character. The Chair does not yet know what is contained in the paper which the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. Hanback, has sent to the desk. * * * The Chair desires the gentleman from Kansas to state whether or not there is anything in this paper which in his judgment involves a question of personal privilege on the part of that gentleman. Unless that were the rule, any gentleman might rise to a question of privilege and have anything that he might choose read at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. Hilary A. Herbert, of Alabama, having suggested that the Speaker might privately inspect the paper to ascertain whether or not a question of privilege was involved, the Speaker said:

The difficulty in regard to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. Herbert, is that if the Chair simply takes the paper and reads it privately for his own information and then decides whether there is or is not a question of privilege involved, no Member on the floor could know whether it was proper to take an appeal from the decision or not. The House must decide finally upon every question of order; so that the first thing to be done is to have the paper read, provided it is presented in a proper way. When a gentleman rises upon the floor and states that there is a question of personal privilege involved in a matter which he presents, it has not been the practice of the House to require him to make in the first instance any motion or offer any resolution. * * * But when a Member states that he rises to a question involving the privileges of the House, then there must be some question presented. The Chair thinks the gentleman must make a motion or offer a resolution, and upon that the question of privilege will arise. Thus far the gentleman from Kansas has offered no resolution nor made any motion which would constitute the foundation for a question of privilege before the House. * * * Although the Chair has constantly endeavored to confine these questions of privilege as strictly as possible under the rules, still it is very difficult for the Chair, in administering the rules, to prevent gentlemen from sometimes making upon the floor statements which are not strictly within the rules. But the Chair will endeavor to administer the rule as fairly as it can be done.

Mr. Hanback having presented the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice be, and is hereby, empowered to make full inquiry into any expenditure upon the part of the Government relative to the rights of the Bell and Pan-Electric Telephone companies; and for the purpose of this investigation, and to the end that the people may be fully advised, the committee is granted the right to send for persons and papers, all expenses to be audited and accounted for upon approved vouchers, and when so approved to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated—

Mr. Nathaniel J. Hammond, of Georgia, made the point of order that this resolution was not a matter of privilege.

The Speaker said:

The Chair will state that during the last session of Congress the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Springer, offered a resolution of a similar character to this, to investigate the conduct of a judge with a view ultimately to his impeachment. That resolution, it was claimed by the gentleman from Illinois, involved a question of privilege, but the Chair decided that it did not. The Chair is unable to see any difference between that resolution and the one now presented. They are simply resolutions proposing an investigation of matters which may or may not be proper for the House to investigate, but which do not involve questions of privilege under the rule.

2547. On November 13, 1903,[2] Mr. Edward J. Livernash, of California, claiming the floor for a question of privilege, proceeded to discuss a question as to whether or not the President of the United States, in his dealings with the revolution on the Isthmus of Panama, had invaded a constitutional prerogative of the House; and to comment on the length of time which had elapsed since the House had called on the Executive for information relating thereto.

[1] John G. Carlisle, of Kentucky, Speaker.

[2] First session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, pp. 233, 234.

Mr. Sereno E. Payne, of New York, having raised a question of order, the Speaker[1] said:

The Clerk will read a passage from the Manual bearing upon this question.

The Clerk read as follows:

In presenting a question of personal privilege a Member is not required in the first instance to make a motion or offer a resolution; but such is not the rule in presenting a case involving the privileges of the House.

The Speaker then said:

If the gentleman will offer his resolution in writing under the rules, he will then conform to the rules; and then, for the first time, the Chair can make a ruling as to whether the gentleman is in order. The point of order being made, the rule is perfectly plain.

If the gentleman is so unfortunate as not to be able to embody in a resolution in writing, for the information of the House, his question of privilege, he is unable to conform to the rules of the House, as the Chair understands the matter.

2548. A resolution presented as a matter of privilege relating to the rights of a Member should show on its face an invasion of those rights.—On March 6, 1894,[2] Mr. Hernando D. Money, of Mississippi, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported for immediate consideration, as involving a question of privilege, a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 128) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to appoint a cadet at the United States Naval Academy from the Fifth district of South Carolina.

It appeared from the debate and from the accompanying report that the Member representing the district having failed to receive the notice that there was a vacancy for his district, made no appointment, and so under the law the Secretary of the Navy had filled the vacancy from the country at large. None of these facts, however, were alleged in the resolution.

The Speaker[3] said:

In determining whether this resolution is privileged the Chair can not go beyond the resolution itself. * * * The Chair does not think the resolution on its face is privileged. It alleges no violation of any right of a Member.

2549. The House having devoted a time to debate only, the Speaker hesitated to recognize a Member for a question of personal privilege.—On Friday, February 7, 1896,[4] the House met at 10.30 a. m., in continuation of the session of the preceding day, the session being for debate only on the bill (H. R. 2904) to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, etc.

Mr. W. Jasper Talbert, of South Carolina, arose to a question of personal privilege.

The Speaker[1] suggested that it would be better for the gentleman from South Carolina to wait until the regular session should open at noon, since this session was for debate only.

Mr. Talbert having asked if the Speaker would recognize him at 12 o'clock, the Speaker replied:

The Chair will be obliged to recognize the gentleman on "a question of personal privilege." The Chair thinks it would be better that the gentleman should not proceed now, because these understandings in regard to order of business ought never under any circumstances to be violated.

2550. A committee being intrusted with the examination of a question of high privilege, a broad construction was given in favor of the privileged character of its reports.—On January 16, 1877,[2] Mr. William A. J. Sparks, of Illinois, from the special committee on the privileges, powers, and duties of the House in reference to counting the electoral vote, reported this resolution:

Resolved, That with respect to any or all subjects to be considered by the special committee of the House on the privileges, powers, and duties of the House of Representatives in counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, and to sit during the sessions of the House.

Mr. James A. Garfield, of Ohio, made the point of order that the resolution was not privileged.

After debate the Speaker[3] said:

Under the Constitution of the United States, in a certain contingency this House of Representatives elects the President of the United States. That clearly is a question of the very highest privilege. The question of the powers, duties, and privileges of this House in connection with that provision of the Constitution has been referred to this committee, and by resolution of this House that committee was given the power to report at any time. Therefore the Chair can reach no other conclusion than to overrule the point of order and to decide that the report at this time is in order as a question of privilege.

2551. A resolution relating to matters undoubtedly involving privilege, but also relating to other matters not of privilege, may not be entertained as of precedence over the ordinary business in regular order.—On January 4, 1904,[4] Mr. James Hay, of Virginia, claiming the floor for a question of privilege, offered the following:

Whereas Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General J. L. Bristow in his report to the Postmaster-General, dated October 24, 1903, and which report has been transmitted to a committee of this House, has charged that long-time leases for post-office premises were canceled and the rent increased upon the recommendation of influential Representatives;

And whereas it is charged in the same report that "if a Member of Congress requested an increase in the clerk hire allowed a postmaster, Beavers usually complied regardless of the merits of the case;"

And whereas certain cases of an aggravated character are cited on pages 133, 134, and 135 of said report to sustain the above charges;

And whereas on page 145 of said report it is charged that Members of Congress have violated section 3739 of the Revised Statutes, and that "in the face of this statute Beavers has made contracts with Members of Congress for the rental of premises, either in their own names, the names of their agents, or some member of their families;"

[3] Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, Speaker.

[4] Second session Fifty-eighth Congress, Journal, p. 89; Record, pp. 444–446.

And whereas these charges and others contained in said report reflect upon the integrity of the Membership of this House, and upon individual Members of this House whose names are not mentioned: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Speaker of this House appoint a committee consisting of five Members of this House to investigate said charges; and in connection therewith any frauds or irregularities in the conduct of the Post-Office Department; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, to enforce the production of the same; to examine witnesses under oath; to have the assistance of a stenographer, and to have power to sit during the sessions of the House, and to exercise all functions necessary to a complete investigation of said charges, and to report the result of said investigation as soon as practicable.

Mr. Frederick H. Gillett, of Massachusetts, made the point of order that the resolution contained a proposition not privileged.

After debate the Speaker[1] ruled:

Turning to page 583 of the Manual, the Chair reads as follows:

"The including of matter not privileged destroys the privileged character of a bill.

"A resolution of inquiry loses its privileged character if matter not privileged be contained therein.

"A privileged proposition may not be amended by adding thereto matter not privileged or germane to the original question"—

Citing the various decisions of the House.

The rulings of the House heretofore have been that you can not, under the guise of a privileged matter, couple therewith matters not privileged. It seems to the Chair that the House heretofore has decided wisely in that respect.

If a contrary ruling were adopted, there would be questions of privilege presented that might drag through many questions that were not privileged, and the House would be compelled to pass on the two together. In view of these rulings in the House from time to time, the Chair will call attention to this resolution.

The preamble seems by recitation to present a question of privilege. The resolution, however, is broader than the preamble. It is this:

"Be it resolved, That the Speaker of this House appoint a committee consisting of five Members of this House to investigate said charges"—

What follows?

"and in connection therewith any frauds or irregularities in the conduct of the Post-Office Department."

Again:

"And to have power to sit during the sessions of the House, and to exercise all functions necessary to a complete investigation of said charges, frauds, and irregularities."

The resolution on its face couples nonprivileged matters with privileged matters under sound rulings and determinations of the House heretofore; and for that reason, in its present shape, the Chair is compelled to sustain the point of order.

2552. In general a question of constitutional privilege may not be displaced by other privileged matters.—On March 3, 1879,[2] the House was considering the report of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department proposing articles of impeachment against George F. Seward, late consul-general at Shanghai, China, and now minister plenipotentiary to China.

Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, as a question of privilege, proposed to submit a report from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the answer of George F. Seward in response to the order of the House, requiring him to show cause why he should not be declared in contempt of the House.

---

[1] Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois, Speaker.

[2] Third session Forty-fifth Congress, Journal, p. 642; Record, pp. 2362–2365.

The Speaker[1] held the report not in order at this time for the reason that a question of high constitutional privilege was pending, which the House by a yea and nay vote had determined to consider, and on which report and accompanying resolutions the main question had been ordered.

Mr. Butler having appealed, the appeal was laid on the table, yeas 125, nays 107.

2553. A proposition involving a question of constitutional privilege may supersede a pending motion to suspend the rules.—On March 2, 1877,[2] Mr. David Dudley Field, of New York, from the Select Committee on the Privleges, Powers, and Duties of the House of Representatives in counting the vote for President and Vice-President of the United States, reported a bill (H. R. 4698) to provide an effectual remedy for a wrongful intrusion into the office of President and Vice-President of the United States.

Mr. Omar D. Conger, of Michigan, made the point of order that the bill could not be reported or considered pending a motion to suspend the rules, which motion he claimed to have made before the bill was read.

The Speaker[1] held the report made by Mr. Field from the committee to be first in order, a question of high constitutional privilege being involved.

2554. A matter of constitutional privilege takes precedence of a special order.—On June 20, 1882,[3] the day was assigned to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3843) to provide additional accommodations for the Library of Congress.

Mr. Thomas Updegraff, of Iowa, claiming the floor for a question of privilege, reported the bill (S. 613) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice President, to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions rising thereon.

Mr. Selwyn Z. Bowman, of Massachusetts, made the point of order that the special order had precedence.

The Speaker[4] said:

> But questions of privilege or privileged questions, as has always been held, have a right to take precedence of any special or general order. It has been held, for instance, that the consideration of election cases are of a higher order of privilege and take precedence, although not mentioned in the exception to the special order. Now if the question which the gentleman from Iowa presents be one of constitutional privilege, it stands relatively in the same way toward all other matters and even matters of privilege.

2555. A question of privilege (as distinguished from a privileged question) does not lose its privilege through informality in the manner of reporting it.—On December 21, 1893,[5] Mr. James B. McCreary, of Kentucky, reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs during the morning hour for the call of committees[6] a resolution relating to alleged intervention of the United States minister and naval forces in the affairs of the Government of Hawaii, and expressive of the sense of the House in relation thereto.

[5] Second session Fifty-third Congress, Journal, pp. 50, 51; Record, p. 471.

[6] Under the present rule reports not privileged are filed with the Clerk.

Mr. Thomas B. Reed, of Maine, submitted the question of order, whether the effect of reporting of said resolution during the morning hour for reports and of the reference thereof to the Calendar would be to cause said resolution to lose its privileged character.

The Speaker[1] stated that that question might arise at a later period, but expressed the opinion that under the practice of the House the reporting of a privileged proposition during the morning hour for reports and the reference thereof to the Calendar caused such proposition to lose its privileged character.

Mr. Reed and Mr. Charles A. Boutelle, of Maine, made the point that the House could not be deprived of its right to consider the resolution by the action of one of its committees in thus reporting it.

Mr. Reed also objected that the resolution could not be referred to the Calendar in such manner as to destroy its privileged character, except after consideration and by the action of the House itself.

The Speaker stated that the question of the alleged privileged status of the resolution would arise when the resolution should be called up for consideration, and would be left open until that time.

On January 3, 1894,[2] the subject arising again, the Speaker said:

The question is not entirely free from doubt. There have been previous rulings—and the Chair does not design or intend to overrule them at all—that when a committee has the privilege of reporting at any time, and the committee exercises the privilege by reporting during the call of committees for reports, that the privilege of calling up afterwards the resolution for consideration as a question of privilege is waived or lost.

But the Chair is inclined to think that the privilege that is thus lost is that privilege only which is given to the committee. In the case of a resolution which is itself privileged without any regard to what committee it might be referred, a case where the privilege attached not to the committee, nor even to the committee and the resolution together, but to the resolution itself, the Chair does not think it loses its privilege because reported during the call; because if it did, then a committee, by exercising its right to report a privileged resolution during the call of committees, could deprive the House of the right to consider it as a privileged matter.

A contested-election case is regarded as matter of the highest privilege, involving the right of a Member to his seat. Such a case is referred, under the rule, to the Committee on Elections, and that committee make a report upon it. They may make the report during the call of committees if they desire to do so—there is nothing to prevent it—or they may make the report at any other time. But whenever a contested-election case is put upon the Calendar it may be called up by any Member of the House.

It is not necessarily called up by the committee, for it has been repeatedly held that any Member of the House may at any time call it up as a privileged question, unless some question of higher privilege is pending, and that the House will then proceed to consider it unless the question of consideration is raised and the House determines that it will not consider it. Therefore, inasmuch as the resolution offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Boutelle] has been decided to be privileged, has been referred to a committee, and has been reported back from that committee with the recommendation that it lie upon the table, and is now in the House and not in the committee, the Chair thinks the gentleman has a right to call it up as a question of privilege.

2556. To justify a question of privilege an invasion of the prerogatives of the House must be alleged to be actual, not prospective.—On

[1] Charles F. Crisp, of Georgia, Speaker.

[2] Second session Fifty-third Congress, Journal, pp. 53, 54; Record, p. 485.

January 31, 1902,[1] Mr. James D. Richardson, of Tennessee, as a question of privilege, offered the following:

Whereas there are now pending before the Senate numerous treaties proposing commercial reciprocity with other nations, by which customs revenue duties will be changed from those established by acts of Congress duly approved by the President of the United States; and

Whereas there are bills originating in the Senate now pending before that body regulating the duties imposed on articles from Cuba and the Philippines imported into the United States; and

Whereas resolutions have been introduced in the Senate and are now pending in that body declaring that the doctrine of reciprocity as stated in the act of October 1, 1890, known as the McKinley bill, and the act of July 24, 1897, known as the Dingley bill, is the true doctrine, and that the various treaties pending in the Senate should receive consideration and action at the present session of Congress: Therefore,

Resolved, That it is the sense of this House that the negotiation by the executive department of the Government of a commercial treaty whereby the rates of duty to be imposed on foreign commodities entering the United States for consumption should be fixed would, in view of the provision of section 7, Article I, of the Constitution of the United States, be an infraction of the Constitution and an invasion of one of the highest prerogatives of the House of Representatives.

Mr. Sereno E. Payne, of New York, made the point of order that the resolution did not involve a question of privilege.

After debate the Speaker[2] said:

The Chair thinks that when he is once clear in his mind on a question like this it is better to rule on it and let the other business of the House go on.

The question first presented to the House for consideration is whether or not the resolutions offered by the gentleman from Tennessee are privileged resolutions. If so, it is because the prerogatives of the House are invaded. There is also presented the question whether we are entitled to go beyond the regular modes of procedure of the House in order to reach the desired result.

Now, there are three whereases in this resolution, each one of which shows that nothing has been done in this matter by the Senate. There is not a single averment in the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee showing a single specific legislative act on the part of the Senate. On the contrary, the averment in the resolution is simply to the effect that certain resolutions are pending in that body, but in no single case has action been taken upon it.

The Chair would state in this connection that this does not involve a discussion or a definition of the main question presented. It refers only to what has been done or is proposed to be done. The only thing, therefore, for the Chair to determine is whether or not, under the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, a question of privilege is presented, and whether such resolution is in order under the rules of the House.

Now, up to last night there were pending in the House 10,511 bills and resolutions, and up to the same hour there were pending in the Senate 3,380 bills and resolutions. We all know, as a matter of fact, that not every bill or resolution presented in either body becomes operative as a law, and it will not do to assume that all of this number of bills to which the Chair has called attention will be passed. Nor will it do to say that the House has not been vigilant in the consideration of matters relating to its rights and duties under the Constitution. This very morning, for instance, the House directed one of its committees to investigate and report upon a question which related to its functions under the Constitution. There can be no complaint of the want of consideration of such matters on the part of the House.

There has been no slumbering by the House in regard to its rights. But the House has not undertaken to fortify itself by the adoption of such a resolution as that presented by the gentleman from Tennessee, and the Chair, after a careful examination of his resolution—a dispassionate examination of it—fails to find anything specified in the resolution to indicate any positive action on the part of the Senate which would entitle the resolution to the consideration of the House. * * * The observation of the Chair was to the effect that there is no precedent cited by the gentleman wherein the House has felt that its prerogatives were being invaded. In the several cases presented by the gentleman, and where this question was considered by the House, there is nothing to show—not a single instance, as far as the Chair has been able to discover—where the House assumed to act before the Senate had taken such action as invaded the prerogatives of the House. It is true that there is a matter, as appears by the Record, which was once considered, where there was action taken as suggested by the gentleman, under a suspension of the rules.

Under individual suspension a gentleman, getting recognition, offered resolutions expressing his views, expressing his fears, calling the attention of the House to supposed dangers, supposed or proposed assaults upon its high privileges and rights; but that is not an authority in point; and if the gentleman can now cite to the Chair a single authority where action was taken by the House before the Senate acted or sent anything to the House, the Chair would be very glad indeed to have it. * * * The Chair, in view of the facts which he has stated, is very clearly of the opinion that this is not a privileged resolution. If the hand of the Senate is laid upon the prerogatives of this House, this House will act. There is no doubt about that, and it has already taken steps to be thoroughly qualified for doing it; but at this moment this great body is not justified, as it seems to the Chair, in taking such resolutions and passing upon them, and that the wise course for a great legislative body like the House of Representatives of the United States is to act with coolness and deliberation, and not strike back when not struck at.

The gentleman has his entire remedy, under the rules of the House, by bringing his resolution before the Committee on Ways and Means or any other committee.

The Chair therefore sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from New York.

2558. It being alleged that the Senate had invaded the constitutional prerogative of the House to originate appropriation bills, the Speaker entertained the matter as of privilege.—On January 23, 1885,[1] Mr. Frank H. Hurd, of Ohio, submitted the following resolution:

Whereas certain bills, appropriating money from the Treasury of the United States, originating in the Senate, have passed that body and have been sent to this House for its concurrence, which are now upon the Speaker's table, to wit, Senate bill No. 398, entitled "A bill to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools," and many others; and

Whereas it is asserted that these bills are in violation of the privilege of this House to exclusively originate bills for raising revenue: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be hereby directed to inquire into the power of the Senate to originate bills appropriating money from the Treasury of the United States and report to this House at as early a day as practicable. And said committee shall have leave to report at any time.

Mr. J. Frederick C. Talbott, of Maryland, made the point of order that this did not present a question of privilege.

The Speaker[2] ruled:

The Chair thinks whenever it is asserted on the floor of the House that the rights or privileges of the House have been invaded or violated by any other body, or by any individual, a question of privilege is presented, at least to the extent that the Chair is obliged to submit it to the House for its decision. Of course the Chair itself will decide all questions of order arising during legislative proceedings of the House; but when the allegation is made that the rights or privileges of the House collectively have been invaded, that is a question which does not come within the province of the Chair to decide. The House is the custodian and guardian of its own rights and privileges as a body, and must always possess the power and have the opportunity to determine what those rights and privileges are and whether or not they have been improperly interfered with.

After a long debate the motion to lay the resolution on the table was agreed to—128 yeas to 123 nays.

2559. An alleged invasion by the Senate of the House's constitutional prerogative of originating revenue legislation has been held in the later practice to present a question of privilege.—On January 29, 1842,[3] the House proceeded to the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the bill No. 67, "An act to authorize the issue of Treasury notes."

Mr. James I. Roosevelt submitted for the decision of the Chair, as a question of privilege, the following:

Whereas the amendment made by the Senate to the bill for the issue of Treasury notes, rendering the same an addition to, instead of a partial substitution for, the twelve-million loan heretofore authorized by law, converts the said bill into a bill for raising revenue, which, by the Constitution, can only originate in the House of Representatives, and is a breach of the privileges of this House: Therefore

Resolved, That the said amendment can not be entertained by this House, and that the bill and amendments be returned to the Senate, with a respectful communication to that effect.

The Speaker[4] decided that the point raised was a question of constitutional power between the two Houses of Congress, and was not a question of privilege, which, in his opinion, it was his duty to submit to the House.

[4] John White, of Kentucky, Speaker.

From this decision Mr. Roosevelt took an appeal to the House; and the decision of the Chair was sustained—112 to 73.

The House then agreed to the first and second amendments, when the third amendment was read, which was to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That the amount of Treasury notes which may be issued under the authority of this act shall be deemed and taken in lieu of so much of the loan authorized by the act of July 21, 1841.

Mr. Charles G. Atherton, of New Hampshire, here submitted for the decision of the Chair, as a question of order, the following:

In the seventh section, first article of the Constitution of the United States, it is provided that "All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills." The bill as it went from the House was not a bill for raising revenue, but to substitute one mode of raising revenue for another in regard to an amount of revenue already authorized by law to be raised. The amendment of the Senate does not increase or diminish an amount already authorized to be raised in the bill as passed by the House, but it entirely changes the nature of the House bill, and makes it a bill for raising an original and independent amount in addition to the sum authorized to be raised by former laws, and its adoption by the Senate is in effect originating a bill for raising revenue.

The Speaker overruled the question of order raised by Mr. Atherton; and on an appeal the decision was sustained—yeas 117, nays 76.[1]

2560. On March 3, 1859,[2] Mr. Galusha A. Grow, of Pennsylvania, raised a question as to the general post-office appropriation bill, which had been returned from the Senate with an amendment raising the rate of postage, and offered this resolution:

Resolved, That House bill No. 872, making appropriations to defray the expenses of the Post-Office Department for the year ending the 30th of June, 1860, with the Senate amendments thereto, be returned to the Senate, as section 13 of said amendment is in the nature of a revenue bill.

A question of order being raised, the Speaker [3] ruled that it was in order, as it involved a question of privilege.

2561. On January 27, 1871,[4] Mr. Samuel Hooper, of Massachusetts, raised a question as to a bill originating in the Senate and sent to the House, providing for the repeal of the law as to the income tax, and presented a resolution reciting that it was exclusively the privilege of the House to originate revenue bills.

A question of order being raised, the Speaker [5] held:

In the opinion of the Chair the question presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts is one of privilege. The Chair is not left to his own judgment merely in coming to this conclusion, but would call the attention of the House to a precedent established in the Thirty-fifth Congress. On that occasion the Senate amended the post-office appropriation bill by adding a clause increasing the rates of postage. On the return of the bill to the House, Mr. Grow, of Pennsylvania, made the motion, as one of privilege, that it be returned to the Senate because it contained a revenue measure. Speaker Orr sustained the motion as privileged, and the House by a decisive majority adopted it. The bill was lost in consequence of the disagreement resulting from this section, but was passed at the next session with the objectionable section left out.

[5] James G. Blaine, of Maine, Speaker.

In regard to the point raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Randall], that this is not a bill to raise revenue, but to repeal a provision of law by which revenue is now raised, the Chair would remark that, in his judgment, that circumstance does not affect the question of privilege raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hooper]. Under the practice of the House the rule requiring tax bills to be first discussed in Committee of the Whole has been always considered to apply with equal force to bills repealing taxes, and for this very obvious reason: that, as such bills are amendable, they might have their entire character changed in the House without the committee having proper opportunity for untrammeled discussion; and for an additional reason of much force, that the repeal of one tax may involve the necessity of levying another, and thus involve the whole question of raising revenue. It is for the House to decide upon the propriety of adopting the resolution offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts. The question submitted to the Chair is simply whether the resolution be one of privilege, and the Chair decides that it is, and it is now before the House.

2562. On June 14, 1878,[1] Mr. Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois, as a question of privilege, submitted the following resolution:

That House bill No. 4286, to establish post routes in the several States therein named, with the Senate amendment thereto, be returned to the Senate, as a part of said amendments are in the nature of and constitute a revenue bill.

The Speaker[2] said:

The House must determine whether it is a question of constitutional privilege in the assertion of the rights of the House. It does not belong to the Chair. If it were a question in reference to the rules, the Chair would determine it.

The points wherein the amendments were in the nature of revenue legislation were specified by Mr. Cannon—the repeal of customs duties on certain books published abroad, extension of the franking privilege, reducing the rate on second-class mail matter, and providing for the collection of a tax from newspaper publishers. The resolution was adopted by the Huose by a vote of 169 to 68, after a long discussion.

2563. A resolution implying that the constitutional rights of the House may have been invaded by the Executive presents a question of privilege.—On December 8, 1903,[3] Mr. Edgar D. Crumpacker, of Indiana, claiming the floor for a question of privilege, offered the following:

Whereas it is commonly reported that a treaty negotiated between the President of the United States and the Republic of Cuba, granting and ceding the Isle of Pines to the Republic of Cuba, is pending in the Senate of the United States for ratification or rejection; and

Whereas by the terms of the treaty of Paris the Kingdom of Spain relinquished sovereignty over the Isle of Pines as part of the island of Cuba; and

Whereas by the action of this Government in establishing and recognizing the independence of the Republic of Cuba it was expressly provided that the Isle of Pines should not be within the constitutional boundary of that Republic; and

Whereas this Government has been administering the affairs of and exercising sovereignty over the Isle of Pines ever since the treaty of Paris was ratified; and

Whereas section 3 of Article IV of the Constitution of the United States provides that "the Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property of the United States:" Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the facts hereinbefore recited and report to this House as soon as practicable:

[1] Second session Forty-fifth Congress, Journal, p. 1303; Record, pp. 4605–4614.

[2] Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, Speaker.

[3] Second session Fifty-eighth Congress, Journal, p. 26; Record, pp. 55–58.

First. Whether the Isle of Pines is "territory or other property belonging to the United States" within the sense and meaning of the Constitution.

Second. Whether a treaty granting and ceding territory of or belonging to the United States to a foreign government without action on the part of the Congress is authorized by the Constitution.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary may report at any time under the foregoing resolution.

Mr. John S. Williams, of Mississippi, made a point of order that no question of privilege was involved.

The Speaker[1] said:

Of course the point of order goes to the standing of the resolution—the propriety of the introduction of the resolution. What the facts may be if the inquiry is made is no part of the duty of the Chair to inquire. The first whereas recites that—

"By the action of this Government in establishing and recognizing the independence of the Republic of Cuba it was expressly provided that the Isle of Pines should not be within the constitutional boundary of that Republic."

The next whereas recites that the government existing in the Isle of Pines is by the United States. The next whereas quotes section 3 of Article IV of the Constitution of the United States, that—

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property of the United States."

And then comes the resolution:

"That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the facts hereinbefore recited and report to this House as soon as practicable."

Then follow "first" and "second." I will read the second paragraph, which is all that is necessary to enable the Chair to rule:

"Second. Whether a treaty granting and ceding territory of or belonging to the United States to a foreign government without action on the part of Congress is authorized by the Constitution."

Now, it seems, upon the face of the resolution, that this presents a question, in the opinion of the Chair, of the highest privilege. What the House may do with the resolution, or, if it be agreed to, what that committee may find to be the facts, and after the finding what the House may do with the report, is no part of the business of the Chair in ruling upon the question of order. The Chair overrules the point of order.

2564. Alleged infringement by the treaty-making power on the constitutional right of the House to originate revenue measures presents a question of privilege.—On January 22, 1887,[2] Mr. D. N. Wallace, of Louisiana, presented, as a question of privilege, this resolution:

Whereas it has been stated in the public prints, and is no doubt true, that the President and Senate have agreed to and ratified a convention by which the terms of the treaty made between the United States and the Government of the Hawaiian Islands on the 30th day of January, 1875, have been extended for seven years longer, and beyond the period limited for its operation by the original treaty; and

Whereas by the original treaty it was agreed that certain articles therein mentioned were to be admitted to the United States free of duty; and

Whereas the original treaty was, by its terms, subject to the confirmation of an act of Congress, which provision is not inserted in the convention said to have been ratified: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the facts hereinbefore recited, and to report to this House whether the treaty which involves the rate of duty to be imposed on any article or the admission of any article free of duty can be valid and binding without the concurrence of the House of Representatives and how far the power conferred on the House by the Constitution of the United States to originate measures to lay and collect duties can be controlled by the treaty-making power under said Constitution.

---

[1] Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois, Speaker.

[2] Second session Forty-ninth Congress, Journal, pp. 349, 350; Record, p. 917.

Resolved, That the President be requested to lay before the House, if consistent with the public welfare, a copy of the treaty or convention proposed to the Senate and ratified by that body between the United States and the Government of the Hawaiian Islands.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary may report at any time under the foregoing resolution.

Mr. Nelson Dingley, jr., of Maine, made the point of order that the resolution was not privileged.

The Speaker[1] ruled:

The only question now before the House is the point of order. The resolution directs the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire and report how far the power conferred on the House by the Constitution of the United States to originate measures to lay and collect duties can be controlled by the treaty-making power under the Constitution. That is a question which involves the constitutional privileges and powers of the House to originate such measures, and the Chair thinks it has always been held to be a matter of privilege in the House.

2565. A resolution that the rights and dignity of the House have been invaded by the Executive presents a question of privilege.—On December 19, 1893,[2] Mr. Charles A. Boutelle, of Maine, submitted, as involving a question of privilege, the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas the Executive communications[3] just read to the House clearly disclose that the rights and dignity of the House of Representatives as a coordinate branch of Congress of the United States have been invaded by the Executive Department in furnishing secret instructions to a minister plenipotentiary of the United States to conspire with the representatives of a deposed and discredited monarchy for the subversion and overthrow of the established republican government to which he was accredited and to which his public instructions pledged the good faith and sympathy of the President, the Government, and the people of the United States: Therefore,

Resolved, That it is the sense of this House that any intervention by the Executive of the United States, its civil or military representatives, without authority of Congress, in the internal affairs of a friendly, recognized government to disturb or overthrow it and to aid or abet the substitution or restoration of a monarchy therefor is contrary to the policy and traditions of the Republic and the letter and spirit of the Constitution, and can not be too promptly or emphatically reprobated.

Mr. James B. McCreary, of Kentucky, made the point of order that the resolution did not present a question of privilege.

Mr. W. C. P. Breckinridge, of Kentucky, made the further point of order that in any event the resolution must first be referred to a committee of the House.

The Speaker[4] held that the resolution was privileged, but also held that under the rules it must be referred in the first instance to a committee.[5] Although the question is privileged, yet if the rules provide for its reference it must be referred. There is no question of higher privilege than the right of a Member to his seat, yet the rules provide that all matters touching the right of a Member to his seat shall be referred to the Committee on Elections.

[2] Second session Fifty-third Congress, Journal, pp. 43, 44; Record, pp. 397–400.

[3] A message relating to affairs in Hawaii.

[4] Charles F. Crisp, of Georgia, Speaker.

[5] This ruling as to reference of a matter of privilege is contrary to the past and present practice of the House, which is that a matter of privilege supersedes the regular order of business and the pending question and engages the attention of the House at once. (See sections 2521–2531, 2567 of this volume.)

Now, it has been held expressly that where a matter is called up in the House, not having been referred to the Committee on Elections, touching the right of a Member to his seat, that when the point is made it must be referred to the Committee on Elections. The Chair is aware of one decision in conflict with this, but the Chair thinks that a moment's reflection will satisfy gentlemen that it is within the power of the House to make rules for its own government, to make rules for the transaction of business, to make the rules which will cover privileged questions as well as questions not privileged.

The House has determined by its rules that as to certain matters they shall be referred to certain committees. Now, if a privileged matter should arise in the House or be presented to the House and there was nothing in the rules providing for its reference to any committee, then the Chair is of the opinion it would be in order to consider it, or be in order to move to refer it to some committee, thereby giving the committee jurisdiction of the subject-matter. Such questions frequently arise where there is no express direction in the rules as to the reference of the matter to a specific committee. The resolution, however, of the gentleman from Maine relates to our foreign relations, and there is a distinct provision in the rules that all matters referring to our foreign relations shall be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs; and the gentleman from Kentucky made the point that this matter should be so referred.

The Chair has decided that the recitals of this resolution constitute a question of privilege, and the point being made that, as the resolution pertains to our foreign relations, it should be referred under the rules to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the Chair holds that it must be so referred.

Mr. Boutelle appealed from the decision of the Chair, to wit, that the resolution should be first referred to a committee. This appeal was, on motion of Mr. McCreary, laid on the table.

On the same day, Mr. W. Bourke Cockran, of New York, presented a resolution on the same subject, alleging that the Executive Department of the Government had recently attempted to enlarge the territorial limits of the United States without any consultation with the House of Representatives, and providing for a special committee to examine into the rights, powers, privileges, and duties of the House on this subject.

Mr. Breckinridge, of Kentucky, made the point of order that the resolution must first be considered by the Committee on Rules.

The Speaker sustained the point of order, holding as follows:

This resolution is a resolution to raise a special committee, and under the rules of the House, when the point is made against its consideration, even though it be privileged, it must be referred to the Committee on Rules, because there is an express provision of the rules to that effect. The Chair holds, under the point made by the gentleman from Kentucky, that this resolution must be referred without a motion; and it will be referred to the Committee on Rules.

2566. A letter from an executive officer of the Government criticising the Senate was condemned in debate as a breach of privilege and withdrawn.—On February 25, 1903,[1] a Senator read in the Senate a letter from the Civil Service Commission criticising language used by a Senator in debate.

[1] Second session Fifty-seventh Congress, Record, pp. 2600–2604.

This letter, which was read during proceedings in relation to one Elmer E. Forshay, was criticised as a gross breach of privilege, and was withdrawn.

2567. A resolution relating to the recognition of a foreign state, no invasion of the House's prerogatives being alleged, does not present a question of privilege.

A definition of questions of privilege.

The ordinary rights and functions of the House under the Constitution are exercised in accordance with the rules, without precedence as matters of privilege.

On March 30, 1898,[1] Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, of Texas, presented, as a question of privilege, the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the heroic struggle of the Cuban people against the force of arms and the horrors of famine has shown them worthy to be free. And, second, the United States hereby recognizes the Republic of Cuba as a free and independent state.

Mr. Charles A. Boutelle, of Maine, made the point of order that the resolution was not in order.

After debate the Speaker[2] ruled:

A question of privilege which concerns the House is one which concerns the exercise of its functions in accordance with the principles which govern parliamentary bodies. Every parliamentary body has to have rules for its government, otherwise it would have no government at all; and upon adherence to those rules depends its success as a parliamentary body. The rights of the House under the Constitution are in no way to be confounded with the privileges of the House and of every Member in it in the sense in which this matter is presented here to-day. Congress has certain powers conferred upon it, and in the exercise of those powers each House is governed by its rules. It is authorized expressly by the Constitution to make rules; and without the authorization of the Constitution it would be at liberty to make rules. These rules are the protection of the rights of the House. Now, it will be noticed in the Constitution—if any gentleman will turn to it—that there are certain powers conferred upon Congress—the power to declare war, the power to legislate for the general welfare, and a series of other enumerated powers. No man up to this date has for an instant pretended or suggested that, because the Congress has the right to pass laws upon certain topics, proposals for those laws become questions of privilege—never before except once, and the Chair will present that decision to the House.

The same language is used with reference to our relations with foreign nations that is used with reference to the creation of the courts of law, and all other power which is concerned. It is a legislative power, and it is exercised under the Constitution by rules adopted by each body. This is the first preliminary idea that we ought to have in regard to this matter. But those propositions in regard to war, or about recognition, or any of those subjects which may or may not be within our purview, do not become questions of privilege at all because we have a right to pass upon them, because that would make everything a question of privilege and end by making nothing a question of privilege.

Now, let us see what this call upon us is founded on. This is a matter that we should not have given any attention to except in times of interest, not to say excitement. The gentleman from Maine, Mr. Boutelle, some time ago presented to Speaker Crisp a proposition which had in it certain elements charging that the Executive was interfering with some of the rights and privileges of the legislative body. The Speaker ruled that it was a question of privilege; and you will perceive that it is entirely different from the present proposition, has no aspect like it at all, not the faintest resemblance to it; but the Speaker ruled that that was a privileged question. He also ruled that, being a privileged question, it should go to a committee.

Well, now, against that doctrine the Chair has always opposed himself; and the question, as Members will see by turning to the Record, that was put to the House was on that part of the Speaker's decision as to whether it should go to a committee or not, and if it appears that, as the gentleman from Texas says, I voted on that subject, I voted according to my lights and voted against it. But he has omitted to state to you this other question, the same question almost, was put afterwards to Speaker Crisp, and by him promptly decided to be out of order at a later day, on the 30th of July, 1894:

"2. That the Republic of Hawaii is entitled to exercise and enjoy international comity and the benefits of all rights, privileges, and advantages under existing treaties that were concluded between the United States of America and the late Kingdom of Hawaii.

"3. That the Republic of Hawaii is hereby recognized by the United States of America as a free, sovereign, and independent republic, and the President of the United States shall give proper notice of the recognition to the President of the Republic of Hawaii."

The gentleman from Maine, Mr. Boutelle, demanded its immediate consideration as presenting a privileged question; and the gentleman from Missouri, an old and experienced Member, Mr. Dockery, made the point of order that the resolution was not privileged. Well, now, as a matter of course, the Speaker sustained the point—and that is precisely this question. There was no appeal. It was too clear for an appeal even.

Mr. Bailey having appealed from the decision of the Chair, the appeal was laid on the table, 180 yeas to 140 nays, and so the decision of the Chair was sustained.

2568. Subjects relating to the relations of the United States with other nations or peoples do not constitute questions of privilege.—On December 21, 1893,[1] Mr. Charles A. Boutelle, of Maine, submitted as a privileged proposition, and asked immediate consideration of, a preamble reciting that the naval forces of the United States at Hawaii had been made subject to the orders of one James H. Blount, who had no rank or authority whereby he might be entitled to assume such authority, and the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the House of Representatives by what authority instructions were issued placing the armed naval forces of the United States and the use of its ensign under the orders and control of said Blount, and that the Secretary of the Navy is further directed to furnish the House of Representatives with copies of all orders, directions, instructions, or official suggestions issued by him or any officer of the Navy Department or of the Navy since the 4th day of March, 1893, concerning the use or movements of the armed naval forces of the United States at the Hawaiian Islands.

The Speaker[2] held that the resolution was not privileged.

2569. On July 30, 1894,[3] Mr. Charles A. Boutelle, of Maine, introduced the following joint resolution (H. Res. 210):

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

1. That the United States of America congratulates the people of the Hawaiian Islands on their just and peaceful assumption of the powers, duties, and responsibilities of self-government, as indicated by their recent adoption of a republican form of government.

2. That the Republic of Hawaii is entitled to exercise and enjoy international comity and the benefits of all rights, privileges, and advantages under existing treaties that were concluded between the United States of America and the late Kingdom of Hawaii.

3. That the Republic of Hawaii is hereby recognized by the United States of America as a free, sovereign, and independent republic, and the President of the United States shall give proper notice of the recognition to the President of the Republic of Hawaii.

Mr. Boutelle demanded its immediate consideration as presenting a privileged question.

Mr. Alexander M. Dockery, of Missouri, made the point that said resolution was not privileged.

The Speaker[1] sustained the point.

2570. On May 27, 1897,[2] Mr. James Hamilton Lewis, of Washington, presented, as a question of privilege, the following resolution:

Whereas the United States Senate assembled has duly by a proper form of resolution declared for a state of neutrality and the according to the island of Cuba all rights as a belligerent as against Spain; and

Whereas it is asserted that such right of recognition exists only with the Executive of the United States: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of Congress, That as a foreign policy of the United States it is the right and authority of the Senate and House of Representatives in adopting a foreign policy of the United States to recognize as Congress the belligerency of and declare the attitude of neutrality of the United States to the island of Cuba or any other government or country when in the sense of the House such course is demanded by existing conditions.

Mr. Nelson Dingley, of Maine, made the point of order that the resolution did not raise a privileged question.

The Speaker[3] said:

The Chair thinks this is not a question of privilege. Under the rules of the House such a resolution can be presented in the regular course and should have the report of a committee upon the subject.

Mr. Lewis having appealed from the decision of the Chair, the appeal was, on June 1, laid on the table.

2571. On June 3, 1897,[4] Mr. William L. Terry, of Arkansas, presented, as a question of privilege, this resolution:

Whereas the people of the United States are taking a deep interest in the Cuban question and the Senate has passed and sent to the House a resolution recognizing the belligerency of Cuba; and

Whereas for the due and orderly consideration of the same, and in accordance with immemorial usage and the rules and practices of the House, it is necessary that there should be a Committee on Foreign Affairs to which said resolution may be promptly referred for proper consideration and report; Therefore,

Resolved, That it is the sense of this House that the Committee on Foreign Affairs authorized by Rule X should be appointed as soon hereafter as practicable, so that said Senate resolution——

Mr. Sereno E. Payne, of New York, made a point of order against the resolution.

The Speaker[3] ruled:

The point is made that this resolution does not raise a question of privilege, and the Chair decides that it does not.

Mr. Terry having appealed, the appeal was laid on the table.

2572. A resolution recommending the recall of a foreign minister of the United States does not present a question of privilege.—On February 26, 1894,[5] Mr. Charles A. Boutelle, of Maine, presented, as involving a privileged question, a resolution recommending the recall of the United States minister to Hawaii.

The Speaker[1] held that the resolution was not privileged, saying:

It seems to the Chair that there can be no question of privilege involved in the resolution. Whilst the question of the relations of the United States to the Hawaiian Islands has been submitted to Congress, so are a great many other matters of much moment, and they do not constitute questions of privilege, but go to a committee, under our rules, to be considered first by the committee and then reported; and even then, unless expressly provided for, they are not what we know as privileged questions. So the Chair thinks it is not a privileged question.

2573. A proposition relating to the counting of the electoral vote presents a question of constitutional privilege.—On February 4, 1853,[2] the House received from the Senate a resolution providing a method of examining the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States.

Mr. George W. Jones, of Tennessee, rising to a parliamentary inquiry, asked if this was not a question of privilege, which took precedence of a mere privileged question.

The Speaker[3] said:

The Chair thinks it is a question of privilege.

2574. On February 2, 1861,[4] Mr. Elihu B. Washburne, of Illinois, called up a resolution from the Senate providing for the appointment of a committee to join such committee as might be appointed by the "House to ascertain and report a mode for examining the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States," etc.

Mr. Muscoe R. H. Garnett, of Virginia, objected to the consideration of the resolution on the ground that it was not then in order.

The Speaker[5] decided that inasmuch as the resolution provided for ascertaining a mode of executing a duty required by the Constitution of the United States to be executed on a particular day, and which might not, under the rules, be considered before that day, he was of the opinion that it presented a question of privilege, and might, therefore, be called up at any time.

Mr. Garnett having appealed, the appeal was laid on the table.

2575. On December 7, 1880,[6] Mr. George A. Bicknell, of Indiana, as a privileged question, moved that the House proceed to the consideration of the resolution of the Senate proposing a joint rule for counting the votes of electors of President and Vice-President.

Mr. J. Warren Keifer, of Ohio, made the point of order that the question was not one of privilege.

The Speaker,[7] after debate, overruled the point of order on the ground that the resolution of the Senate related to the execution of a high constitutional duty devolving on the two Houses of Congress by the Twelfth Article of the Constitution, which was also a duty imposed by section 142 of the Revised Statutes, and that as a particular day during the present session was the one fixed by law for counting the votes for President and Vice-President, any proposition looking to the performance of that duty was a question of privilege. The Speaker said:

If it (the counting) is done by the two Houses it is the highest duty they have to perform, one imposed directly by the Constitution, as the Chair thinks, relating to the election of a President and a Vice-President, and the very existence of our form of government might depend thereon. If done by any other authority it must be done in the presence of the two Houses, and without their presence it can not be done at all; so that all laws and all rules relating to the joint meeting ,which in any event is indispensable to a count must be of the highest privilege, affecting as they do the exercise of a most important function of the two Houses, the ascertainment of the choice of electors for President and Vice-President. * * * The Chair desires to say that it is not competent for the House to make any rule which impairs in any degree the execution of the terms of the Constitution of the United States. The Chair therefore considers, for the reasons given and in view of past practice, that this is a question of privilege.

2576. A resolution declaring that the counting of the electoral vote of a certain State by the direction of the Presiding Officer of the Senate was an invasion of the privileges of the House, was held in order in the House.—On February 10, 1869,[1] after the electoral count had been concluded and the Senate had withdrawn, Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, offered this resolution as a question of privilege:

Resolved, That the House protest that the counting of the vote of Georgia by the order of the Vice-President pro tempore was a gross act of oppression and an invasion of the rights and privileges of the House.

Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, made the point of order that the House had no right to make reflections on the other House.

The Speaker[2] said:

The House has the right to adopt such resolutions as it may consider proper when it deems that its rights and privileges have been infringed upon.

2577. A resolution relating to alleged fraud in connection with the electoral count has been presented as a matter of privilege.—On May 13, 1878,[3] Mr. Clarkson N. Potter, of New York, as a question of privilege, presented a preamble and resolution, reciting the allegation of the legislature of Maryland that by reason of fraudulent returns from the States of Florida and Louisiana due effect had not been given to the electoral vote cast by Maryland on December 6, 1876, alleging fraud with the connivance of high officials of the Government, and providing for the appointment of a select committee to investigate the charges.

Mr. Omar D. Conger, of Michigan, made the point of order that the preamble and resolution did not present or involve a question of privilege, and were not in order at this time.

The Speaker[4] overruled the point of order on the ground that the preamble and resolution presented the question of the rightful occupation of the Executive

Chair and the connection of prominent officials with frauds alleged to have been committed in connection therewith, and, being presented on behalf of a sovereign States whose rights were alleged to be invaded, presented a question of high privilege.

Mr. Conger having appealed, the appeal was laid on the table, yeas 128, nays 108.

2578. A bill relating to the constitutional functions of the House in counting the electoral vote was held to be highly privileged.—On February 27, 1877,[1] Mr. David Dudley Field, of New York, from the Select Committee on the Privileges, Powers, and Duties of the House of Representatives in Counting the Vote for President and Vice-President of the United States, reported a bill (H. R. 4693) to amend the Revised Statutes of the United States in respect to vacancies in the offices of President and Vice-President, and demanded the previous question thereon.

Mr. Horatio C. Burchard, of Illinois, made the point of order that the committee had no authority to report the said bill.[2]

The Speaker[3] overruled the point of order on the ground that the resolution creating the said committee authorized it "to ascertain and report what are the privileges, powers, and duties of the House of Representatives in counting the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States," and also gave the committee the right to report at any time. The Speaker further stated that he could not conceive of a question of higher constitutional and parliamentary privilege than was involved in the bill under consideration, and he therefore held the bill to be in order at this time.

The record of the debates[4] further shows the Speaker to have said:

> The Chair thinks there will be no dispute about one point, and that is this: That this committee possesses the power to report at any time. In the next place, the Chair is unable to conceive of a higher constitutional and parliamentary privilege than the introduction of a bill of this character. He will even go so far as to say that a Member might rise in his place and introduce a bill of this character, involving, as it does, the highest constitutional privilege he can conceive of, and ask for its consideration. This House has the right to determine when the contingency arises in reference to the election of President and Vice-President of the United States requiring further legislation in reference thereto.

2579. The right of a Member to his seat presents a question of privilege, and takes precedence of other business.

Previous to 1840 the principle that the order of business might be interrupted by a question of privilege was not fully recognized.

On June 16, 1840,[5] Mr. John Campbell, of South Carolina, moved that the rules in relation to the order of business be suspended to enable him to submit to the House two reports from the Committee on Elections. The motion was defeated, 114 yeas to 64 nays—not the required two-thirds vote. Mr. Campbell then arose and notified the House that he was instructed by the Committee on Elections to make two reports from that committee upon the rights of persons to seats as Members of this House,[1] and he claimed the right to make the reports on the ground that the privileges of the House were involved in the questions discussed in the reports.

The Speaker[2] decided against the right claimed. He based his decision that a contested election case was not a question of privilege upon a case of contested election from Mississippi in a former Congress, from which it was to be seen that the House could not have considered it a privileged question, as it was determined that it required a vote of two-thirds to make that case a special order for a particular day.[3]

From this decision Mr. Campbell took an appeal to the House, and, after debate, the decision of the Chair was reversed, 95 nays to 86 yeas. And so it was decided that a contested election case was a privileged question.

The House having thus decided, Mr. Campbell, from the Committee of Elections, made a report on the New Jersey contested election, accompanied by the journal of the proceedings of the committee.

On July 17, 1840, Mr. Campbell, from the Committee of Elections, as a matter of privilege, under the decision of the previous day, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of certain electors of the Sixth Congressional district of the State of Massachusetts, alleging that Osmyn Baker, the sitting Member from that district, was not duly elected a Member of the House of Representatives, etc.

This resolution was agreed to.

2580. On January 7, 1846,[4] as a question of privilege, Mr. Hannibal Hamlin, of Maine, from the Committee of Elections, to which was referred the memorial of W. H. Brockenbrough, representing that he was elected a Member of the House of Representatives in the Twenty-ninth Congress from the State of Florida by a majority of the legally qualified voters of that State, and that he was entitled to the return and commission at the time that Edward C. Cabell received the same, made a report thereon, accompanied by resolutions.

The record of debates does not show that any question was made against receiving the report as one of privilege. The Journal also indicates that it was received as a matter of course.

2581. It has been held that an election case may not supersede the consideration of a proposition of impeachment.—On March 3, 1879,[5] the regular order of business was the report of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, proposing articles of impeachment against George F. Seward, late consul-general at Shanghai, China, and now minister plenipotentiary to China, the pending question being the question of consideration raised by Mr. James A. Garfield, of Ohio, on which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

[3] This case was considered in 1837 (see section 518 of Vol. I). Also on March 4, 1836 (first session Twenty-fourth Congress, Journal, p. 464), the House took up the report in a contested election case by a two-thirds vote, Mr. Speaker Polk deciding that such a vote was necessary to set aside the regular order of business.

[4] First session Twenty-ninth Congress, Journal, p. 201; Globe, p. 158.

[5] Third session Forty-fifth Congress, Journal, p. 621; Record, p. 2347.

Mr. Hiram Price, of Iowa, proposed to submit the following resolution as a question of privilege:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be discharged from the further consideration of the contested election case of Nutting against Reilly, and that the same be now taken up for action in the House.

The Speaker [1] ruled the resolution out of order at this time, for the reason that a question of high privilege was already pending, involving the constitutional power of the House with reference to impeachment, on which question the yeas and nays had been ordered, thus precluding the presentation of another question of privilege until the pending question had been disposed of.

2582. The latest ruling establishes the principle that a proposition relating to the right of a Member to his seat may be acted on at once without reference to a committee.—On December 16, 1889,[2] Mr. John F. Lacey, of Iowa, as a privileged question, submitted the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas it is well known that a contest for a seat in this House was duly commenced by Hon. John M. Clayton, of Arkansas, against Hon. C. R. Breckinridge, a sitting Member; and

Whereas it is a matter of public notoriety that the said Clayton, while engaged in taking testimony in the said contest was assassinated and all further proceedings thereby suspended;

Resolved, therefore, That the Committee on Elections be, and is hereby, directed to inquire and report what further proceedings should be had in relation to the said case, and they are authorized to send for persons and papers if deemed necessary by them for the investigation of the said matter.

The same having been read, Mr. Charles F. Crisp, of Georgia, made the point of order that the said preamble and resolution, under the rule adopted, must be referred to the Committee on Elections.

After debate thereon, the Speaker [3] overruled the said point of order on the ground that the preamble and resolution touched the privileges of the House, and it therefore became the duty of the Chair to entertain and submit it to the House.

2583. On October 30, 1893,[4] Mr. Thomas A. E. Weadock, of Michigan, submitted as a privileged proposition, the following resolution, to wit:

Resolved, That the memorial of Henry M. Youmans, an elector residing in the Eighth Congressional district of the State of Michigan, touching the election of William S. Linton as a Member of the House of Representatives, to represent said district in this House, be referred to the Committee on Elections, which committee shall consider the allegation therein made, and, as speedily as possible, report to the House what action should be taken with reference thereto.

Mr. Albert J. Hopkins, of Illinois, made the point of order that the resolution should be first considered by the Committee on Elections.

The Speaker [5] sustained the point of order; and the resolution was accordingly committed to the Committee on Elections.

2584. The right of a Member to his seat may come up at any time as a question of privilege, even though the subject may have been referred to a committee.

A resolution directing the Elections Committee to report an election case may not have precedence as a question of privilege.

On June 18, 1884,[1] Mr. Samuel H. Miller, of Pennsylvania, proposed, as a question of privilege, a resolution reciting that the Committee on Elections had had the case from the Second Mississippi district before them over six months, and proposing that, therefore, it be

Resolved, That the Committee on Elections be ordered to report said case to the House at the earliest practicable time.[2]

The Speaker[3] decided that this resolution, as it did not propose to administer the oath to a Member but only to instruct a committee, was not one of privilege. But immediately the following was offered:

Resolved, That James R. Chalmers was duly elected a Representative to the Forty-eighth Congress from the Second Congressional district of Mississippi, and is entitled to his seat.

Mr. Nathaniel J. Hammond, of Georgia, made the point of order that the resolution was not in order, as this subject has been committed by the House to the Committee on Elections.

The Speaker, after referring to the fact that the resolution did not come before the House as the report from a committee, ruled:

It is a proposition to seat a Member, and is a question of privilege.

It being proposed by Mr. Philip B. Thompson, jr., of Kentucky, to raise the question of consideration, the Speaker ruled: "The Chair decides it a matter of privilege, but of course the question of consideration may be raised against it."

2585. A motion to discharge a committee from the consideration of a contested election case presents a question of the highest privilege.—On July 23, 1886,[4] Mr. Henry G. Turner, of Georgia, as a privileged resolution, submitted the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on Elections be discharged from the further consideration of the contested election case of Charles H. Page v. William A. Pirce, from the Second Congressional district of Rhode Island, and that the House proceed to consider said case.

Resolved, That neither Charles H. Page nor William A. Pirce was duly elected a Member of this House from the Second Congressional district of Rhode Island, and that the seat now occupied by said William A. Pirce be declared vacant.

The Speaker[3] said, "This presents a question of the highest privilege."

2586. A resolution providing for an investigation of the election of a Member presents a question of privilege.—On October 27, 1893,[5] Mr. Thomas A. E. Weadock, of Michigan, as involving a question of privilege, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the memorial of Henry M. Youmans, an elector residing in the Eighth Congressional district of the State of Michigan, touching the election of William S. and papers, administer oaths, and to employ a clerk and stenographer, and that said committee be authorized and directed to investigate the allegations of said memorial and report to this House; and the expenses necessarily incurred in the execution of this order shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. Albert J. Hopkins, of Illinois, made the point of order that the resolution did not present a question of privilege.

The Speaker[1] overruled the point of order.

2587. A claimant to a seat, with papers indicating his election, is entitled to have them presented as a question of privilege.—On December 12, 1865,[2] Mr. Henry J. Raymond, of New York, presented, as a question of privilege, the certificates of certain gentlemen claiming to be representatives from the State of Tennessee.

Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, raised the question that no question of privilege was involved, since the State of Tennessee was not known to the House or the Congress.

The Speaker[3] overruled the point of order, saying:

The Chair has examined the precedents of previous Congresses, especially since the rebellion commenced, and finds that the usage of the House has been uniform that claimants of seats have their credentials presented as a question of privilege. It is then for the House to determine what shall be done with them. The presentation of the credentials does not involve the question of their reference. It is for the House to determine whether they shall be laid on the table or referred. But a claimant to a seat, with papers prima facie indicating his election, is entitled, as a question of privilege, to have them presented.

2588. A question relating to the existence of a vacancy in the membership of the House was held to be of privilege.

Effect of negative votes by the House on affirmative propositions as to the titles of persons to seats, especially as related to the creation of vacancies. (Footnote.)

On June 29, 1850,[4] the House had defeated by a vote of 94 yeas to 102 nays this resolution:

Resolved, That William Thompson is entitled to the seat in this House which he now holds as the Representative from the First Congressional district of Iowa.

Thereupon Mr. Edward W. McGaughey, of Indiana, submitted the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That there is now a vacancy in this House in the representation from the First Congressional district of the State of Iowa, and that the fact of vacancy be notified to the executive of the State of Iowa by the Speaker of this House.

Which having been read,

Mr. Armistead Burt, of South Carolina, made the point of order that the said resolution was not in order, as the result of the vote sufficiently declared the vacancy without further action. Mr. Burt then referred to a recent New York case [1] as one in point. He held that as a proposition of the minority that the contestant was entitled to his seat, as well as the proposition of the majority, had both been voted down, a vacancy existed. No Member of the House could be concerned, therefore, by this resolution pending, and therefore no question of privilege was involved.

The Speaker [2] decided that, being a question of privilege, the resolution was in order.

Mr. Burt having appealed, the Chair was sustained.

The resolution was then agreed to by a vote of 109 to 84.

2589. A resolution notifying the governor of a State of a vacancy in the representation of a district is presented as a question of privilege.—On June 29, 1850,[3] the report of the Committee of Elections on the Iowa contested election case was under consideration, and the House had decided that neither Mr. Thompson, the sitting Member, nor Mr. Miller, the contestant, was entitled to the seat as Representative from the First Congressional district of Iowa.

Thereupon Mr. Edward W. McGaughey, of Indiana, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That there is now a vacancy in this House in the representation from the First Congressional district of the State of Iowa, and that the fact of vacancy be notified to the executive of the State of Iowa by the Speaker of this House.

Mr. Armistead Burt, of South Carolina, made the point of order that the resolution was not in order.

---

[1] This case seems to have been the following, which occurred April 19, 1848. (1st sess. 30th Cong., Globe, p. 643; Journal, p. 709.)

These resolutions were voted on:

"Resolved, That David S. Jackson is not entitled to his seat in this House as a Representative from the Sixth Congressional district of the State of New York.

"Resolved, That James Monroe is entitled to the seat now occupied in this House by David S. Jackson as a Representative from the Sixth Congressional district of the State of New York."

The first resolution was decided in the affirmative and the second in the negative.

Mr. Burt inquired of the Speaker if, under the recent decisions of the House, he should not consider it his duty to inform the proper authority of the State of New York that a vacancy existed in the representation from that State in the House of Representatives for the Thirtieth Congress.

The Speaker (Robert C. Winthrop, of Massachusetts) said that he should do so after the time had elapsed in which a motion for the reconsideration of the votes last taken could be moved.

This case, it will be observed, is essentially different from the Iowa case.

On May 29, 1896 (1st sess. 54th Cong., Record, p. 5915), the House was considering these resolutions:

"Resolved, That Thomas B. Johnston was not elected a Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Seventh Congressional district of the State of South Carolina, and is not entitled to a seat therein.

"Resolved, That J. William Stokes was duly elected a Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Seventh Congressional district of South Carolina, and is entitled to a seat therein."

Mr. Stokes was the sitting Member.

Mr. Samuel W. McCall, of Massachusetts, having raised the question as to whether the defeat of both resolutions would in effect declare the seat vacant, the Speaker (Mr. Reed) informally expressed the opinion that it would.

[2] Howell Cobb, of Georgia, Speaker.

[3] First session Thirty-first Congress, Journal, p. 1065; Globe, pp. 1315, 1316.

The Speaker[1] decided that, being a question of privilege, the resolution was in order.

Mr. Burt having appealed, the appeal was laid on the table, thus sustaining the decision of the Chair.

2590. A Member having resigned, a question as to his right to his seat was not entertained as a question of privilege.

Although a Member had resigned, the House proceeded to inquire whether or not his acceptance of an incompatible office had vacated his title to the seat.

On January 5, 1847,[2] Mr. Robert C. Schenck, of Ohio, offered the following resolution as a question of privilege:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be instructed to inquire and report to this House whether the Hon. Edward D. Baker, a Representative from the State of Illinois, having accepted a commission as colonel of volunteers in the Army of the United States, and being in the service and receiving compensation from the Government of the United States as such army officer, has been entitled, since the acceptance and exercise of said military appointment, to a seat as a Member of this House.

Mr. Linn Boyd, of Kentucky, raised the question of order that the resolution did not involve a question of privilege to take precedence of all other business.

The Speaker[3] decided that the Member whose name was mentioned in the resolution, having resigned his seat as a Member of this House, the question, although an abstract question of privilege, was not such a question, involving the privileges of any Member of this House, as would take precedence of all other business.

This decision was acquiesced in by the House.

The question was then put on the resolution and it was agreed to.

2591. A paper in the nature of a memorial condemning the decision of the House in an election case was held not to involve a question of privilege.—On April 24, 1894,[4] Mr. Richard Bartholdt, of Missouri, claiming the floor for a question of privilege, offered the following resolution, which was read in part as follows:

Whereas the principles of justice have been outraged in the unseating of the lawfully elected Member of Congress from the Eleventh district of Missouri, Mr. Charles F. Joy; and

Whereas this act is a direct assault upon the dearest possession of a citizen—the right to choose his representatives in the enactment of his country's laws—and is the first step in the direction of anarchy, as subverting a government of the people, for the people, and by the people: Be it therefore

Resolved, That this assemblage of voters of the district, irrespective of party, condemns this outrage against the integrity of the ballot and protests against the misrepresentation of the district by a man——

At this point of the reading Mr. Benton McMillin, of Tennessee, made the point of order that no question of privilege was presented.

After debate, during which reference was made to a precedent arising in connection with the Michigan case in the preceding session, the Speaker[5] held that no question of privilege was presented, saying:

---

[1] Howell Cobb, of Georgia, Speaker.

[2] Second session Twenty-ninth Congress, Journal, p. 136; Globe, pp. 115, 116.

[3] John W. Davis, of Indiana, Speaker.

[4] Second session Fifty-third Congress, Record, pp. 4032, 4033.

[5] Charles F. Crisp, of Georgia, Speaker.

The Michigan case * * * was one where the memorial alleged that a gentleman who was on the roll and acting as a Member of the House had not been duly elected. That memorial was referred. But the case presented here is one in which there was a contest under the statute, notice given, evidence taken, a decision by the Committee on Elections, and a decision by the House after full debate; and the matter presented by the gentleman from Missouri is simply a resolution adopted by some individuals in St. Louis, declaring their opinion that there is no Representative of that district, although the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. O'Neill, was the duly and lawfully elected Member and entitled to his seat.

2592. No question of privilege is involved in the claim of a person to a seat in pursuance of the demand of a State for a representation greater than that allowed by law.—On March 9, 1869,[1] Mr. Roderick R. Butler, of Tennessee, offered as a question of privilege the following:

Whereas Hon. John B. Rodgers was on the first Tuesday of November, 1868, elected to the Forty-first Congress of the United States from the State of Tennessee as a delegate from the State at large; and

Whereas there is no existing law for the additional Member, but the loyal citizens of Tennessee believe that they are justly entitled to said additional Member: Therefore

Be it resolved, That the credentials of John B. Rodgers be referred to the Committee of Elections and that they be instructed to report, etc.

Mr. John F. Farnsworth, of Illinois, made the point of order that this was not a question of privilege.

The Speaker[2] said:

The Chair sustains the point of order. The resolution does not relate to the right of representation in any district of the United States, but refers to a law to confer additional representation.

2593. On March 28, 1879,[3] Mr. William M. Springer, of Illinois, presented the memorial of J. J. Wilson, claiming to have been elected a Representative from the State of Iowa for the Forty-sixth Congress and presented with the memorial a resolution providing for the reference of the subject to the Committee on Elections.

Mr. Omar D. Conger, of Michigan, and others made the point of order that no question of privilege was involved, since the petitioner claimed to have been elected at a pretended election at which a few votes only were cast, that the petition could not under the law be a basis for a contest, and that the petitioner had no credentials.

The Speaker[4] said:

The Chair desires to say that he can not see how the right of a person to be heard on this floor in reference to his right to a seat can be abridged or interfered with by any decision which the Clerk may have made in placing the names on the roll in pursuance of law. * * * The Constitution declares that this House "shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." Now, for the Chair to deny a hearing to any person seeking a seat on this floor, claiming that he is entitled to it in preference to one who is already seated, would be an infringement upon the right which is guaranteed to every citizen in the Constitution itself. The Chair therefore considers that under the rules this is a question of privilege and entertains the resolution.

2594. A resolution proposing the exclusion of a Delegate from his seat presents a question of privilege.—On December 23, 1857,[5] Mr. Edward A.

[2] James G. Blaine, of Maine, Speaker.

[3] First session Forty-sixth Congress, Record, pp. 93–95.

[4] Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, Speaker.

[5] First session Thirty-fifth Congress, Journal, pp. 112–115; Globe pp. 165–169.

Warren, of Arkansas, as a question of privilege, submitted the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas it appears from the proclamation of Brigham Young, late governor of the Territory of Utah, from the President's message, and from later developments, that the said Territory is now in open rebellion against the Government of the United States: Therefore

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Territories be instructed to report the facts and to inquire into the expediency of the immediate exclusion from this floor of the Delegate from said Territory.

Mr. Nathaniel P. Banks, of Massachusetts, raised a question of order as to the presentation of the resolution as a question of privilege.

The Speaker[1] overruled the point of order, on the ground that the resolution affected the right of a person who now occupied a seat on the floor.

A motion to lay the resolution on the table was decided in the negative, yeas 72, nays 118, and then the resolution and preamble were agreed to.

2595. A resolution embodying a general declaration as to the qualifications of Delegates was decided by the House not to involve a question of privilege.—On January 10, 1882, the House had adopted a resolution referring to the Committee on Elections the subject of the representation of Utah, the principal question being as to the eligibility of Mr. George Q. Cannon, a Mormon and polygamist, to the seat to which he had been elected.

On the succeeding day, January 11,[2] Mr. Dudley C. Haskell, of Kansas, presented, as a question of privilege, a preamble and resolution reciting the facts as to the existence of polygamy in the United States, and as to Mr. Cannon's relations to the institution, and, concluding,

Resolved (as the fixed and final determination of this House of Representatives of the Forty-seventh Congress), That no person guilty of living in polygamous marital relations, or guilty of teaching or inciting others so to do, is entitled to be admitted to this House of Representatives as a Delegate from any Territory of the United States.

Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, made the point of order that the resolution did not involve a question of privilege under Rule IX, the subject-matter having been disposed of by the House.

During the debate it was urged that this subject involved the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings.[3] On the other hand it was urged that Mr. Cannon did not have a seat in the House, his claims to one being before a committee; therefore the question was not before the House, and the resolution amounted merely to a declaration as to qualifications.

The Speaker[4] said he regarded it his duty to submit the question to the House, whether or not the resolution involved a question of privilege.

After further debate the House decided—yeas 109, nays 139—that the proposition did not present a question of privilege.

2596. A resolution providing compensation for a Territorial agent, not having a seat on the floor, does not present a question of privilege.

[4] J. Warren Keifer, of Ohio, Speaker.

In rare instances members of the minority party have been called to the Chair by the Speaker.

On March 2, 1861,[1] Speaker pro tempore Lawrence O'B. Branch,[2] of North Carolina, decided that a resolution providing compensation for a quasi-Delegate from the Territory of Colorado did not present a question of privilege, and on appeal the decision was sustained—yeas 79, nays 46. (The quasi-Delegate seems to have been one who attended to the business of the Territory as agent.)

2597. A protest against the method by which a bill had been passed, no error or infraction of the rules being alleged, was decided by the House not to present a question of privilege.

The Speaker held that a protest by Members should be read before any decision as to whether or not it might be offered as a question of privilege.

Instance in which the Speaker submitted to the House the decision as to whether or not a question involved privilege.

Summary of precedents relating to the placing of protests on the Journal.

On April 22, 1878,[3] the House having passed, under suspension of the rules, a bill making appropriations for the improvement of certain rivers and harbors, Mr. Samuel S. Cox, of New York, claimed the floor for a question of privilege and presented a protest, signed by several Members of the House, against the passage of the bill in this manner.

Mr. John H. Reagan, of Texas, made a point of order that the protest did not present a question of privilege and that it could not be admitted.

The Speaker[4] ruled that he could not decide whether a question of privilege was involved until he had heard the protest read.

From this decision Mr. Reagan appealed. On the following day Mr. Reagan withdrew his appeal, which was renewed by Mr. James A. Garfield, of Ohio.

The Speaker, in ruling, said:

Rule 141[5] provides that "when the reading of a paper is called for, and the same is objected to by any Member, it shall be determined by a vote of the House." In the Digest it is expressly stated in the same connection that the "rule above recited is not construed to apply to the single reading of a paper or proposition upon which the House may be called upon to give a vote or to the several regular readings of the bill, but to cases where a paper has been once read or a bill has received its regular reading and another is called for, and also where a Member desires the reading of a paper having relation to the subject before the House."

Further, in relation to questions of privilege, when a proposition is offered which relates to the privileges of the House, it is the duty of the Speaker to entertain it at least to the extent of submitting the question to the House as to whether or not it presents a question of privilege. Now, how could the Chair submit a question of privilege to the House, or a paper as to whether it involved a question of privilege or not, if the paper was not read so it could be seen whether it involved a question of privilege or not? Under the rules it is the duty of the Chair to entertain it at least to the extent of submitting the question to the House as to whether or not it presents a question of privilege. The rule also provides that the gentleman has the right to call for the reading of a paper or proposition upon which the House may be called upon to give a vote.

The Chair did not know until this morning, when he read it in the daily paper, what was contained in the protest, but if he had known, under the rules of the House it was the duty of the Chair to entertain the question of privilege alleged by the gentleman from New York to the extent at least of submitting it to the House, and as it was a proposition upon which the House might be called upon to vote, the reading of the paper was a right which the gentleman from New York could demand. The only question decided by the Chair is that under the rules the reading of the paper is in order.

The appeal from the Speaker's decision was laid on the table by a vote of 131 yeas to 101 nays.

So the protest was read. It alleged that the rules of the House should not be suspended to facilitate the passage of a bill appropriating so large a sum of money; that it was an infraction of one of the rules of the House, and that certain provisions of the bill were infractions of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution.

Mr. Eugene Hale, of Maine, made the point of order that it was not a question of privilege. After debate, the Speaker said:

In so far as this paper alludes to the rules of the House, the Chair on yesterday decided that point: That a suspension of the rules vacated them and for that occasion made them inoperative.

So far as the constitutional point alluded to in this paper is concerned, the Chair on yesterday stated it was not within his province to construe the Constitution, any more than it would be in the case of an amendment to cut off the House from determining whether such an amendment was contrary to law or not.

But in so far as this question of a protest is concerned and whether as a question of privilege it acquires the right to be read and the right to be placed upon the Journal, the Chair desires to refer to the proceedings of former Congresses. In the Third Congress, presided over by Mr. Muhlenberg, of Pennsylvania, Mr. Garnett, of Virginia, was allowed to spread upon the Journal the reasons of a vote given by him. In the Journal will be found the reasons in full.

"Mr. Swift, of Maryland, moved that the House do reconsider the vote taken on Saturday last on the question, Shall the declaration of Mr. Garnett then presented detailing the reasons for and motives of his vote on Thursday last on concurring with the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union in their agreement to the first resolution subjoined to the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs on the subject of a recognition of the independence of the late Spanish-American provinces be placed on the Journal? And on the question, Will the House reconsider the said vote? it passed in the affirmative.

"And on the question, Shall the said paper be placed onthe Journal? it passed in the affirmative—yeas 89, nays 71."

The next precedent which the Chair has been able to consider was in the Twenty-eighth Congress, over which Mr. J. W. Jones, of Virginia, presided. New Hampshire, Georgia, Missouri, and Mississippi elected their Representatives by general ticket. Mr. Barnard, of New York, and forty-nine other Members signed a protest against the admission of Representatives from said States. The Journal of the House says Mr. Barnard so framed his protest as to embody it in a resolution. Subsequently, on motion, the Journal was corrected so as to make it appear that the protest had got upon the Journal surreptitiously. It will be observed that the latter suggestion was the ground given for refusing it to be on the Journal. In both these cases, however, the papers were read and considered.

The next case to which the Chair has had his attention directed is a case in the Thirty-first Congress, and is the one occurring in the Senate alluded to in the Manual. The decision quoted in the Manual, page 289, under the heading of "Protest," was a protest on the part of certain Senators against the passage of a bill admitting California into the Union as a State. After extended debate, the Senate decided, by yeas 22 to nays 19, to lay the whole subject upon the table. This protest was signed by Senators Hunter and Mason, of Virginia; Butler and Barnwell, of South Carolina; Soule, of Louisiana;

Jefferson Davis, of Mississippi, and other Senators. That paper appears of record, but did not go, the Chair presumes, on Senate Journal.[1]

The next is a case in the Thirty-sixth Congress, when John B. Clark, of Missouri (I believe the father of a respected Member of this House), claimed the right to submit a preamble and resolution, but the Clerk in that case declined to entertain it, on the ground he had not the power to do so pending the organization of the House. The same was read, however.

Again in the Thirty-ninth Congress, Mr. Brooks—it was the case alluded to yesterday—claimed the right to put upon the record a protest against the way in which the Clerk made up the roll of Members. The record shows that it was inserted in the proceedings, but the Clerk declined to recognize it, because he was then acting under the operation of law which instructed him as to the making up of the roll of Members.

It will thus be seen in every instance the Chair has mentioned the reading of the paper was allowed and that in one instance the Journal contains the protest.

The Chair, as an individual opinion, thinks that where a protest is respectful in terms no harm can come by allowing such courtesy as will place such respectful protest of record in the Journal, especially in a case where debate was not allowed and there was no possibility of amendment. Following, however, the rules which govern him in the administration of his duties as presiding officer, the Chair submits the question to the House itself to determine whether there is here presented or not a question of privilege. Those who think it involves a question of privilege will vote in the affirmative and those who are of a contrary opinion will vote in the negative.

The question being taken, the House decided, 52 yeas to 180 nays, that the paper presented by Mr. Cox did not involve a question of privilege.

2598. Alleged improper alteration of a bill presented as a question of privilege.

The enrolling clerks should make no change, however unimportant, in the text of a bill to which the House has agreed.

On July 24, 1854,[2] Mr. Elihu B. Washburne, of Illinois, submitted, as a question of privilege, the following resolution:

Resolved, That a special committee of five be appointed for the purpose of inquiring whether the text of House bill No. 342, to aid the construction of a railroad in the Territory of Minnesota, was altered or in any way changed in its language, subsequent to its engrossment or passage by this House, without the authority of the House; and if so, by whom, and under what circumstances, such change was made; and that said committee be empowered to send for persons and papers, and to examine witnesses on oath in the premises.

This resolution, having been amended by the addition of the words "and also in regard to all other cases of interpolations of bills or joint resolutions of the House during the present session," was adopted, and Mr. Washburne was appointed chairman of the committee.

The record[3] of the debate shows that no question was made about the privileged character of the resolution.

The report was made on August 2.[4] It shows that the change was made under direction of the Clerk of the House to make the enrolled bill conform to what he was assured was the intention of the Committee on Public Lands when they reported the bill to the House. The act was done as a correction of a clerical error made in reporting the bill from that committee. Such informal corrections in enrolled bills were made with considerable frequency, the committee found; and the report says:

In the opinion of your committee it is highly censurable in any Member or officer of the House to make any change, even the most unimportant, in any bill or resolution which has received the sanction of this body.

2599. The printing of an argument with the text of a bill was held to involve a question of privilege, and the House ordered the objectionable portions stricken out.—On January 12, 1900,[1] Mr. James D. Richardson, of Tennessee, rising to a question of privilege, said:

I think, Mr. Speaker, the matter I present is one of privilege—one which affects the integrity of the proceedings of the House. I hold in my hand what purports to be a bill. It is in the form of a bill—that is, the first portion of it—and it is indorsed "H. R. 64. A bill to promote the commerce and increase the foreign trade of the United States, and to provide auxiliary cruisers, transports, and seamen for Government use when necessary."

It purports to have been introduced on the 4th day of December, 1899, and to have been referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and ordered to be printed.

The first few pages of this paper is in the form of a bill. The latter pages—four pages—are in different type, and an argument, a partisan argument, in support of the bill. After the conclusion of the bill there are four pages of partisan arguments and facts. It is made up in part of statements purporting to show the effect of the bill.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this bill should be taken from the files. I make the point of order, first, that the paper should be suppressed—it is not a bill—and, failing in that, I shall move to strike it from the files and have it destroyed.

After debate, the Speaker[2] said:

The Chair is of the opinion that that request should have coupled with it that the committee be discharged from the consideration of the bill, it not being before the House, and then have it reprinted. * * * The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order made by the gentleman from Tennessee is a good one. The bill is not before the House—it is before the committee, and it seems that it is improperly before the committee; and now the request should be that the committee be discharged from the consideration of the bill, this objectionable part eliminated, and the bill referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries with a new order to print. If there be no objection to such an order, it will be made. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

2600. A proposition to correct an enrolled bill that has become a law may not be presented as privileged.—On November 21, 1877,[3] Mr. Andrew H. Hamilton, of Indiana, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, proposed to report as a matter of privilege a proposition for the correction of an enrolled bill of the last Congress.

The Speaker[4] said:

This is not a privileged matter; it involves a change of existing law.

2601. There having been no unreasonable delay in transmitting an enrolled bill to the President, a resolution relating thereto was decided not to present a question of privilege.

Enrolled bills are taken to the President by the chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

[2] David B. Henderson, of Iowa, Speaker.

[3] First session Forty-fifth Congress, Record, p. 582.

[4] Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, Speaker.

On September 20, 1888,[1] Mr. William W. Morrow, of California, presented, as a question of privilege, this preamble and resolution:

Whereas the House of Representatives did, on the 3d day of September, 1888, pass the bill H. R. 11336, entitled "A supplement to an act entitled 'An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese,' approved the 6th day of May, 1882," which said bill was on the same day reported to the Senate;

That it appears from the Record that said bill passed the Senate on the 17th day of September, 1888, and on the 18th day of September, 1888, was reported to this House by Mr. Kilgore, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, as truly enrolled, whereupon the said bill was duly signed by the Speaker pro tempore of the House;

That thereafter and on the same day the said bill was reported to the Senate as having been so signed by the Speaker pro tempore of the House, whereupon it was duly signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate;

That the said bill having then passed both Houses, and having been duly enrolled and signed by the presiding officers of both Houses, was ready for transmittal to the President of the United States for his approval;

That it further appears that said bill was delivered to the Committee on Enrolled Bills of the House on the 19th of September, 1888, and is now in the possession of the acting chairman of said committee, Mr. Kilgore, for such transmittal to the President;

That it is reported in the Washington Post of this morning that said bill is being withheld from the President by said Committee on Enrolled Bills; that such action of the committee is without authority of law: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States, That said Committee on Enrolled Bills be directed to transmit said bill to the President of the United States forthwith and without further delay.

Mr. Benton McMillin, of Tennessee, having reserved a point of order, after debate, the Speaker[2] pro tempore decided:

In the opinion of the Chair this resolution does not present a question of privilege. If the resolution were properly before the House, being a resolution directing the Committee on Enrolled Bills to transmit a certain bill to the President of the United States forthwith, the House could no doubt adopt the resolution, but the point raised here is whether as this resolution now reaches the House it is a question of privilege. The point involved relates to the presentation of bills to the President after they are signed by the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate. In the absence of any law on the subject or any rule governing the House in respect to this matter, reference has been made to the Constitution, which provides in section 7 of Article I that—

"Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the President of the United States."

No time is fixed within which this presentation shall be made; there is no limit; the provision does not say "forthwith" or "immediately." The question presented therefore is not so much a question of law or Constitutional interpretation as a question of practice. The custom has grown up within the knowledge of the Chair—it is an old custom—for the Committee on Enrolled Bills to carry these bills to the President. We do not do as the Senate does. According to the practice of the House the chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills, by the direction of his committee or by reason of his function as chairman, takes these bills to the President. Within what time? There is no rule or law operating upon him in this respect.

In this resolution there is no reflection made upon this committee—none whatever. The only allegation in the resolution is based upon a statement taken from the Washington Post "that said bill is being withheld from the President by said Committee on Enrolled Bills; that such action of the committee is without authority of law." That is the statement of a newspaper; it is a part of the allegata; there is no proof of it. There is no statement of anything reflecting on the committee; no allegation of any impropriety; nothing involving the integrity of the committee or the integrity of the House in any sense of the word "integrity."

Is this a question of privilege under those circumstances? What is a question of privilege? It is that which involves the safety, the dignity, or integrity of the House or its Members or of its proceedings. This does not in any way involve the safety or dignity of the House, and according to the statement of the gentleman submitting the proposition it does not involve the integrity of the gentleman from Texas or of the committee.

Has there been in this case unusual delay? The actual lapse of time appears to have been one day. The Chair has made inquiry into this matter, and finds, according to the report of the Clerk, that the time within which bills passed by the Senate and House and signed by their respective presiding officers reach the President varies from one to ten days, the average being three days. Non constat that the President may be out of town, or that there may be some other impediment. Possibly this Committee on Enrolled Bills is obliged to compare this bill in accordance with its function in these cases.

So that neither in the statement of the resolution nor the statement of Members on the floor is there any imputation upon the Committee on Enrolled Bills. Hence the Chair decides that this is not a question of privilege. If the resolution should properly come before the House it would no doubt be entertained; and the House could direct, according to its own judgment, the action which the Committee on Enrolled Bills should take in reference to this bill. If this matter should come up on a subsequent day, when there had been an unreasonable delay in transmitting the bill to the President, the Chair is not prepared to say what he might do in the premises, for lapse of time might raise some inference upon which to predicate a question of privilege.

The Chair sustains the point of order.[1]

2602. The correction of the reference of a public bill was held, at a time when the rules did not provide any other mode of correction, to present a question of privilege.—On March 22, 1880,[2] Mr. Richard W. Townshend, of Illinois, presented "A bill (H. R. 5265) to revise and amend sections 2503, 2504, and 2505 of title 33 of the Revised Statutes of the United States," and this bill was referred to the Committee on Revision of the Laws.[3] The text of this bill was as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 2503, 2504, and 2505 of title 33 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be revised and amended so that the duty on salt, printing type, printing paper, and the chemicals and materials used in the manufacture of printing paper, be repealed, and that said articles be placed on the free list.

When, on the succeeding day, the nature of the bill became known, there was an extended controversy over changing the reference to the proper committee, the Ways and Means.

Finally, Mr. Robert M. McLane, of Maryland, made the point that the improper reference of the bill involved the "integrity" of the proceedings of the House, and proposed as privileged the following:

Whereas the House, being of opinion that the reference of House bill 5265 to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws was incorrect under its rules, doth resolve that the said committee be discharged from its further consideration and the same be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

[1] On February 13, 1884 (1st sess. 48th Cong., Record, pp. 1089, 1090), Mr. Speaker Carlisle made a similar decision as to a resolution proposing to investigate an alleged delay in transmitting to the President an enrolled joint resolution providing relief for sufferers from floods in the Ohio River.

[2] Second session Forty-sixth Congress, Record, pp. 1804, 1817, 1844, 1846; Journal, pp. 842–877.

[3] Public bills were then referred in open House. Now they are filed and referred under direction of the Speaker.

During the debate Mr. McLane explained his point of order:

I make the point to the House, the Journal of day before yesterday, on being read, having been approved by the Speaker and read to the House in pursuance of the first rule, reveals to me the reference of certain bill to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws which I think under the rules of this House ought to go to the Committee on Ways and Means. I believe it to be my privilege before I approve that Journal to see that a proper reference is made. It applies no more to this than to a multitude of cases which can occur. I do not choose to sit here and see a reference made which I know to be an improper reference under the rule, with no relief except what may come from the committee to which that bill has been improperly referred. I care not whether the reference results through the negligence of the officers of the House, through the design of the officers of the House, through the inadvertence of the officers of the House, it is my right and privilege to move the reference of the bill as the rules require; and, sir, that is the only point I make.

On the other hand it was urged by Mr. Carlisle:

I submit to my friend from Maryland that the phrase "integrity of its proceedings" means simply the unity, the completeness, and the truth of the proceedings of the House. When the proceedings of the House, as recorded by the Clerk under the direction of its presiding officer, do truthfully and correctly show what actually occurred, there can be no question of privilege about it.

The Speaker[1] submitted the question to the House, who decided, 135 yeas to 98 nays, to entertain the motion as a question of privilege.[2]

2603. The charge that the minority views of a committee had been abstracted from the Clerk's office by a Member was investigated as a question of privilege.—On March 3, 1863,[3] Mr. Elihu B. Washburne, of Illinois, rising to a question of privilege, charged that the minority views of the select committee on government contracts had been abstracted from the Clerk's office by a Member of the House with the connivance of a clerk in the office, and moved that a committee of three Members be appointed to investigate. This motion was agreed to and the committee were appointed; but the session and Congress ended so soon after that they did not report.

2604. The House authorized the clerk of a committee to disclose by deposition the proceedings of the committee.—On July 18, 1876,[4] Mr. Ansel T. Walling, of Ohio, from the Committee on the Public Lands, by unanimous consent, offered this resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the Committee on the Public Lands be authorized to attach to any deposition he may be required to give in the case of Hovey v. Valentine, now pending in the district court at San Francisco, Cal., a copy of the minutes of the proceedings of the Committee on the Public Lands on House bill 1024, (Forty-second Congress), for the relief of Thomas B. Valentine.

This action was taken to relieve the Clerk who had, in a court, declined to testify as to what took place in the committee, believing that he had no right to communicate what occurred in the committee.

2605. A charge of unfair and improper action on the part of a committee has been held to involve a question of privilege.—On May 24, 1882,[5]

Mr. William H. Calkins, of Indiana, claimed the floor for a question of personal privilege, and had read an article making a charge against a committee of which he was a member.

A point of order having been made that no question of privilege was involved, the Speaker[1] stated the case and his decision as follows:

The Chair always feels somewhat embarrassed in determining what constitutes a question of privilege. The matter which has been read by the Clerk, fairly analyzed, may be held to be equivalent to a statement that the case of Mackey against Dibble was not fairly heard by the committee, in this—that the evidence of fraudulent transactions in the taking of the testimony in the case was unfairly or improperly rejected by the committee. Now, if that is to be considered as a reflection upon the conduct of members of the committee or of the majority of the committee, the Chair would feel bound to hold it was a question of privilege affecting the Member's rights in his representative capacity, which any member of the committee concurring with the majority might rise for the purpose of presenting to the House; and as it is a statement made by a Member of the House, the Chair feels it to be its duty to hold that this presents a question of privilege.

2606. A committee of the House having been charged with improper conduct, a member of that committee was recognized on a question of personal privilege.—On May 24, 1882,[2] Mr. William H. Calkins, of Indiana, rising to a question of personal privilege, sent to the Clerk's desk an extract from a newspaper relating to a contested election case. It was charged in this paper that the Committee on Elections had refused to hear any testimony as to the truth of a matter pending before that committee. Mr. Calkins asserted that this charge was made by a Member from New York, Mr. Abram S. Hewitt.

Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, made the point of order that no question of privilege was involved.

After debate, the Speaker[1] said:

The Chair does not feel bound to put an absolute construction on this language, because it may be open to a different construction from that suggested; but as it is a statement alleged to have been made by a Member of the House who is present, and as there is doubt about it, the Chair feels in the present case that it must hold this to be a question of privilege and one affecting the rights of a Member in his representative capacity.

Mr. Calkins thereupon proceeded with his explanation.

2607. An allegation that a committee had refused either to give hearings or to allow petitions to be read before it was held to involve no question of privilege.—On March 12, 1888,[3] Mr. Thomas M. Bayne, of Pennsylvania, claiming the floor on a question of privilege, presented the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas it is commonly stated in the newspapers throughout the country that the Committee on Ways and Means by a majority has not only refused oral hearings to the producers, manufacturers, and workingmen of the country, but has denied to them also the right to have read before that committee their printed or written petitions in relation to the proposed changes of the tariff laws; and

Whereas the right of petition is a sacred constitutional right of the people; and

Whereas it has so long been the practice of the committees of the Senate and of the House of Representatives to freely grant opportunities to be heard by persons and interests affected by proposed legislation: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be, and it is hereby, instructed to make thorough inquiry respecting the foregoing allegations and to report the facts, with such amendment of the rules of the House as may be necessary to assure to the people the full enjoyment of their constitutional right to be heard by petition or otherwise.

Mr. William C. P. Breckinridge, of Kentucky, made the point of order that the resolution did not present a question of privilege.

After debate, the Speaker pro tempore[1] said:

The Chair would state respectfully to the House that he has the privilege, under the rules, of selecting his own time for deciding points of order. He has now heard gentlemen on both sides; he has heard them sufficiently to make the point intelligible, to his own mind, at least. The resolution introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania refers, in the first place, to an alleged refusal on the part of the Committee on Ways and Means to allow oral hearings. That is not within the purview of a question of privilege here. It is a matter entirely within the province of the committee. Next, the resolution recites that certain persons have been denied the opportunity to have read before that committee their printed or written petitions in relation to proposed changes in the tariff laws. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Bayne] takes the high constitutional ground that the right of petition has been thus invaded by this action of the Committee on Ways and Means. The right of petition is not abridged by the mode of reception of these petitions prescribed by our House rules, nor is it abridged by any denial of which the Chair is aware. That has already been decided. How, then, is the right of petition abridged? By the action of this Committee of Ways and Means in this alleged denial of the reading of the petitions? What has the committee done; and how can the House take control of this committee matter so as to regulate it either as to the mode of hearing, oral or written or otherwise? The committee has the right within itself to control it. It is not alleged that any member of the committee or of this House has been refused access to these petitions or that information in regard to their contents has been in any manner restricted. It is not a question of privilege to take that business from the committee. If it were done, the committee—in fact, all committees thus circumstanced—would be so crippled as to be practically useless.

Mr. Bayne having appealed, the appeal was laid on the table.

2608. The charge that a committee has reported a bill containing items of appropriation not in order under the rules does not present a question of privilege.—On February 22, 1897,[2] Mr. Joseph H. Walker, of Massachusetts, having claimed the floor on a question of privilege, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations were not justifind in bringing in ten items in their appropriation bill, under the laws or under the rules of the House, that were knowingly subject to the objection, under the point of order, that they were not justified by existing law.

The Speaker[3] decided that the resolution did not involve a question of privilege.

2609. A report having been ordered to be made by a committee, but not being made within a reasonable time, a resolution directing the report to be made was decided to be privileged.—On January 23, 1891,[4] Mr. George W. Cooper, of Indiana, submitted, as involving a question of privilege, this resolution:

Resolved, That the select committee having in charge the investigation of certain charges against the Commissioner of Pensions, to whom was referred, on the 4th day of September last, a preamble and resolution reciting additional misconduct and corruption in office on the part of said Commissioner, be directed to forthwith return said resolution to the House.

[4] Second session Fifty-first Congress, Journal, p. 174; Record, p. 1789.

Mr. William McKinley, jr., of Ohio, having made the point of order that the resolution did not present a question of privilege, the Speaker[1] said:

The statement made by the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Cooper, is that a committee of this House adopted a resolution to report, for reference by the House under the twenty-second rule, resolutions which had been referred to that committee in regular order. He states that a considerable length of time has elapsed since that action was taken by the committee to which the original resolution was referred, and he claims that this is a question of privilege involving the rights of the House and its method of doing business. The Chair thinks it plainly so; that the committee having ordered a report of that kind, it should have been made in a reasonable time, and that the House has a right to make inquiry into the matter and to decide what ought to be done under the circumstances.

2610. A charge that a committee had been inactive in regard to a subject committed to it was decided not to constitute a question of privilege.—On August 9, 1894,[2] Mr. James B. McCreary, of Kentucky, claimed the floor on a question of privilege to reply to remarks made by Mr. Charles A. Boutelle, of Maine, in which the latter was said to have attributed improper motives to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. George W. Fithian, of Illinois, made the point of order that no question of privilege was involved.

The Speaker[3] said:

This is no question of privilege. There is no reflection on the gentleman. If there was, it would authorize him to rise to a question of privilege. But the mere inaction of the committee, if that is the charge of the gentleman from Maine, can not constitute a question of privilege. Of course the Chair would recognize the gentleman if the question, in the judgment of the Chair, involved one of privilege; but the mere question of the action of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, or the inaction of the committee, or any other committee, in relation to the measures brought before it, the Chair does not think constitutes a question of privilege. If that were so, why of course we might discuss everything that was discussed before any of the committees of the House.

2611. The premature publication of a paper as the report of a committee was, by permission of the House investigated by that committee.—On May 25, 1876,[4] Mr. George W. Hendee, of Vermont, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, as a question of privilege, although the Journal records it as by unanimous consent, stated that a paper presented before the committee, but not adopted as its report, had been made public as the report of the committee through the "fault, neglect, or improper act of some of the officers or employees of this House or of the Government Printing Office or of said committee," and therefore asked the House to authorize the committee to inquire into the matter. The House adopted a resolution giving the required order.

2612. A question affecting the integrity of the managers of an impeachment is a matter of privilege.—On May 1, 1868,[5] Mr. James Brooks, of New York, presented a resolution and preamble reciting that a charge had been made that some of the managers of the impeachment of the President had made to him, the accused, while thus accused, a proposition that he, by the exercise of the war power, seize the island of Alta Vela, off the coast of Santo Domingo. The preamble further recited that it was important that the dignity and purity of the House be maintained through its managers, and therefore proposed a resolution to create a committee of investigation.

The Speaker[1] said:

The Chair thinks this is a question of privilege, as the rulings have been uniform that questions touching the official conduct of officers of the House are questions of privilege. The managers representing the House of course are subject to the orders of the House.

2613. A proposition to correct an error in a message to the Senate presents a question of privilege.—On August 3, 1854,[2] Mr. George S. Houston, of Alabama, called attention to the fact that in the message to the Senate concerning the action of the House on the Senate's amendments to the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill several errors had been made.

Objection being made to the consideration of the subject, Mr. Houston inquired if the matter did not constitute a question of privilege.

The Speaker[3] said:

The Chair holds that if an error has been committed by the Clerk, or in any other form, in any bill passed by the House, it is competent for the House to correct that error, and in that form it becomes a privileged question.

The Senate having acted on the bill before the House had determined as to the manner of making the corrections, they were left to the committee of conference.

2614. A motion to correct an error in referring a bill to the proper calendar presents a question of privilege.

A bill which applies to a class, and not to individuals as such, is a public bill.

On March 31, 1906,[4] Mr. Sereno E. Payne, of New York, claiming the floor for a privileged motion, said:

House bill 186, to authorize the readjustment of the accounts of army officers in certain cases, and for other purposes, relates to all the officers of the Army up to a certain date—about 1880. It is the second bill on the Private Calendar. It belongs evidently on the Union Calendar, and I move it be taken from the Private Calendar and placed upon the Union Calendar. I make that as a privileged motion

The bill was reported as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claims of officers of the United States Army, or of persons who may have served as such, and of the heirs at law or legal representatives of such as are deceased, for arrearages of longevity pay, are hereby referred to the United States Court of Claims, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon said court to render judgment in all such claims, without regard to lapse of time, for the amount, if any, found due; and in the adjustment of such claims credit shall be allowed for the full time of service as cadets in the Military Academy at West Point, and as officers or enlisted men in the Army or Navy of the United States, Regular or Volunteer, or both.

After debate the Speaker[5] said:

As the Chair understands, the gentleman from New York [Mr. Payne] moves to change this bill from the Private Calendar to the Union Calendar. The objection is made, as the Chair understands, that the motion does not present a question of privilege, and therefore is not in order. Now, Mr. Speaker Randall held, and, as the Chair thinks, correctly, that such a motion does present a question of privilege. It seems to the Chair, however, that if the bill be a private bill it is on the right calendar. If it be a public bill, then it ought to go to the Union Calendar, under the rules. The Chair has followed the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Mahon] in his citation of precedents.

Under Rule XIII there are three calendars. There is a Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, which carries bills raising revenues, general appropriation bills, and bills of a public character directly or indirectly appropriating money or property. There is a House Calendar, to which are referred all bills of a public character not raising revenue or directly or indirectly appropriating money or property. And there is a Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House to which are referred all bills of a private character. The practice is that the Journal Clerk, under the direction of the Speaker, shall refer the bills to the respective calendars as they come from the committees. In point of practice the Journal Clerk, with the assistance of the clerk at the Speaker's table, makes these references unless the matter is specifically called to the attention of the Speaker. The same principle applies in the reference of bills that are introduced by Members and come through the basket. Now, this bill when it was introduced, as the Chair finds on consulting the Journal, was referred as a public bill; but when it was reported back from the committee the Clerk placed it, as it seems to the Chair if it be a public bill, inadvertently, upon the Private Calendar. So, that after all, it becomes a question of fact whether it is a public or a private bill within the rules and precedents. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Keifer] in his statement is probably correct from the standpoint of the rules as they were prior to the Fifty-fourth Congress; but, at that time, on the suggestion of Representative Dingley to the Committee on Rules, an amendment was made to Rule XXIII, section 3, so as to add to the words "all motions or propositions involving a tax or charge upon the people," etc., "or releasing any liability to the United States for money or property," the following: "or referring any claim to the Court of Claims." The effect of this is that such bills, under the rules, go to the Committee of the Whole.

Now, as to whether it be a public or a private bill, the Chair reads from Parliamentary Precedents of the House, as follows:

"The line of distinction between public and private bills is so difficult to be defined in many cases that it must rest on the opinion of the Speaker and the details of the bill. It has been the practice in Parliament, and also in Congress, to consider as private such as are 'for the interest of individuals, public companies, or corporations, a parish, city, or county, or other locality.' To be a private bill it must not be general in its enactments, but for the particular interest or benefit of a person or persons. A pension bill for the relief of a soldier's widow is a private bill, but a bill granting pensions to such persons as a class, instead of as individuals, is a public bill," etc.

Now, treating this bill by the test, if the House will give the Chair attention, let us read it. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, in his argument, assumes that this would cover about 800 people; assumes that it is under a certain law. After all that is an assumption. It may be correct or may not, and the Chair is not informed. The bill is as follows:

"That the claims of officers of the United States Army, or of any person who may have served as such"—

So it covers persons who have served as officers, although they may not have been officers regularly—

"and of the heirs at law or legal representatives of such as are deceased, for arrearages of longevity pay, are hereby referred to the United States Court of Claims and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon said court to render judgment in all such claims, without regard to the lapse of time, for the amount, if any found due; and in the adjustment of such claims credit shall be allowed for the full time of service as cadets in the Military Academy at West Point, and as officers or enlisted men in the Army or Navy of the United States, Regular or Volunteer, or both."

Now, this bill not only refers the cases to the Court of Claims, but it legislates, removing the statute of limitations upon all claims, if such exist, from the organization of the Government to the present time. As a matter of fact, whether such claims are in existence in the hands of assignees or administrators the Chair is not informed. The Chair only knows of this bill upon its face. Nor does it apply in its terms to claims on file, if they be on file in the Treasury Department. It would cover claims, if such exist, although they may never have been filed or made under the provisions of the bill. It is not like unto the case where legislation was had for the relief of a battalion, mentioning the battalion, because there was a roster, a specific number of people to be covered by the bill. This bill relates to a class; it legislates; it removes the statute of limitations; it counts services in the Militia, as well as in the Regular Army; it covers officers who were never mustered in, if they acted as officers. It seems to the Chair that if this is not a public bill, it would be difficult to conceive of one, and therefore the Chair thinks the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Payne] is in order.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to change the reference from the Private Calendar to the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion of Mr. Payne was agreed to, ayes 62, noes 37.

2615. On February 18, 1889,[1] Mr. William H. Hatch, of Missouri, raised the question that the bill (H. R. 11027) defining "lard," etc., reported from the Committee on Agriculture, had been referred to the House Calendar, when it should have been sent to the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.[2] Therefore, as a matter of privilege, he moved the correction of the reference, and that the bill take the same place on the proper Calendar that it would have had had it been correctly referred at first.

Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, made the point of order that such motion did not present a privileged question and was not in order for consideration at this time.

The Speaker[3] said:

The question arose in the Forty-sixth Congress as to whether it was a matter of privilege to correct an erroneous reference to a committee, and the then occupant of the chair decided that it was, and the House sustained the decision.[4] Since that time two or three questions of a similar character have arisen in the House, and have been decided in the same way. The Chair thinks that an erroneous reference of a bill to one of the Calendars of the House stands upon the same footing. It involves simply carrying out the rules of the House, and therefore the Chair thinks that the presentation of the question is a matter of privilege, but it is not the province of the Chair to correct the error by referring it to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. It is for the House to say whether it will or will not do so. The gentleman from Missouri moves that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, as of the date July 28, 1888, when the House made the improper order, and the Chair puts that question to the House.

2616. A mere clerical error in the Calendar does not give rise to a question of privilege.—On April 13, 1876,[5] Mr. Thomas L. Jones, of Kentucky, claiming the floor for a question of privilege, stated that the calendar was in error in recording a certain bill as a special order for one date, when in fact it had been made a special order for another date.

The Speaker[6] said:

That is not a question of privilege. The Journal is correct, and as that and not the Calendar will guide the action of the House, the error in the Calendar will not cause any difficulty.

2617. A question as to the constitutionality and propriety of a continuing order of arrest was held not to supersede a motion to discharge the Sergeant-at-Arms from further execution of the order.—On April 17,

[5] First session Forty-fourth Congress, Record, p. 2457.

[6] Michael C. Kerr, of Indiana, Speaker.

1894,[1] after the Journals of two preceding days had been approved, the Speaker stated that the question first in order would be on the motion of Mr. William M. Springer, of Illinois, to discharge the Sergeant-at-Arms from the further execution of the warrant of the 29th ultimo against absent Members, upon which motion the previous question had been demanded and the yeas and nays ordered on said demand.

Mr. Thomas B. Reed, of Maine, thereupon, as involving a question of privilege, submitted the following resolution:

Whereas the continuing order sought to be dispensed with is contrary to the Constitution and rules of the House, the same is hereby declared void.

After debate on the question of order, the Speaker[2] held as follows:

The Chair can not see that the question presented by the gentleman from Maine is one of superior privilege to the pending question, because it must be borne in mind that the pending question is to discharge a warrant for the arrest of certain Members. The question of the gentleman from Maine raises the question of the legality of the warrant. Now, the Chair can not see that that question ought to take precedence of the question of the discharge of a Member from custody or of a warant for his arrest.

Therefore the Chair thinks the proposition presented by the gentleman from Maine does not in its present status take any priority of or supersede the pending proposition, and can not now be considered.

2618. The Sergeant-at-Arms having made no report of his execution of an order of arrest, and no excessive delay appearing, a motion summoning him to report was held not to be of privilege.—On February 8, 1894,[3] Mr. Thomas B. Reed, of Maine, as a matter of privilege, moved that the Sergeant-at-Arms be summoned to the bar of the House to make report of his action upon the order to take absent Members into custody, made by the House just before adjournment on the preceding day.

Mr. Richard P. Bland, of Missouri, made the point that the motion of Mr. Reed was not privileged and not in order.

The Speaker[2] sustained the point of order, saying, in the course of his ruling:

There has been no report from the Sergeant-at-Arms, anb, so far as the Chair knows, no Member has been arrested, so that it seems to the Chair it certainly must be in the power of the House to ge on with the transaction of its business until some report is made from the Sergeant-at-Arms. The Chair has no doubt that when that report is made the House will proceed at once to consider it, becaust it would present a question of high privilege, relating to the right of the House to punish its absent Members.

2619. An alleged error in the Congressional Directory relating to the representation of a district in the next Congress does not present a question of privilege.—On February 21, 1893,[4] Mr. J. Logan Chipman, of Michigan, submitted as a privileged proposition the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be directed to ascertain by what authority the editor of the Congressional Directory, in the edition published February 10, instant, inserted the name of Charles B. Belknap in the list of Members-elect to the Fifty-third Congress as a Representative-elect from the Fifth Congressional district of Michigan.

Mr. William J. Bryan, of Nebraska, made the point of order that the resolution did not present a privileged question.

The Speaker[1] sustained the point of order.

2620. The House having approved the Journal of the preceding day, a resolution to correct an alleged error in a vote of that day, which had been discussed before the vote of approval, was held not to be of privilege.

Instance wherein the House declined to permit a change in the Journal record of persons noted as present and not voting, on the statement of certain ones, not numerous enough to change the result, that they had been improperly noted.

On February 20, 1891,[2] the question was taken on ordering the previous question on a resolution reported from the Committee on Rules, when the Speaker announced yeas 150, nays 8, noted as present and not voting 35—in all 193, a quorum being 165.

Among those noted as present and not voting was Mr. Charles J. Boatner, of Louisiana. Mr. Benton McMillin, of Tennessee, raised the question that Mr. Boatner had not in fact been present; but another Member, Mr. Thomas M. Bayne, of Pennsylvania, stated that he had seen Mr. Boatner in the Hall.

On February 21,[3] when the Journal had been read for approval, four of those noted as present (Mr. Boatner not being one of the four) arose in yielded time and claimed that they had not been properly noted as present, since they had left the Hall before the time arrived when they might be noted properly.

But they were not permitted to move a correction of the Journal, the previous question being ordered by yeas 155, nays 113, on motion of the Member having the floor. Then the Journal was approved, yeas 150, nays 95.

Immediately after the approval of the Journal, Mr. William M. Springer, of Illinois, proposed to offer as a question of privilege a resolution as follows:

Whereas the Speaker of the House on yesterday directed the Clerk to announce and record as present Mr. Boatner, of Louisiana, on the statement of the Clerk that he passed between the tellers on the demand for yeas and nays;

Whereas Mr. Boatner was not in the,Hall of the House during the taking of the vote by yeas and nays on the pending proposition: Therefore,

Resolved, That the recording of Mr. Boatner as present and not voting at that time was contrary to the facts and in violation of the rules of the House.

Mr. William McKinley, jr., of Ohio, made the point of order that the preamble and resolution did not present a privileged question, and was therefore not in order.

The Speaker[4] pro tempore said:

In the judgment of the Chair, a question of privilege is not presented by this resolution because of the fact that, after the reading of the Journal by the Clerk, after debate had upon the motion made by the gentleman from Ohio that the Journal be approved, and after the previous question had been ordered, the House by a vote of 150 to 95 approved the Journal, which involved the method in which a quorum was secured, and the evidence of the fact, the action of the House, concludes the question. The Chair is of opinion that no question of privilege is presented because of the action of the House upon the Journal itself; and therefore the point of order made by the gentleman from Ohio is sustained.

Mr. Springer having appealed, the appeal was laid on the table by a vote of 145 yeas to 98 nays.

2621. A rule giving the Speaker power to hold as dilatory certain motions, a resolution condemning his action thereunder was not admitted as a question of privilege.

Instance wherein the Speaker retained the Chair and ruled as to a resolution which in effect proposed a censure of a decision made by himself as Speaker.

On January 27, 1891,[1] Mr. William M. Springer, of Illinois, on the ground of its being a privileged question, submitted the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas during yesterday's session of the House, when a vote by yeas and nays had been ordered upon the previous question on the motion to approve the Journal, and the yeas and nays had been called, the recapitulation of said vote was dispensed with without the request for the consent of the House; and upon the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Bland] and the demand of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Tracey] for a recapitulation of the vote, the Speaker declined to order a recapitulation; and an appeal from this decision being made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Bland], the Speaker declined to entertain the appeal: Therefore,

Resolved, That this action on the part of the Speaker was unlawful; that to permit it to go uncondemned by the House would be to permit a precedent to stand, with apparent approval, that impairs the right and dignity of the House and that is inconsistent with a proper evidence of the integrity of its proceedings.

Mr. William McKinley, jr., of Ohio, made the point of order that the resolution did not present a question of privilege, since the Speaker distinctly made the ruling upon the ground that the motion was dilatory, and also because there was no rule which required the recapitulation of the yeas and nays.

After debate the Speaker[2] said:

The Chair does not think that the action of the Chair under the rules of the House in deciding motions to be out of order, on the ground that they are dilatory, can be made a question of privilege. If they could be, the sole purpose of the rule in giving to the Chair the power to put an end to dilatory motions would be nugatory. The Chair thinks, therefore, that it is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Springer having appealed from the decision of the Chair, the appeal was laid on the table by a vote of 139 yeas to 105 nays, and so the Chair was sustained.

2622. A proposition that the House cooperate with the Senate in the conduct of the ceremonies of the President's inauguration was held not to present a question of privilege.—On February 28, 1885,[3] Mr. Roger Q. Mills, of Texas, offered, as a question of the highest privilege:

Resolved, That the Speaker appoint a committee of three Members of the House to cooperate with the committee appointed by the Senate to take charge of the arrangements for the inaugural ceremonies at the Capitol on the 4th of March.

[3] Second session Forty-eighth Congress, Record, p. 2301.

Mr. Richard W. Townsend, of Illinois, having made the point of order that the resolution was not a question of privilege, the Speaker[1] ruled:

The Chair does not see that the resolution involves any matter of privilege. It does not relate to the legislative proceedings of the House or its duties under the Constitution.

2623. A Member having announced his intention to publish in the Record certain extracts, but not having obtained leave of the House, the refusal of the proposed insertion violates no privilege.—On September 27, 1893,[2] Mr. Elijah A. Morse, of Massachusetts, stated, as involving a question of privilege, that on the 25th instant, in the course of his remarks, he had announced that he would incorporate in his remarks certain newspaper extracts; that objection was not made thereto at the time, but that no leave to insert the extracts had been granted by the House. The proposed insertions had been denied publication in the Record. He asked that they be printed with his remarks in the Record.

The Speaker[3] held that no question of privilege had been presented and that a Member had no right to have printed with or appended to his remarks any matter not actually delivered unless the express consent of the House thereto be given.

Mr. William M. Springer, of Illinois, submitted the question of order, whether the business first in order was not the resolution of inquiry reported as a privileged matter and pending when the House adjourned on the previous day.

The Speaker held that, inasmuch as the previous question had not been ordered on the resolution, it did not come up as the regular order of business until called up.

2624. An alleged violation of the rule relating to admission to the floor presents a question of privilege.—On March 1, 1886,[4] Mr. Lewis Beach, of New York, presented this resolution:

Whereas it is asserted in the public press that Rule XXXIV,[5] regulating admission to the floor of the House, is being violated: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be instructed to inquire into the facts, and report as to the truth or falsity of the said charges and what remedy, if any, is necessary to secure a strict enforcement of the rule.

Mr. Richard P. Bland, of Missouri, made the point of order that the resolution was not in order.

The Speaker[1] said:

The Chair thinks this presents a question of privilege.

2625. A resolution relating to an alleged abuse of the privileges of the floor presents a question of privilege.—On March 1, 1886,[6] Mr. Lewis Beach, of New York, rising to a question of privilege, sent to the Clerk's desk to be read an article from a newspaper. During the reading, the point being made that a question of privilege had not been developed, the Speaker[1] said:

[2] First session Fifty-third Congress, Journal, p. 114.

[3] Charles F. Crisp, of Georgia, Speaker.

[4] First session Forty-ninth Congress, Record, p. 1905; Journal, p. 781.

[5] For this rule see section 7283 of Volume V of this work.

[6] First session Forty-ninth Congress, Journal, p. 781; Record, p. 1905.

The Chair thinks, under the rulings made heretofore, that a proposition must be presented to the House in a case when a gentleman rises to a question of privilege which he states involves the dignity of the House or the integrity of its proceedings, and then the gentleman can support his proposition by any argument, or having anything read which he chooses in his own time, provided it is pertinent.

Mr. Beach then presented the following:

Whereas it is asserted in the public press that Rule XXXIV, regulating admission to the floor of the House, is being violated: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be instructed to inquire into the facts, and report as to the turth or falsity of the said charges, and what remedy, if any, is necessary to secure a strict enforcement of the rule.

Mr. Richard P. Bland, of Missouri, made the point of order that the preamble and resolution were not in order for present consideration.

The Speaker overruled the point of order and held that they presented a question of privilege.

2626. A resolution relating to an alleged abuse of the privileges of the floor does not present a question of higher privilege than an election case.—On May 22, 1884,[1] during the consideration of the contested election case of English v. Peelle, the previous question having been ordered on the resolution and pending substitute, Mr. Thomas M. Bayne, of Pennsylvania, presented the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be, and it is hereby, instructed to inquire and report to this House whether or not Hon. William H. English, an ex-Member of this House, has violated the privileges thereof in the contested election case of English v. Peelle.

Mr. Richard P. Bland, of Missouri, made the point of order that the resolution was not in order while a contested election case was pending, which was of higher privilege.

The Speaker[2] said:

While this resolution presents a matter of privilege, the Chair does not think it is a matter of higher privilege than the question of the right of a Member to a seat on the floor. The Chair thinks that except by consent it could not be introduced during the pendency of a contested election case.

2627. Alleged misconduct of an occupant of the press gallery, although occurring during a former Congress, brought before the House as a matter of privilege.—On January 29, 1884,[3] Mr. James H. Hopkins, of Pennsylvania, submitted the following as a privileged resolution:

Whereas Hon. J. Warren Keifer, a Member of this House, has charged H. V. Boynton, the Washington correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial-Gazette, now holding a seat in the press gallery under the rules of the House, with having approached the Speaker of the House during the closing days of the last session of Congress with corrupt propositions intended to influence his official action; and

Whereas this alleged act is in the nature of a gross breach of the privileges of the House, and the charge if sustained would call for the exclusion of the said H. V. Boynton from the press gallery; therefore,

Be it resolved, That a special committee of five Members of this House be appointed by the Speaker with power to send for persons and papers and administer oaths, to investigate the said charge of attempted corruption, and to report the results of this investigation to the House.

[2] John G. Carlisle, of Kentucky, Speaker.

[3] First session Forty-eighth Congress, Journal, p. 444; Record, p. 741.

Mr. William H. Calkins, of Indiana, made the point that it was a matter of privilege for the last and not for the present House.

The Speaker[1] ruled:

The Chair is called upon to determine whether this is or is not a question of privilege under the rules or under the general parliamentary law.[2] The preamble alleges that a person who is now occupying the gallery of the House by the permission of the House has made an improper proposition to a Member, not during the present session, but during the last session. Of course it is well known to the Chair and to every Member on the floor that no person can occupy a seat in that gallery without signing a statement or pledge that he is not interested in any legislation pending before the House. It does seem to the Chair that if there is any person occupying a seat in that gallery who has at any time, in violation of that pledge, made improper proposals to a Member of the House, it is not only the right but the duty of the House to investigate the matter, with a view of protecting the integrity of its own proceedings and denying to that person hereafter the privileges of the gallery. The Chair is therefore disposed to hold and does hold that this is a matter of privilege.

2628. A newspaper charge that an officer of the House had conspired to influence legislation was considered as a question of privilege.—On April 26, 1876,[3] Mr. John D. White, of Kentucky, submitted as a question of privilege a preamble and resolution reciting an allegation from a newspaper charging that the Clerk of the House and some of his subordinates had conspired to prevent retrenchment of expenditures, and directing the Committee on Rules to investigate the charges and make report thereon.

Mr. William M. Springer, of Illinois, made the point of order that the resolution did not involve a question of privilege.

The Speaker[4] overruled the point of order on the ground that the resolution, though going to the verge to which any matter of privilege of a Member of the House should go, involved enough of substance in its connection with the House and legislation to bring it within the rule and definition of a question of privilege.

2629. A resolution from the Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics relating to the comfort of Members in the Hall was received as a question of privilege.—On June 8, 1894,[5] Mr. George W. Shell, of South Carolina, from the Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics, presented for consideration as involving a question of privilege the resolution (Mis. Doc. 162) reported by him on the preceding day:

Resolved, That the Architect of the Capitol is hereby authorized to employ for the balance of this session an assistant engineer at the rate of $100 per month, and three additional laborers at $60 per month each, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House; and the Clerk of the House is hereby directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House the sum of $20 for incidental expenses of the Architect's office, and the sum of $400 for additional coal for the use of the same.

Mr. William S. Holman, of Indiana, made the point of order that the resolution should receive its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

The Speaker sustained the point of order.

[4] Michael C. Kerr, of Indiana, Speaker.

[5] Second session Fifty-third Congress, Journal, p. 421; Record, pp. 5924, 5989.

The record of the debate shows that the resolution was called up as a question of privilege, the subject relating to the health of Members, and was admitted to consideration as such.

2630. A proposition relating to the comfort or convenience of Members is presented as a question of privilege.—On December 10, 1880,[1] Mr. Speaker Randall intimated that he considered a proposition relating to the construction of a proposed elevator for the House to be a question of privilege, since it related to the convenience of the House.

2631. On December 14, 1883,[2] Mr. Richard W. Townshend, of Illinois, proposed a resolution providing for the removal of the desks from the hall.

A point of order being made against the resolution by Mr. William H. Calkins, of Indiana, the Speaker[3] said:

> It was decided by Mr. Speaker Blaine in the Forty-second Congress that all matters relating to the arrangement of the hall and the convenience of Members were to be considered and treated as matters of privilege, and a similar ruling was made by Mr. Speaker Keifer in the last Congress.

Accordingly the resolution was admitted.

2632. A subject relating to the convenience of Members and comfort of employees presents a question of privilege.—On June 13, 1882,[4] Mr. John H. Brewer, of New Jersey, called up a report of the Select Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics[5] in relation to the unhealthfulness of the folding room of the House of Representatives.

Mr. Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois, objected to its consideration.

The Speaker[6] held the report to be of a privileged character on the ground that the committee had been specially directed to consider the subject-matter of the resolution submitted, and report their conclusions thereon to the House, and although authority had not been specially given to that committee to report at any time, it was still the duty of the committee to report at as early a day as practicable, and having so reported, their report was properly before the House; and also on the further ground that the pending resolution related to the convenience of Members and comfort of the employees of the House.

2633. A resolution reported from the Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics and relating to the sanitary conditions surrounding certain employees, was held to be privileged.—On June 13, 1882,[7] Mr. John H. Brewer, of New Jersey, called up the report[8] of the Select Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics, which had come over from the preceding day with a question as to whether or not it involved a question of privilege.

[7] First session Forty-seventh Congress, Record, pp. 4846, 4852.

[8] The report was in response to a resolution directing an investigation of the sanitary condition of the House folding room.

Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, having renewed the question of order, the Speaker [1] said:

The Chair wishes to state that under the resolution which passed the House ordering this committee to investigate this subject it was required by the terms of that resolution that the committee report to the House; and while it does not specify it should report at any time, yet in view of the fact that it relates to the convenience of the employees of the House and is necessarily connected with the business of the House, the Chair is inclined to hold to-day that it is a privileged matter.

2634. A resolution relating to the dismissal of an employee was held not to involve a question of privilege.—On February 11, 1884,[2] Mr. John D. White, of Kentucky, claiming the floor for a question of privilege, presented a resolution instructing the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service to inquire into the cause of the removal of William H. Smith, librarian of the House of Representatives, and directing it to report on what changes might be necessary to protect employees of the House from dismissal.

Mr. Philip B. Thompson, jr., of Kentucky, made the point of order that no question of privilege was involved.

The Speaker [3] said:

The Chair does not think this resolution comes within any definition of a privileged matter given in the rules or the general parliamentary law of the country.

2635. Subjects relating to the convenience of Members are not necessarily entertained as matters of privilege.—On November 19, 1903,[4] Mr. Charles Q. Hildebrandt, of Ohio, offered as a question of privilege the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed to employ an additional laborer in the bathroom during the remainder of the present fiscal year, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the rate of $60 per month.

The Speaker [5] declining to entertain it as a question of privilege, it was submitted by unanimous consent.

2636. A resolution from the Committee on Accounts relating to the management of the House restaurant was not received as a matter of privilege.—On April 25, 1904,[6] Mr. Joseph V. Graff, of Illinois, claiming the floor for a privileged matter, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the superintendent of the Capitol building and grounds shall, under the direction of the Speaker of the House, make such alterations of the rooms now used as a restaurant as to provide facilities for luncheon rooms for the Members, Delegates, and officers of the House, and for the employees of the House and the public. And the privilege of conducting said luncheon rooms shall be granted by the Speaker of the House to such person or persons as he shall select, who shall be subject to removal by him and who shall be governed by such rules for the conduct of said luncheon rooms as he may prescribe: Provided, That in no sense shall it be understood that the practical management of the House luncheon rooms is hereby assumed by the House.

The Speaker[1] did not entertain the resolution as one involving the privileges of the House, but admitted it after asking the unanimous consent of the House.

The resolution was agreed to.

2637. The publication by a Member of alleged false and scandalous charges against the House and its Members, which he also reiterated in debate, was held to involve a question of privilege.

The House took action as to a Member who reiterated on the floor certain published charges against the House, although other business had intervened.

Instance wherein testimony taken before a Committee and relating to the conduct of a Member was not reported to the House at once.

On July 29, 1892,[2] Mr. Charles J. Boatner, of Louisiana, as a matter of privilege, submitted the following resolution, and demanded immediate consideration thereof, to wit:

Whereas on page 216 of a book purporting to have been written by Thomas E. Watson, of Georgia, a Member of the House of Representatives, the following charge appears:

" Drunken Members have reeled about the aisles, a disgrace to the Republic. Drunken speakers have debated grave issues on the floor, and in the midst of maudlin ramblings have been heard to ask: 'Mr. Speaker, where was I at?' " and

Whereas the publication of such charges, if untrue, is a grave wrong to this body, and if true the responsibility should be placed where it belongs; and

Whereas the said Watson has reiterated the same on the floor of the House: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the House, That a committee of five Members be appointed by the Speaker to investigate and report to the House whether such charges are true, and, if untrue, whether the said Watson has violated the privileges of the House and their recommendations relative to the same. That said committee have leave to sit during the sessions of the House, to send for persons and papers, to swear witnesses, and to compel their attendance.

Mr. Thomas B. Reed, of Maine, submitted the question of order, whether, the House having failed to take action respecting the remarks of Mr. Watson at the time he reiterated the charges on the floor of the House, and having passed to other business, it was not now too late to hold him to account therefor.

Mr. Louis E. Atkinson, of Pennsylvania, made the further point of order that the pending business before the House was a conference report, which was itself a matter of the highest privilege.

The Speaker[3] held that the resolution submitted by Mr. Boatner presented a question of privilege, and that whenever the Speaker is of opinion that a question of privilege is involved in a proposition, he must entertain it in preference to any other business.

The Speaker also held that the pending business was the amendments of the Senate to the bill H. R. 752, and that no conference report was pending. Both points of order were therefore overruled.

On August 8, 1892,[4] Mr. Boatner submitted the report[5] of the select committee authorized by the adoption of the resolution, and of which he had been made chairman.

[5] Report No. 2132.

This report stated that the committee summoned Mr. Watson and such witnesses as he indicated, and very soon the fact was developed that the charge as to drunken speakers referred to Mr. J. E. Cobb, of Alabama. The committee thereupon went on and examined testimony as to Mr. Cobb, no point of order being made that the testimony implicating a Member should first be reported to the House.

The committee concluded that the charge was a libel upon the membership, and recommended the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the charges made by Thomas E. Watson in his book against the House of Representatives, viz, "that drunken Members have reeled about the aisles, a disgrace to the Republic," and "drunken Members have debated grave issues on the floor," etc., are not true, and constitute an unwarranted assault upon the honor and dignity of the House, and that such publication has the unqualified disapproval of the House.

This report was made in the last hours of the session and does not appear to have been acted on.

2638. General charges that attempts are being made through public sentiment to influence the House do not give rise to a question of privilege.—On March 11, 1902,[1] Mr. John R. Thayer, of Massachusetts, claimed the floor to offer, as involving a question of privilege, the following:

Whereas it has been currently reported in many reputable newspapers, and by many Republican Members of this House, that in the event of a reduction of the duty on sugar imported from Cuba the American Sugar Refinery, commonly known as the "sugar trust," will be the chief beneficiary; and

Whereas it has been currently reported from reliable sources that the entire crop of Cuban sugar has already been purchased from the Cubans at ruinously low prices by the said sugar trust, and is only awaiting shipment until a reduction of the duty on the same can be secured through the action of Congress, and that any concessions intended to be for the alleviation of the deplorable condition of the Cubans by admitting their sugar this year at reduced rates of duty will serve only to benefit the sugar trust, and that the Cubans will receive no benefit whatever from it; and

Whereas it has been currently alleged by many reputable newspapers that the American Sugar Refinery Company (commonly known as the "sugar trust") has, by subsidizing the press, establishing literary bureaus, and by spending large sums of money, and in other ways attempted to create a public sentiment in favor of a radical reduction of the tariff on sugar imported from Cuba; and

Whereas it is due to the dignity of this House that the truth or falsity of these charges should be clearly established before the House proceeds to a consideration of the question of reducing the duty on sugar imported from Cuba, as recommended by the President of the United States in his annual message to Congress: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That a special committee of seven Members of this House be appointed by the Speaker to investigate the subject-matter of this resolution.

Mr. Eugene F. Loud, of California, raised the question of order that no question of privilege was presented.

The Speaker[2] sustained the point of order.

Mr. Thayer having appealed, the House, on motion of Mr. Sereno E. Payne, of New York, laid the appeal on the table by a vote of yeas 125, nays 87.

2639. A newspaper article making general charges concerning the proceedings of the House was held not to involve a question of privilege.—

[1] First session Fifty-seventh Congress, Record, p. 2639.

[2] David B. Henderson, of Iowa, Speaker.

On April 21, 1868,[1] Mr. Charles E. Phelps, of Maryland, offered, as a question of privilege, the following:

Whereas there appeared in the Baltimore American newspaper of the 15th of April, 1868, the following paragraph:

"GENERAL SHERMAN BEFORE THE MANAGERS.

"Lieutenant-General Sherman was before the impeachment managers for a considerable time and was very minutely examined in relation to his interviews with the President at the time of the proffer of the War Department to him. It is understood that the declination of General Butler to proceed with the cross-examination of General Sherman yesterday was in view of this preliminary examination of General Sherman this morning."

And whereas "false and scandalous reports of proceedings in this House," "charges affecting the official character of its Members," and "alleged combinations on the part of certain Members," as questions of high privilege, demand that such indecent imputations as are contained in the above-recited paragraph upon the official conduct of the honorable managers appointed by the House of Representatives to conduct the trial of the impeachment of the President at the bar of the Senate of the United States should not be promulgated without proper action on the part of this House to vindicate the reputation of its officers and its own dignity:

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to inquire into the truth or falsity of the imputations conveyed in the above-recited paragraph, with power to send for persons and papers and to report what action, if any, should further be taken in the premises.

Mr. Elihu B. Washburne, of Illinois, made the point of order that this did not involve a question of privilege.

The Speaker[2] said:

The Chair will rule that this is not a question of privilege, and will state his reasons. Although the gentleman from Maryland has noted upon his resolution references to the Digest, which relate to questions of privilege, if he will examine the authorities there quoted he will find that the charges are not to be general charges. If a charge is made by a newspaper affecting the official character of a Member of this House, that would be a question of privilege. If an attack should be made by the Public Printer, and, the Chair would add, by the publisher of any paper, in an article alleged to be for the purpose of inciting unlawful violence among Members, that would be a privileged question, because relating to the privileges of the House. If alleged corrupt combinations on the part of certain Members were presented, those would be questions of privilege. But the corrupt combinations must be charged, and the statement of the corrupt combination must be incorporated in the resolution. In the extract which the gentleman has quoted in his resolution * * * the Chair is unable to see how, even by the utmost stretching of the rule that could be construed into a question of privilege. * * * If this proposition could be entertained as a question of privilege, the House of Representatives would or could have resolutions upon questions of privilege before them every day, because probably not a day elapses without some newspaper in the country making a general charge against the Congress of the United States or some of its Members. These charges must be specific charges. A general charge that some conduct has been scandalous and unjust, the Chair will rule is not a question of privilege, unless the gentleman from Maryland desires to have that question submitted to the House.

Mr. Phelps having asked the decision of the House, the question was put, Will the House entertain the same as a question of privilege? and decided in the negative.

2640. The House ordered the investigation, as a question of privilege, of a newspaper report of certain proceedings of the House.—On February 8, 1847,[3] Mr. Stephen A. Douglas, of Illinois, offered the following resolution as a question of privilege, and it was entertained as such without question:

---

[1] Second session Fortieth Congress, Journal, p. 632; Globe, p. 2320.

[2] Schuyler Colfax, of Indiana, Speaker.

[3] Second session Twenty-ninth Congress, Journal, pp. 311-313, 353; Globe, pp. 349-352, 426.

Resolved, That a committee of five Members be appointed to examine into the truth of the report of the Union of the 6th instant, in regard to the proceedings of the House and of the Committee of the Whole, on Saturday last, on the bill for the relief of Thomas Wishart, and to ascertain who the reporter was and what Members were engaged in creating disorder in the House and in the committee, and report thereon, with the names of such reporter and Members; and for the purposes of such examination said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers.

This resolution having been agreed to, yeas 128, nays 64, the Speaker appointed Messrs. Douglas; Andrew Kennedy, of Indiana; Thomas H. Bayly, of Virginia; David Wilmot, of Pennsylvania; and Andrew Trumbo, of Kentucky, the committee.

On February 15 Mr. Douglas reported from the committee that they had found the investigation would require more time than could be obtained so near the end of the session, and asking that they be discharged from further consideration of the subject. Such a motion was made and agreed to.[1]

2641. The publication by the Public Printer of an article alleged to be for the purpose of exciting unlawful violence among Members has been considered a matter of privilege.

The Speaker may pass on a question presented as of privilege instead of submitting it directly to the House.

On June 8, 1854,[2] Mr. Joshua R. Giddings, of Ohio, submitted, as a question of privilege, the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas A. O. P. Nicholson, esq., printer to this body,[3] editor and proprietor of the Washington Union, in his paper of this morning has published an article most evidently designed to excite unlawful violence upon Members of this body: Therefore,

Resolved, That said A. O. P. Nicholson, and all other persons connected with the Washington Union, be expelled from this House.

Upon the presentation of these resolutions a suggestion was at first made that questions of privilege had heretofore been referred to the judgment of the House.

The Speaker[4] at first acquiesced in this view, but afterwards determined that there was involved in the resolution a question of privilege, and that the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Giddings, had a right to move to expel from the Hall any officer of the House. * * * The editor or editors of the Union had the privilege of the Hall, but they had not the privilege of the floor. That paper had a number of reporters here, and they were here by law of the House and under the direction of the Speaker. The gentleman proposed to expel them all, editors and reporters. The Chair was of the opinion that the question was a privileged one, and so decided. * * * Mr. A. O. P. Nicholson was entitled, under an express law of the House, to the privilege of the Hall as an ex-Senator of the United States. He was named in the resolution.

The resolution proposed by Mr. Giddings was not agreed to by the House.

[1] At about this time a similar resolution in the Senate caused a long debate on the freedom of the press. The resolution excluded the editors of the Union from the floor for "uttering a public libel upon the character of this body." (Globe, pp. 392, 406–417.)

2642. An alleged offense against the dignity of the House and the participation of a Member therein was held to constitute a question of privilege.

Early instance wherein the Speaker and not the House decided whether or not a question was one of privilege.

On April 27, 1846,[1] Mr. Robert C. Schenck, of Ohio, offered as a question of privilege a preamble and resolution reciting that the President, in response to a resolution of the House, had declined to disclose in regard to the use of the secret-service fund of the State Department during the Oregon boundary negotiations, and that Charles Jared Ingersoll, a Member from Pennsylvania, had averred that he had procured such information from the Department of State, and therefore resolving that a committee of five be appointed to ascertain how Mr. Ingersoll got his information, whether by his own act or by the act of "any officer of any Department of this Government."

The Speaker[2] decided that the resolution did not involve a question touching the privileges of this House or any of its Members.

Mr. Schenck modified his resolution by inserting after the word "Government," where it last occurs, the following:

> And if by a Member, then whether he does not deserve by such conduct punishment by the House, and whether, in such transaction, there has been an offense committed against the dignity and privileges of the House.

The Speaker decided that the resolution, as modified, involved a question touching the privileges of this House and must be entertained in preference to any other business.

2643. A proposition to investigate alleged unnecessary violence of policemen toward citizens on the Capitol grounds was ruled not to present a question of privilege.—On May 2, 1894,[3] Mr. Tom L. Johnson, of Ohio, submitted, as presenting a question of privilege, the following preamble and resolution:

> Whereas it is well known that the Capitol grounds were, on May 1, overrun by a large assemblage of people, including a considerable number of the regular and special police of this District; and
> Whereas it is publicly stated that the safety of the Members of this House has been endangered, thereby making it necessary for the House to rely upon the clubs of policemen for their protection:
> Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire into the question as to whether unnecessary force was used, whether unoffending citizens were cruelly beaten, and whether the dignity of this House has been violated; that the said committee have the power to send for persons and papers, and report the facts in connection with the subject, with their recommendations as to whether any legislation is necessary in the premises.

Mr. Joseph H. Outhwaite, of Ohio, made the point of order that no question of privilege was presented in said resolution.

After debate the Speaker[4] sustained the point of order, holding that the resolution did not present a question of privilege.

2644. A charge affecting the character of an elected officer of the House was held to involve a question of privilege.

The office of Journal Clerk and its requirements. (Footnote.)

On May 13, 1876,[1] Mr. John D. White, of Kentucky, as a question of privilege, submitted the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas the following articles which affect the character of an officer of this House have appeared in the public print [the articles were not read]: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be, and they are hereby, directed to inquire into the charges publicly made against L. H. Fitzhugh, Doorkeeper of the House, and report, by resolution or otherwise, whether there is anything in said charges that would render him an improper person to be an officer of this House; and that they be further directed to inquire into the propriety of abolishing the office of Doorkeeper and requiring the duties of said office to be performed by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, raised the point of order that as the articles read did not affect or relate to the privileges of a Member it was not a question of privilege.

The Speaker pro tempore[2] overruled the point of order, holding that any matter affecting the character of an officer of the House was a question of privilege.

In this decision the House acquiesced.[3]

2645. The request of an officer of the House for an investigation of newspaper charges against his administration is presented as a question of privilege.—On December 10, 1867,[4] Mr. William B. Allison, of Iowa, presented a communication from the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House asking for an investigation of his administration of his office, certain charges reflecting on his official integrity having been made in certain newspapers.

Mr. Lewis W. Ross, of Illinois, raised a question as to whether or not the communication was privileged.

The Speaker[5] said:

The Chair thinks that this is a question of privilege, as it involves a question concerning the fidelity of one of the officers of the House.

2646. A resolution for the investigation of the conduct of an employee of the House may be presented as a matter of privilege.—On January 8, 1883,[6] Mr. Thompson H. Murch, of Maine, submitted the following as a question of privilege:

Whereas it has been asserted on the floor of this House that John Bailey, chief clerk, is an officer and large stockholder of the Washington Gaslight Company, and has been retained in the Clerk's office of the House for many years past through the influence of said company in order to advise it of what was going on in Congress affecting its interests and to assist in procuring favorable legislation for said company; and [3] On April 15, 1876 (First session Forty-fourth Congress, Journal, p. 806; Record, pp. 2480, 2655), a question as to the conduct of the Journal Clerk of the House was presented as a question of privilege apparently, although Record and Journal do not agree on this point. On April 20 the Committee on Rules, after investigating the charges, made a report which dwells at length upon the necessity of competency and integrity on the part of that officer.

Whereas the same charge has been heretofore made in the public press: Therefore,

Resolved, That a select committee of five Members be appointed, whose duty it shall be to thoroughly investigate said charges; and said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, and shall have leave to report at any time.

Mr. George M. Robeson, of New Jersey, made the point of order that the preamble and resolution did not involve a question of privilege.

After debate the point of order was withdrawn, and the resolution was agreed to.

On January 13, Mr. Murch, also as a question of privilege, introduced and the House agreed to a resolution instructing the committee to inquire "whether said Bailey has at any time attempted to influence legislation in this House for the benefit of the Washington Gaslight Company."[1]

2647. A proposition to investigate the conduct of certain officers of the House while they were officers of the preceding House was presented as a matter of privilege.—On March 16, 1886,[2] Mr. Thomas M. Browne, of Indiana, presented a preamble reciting that the charge had been made that certain officers of the preceding House had in that Congress exacted a sum of money on pretense of influencing the action of Congress, and further reciting that these persons so exacting money were officers of the present House. Therefore he proposed a resolution instructing the Committee on Reform of the Civil Service to make an investigation of the charges.

The preamble and resolution were presented as a question of privilege, and agreed to without question.

2648. A proposition relating to the expulsion of a Member presents a question of privilege which supersedes the regular order of business.

Instance wherein the Speaker left to the House to decide whether or not a proposition involved a question of privilege.

On February 19, 1857,[3] Mr. Henry Winter Davis, of Maryland, from the select committee on certain alleged corrupt combinations, proposed to submit a special report from the said committee, having reference to William A. Gilbert, a Member of the House from the State of New York, accompanied by a resolution reciting the alleged corrupt acts of Mr. Gilbert and providing for his expulsion from the House forthwith.

The report and resolution having been read, the Speaker[4] stated the question to be, Shall the said committee have leave to report in part at this time, and will the House receive the said resolution as a question of privilege?

After debate, and a motion to adjourn, Mr. Davis modified the motion originally submitted by him, as follows: That the said special report, together with the other special reports of the said committee, the views of a minority, the general report, and the evidence, be received and printed.

This motion was agreed to, 168 yeas to 5 nays.

2649. A proposition to censure a Member presents a question of privilege.

Early instances wherein the Speaker passed on questions presented as of privilege instead of submitting them directly to the House.

On January 24, 1842,[1] Mr. Thomas W. Gilmer, of Virginia, presented the following resolution:

Resolved, That in presenting for the consideration of the House a petition for the dissolution of the Union the Member from Massachusetts [Mr. Adams] has justly incurred the censure of this House.

Mr. Joseph R. Underwood, of Kentucky, objected to the reception of the resolution at this time, as not within the established order of business, and consequently not now in order.

The Speaker[2] said that he considered this a matter of privilege, and referred to a precedent that occurred in 1836, in which the gentleman from Massachusetts offered a petition from certain slaves near Fredericksburg, Va., and on which occasion a resolution was offered by a gentleman from Virginia that the gentleman be brought to the bar and censured. Under this precedent the Chair did not feel at liberty to arrest the proceeding.

2650. On April 27, 1858,[3] Mr. James Hughes, of Indiana, submitted as a question of privilege a preamble reciting that Mr. Francis E. Spinner, of New York, by proposing to the House an investigation of mere newspaper insinuations against a certain Senator and certain Members of the House, had reflected upon their characters without presenting any matter or charge proper for action, and concluding with this resolution:

Resolved, That the offer to introduce said preamble and resolution was a breach of the privilege, order, and decorum of the House, and that the said Francis E. Spinner is hereby censured for the same.

Mr. Lewis D. Campbell, of Ohio, raised the question of order that no question of privilege was involved.

The Speaker[4] held that as the resolution proposed to censure a member it involved a question of privilege.

After debate the resolution was laid on the table.

2651. A proposition to censure a Member for violating the rules of the House involves a question of privilege.—On February 10, 1865,[5] Mr. James A. Garfield, of Ohio, submitted as a question of privilege the following:

Resolved, That Hon. E. B. Washburne, in leaving the Hall without permission, pending a call of the House at its session Tuesday evening, February 9, was guilty of disorderly conduct, and deserves the censure of the House.

Mr. John F. Farnsworth, of Illinois, raised a question of order as to the privilege of the resolution.

The Speaker[6] said:

The Chair is of the opinion that it is a question of privilege, as a charge is made by one member against another for violating the rules of the House.

2652. A charge that a Member had been holding intercourse with the foes of the Government was investigated as a question of privilege.—On July 15, 1861,[1] Mr. John F. Potter, of Wisconsin, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire whether the Hon. Henry May, a Representative in Congress from the Fourth district of the State of Maryland, has not been found holding criminal intercourse and correspondence with persons in armed rebellion against the Government of the United States, and to make report to the House as to what action should be taken in the premises, and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers and to examine witnesses on oath or affirmation, and that said Hon. Henry May be notified of the passage of this resolution (if practicable) before action thereon by said committee.

Mr. Henry C. Burnett, of Kentucky, made the point of order that the resolution was not in order as a question of privilege.

The Speaker[2] submitted the question to the House, and the House decided that the resolution was in order as involving a question of privilege.

By a vote of 56 yeas to 82 nays the House refused to lay the resolution on the table. It was then agreed to.[3]

2653. A resolution directing an inquiry into alleged treasonable conduct on the part of a Member was admitted as a question of privilege.—On December 19, 1865,[4] Mr. John F. Farnsworth, of Illinois, as a question of privilege, submitted the following:

Whereas it is alleged that Benjamin G. Harris, a Representative in this House from the Fifth district of the State of Maryland, was, in the month of May last, before a very respectable and intelligent court-martial tried, and by said court convicted, upon charge and specifications, to wit: "Violative of the sixth article of war," by giving aid and comfort to the public enemy and inciting them to continue to make war against the United States, declaring his sympathy with the enemy and his opposition to the Government of the United States in its efforts to suppress the rebellion; and

Whereas it was proved at such trial (as is alleged) that the said Harris expressed his regret that the assassination of President Lincoln came too late to be of any use to the rebels, and at the same time declared that Jeff. Davis was a great and good man, all of which acts on the part of said Harris are inconsistent with the oath which he has taken as a Member of this House; and

Whereas the said court-martial sentenced the said Harris (among other things) to be forever disqualified to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States, which sentence was approved by the President: Therefore

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be directed to inquire into the facts of the case and that they report the same to the House, together with such action as said committee shall recommend; and in making their investigations said committee to have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. Charles A. Eldridge, of Wisconsin, raised the question of order that no question of privilege was involved.

The Speaker[5] held that the question raised was a question of privilege, and of the very highest kind, since it involved the right of a Member to his seat.

The resolution was then agreed to, yeas 138, nays 21.

2654. The House declined to entertain as a question of privilege a resolution to investigate a charge made by a Cabinet officer that Members of Congress, not named, had made a corrupt proposition to the Executive.

There is a distinction between a question of privilege and a privileged question.

In 1842 the Speaker could find no precedent for deciding as to a question offered as of privilege.

On December 13, 1842,[1] Mr. John M. Botts, of Virginia, moved, as involving the privileges of this House, a resolution in the words following:

Resolved, That a committee of ——— be appointed to inquire into the truth of the charges contained in the letter of the Hon. John C. Spencer,[2] dated October 25, addressed to Lewis K. Faulkner and others, against Members of Congress, of having submitted a proposition to the President of the United States, at the extra session of Congress, to postpone the consideration of a great national measure, intimately connected with the best interests of the country, on condition of a pledge from him that he would not disturb the then members of his cabinet in office.

Mr. Henry A. Wise, of Virginia, submitted that it was not in order to entertain the proposition without a vote of two-thirds (i. e., by suspension of rules) unless it be a privileged question; and he submitted that the paragraphs read by Mr. Botts from a letter purporting to be written by John C. Spencer, Secretary of War, did not involve any question of the privileges of this House.

The Speaker[3] stated that there was a difference between a question of privilege and a privileged question, and it was the duty of the Chair to decide such questions. A question of privilege was one which involved the character and the rights of Members of the House, and the Chair would inform the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. Wise, that his question of order did not reach the point. It was for the House to determine whether it should be entertained, and if no gentleman made a motion for that purpose it was the duty of the Speaker to test the sense of the House. He should therefore propound the question, "Shall the resolution be considered?" because for the Chair to decide in such a case would be a usurpation on its part. What the Chair might deem a breach of privilege the House might not deem so, and vice versa, and therefore he should propound the question which he had stated; to do which he had the authority of the fifth rule,[4] which said: "When any motion or proposition is made the question, 'Will the House now consider it?' shall not be put unless it is demanded by some Member or is deemed necessary by the Speaker."

Mr. Wise insisted that the resolution could not be considered except by a two-thirds vote suspending the rules, unless it could be shown that a question of privilege was involved. This was simply a resolution to raise a committee of inquiry. The House was not charged by the Secretary of War with malfeasance. He had simply made charges against a party in the House, and that could not be a question of privilege.

[4] Now section 3 of Rule XVI.

The Speaker said that he could find no instance on record where the Chair had entertained of himself, and settled, what was a question of privilege; on the contrary, he found numerous instances where the House had settled it.

The question being put by the Speaker, the House decided, 86 yeas to 106 nays, that the resolution did not present a question of privilege.

2655. A resolution to investigate the charge that a Member had improperly abstracted papers from the files of an Executive Department was entertained as privileged. (Speaker overruled.)—On July 5, 1850,[1] the House voted that a charge in a newspaper that the Hon. Joshua R. Giddings, of Ohio, had abstracted from the files of the Post-Office Department certain papers relating to the post-office at Oberlin, Ohio, did not involve a question of privilege. On July 6 Mr. Orsamus B. Matteson, of New York, having made an explanation in behalf of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, stating that the newspaper article was unauthorized by that official, but that Mr. Giddings did ask to see the papers referred to and examined them at the Department, Mr. Edward D. Baker, of Illinois, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by the Speaker to investigate the charges against the Hon. Joshua R. Giddings of having improperly abstracted papers from the files of the Post-Office Department, and that they have power to send for persons and papers.

The Speaker[2] decided that the whole subject was disposed of by the action of the House on the preceding day, the House having decided that it did not involve a question of privilege. He therefore ruled the resolution out of order.

Mr. William A. Richardson, of Illinois, appealed from the decision on the ground that the state of facts on this day was different from what it had been on the preceding day.[3]

Mr. Harman S. Conger, of New York, moved that the appeal be laid on the table, and on this question there appeared, yeas 54, nays 86.

The question being then taken on the appeal, the decision of the Chair was overruled, and the House decided that the resolution of Mr. Baker might be considered.

2656. One House should not take notice of bills or other matters depending in the other, or votes or speeches until they be communicated.—Section III of Jefferson's Manual, on the subject of privilege, provides:

It is highly expedient, says Hatsel, for the due preservation of the privileges of the separate branches of the legislature that neither should encroach on the other, or interfere in any matter depending before them, so as to preclude, or even influence, that freedom of debate which is essential to a free council. They are, therefore, not to take notice of any bills or other matters depending, or of votes that have been given, or of speeches which have been held, by the members of either of the other branches of the legislature, until the same have been communicated to them in the usual parliamentary manner. (2 Hats., 252; 4 Inst., 15; Seld. Jud., 53.) Thus the King's taking notice of the bill for suppressing soldiers, depending before the House; his proposing a provisional clause for a bill before it was presented to him by the two Houses; his expressing displeasure against some persons for matters moved in Parliament during the debate and preparation of a bill, where breaches of privilege (2 Nalson, 743); and in 1783, December 17, it was declared a breach of fundamental privileges, etc., to report any opinion or pretended opinion of the King on any bill or proceeding depending in either House of Parliament with a view to influence the votes of the members. (2 Hats., 251, 6.)

2657. Certain Members of the House having, in a published letter, sought to influence the vote of a Senator from their State in an impeachment case, it was held that no question of privilege arose thereby in the House.—On May 15, 1868,[1] Mr. George W. Woodward, of Pennsylvania, as a question of privilege, offered the following:

Whereas a letter has been published purporting to be addressed by Members of this House to a Senator from the State of Missouri, with a view of influencing his vote upon articles of impeachment preferred by this House against the President of the United States, and now pending in the Senate of the United States, sitting as a court of impeachment, which letter, as published, is as follows:

"WASHINGTON, May 12, 1868.

"SIR: On a consultation of the Republican Members of the House of Representatives from Missouri, in view of your position on the impeachment articles, we ask you to withhold your vote on any article upon which you can not vote affirmatively. This request is made because we believe the safety of the loyal people of the United States demands the immediate removal of Andrew Johnson from the office of President of the United States.

"Respectfully,

"GEORGE W. ANDERSON.
"WILLIAM A. PILE.
"C. A. NEWCOMB.
"JOSEPH W. MCCLURG.
"BENJAMIN F. LOAN.
"JOHN F. BENJAMIN.
"JOSEPH J. GRAVELY.

"Hon. JOHN B. HENDERSON, United States Senate."

And whereas such a communication, if addressed to a Senator sitting in judgment upon a President of the United States, is a gross breach of the privileges of the Senate, calculated to degrade the House of Representatives and to obstruct the course of public justice; therefore—

Resolved, That a select committee of seven be appointed, etc.

The Speaker[2] said:

In the opinion of the Chair it is not a question of privilege. The wording of the resolution expressly shows that it is not. The charge is that this was an infringement of the privileges of the Senate. It has not yet occurred, in the recollection of the Chair, that the House of Representatives has been recognized by the Senate as the protector of its privileges. If the privileges of the Senate are assailed, that body is competent to protect its own privileges; nor would the House consent that the Senate of the United States should assume to protect its privileges. The Chair, therefore, does not think that it is a question of privilege.

Mr. Woodward thereupon struck out the reference to the Senate, whereupon the Speaker said:

The Chair is still of the opinion that it is not a question of privilege. From a hurried examination of the precedents to be found in the Digest, the Chair can not see on what ground it could be held to be a question of privilege, unless it were "an alleged corrupt combination." But it does not appear that any corruption is charged in this case upon Members of the House. As to intercourse between Members of the House and Senators, whether oral or written, the Chair can not see that that properly involves a question of privilege, unless corrupt influences were used.[3]

[3] The Journal of May 15 contains no reference to this action, no vote being taken on appeal. (Journal, pp. 690–694.)

On May 16 Mr. Charles A. Eldridge, of Wisconsin, introduced the subject again, reciting in the preamble "that an indecent and corrupt combination of the Representatives aforesaid has been entered into to improperly influence the Senator aforesaid in his judgment and decision."

The Speaker said:

The evident object of the language of this resolution is to charge that the letter written by the Representatives from Missouri to their Senator appears to be an indecent and corrupt combination of the Representatives aforesaid, but without a direct charge to that effect. In the opinion of the Chair it is not a corrupt combination and the Chair will state the reasons for his opinion. If the conversations and the interviews between Members of the House and those representing the same State in the Senate in writing are corrupt, then the same conversations in regard to matters pending before the Senate sitting as a court orally are corrupt. If the gentleman from Wisconsin had charged directly that there was a corrupt combination, the Chair would be disposed to submit the question to the House for them to decide whether it is or is not a question of privilege, as the rules allow him to do in doubtful cases, and as he intends to do, even as the resolution reads. In the opinion of the Chair it is not a corrupt combination. There does not appear on the face of it anything corrupt in its character.

The Chair thereupon submitted the question to the House, and it was decided, yeas 28, nays 82, that the preamble and resolution did not present a question of privilege.

2658. A charge of general corruption in the Government, made in the Senate, does not so reflect on the House as to raise a question of privilege.—On February 15, 1847,[1] Mr. William H. Brockenbrough, of Florida, offered a preamble and resolution setting forth that a Senator, in the Senate, had charged general corruption in the Government, and as the silence of the House might be construed as acquiescence in this charge, providing a committee to go to the Senate and ask for such specifications in regard to the charges as would enable the House to act in the matter. Mr. Brockenbrough offered this as a question of privilege, but Mr. Joseph R. Ingersoll, of Pennsylvania, objected to the introduction thereof on the ground that it did not present a question of privilege.

The Speaker[2] sustained the point of order.

2659. A resolution relating to the protection of the records of the House presents a question of privilege.—On January 26, 1885,[3] Mr. Strother M. Stockslager, of Indiana, claiming the floor for a question of privilege, presented a resolution instructing a committee to investigate the causes of a fire which occurred on the roof of the House that morning, and ascertain what action might be necessary in future to protect the records of the House from a recurrence of such an accident.

The Speaker[4] said:

The Chair thinks it is properly a matter of privilege.

2660. The House, after discussion, declined to make a general rule permitting Members to waive their privilege in attending court as witnesses, but gave the permission asked on behalf of a single Member.—

[2] John W. Davis, of Indiana, Speaker.

[3] Second session Forty-eighth Congress, Record, p. 1004.

[4] John G. Carlisle, of Kentucky, Speaker.

On May 6, 1846,[1] Mr. George C. Dromgoole, of Virginia, rising to a question of privilege, stated that his colleague, Mr. George W. Hopkins, of Virginia, had been summoned to attend as a witness before the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia. The rule of the Manual forbade a Member to waive his privilege without leave of the House. Therefore Mr. Dromgoole offered this resolution:

Resolved, That any member of this House who has been, or may be, summoned to attend as a witness before the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia, now sitting in the City of Washington, has the leave of this House, during the present session, to attend as a witness in said court, if he shall think proper to do so.

The words "if he shall think proper to do so," were added at the suggestion of Mr. Robert C. Winthrop, of Massachusetts, who favored the assertion of the House's privileges to the fullest extent.

Considerable discussion arose over the resolution. Reference was made to the case of Thomas Cooper, tried while Congress was in session in Philadelphia. Members of Congress were summoned, but the court decided that Mr. Cooper was not entitled to compulsory process against them. Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, criticised the resolution as far more extensive than was necessary to meet the case. This was an exceedingly delicate matter for the House to decide. On the one hand were privileges which were a departure from the common law of the country in favor of Members of the House—not for their own advantage, but for the advantage of the country whose interests they represented. On the other hand the sacred powers of the courts of justice to summon witnesses before them was equally important to the liberties of the country, and to all its rights and interests. For his own part he should object to any general resolution. He should wish to recur to the practice heretofore of the British Parliament, from which our institutions, in this respect, had their origin, not for the purpose of considering any of these privileges, in relation to the British Parliament, as having any application here, but because the practice as there established, was a good source to consult as to the mode of proceeding in such cases.

Finally, after considerable debate, and the suggestion of several propositions, the House adopted the following substitute resolution, offered by Mr. Armistead Burt, of South Carolina:

This House having been informed that Mr. Hopkins, one of its Members, has been served with a process of the circuit court of the United States, now sitting in this city, to attend as a witness in a criminal proceeding pending in that court:

Resolved, That Mr. Hopkins have the leave of this House to attend said court.

2661. The House decided that the summons of a court to Members to attend and testify constituted a breach of privilege, and directed them to disregard the mandate.—On March 7, 1876,[2] certain Members of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, who had examined the charges against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, and had reported in favor of his impeachment, informed the House that they had been commanded by the supreme court of the District of Columbia "to bring all papers, documents, records, checks, and contracts in your possession, or in possession of the committee of the House of Representatives on Expenditures in the War Department, in relation to the charge against said defendant of accepting a bribe or bribes while Secretary of War of the United States, and to attend the said court immediately to testify on behalf of the United States, and not depart from the court without leave of the court or district attorneys," and that they had attended.

A long debate arose over this statement. It was urged[1] that had the Members belonged to the British House of Commons they would, on their own statements, be punished for breach of privilege in attending without the permission of their House, the privilege being the privilege of the House and the individual Member having no right to waive it.

The House adopted a resolution the preamble of which gave a statement of the facts and declared that—

Whereas the mandate of said court is a breach of the privileges of this House:

Resolved, That the said committee and the members thereof are hereby directed to disregard said mandate until the further order of this House.

2662. Members having informed the House, as a matter of privilege, that they had been summoned before the grand jury of the District of Columbia, the House authorized them to respond to the summons.—On March 21, 1876,[2] Mr. Jeptha D. New, of Indiana, rising to a question of privilege, stated that he and two of his colleagues had been subpœnaed to appear before the grand jury of the District of Columbia. Inasmuch as it seemed to be well settled that the privilege of the Member was the privilege of the House and that privilege could not be waived except with the consent of the House, they had thought it their duty to submit the matter to the House.

Mr. J. Randolph Tucker, of Virginia, offered this resolution:

Whereas John M. Glover, Jeptha D. New, and A. Herr Smith, Members of this House and of the committee of this House for investigating the affairs of the real-estate pool of the District of Columbia, have been summoned to appear as witnesses before the grand jury of the district court of said District to testify; and whereas this House sees no reason why the said Members should not appear and testify: Therefore,

Resolved, That they be, and are hereby, authorized to appear and testify under the said summons.

After brief debate this resolution was agreed to without division.

2663. No officer or employee of the House may produce any paper belonging to the files of the House before a court without permission of the House.

No officer or employee of the House should furnish, except by authority of the House or a statute, any copy of any paper belonging to the files of the House.

No officer or employee should furnish any copy of any testimony given or paper filed on any investigation before the House or any of its committees.

[2] First session Forty-fourth Congress, Record, p. 1847.

On April 22, 1879,[1] Mr. J. Proctor Knott, of Kentucky, from the Committee on the Judiciary, made a report on a question which had arisen as follows:

The Adjutant-General of the Army had transmitted to the Speaker a subpœna addressed to Mr. Ferris Finch, file clerk of the House. This subpœna was given under the hand of D. G. Swaim, judge-advocate of a general court-martial convened in the city of New York, and commanded Mr. Finch to appear there as a witness, and commanded him to bring with him manuscript of certain testimony given before the Military Affairs Committee of the House in 1872.

This letter of transmittal, with the accompanying subpœna, were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The committee concluded that under the law the judge-advocate of a court-martial was not authorized to compel the attendance of witnesses from beyond the limits of the State, Territory, or district in which the court-martial was ordered to sit. As to the further and more important question, whether or not any officer of the House had the right or could be lawfully compelled without the consent of the House to produce, in obedience to a subpœna duces tecum, any paper belonging to its files, the committee concluded, after examining the decisions of the courts, that the file clerk could not lawfully be compelled by a subpœna duces tecum to remove any paper or document whatever from the files of the House. He was not even mentioned or recognized in the rules as an officer or employee of the House. He was merely an assistant, employed by the Clerk to enable him to discharge one of the functions which, from the necessity of the case or the unbroken practice and usage of the House, pertained to his office, namely, that of preserving and arranging the archives of the House so that they might be produced immediately whenever the business of the House should require. He had no property in nor authority to remove a solitary paper from the files for any other purpose than those just specified. Were he to attempt to do so, the Clerk could forbid it, remove the papers beyond his reach, or remove him from his position, as he might choose. It was scarcely necessary to add that if he could not be compelled by legal process to take a paper from the files he had no authority to do so voluntarily, unless by the permission or under the direction of the House. The report continues:

Nor has the Clerk of the House himself any such authority, either of his own volition or in obedience to a subpœna duces tecum. It is simply his duty, as one of the incidents of his office, to keep the files of the House, preserve the papers belonging to its archives, and see that they are arranged in convenient and proper order. He has no such property in, possession of, or control over them as to impose any obligation upon him to produce them before a court, or to authorize him to do so of his own accord. They belong to the House, and are under its absolute and unqualified control. It can at any time take them from the custody of the Clerk, refuse to allow them to be inspected by anyone, order them to be destroyed, or dismiss the Clerk for permitting any of them to be removed from the files without its expressed consent.

The committee discuss the inconvenience that might result from allowing papers from the files to be taken to places where they might not be accessible when needed, and also to the fact that good faith and public policy, especially in the case of witnesses, who might give testimony compromising to themselves, often required that certain documents be kept in the custody of the House. In this regard it had long been the settled and invariable practice of the English Parliament to refuse to permit the testimony taken before any of its committees to be used in any criminal proceeding involving the party who testified, provided he testified truly.

It was a principle well understood that the President, the governor of a State, or the head of a department was not bound to produce papers or disclose information communicated to him when, in his own judgment, the disclosure would, on considerations of public policy, be improper or inexpedient.[1] And by parity of reasoning the House of Representatives, having the exclusive custody and absolute control of its own archives, should judge for itself whether the production or inspection of these papers would be injurious to the public interests or not, and refuse or permit such production or inspection accordingly as its own judgment might dictate.

The committee therefore recommended the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved. 1. That no officer or employee of the House of Representatives has the right, either voluntarily or in obedience to a subpœna duces tecum, to produce any document, paper, or book belonging to the files of the House before any court or officer, nor to furnish any copy of any testimony given or paper filed on any investigation before the House or any of its committees, or of any other paper belonging to the files of the House, except such as may be authorized by statute to be copied, and such as the House itself may have made public, to be taken without the consent of the House first obtained.

2. That the consent of the House is hereby given to either party in the case of the United States against Col. D. S. Stanley, now pending before the general court-martial sitting in the city of New York, to have made and properly proven such copies of the papers mentioned in the subpœna duces tecum issued by the judge-advocate of said court and directed to Ferris Finch, esq., file clerk of the House of Representatives, on the 16th instant as may be desired, but that the originals thereof shall not be removed from the files of the House.

On April 22, as soon as made to the House, this report was adopted under operation of the previous question.[2]

2664. The House, in maintenance of its privilege, has refused to permit the Clerk to produce in court, in obedience to a summons, an original paper from the files, but has given the court facilities for making certified copies.

Instance wherein a report was ordered printed in the Journal.

On February 9, 1886, Mr. J. Randolph Tucker, of Virginia, from the Committee on the Judiciary, made a report [3] on the subject of a subpœna duces tecum issued by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia and addressed to Hon. John B. Clark, Clerk of the House of Representatives, directing him to appear as a witness at a certain place within the District of Columbia and to bring with him a certain volume from the files of the House.[4]

The report states that the committee deemed it important to protect with strict care the privileges of the House in respect of its officers and its records, and papers upon file in its various offices, and under charge and in custody of its officers. Subject to this supreme duty the committee thought that all proper access to records and papers should be allowed in furtherance of the ends of justice, in the courts, but so as not to endanger the safety nor surrender the custody of the papers. It did not appear in this case that the production of the book was necessary. The precedents of the Forty-fourth and Forty-sixth Congresses[1] were cited, and the following resolution was recommended to the House:

Resolved, 1. That by the privilege of this House no evidence of a documentary character under the control and in the possession of the House of Representatives can, by the mandate or process of the ordinary courts of justice, be taken from such control or possession but by its permission.

2. That when it appears by the order of a court or of the judge thereof, or of any legal officer charged with the administration of the orders of such court or judge, that documentary evidence in the possession and under the control of the House is needful for use in any court of justice or before any judge or such legal officer for the promotion of justice, this House will take such order thereon as will promote the ends of justice consistently with the privileges and rights of this House.

3. That the Hon. John B. Clark, Clerk of the House, be authorized to appear at the place and before the officer named in the subpœna duces tecum before mentioned, but shall not take with him the books named therein, nor any document or paper on file in his office, or under his control or in his possession as Clerk of the House.

4. That the said court, through any of its officers or agents, have full permission to attend with all witnesses and proper parties to the proceeding, and then always at any place under the orders and control of this House, and take copies of any documents or papers in possession or control of said Clerk, and any evidence of witnesses in respect thereto which the court or other proper officer thereof shall desire, so as, however, the possession of said documents and papers by the said Clerk shall not be disturbed, or the same shall not be removed from their place of file or custody under said Clerk.

5. That a copy of this report and these resolutions be transmitted to the said court as a respectful answer to the subpœna aforementioned.

On February 9 these resolutions were agreed to by the House without debate.[2]

2665. The Secretary of the Senate being subpœnaed to appear before a committee of the House with certain papers from the files, the Senate, after a discussion as to privilege, empowered him to attend with the papers in his custody.—On June 7, 1878,[3] a letter was laid before the Senate from the Secretary of the Senate stating that on the 3d instant he was served with a subpœna to appear before a special committee of the House of Representatives, of which Hon. Clarkson N. Potter was chairman, and to bring with him all books, returns, and papers in his custody as secretary of the Senate in any manner relating to the election of Presidential electors of the State of Louisiana in the year 1876. The Secretary stated that he had obeyed the subpœna, and the papers had been from day to day before the committee, in the custody, however, of one of the clerks of his office. The Secretary requested instructions as to his duty.

Mr. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, offered the following:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate attend before the committee of the House of Representatives mentioned in the letter of the Secretary with the papers desired by said committee, and submit said papers to the examination of said committee from time to time according to its convenience.

The objection was made that the House had commanded the papers as a legal and superior authority. It was an attempt of the House to visit the archives of the Senate, or at least to command documents in the custody of the Senate. The House should have asked leave of the Senate for its officer to attend. The question was raised that the electoral certificates were not especially the archives of the Senate, as no constitution or law made them such, but it was replied that they never had been in any other custody since the foundation of the Government, and they were actually among the papers of the Secretary's office.

Finally the Senate agreed to the order, modified as follows:

Ordered, Reserving all questions touching the regularity of the action of the committee of the House of Representatives in calling for the papers, that the Secretary of the Senate attend before the committee of the House of Representatives mentioned in the letter of the Secretary, with the papers desired by said committee, and submit said papers to the examination of said committee from time to time, according to its convenience, retaining, however, the custody of said papers.

2666. The Secretary of the Senate being subpœnaed to produce a paper from the files of the Senate, permission was given him to do so after a discussion as to whether or not he was exempted by privilege from the process.—In the Senate, on December 28, 1842,[1] the Chair laid before the Senate a subpœna issued from the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia, which had been served upon the Secretary of the Senate, with a view to compel his attendance in court with a certain antibank memorial, on the files of the Senate. The Chair stated that the Secretary was in doubt as to what to do, having no authority to take from the files any portion of the public archives.

Considerable discussion arose as to the character of the office of the Secretary, whether, being a ministerial officer, he was entitled to the privilege which attached to Senators and exempted them from the processes of the courts. The question was also raised as to whether a transcript would not be sufficient to carry into court.

Finally, on motion of Senator J. M. Berrien, of Georgia, the following was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate have leave to take from the files of the Senate the antibank memorial specified in the subpœna duces tecum issued from the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia, in the case of Henry Addison v. Robert White, this day served upon him for the purpose of being exhibited as evidence in the said case.

2668. Jefferson's summary of the privileges of members of Parliament.—Thomas Jefferson, in his manual written for the use of the Senate and in 1837 adopted as a guide for the House in all cases not provided for by its rules and orders, has the following in his discussion of the subject of privilege:

The privileges of members of Parliament, from small and obscure beginnings, have been advancing for centuries with a firm and never-yielding pace. Claims seem to have been brought forward from time to time and repeated till some example of their admission enabled them to build law on that example. We can only, therefore, state the points of progression at which they now are. It is now acknowledged, first, that they are at all times exempted from question elsewhere for anything said in their own House; second, that during the time of privilege, neither a member himself, his [4] wife, nor his servants (familiares sui), for any matter of their own, may be [5] arrested on mesne process in any civil suit; third, nor be detained under execution, though levied before time of privilege; fourth, nor impleaded, cited, or subpœnaed in any court; fifth, nor summoned as a witness or juror; sixth, nor may their lands or goods be distrained; seventh, nor their persons assaulted or characters traduced. And the period of time covered by privilege, before and after the session, with the practice of short prorogations under the connivance of the Crown, amounts in fact to a perpetual protection against the courts of justice. In one instance, indeed, it has been relaxed by the 10 G., 3, c. 50, which permits judiciary proceedings to go on against them. That these privileges must be continually progressive seems to result from their rejecting all definition of them, the doctrine being that "their diginity and independence are preserved by keeping their privileges indefinite, and that 'the maxims upon which they proceed, together with the method of proceeding, rest entirely in their own breast and are not defined and ascertained by any particular stated laws.'" (1 Blackst., 163, 164.)

2669. Privilege of Parliament takes place by force of election and may not be waived by the Member without leave.—Thomas Jefferson, in his Manual written for the use of the Senate and in 1837 adopted as a guide for the House in all cases not provided for by its rules and orders, has the following in his discussion of the subject of privilege:

Privilege from arrest takes place by force of the election; and before a return be made a Member elected may be named of a committee, and is to every extent a Member except that he can not vote until he is sworn. (Memor., 107, 108. D'Ewes, 642, col. 2; 643, col. 1. Pet. Miscel. Parl., 119. Lex. Parl., c. 23. 2 Hats., 22, 62.)

Every man must, at his peril, take notice who are Members of either House returned of record. (Lex. Parl., 23; 4 Inst., 24.)

On complaint of a breach of privilege, the party may either be summoned or sent for in custody of the sergeant. (1 Grey, 88, 95.)

The privilege of a Member is the privilege of the House. If the Member waive it without leave, it is a ground for punishing him, but can not in effect waive the privilege of the House. (3 Grey, 140, 222.)

2670. The Constitution grants to Members privilege from arrest under certain conditions.

The Constitution guards Members from being questioned outside of the House for speech or debate in the House.

The Constitution provides for the punishment or expulsion of Members.

The Constitution of the United States, in article 1, section 6, provides:

They [the Senators and Representatives] shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in either House, they shall not be questioned in any other place.

Also, in section 5 of article 1:

Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member.

2671. Privilege as to speech or debate in Parliament is limited by certain conditions.—Section III of Jefferson's Manual, on the subject of privilege, provides:

For any speech or debate in either House they shall not be questioned in any other place (Const. U. S., 1, 6; S. P. protest of the Commons to James I, 1621; 2 Rapin, No. 54, pp. 211, 212); but this is restrained to things done in the House in a parliamentary course (1 Rush., 663.), for he is not to have privilege contra morem parliamentarium, to exceed the bounds and limits of his place and duty. (Com. p.)

2672. Jefferson's discussion of the privilege conferred on Members by the Constitution, especially as to arrest, summons, etc.—Thomas Jefferson, in his Manual, written for the use of the Senate and in 1837 adopted as a guide for the House in all cases not provided for by its rules and orders, has the following in his discussion of the subject of privilege:

It was probably from this view of the encroaching character of privilege that the framers of our Constitution, in their care to provide that the laws shall bind equally on all, and especially that those who make them shall not exempt themselves from their operation, have only privileged "Senators and Representatives" themselves from the single act of "arrest in all cases except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses and in going to and returning from the same, and from being questioned in any other place for any speech or debate in either House." (Const. U. S., art. 1, sec. 6.) Under the general authority "to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers given them" (Const. U. S., art. 2, sec. 8), they may provide by law the details which may be necessary for giving full effect to the enjoyment of this privilege. No such law being as yet made, it seems to stand at present on the following ground: 1. The act of arrest is void, ab initio. (2 Stra., 989.) 2. The Member arrested may be discharged on motion (1 Bl., 166; 2 Stra., 990), or by habeas corpus under the Federal or State authority, as the case may be, or by a writ of privilege out of the chancery (2 Stra., 989), in those States which have adopted that part of the laws of England. (Orders of the House of Commons, 1550, February 20.) 3. The arrest being unlawful, is a trespass for which the officer and others concerned are liable to action or indictment in the ordinary courts of justice, as in other cases of unauthorized arrest. 4. The court before which the process is returnable is bound to act as in other cases of unauthorized proceeding, and liable, also, as in other similar cases, to have their proceedings stayed or corrected by the superior courts.

The time necessary for going to and returning from Congress not being defined, it will, of course, be judged of in every particular case by those who will have to decide the case. While privilege was understood in England to extend, as it does here, only to exemption from arrest, eundo, morando, et redeundo, the House of Commons themselves decided that "a convenient time was to be understood." (1580, 1 Hats., 99, 100.) Nor is the law so strict in point of time as to require the party to set out immediately on his return, but allows him time to settle his private affairs and to prepare for his journey; and does not even scan his road very nicely, nor forfeit his protection for a little deviation from that which is most direct, some necessity perhaps constraining him to it. (2 Stra., 986, 987.)

This privilege from arrest, privileges, of course, against all process the disobedience to which is punishable by an attachment of the person, as a subpœna ad respondendum, or testificandum, or a summons on a jury; and with reason, because a Member has superior duties to perform in another place. When a Representative is withdrawn from his seat by summons, the 40,000 people whom he represents lose their voice in debate and vote, as they do on his voluntary absence; when a Senator is withdrawn by summons, his State loses half its voice in debate and vote, as it does on his voluntary absence. The enormous disparity of evil admits no comparison.

2673. The words "treason, felony, and breach of the peace" in the constitutional guarantee of privilege have been construed to mean all indictable crimes.—On November 14, 1877,[1] the House, on motion of Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, agreed to a preamble and resolution instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to investigate the arrest and confinement of Robert Smalls, of South Carolina, a Member of the House, and report whether the arrest was in violation of the privileges of the House.

On January 25, 1878,[2] Mr. J. Proctor Knott, of Kentucky, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted a report,[2] which, after reciting the statutes of South Carolina on the subject of bribery, presented the following statement of facts:

It appears that after his credentials as a Member-elect to the Forty-fifth Congress of the United States had been formally issued and forwarded to the Clerk of the House of Representatives Mr. Smalls was arrested, under a regular warrant issued by a duly authorized magistrate, on a charge of having accepted a bribe in violation of the statute just recited, and on the 9th day of October, 1877, entered into a recognizance to appear at the next ensuing term of the court of general sessions in and for the county of Richland, in said State, and answer such bill of indictment as might be preferred against him therefor.

[1] First session Forty-fifth Congress, Journal, p. 212; Record, p. 399.

[2] Second session Forty-fifth Congress, H. Report No. 100; Journal, p. 287.

Whether he was actually on his way to attend the session of Congress called to meet on the 15th of October when arrested your committee are not advised, but on that day he appeared at the bar of the House with his credentials as a Member thereof, was admitted to his seat as such, and took the oath prescribed by law. On the 25th day of the same month he was granted a leave of absence at his own request and returned to Columbia, S. C., where, in discharge of his recognizance, he appeared in the court of general sessions, the tribunal having jurisdiction of the offense charged against him, to answer an indictment preferred against him on the 22d of October for having accepted from one Josephus Woodruff a bribe of $5,000 on the 18th day of December, 1872, etc.

On the 8th of November Mr. Smalls presented his petition to the court in which the indictment was pending for a removal of the cause to the circuit court of the United States for the district of South Carolina, which having been overruled, he moved the court to discharge him from custody on the ground that his arrest and detention were in violation of his privilege as a Member of Congress, which motion was overruled and a trial had by jury, which resulted in his conviction and sentence to imprisonment in the penitentiary for five years. The accused having before sentence filed his motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, which were respectively overruled, appealed from the judgment of the court and was admitted to bail in the sum of $10,000 and discharged from custody pending the appeal, since which time he has been in attendance upon the sessions of the House.

The committee proceed to say that it is worthy of note that the question to what extent, if any, a Member of Congress enjoys immunity from arrest under criminal process, State or Federal, was now presented for the first time since the organization of the Government. The Constitution had limited privilege from arrest by the clause declaring that Senators and Representatives "shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses and in going to and returning from the same." It was evident, therefore, that the question at issue turned on the consideration whether or not the offense of bribery fell within the exception embraced by the terms "treason, felony, and breach of the peace." At the time the Constitution was formed bribery, like perjury and forgery, did not, by either the common law or any statute then in force in any of the States, come within the technical definition of either treason, felony, or breach of the peace. Indeed, at the present time the offense of bribery was only a misdemeanor in South Carolina, although in some of the States it was a felony. The committee comment upon the fact that if the words of the Constitution were to be taken literally a Member might plead his privilege in one State, while in another a Member might be held for the same offense. A President might be impeached for bribery, yet if bribery were not included in the phrase "treason, felony, or breach of the peace" a Senator held for bribery might be taken from court by the Senate to sit in judgment on the President accused of the same offense. Furthermore, it was never expected that Congress would be given a wider range of privilege than had been claimed for Parliament. And the committee show by abundant English precedents that the provision of our Constitution was intended to embrace the entire range of indictable crimes. The fact also was commented on that any other than a broad construction of the Constitution would deny the Member privilege for a mere assault or brawl in a tavern and allow him the benefits of privilege in a case where he had defrauded his neighbor by perjury. After quoting May and Cushing, the committee proceed to consider the contention that the Constitution refers only to treasons, felonies, and breaches of the peace against the laws of the United States. If that were so, a Member was not privileged at all from arrest upon processes issued by State authority, even in civil suits, because the language used in the exception is as general as that employed in the rule. The report concludes:

Upon principle therefore, as well as in view of the precedents, your committee are clearly of the opinion that the arrest of Mr. Smalls upon the charge and under the circumstances hereinbefore set forth, was in no sense an invasion of any of the rights or privileges of the House of Representatives; and that, so far as any supposed breach of privilege is concerned, his detention by the authorities of South Carolina for an alleged violation of the criminal law of that State was legal and justifiable; and having arrived at that conclusion they have deemed it not only unnecessary but improper for them to make any suggestion here as to what course the House should have pursued had the arrest been a violation of its privileges.

Your committee, therefore, submit the following resolution, and recommend its adoption:

Resolved, That the arrest of Robert Smalls, a Member of this House, by the authorities of South Carolina, for an alleged crime against the laws of that State, was no violation of any right or privilege of this House; and that the detention of said Smalls for trial in the courts of said State, so far as any supposed breach of the privilege of this House is concerned, was legal and justifiable.

This report was printed and recommitted, and there does not appear to have been any further action by the House on the matter. The printing and recommitting was undoubtedly a matter of form, and not a decision on the merits of the question involved.

2674. Instance wherein the courts discussed and sustained the privilege of the Member in going to and returning from the sessions of the House.—On August 9, 1886, Judge Dyer, United States district judge for the eastern division of Wisconsin, made a decision in the cases of Miner v. Markham, which involved the construction of that clause of the Constitution relating to the privileges of the Member in going to and returning from the sessions of the House.[1]

These were two suits begun in the State court and removed to this court. The summons in each case was served on the defendant personally at Milwaukee, on the 28th day of October, 1885. Before the removal of the cases to this court the defendant appeared specially therein, and moved to set aside the service of the summons in each action on the ground that he was a Member of Congress, and at the time of such service was on his way from his residence in California to Washington for the purpose of attending the next ensuing session of Congress. The motion was overruled by the State court, but without prejudice to the right of the defendant to renew the motion in that or any other court in which the cases should be thereafter pending. Thereupon the defendant, thereafter appearing in the cases for the purpose only of removing the same to this court, filed petitions in each suit for the removal of the same under the act of 1875, and the cases were duly removed. A new motion was then made in behalf of the defendant to quash the service of the summons in each action upon the same ground as that upon which a similar motion was made in the State court, which motion was opposed and argued.

Affidavits filed in the cases in support of the motion showed that at the time of the service of process, and for a considerable time prior thereto, the defendant was a Member of the Congress of the United States, having been duly elected thereto as a Representative from the Sixth Congressional district of the State of California, and that he is a resident of the county of Los Angeles in that State. He alleged that at the time of the service of process upon him he was on his way to the city of Washington for the purpose of attending a session of the House of Representatives as a Member thereof from the Sixth Congressional district of California, and was at the time of such service temporarily in the city of Milwaukee. He further stated in his affidavit that he left Los Angeles, accompanied by his wife and four children, intending to proceed to Washington and there secure a suitable place of residence for himself and family during the session and in time to arrange for and settle his family and household affairs there prior to the date of the commencement of the session; that during his journey several of his children were ill, and by reason thereof he was obliged to stop at several places on his way to Washington; and further, that by reason of such illness he was being detained in Milwaukee at the residence of his brother at the time of the service of summons in said actions. He further states in his affidavit that he started from his residence in Los Angeles County to attend the session of Congress only a reasonable length of time before the commencement of the session, and such as he considered proper and necessary under all the circumstances connected with the proper discharge of his duties as a Representative in Congress, and was proceeding on his way to attend the session without any unreasonable or unnecessary delay.

* * * * * * *

Thus it will be seen that the decisions are not entirely harmonious upon the question of the extent of the privilege in question; but it has been the law in this jurisdiction from Territorial times that the privilege in such a case as that at bar extends to exemption from civil process, with or without actual arrest; and in the absence of more authoritative exposition of the constitutional provision from the Supreme Court of the United States, I shall hold that under that provision the defendant, as a Member of the Congress of the United States, was entitled to exemption from service of process upon him, although it was not accompanied with an arrest of his person, provided the privilege was in force at the time of such service.

2. This brings us to the second proposition involved, namely: Was the defendant, when served with process, "going to" the capital to attend a session of the House of which he was a Member, within the meaning of the constitutional provision? No fixed time is prescribed by the Constitution during which, before and after the close of the session, the privilege in question shall extend. The clause is: "During their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same." It would be a superfluous task to go into all the old law on this subject as it once existed in England, when members of Parliament were allowed prescribed periods of exemption from arrest before and after sessions of Parliament. An exhaustive review of the law and of the English authorities may be found in the case of Hoppin v. Jenckes (8 R. I., 453), and nothing can be profitably added to what is there said on the subject. In Cushing's Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies, at section 582, it is said:

"In the Federal Government, and in many States, Members are privileged while going and returning merely, without other limitation of time. Where the duration of the privilege is thus stated, Members are entitled to a reasonable or, as it was expressed by the House of Commons on occasion, a convenient time for going and returning. Thus they are not obliged at the close of the session to set out immediately on their return home, but may take a reasonable time to settle their private affairs and prepare for the journey; nor will the privilege be forfeited by reason of some slight deviation from the most direct road."

The Manual of Parliamentary Practice, published by authority of the House of Representatives in 1860, states the rule thus:

"The time necessary for going to and returning from Congress not being defined, it will, of course, be judged of in every particular case by those who will have to decide the case. While privilege was understood in England to extend, as it does here, only to exemption from arrest, eundo morando et redeundo, the House of Commons themselves decided that a convenient time was to be understood. (1 Hats., 99, 100.) Nor is the law so strict in point of time as to require the party to set out immediately on his return, but allows him time to settle his private affairs and to prepare for his journey, and does not even scan his road very nicely nor forfeit his protection for a little deviation from that which is most direct, some necessity, perhaps, constraining him to do it. (Str., 986, 987.)"

Such, also, is, in substance, the language of Judge Story, in his work on the Constitution, section 864. As a result of the authorities that bear on the question, it is held, in Hoppin v. Jenckes, supra, that the privilege from arrest of a Member of Congress is limited to the continuance of the session and to a reasonable time for going and returning; and this is now the law of this country. What is a reasonable time for "going to and returning" from the seat of government must depend upon circumstances and may be difficult to determine. The observations of Judge Story, that the law does not scan the road which the Member may take in his journey very nicely, nor forfeit his protection for a slight deviation from the route which is most direct, nor, it may be added, measure with precision the time absolutely necessary for going to or returning from the capital, furnish a just and sensible test in considering the question. To entitle the defendant to the privilege here invoked he must have been in good faith on his way to the seat of government to enter upon the discharge of his public duties; that must have been the primary object of his journey. He must have left his residence in California with the intent of then going to Washington to take his seat in the Congress to which he was elected, and the time taken for the journey must have been reasonable. He had a right, without forfeiture of his privilege, to set out from his residence at such time before the session should open as would enable him conveniently to establish his quarters and settle his family and household affairs at the capital, and also, I think, to enable him to inform himself as a new Member regarding pending legislation, so that he might enter advisedly upon the discharge of his duties. A slight deviation from the usual route, for rest, convenience, or because of family sickness, ought not to cause a loss of his privilege, if such deviation was but an incident to the principal journey. Nor ought the duration of the privilege to be strictly measured by the exact number of days, with the present facilities for travel, required for a journey from his residence in California to Washington. At the same time his privilege could not and ought not to avail him if the deviation was equivalent to an abandonment of the original journey for purposes of pleasure or family visiting. If, when he left his home in California, his intention was to make a journey, not to Washington, but to Milwaukee, there to spend an indefinite time visiting relatives, and then to go from Milwaukee to Washington after such prearranged delay at the former place as would still enable him to arrive at the capital in reasonable time to enter upon his public duties, so that it might be fairly said that the object of his journey at the time he set out upon it was not then to go to the capital, but elsewhere, it is clear that while in Milwaukee he could not assert the constitutional privilege of exemption from arrest or service of process.

Applying these principles to the facts as here presented, I am of the opinion that the defendant was privileged from the service of process upon him in these cases. It is evident that when he set out with his family from Pasadena his intended destination was Washington. The primary object of the journey was to go to the capital to prepare for and enter upon his duties as a Member of Congress. He had a right to exercise a reasonable judgment in connection with the settlement of his family in Washington, as to the time required for the accomplishment of his primary purpose, with its necessary incidents. It can not be said from the facts shown that his destination was Milwaukee. It is evident that the health of his family to a large extent controlled his movements. Under the circumstances, his deviation from the direct route was not such as to justify an inference of abandonment of the original journey or its primary object. His privilege, in view of all the facts shown, ought not, I think, to be adjudged forfeited by such deviation, nor ought the court to measure with mathematical accuracy the days and hours required by the most rapid course of transit to travel from Pasadena to Washington. In short, the defendant was in good faith on his way to the seat of government to enter upon his public duties as a Member-elect of the Forty-ninth Congress when the process in these cases was served upon him. His deviation to Milwaukee was but an incident in the journey and seems to have been occasioned by circumstances which made the deviation justifiable, if not absolutely necessary. He was therefore entitled to the protection of his privilege.

The defendant having appeared specially in the State court both in his motion to set aside the service of the summons in these cases and in his application for the removal of the cases to this court, and the motion made in the State court having been denied without prejudice to a renewal of the same, the defendant has not waived his privilege and can assert it here with the same force and effect as if the suits had been brought and the motion made in this court in the first instance. (Atchinson v. Morris, supra; Harkness v. Hyde, 98 U. S., 476; Sanderson v. Ohio Cent. R. and C. Co., 61 Wis., 609; S. C., 21 N. W. Rep., 818.)

Motion to set aside the service of summons granted.

2675. In the case of Kilbourn v. Thompson the court affirmed the immunity of Members of the House from prosecution on account of their action in a case of alleged contempt.

The constitutional privilege as to "any speech or debate" applies generally to "things done in a session of the House by one of its Members in relation to the business before it."

At the October term of 1880 the Supreme Court of the United States rendered an opinion in the case in error of Hallet Kilbourn against John G. Thompson,

Michael C. Kerr, John M. Glover, Jeptha D. New, Burwell P. Lewis, and A. Herr Smith. This was an action for false imprisonment, the plaintiff having been imprisoned by the defendant, Thompson, who was Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives, on a warrant given under the hand of Michael C. Kerr, who was Speaker, and authorized by action of the House, taken on report of an investigating committee, of which the remaining defendants were members.[1] The defendant, Kerr, died before process was served on him. The other Members of the House[2] who were defendants pleaded their constitutional privilege, which protected them against being "questioned in any other place."[3]

The opinion[4] of the court, delivered by Mr. Justice Miller, proceeds:

As these defendants did not make the actual assault on the plaintiff, nor personally assist in arresting or confining him, they can only be held liable on the charge made against them as persons who had ordered or directed in the matter, so as to become responsible for the acts which they directed.

The general doctrine that the person who procures the arrest of another by judicial process, by instituting and conducting the proceedings, is liable to an action for false imprisonment, where he acts without probable cause, is not to be controverted. Nor can it be denied that he who assumes the authority to order the imprisonment of another is responsible for the act of the person to whom such order is given, when the arrest is without justification. The plea of these defendants shows that it was they who initiated the proceedings under which the plaintiff was arrested. It was they who reported to the House his refusal to answer the questions which they had put to him, and to produce the books and papers which they had demanded of him. They expressed the opinion in that report that plaintiff was guilty of a contempt of the authority of the House in so acting. It is a fair inference from this plea that they were the active parties in setting on foot the proceeding by which he was adjudged guilty of a contempt, and in procuring the passage of that resolution.

If they had done this in any ordinary tribunal, without probable cause, they would have been liable for the action which they had thus promoted.

The House of Representatives is not an ordinary tribunal. The defendants set up the protection of the Constitution, under which they do business as a part of the Congress of the United States. That Constitution declares that the Senators and Representatives "shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in either House they shall not be questioned in any other place."

Is what the defendants did in the matter in hand covered by this provision? Is a resolution offered by a Member a speech or debate within the meaning of the clause? Does its protection extend to the report which they made to the House of Kilbourn's delinquency? To the expression of opinion that he was in contempt of the authority of the House? To their vote in favor of the resolution under which he was imprisoned? If these questions be answered in the affirmative they can not be brought in question for their action in a court of justice or in any other place. And yet if a report, or a resolution, or a vote is not a speech or debate, of what value is the constitutional protection?

We may perhaps find some aid in ascertaining the meaning of this provision if we can find out its source, and fortunately in this there is no difficulty. For while the framers of the Constitution did not adopt the lex et consuetudo of the English Parliament as a whole, they did incorporate such parts of it, and with it such privileges of Parliament as they thought proper to be applied to the two Houses of Congress. Some of these we have already referred to, as the right to make rules of procedure, to determine the election and qualification of its Members, to preserve order, etc. In the sentence we have just cited another part of the privileges of Parliament are made privileges of Congress. The freedom from arrest and freedom of speech in the two Houses of Parliament were long subjects of contest between the Tudor and Stuart kings and the House of Commons. When, however, the revolution of 1688 expelled the last of the Stuarts and introduced a new dynasty many of these questions were settled by a bill of rights, formally declared by the Parliament and assented to by the Crown. (1 W. & M., st. 2, c. 2.) One of these declarations is "that the freedom of speech and debates and proceedings in Parliament ought not to be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of Parliament."

In Stockdale v. Hansard, Lord Denman, speaking on this subject, says: "The privilege of having their debates unquestioned, though denied when the members began to speak their minds freely in the time of Queen Elizabeth, and punished in its exercise both by that princess and her two successors, was soon clearly perceived to be indispensable and universally acknowledged. By consequence, whatever is done within the walls of either assembly must pass without question in any other place. For speeches made in Parliament by a member to the prejudice of any other person, or hazardous to the public peace, that member enjoys complete impunity. For every paper signed by the Speaker[1] by order of the House, though to the last degree calumnious, or even if it brought personal suffering upon individuals, the Speaker can not be arraigned in a court of justice. But if the calumnious or inflammatory speeches should be reported and published the law will attach responsibility on the publisher. So if the Speaker by authority of the House order an illegal act, though that authority shall exempt him from question, his order shall no more justify the person who executed it than King Charles's warrant for levying ship money could justify his revenue officer."

Taking this to be a sound statement of the legal effect of the Bill of Rights and of the parliamentary law of England, it may be reasonably inferred that the framers of the Constitution meant the same thing by the use of language borrowed from that source.

The court refers to similar provisions in the fundamental laws of the colonies, which afterwards became States. The Massachusetts constitution of 1780 had a provision which received judicial construction in 1808, in a decision from which quotation is made. The opinion of Mr. Justice Story is also quoted in support of the conclusion that—

It would be a narrow view of the constitutional provision to limit it to words spoken in debate. The reason of the rule is as forcible in its application to written reports presented in that body by its committees, to resolutions offered, which, though in writing, must be reproduced in speech, and to the act of voting, whether it is done vocally or by passing between the tellers. In short, to things generally done in a session of the House by one of its Members in relation to the business before it.

Therefore the plea set up by the Members is held good.

2676. A Member having been arrested and detained under mesne process in a civil suit, the House liberated him and restored him to his seat by the hands of its own officer.

On suggestion based on a newspaper report the House investigated the arrest and detention of a Member by authority of a court.

Interpretation of word " felony " as related to the privilege of a Member from arrest.

The House has decided that a Member arrested during vacation was entitled to discharge from arrest and imprisonment on the assembling of Congress.

On December 20, 1866,[2] Mr. Thomas Williams, of Pennsylvania, as a question of privilege, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom it was referred to inquire into the circumstances of the detention from his seat in this House, under arrest, of the Hon. Charles V. Culver,[1] submitted a report in writing, accompanied by the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Speaker be directed to issue his warrant to the Sergeant-at-Arms, commanding him to deliver forthwith the Hon. Charles V. Culver, a Member of this House, detained, as it appears under mesne process issuing out of the court of common pleas of Venango County, in the State of Pennsylvania, in a civil suit instituted therein at the instance of a certain James S. Myers, from the custody of the sheriff and jailer of said county, or any other person or persons presuming to hold and detain the said Culver by virtue of such process, wherever he may be found, a copy of the said warrant, duly authenticated by the Clerk of this House, being first delivered to the party or parties in whose custody he may be, and to make return to this House of the said warrant, along with the manner in which he may have executed the same.

On the same day the Speaker laid before the House the following return made by the Sergeant-at-Arms to the warrant this day issued by order of the House, viz:

OFFICE OF THE SERGEANT-AT-ARMS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., December 20, 1866.

Pursuant to this warrant, I have taken the Hon. C. V. Culver from the custody of Philander R. Gray, esq., sheriff of Venango County, in the State of Pennsylvania, and have delivered to the said Gray a certified copy of the within warrant, as within commanded, and now have the Hon. Charles V. Culver unrestrained in his seat as a Member of the Thirty-ninth Congress.

N. G. ORDWAY,
Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives.

The Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to examine into the case by a resolution[2] passed December 10, Mr. Robert S. Hale, of New York, who introduced the resolution, basing his action upon a newspaper report that Mr. Culver was held in custody, and that on a writ of habeas corpus a United States judge had decided that a Member of Congress arrested under such conditions was not entitled to his privilege. The report of the Judiciary Committee[3] shows that Mr. Culver was arrested in the preceding month of June, during the actual session of Congress, at his home, by virtue of a warrant issuing out of the court of common pleas of the county, under an act of the general assembly of Pennsylvania passed on the 12th day of July, 1842, upon an affidavit filed by a certain James S. Myers, as the plaintiff in an action of assumpsit instituted against the said Culver upon a contract for the return of certain bonds and notes alleged to have been lent to him, charging that the debt incurred thereby was fraudulently contracted by said Culver; and that upon a hearing before the then acting judge of said county he was committed, in default of the required security to the jail, where he had been imprisoned until the 18th instant.

The committee found that under the sixth section of the first article of the Constitution, which provides that Senators and Representatives "shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same," there had been a violation of the privilege of the House, and that the arrest did not fall within any of the specified exemptions. The process issued was but a warrant, authorized by an act of assembly abolishing imprisonment for debt in cases where fraud was charged as an ingredient in the contract, and its effect was only to require the defendant to pay or secure the debt, or give security not to remove or dispose of his property in fraud of his creditor, or that he would apply within thirty days for the benefit of the insolvent laws of the State. It was therefore but a mesne or interlocutory process, and the action which authorized it was no wise penal nor the proceeding itself a criminal one.

[1] The case of Mr. Culver had been brought to the attention of the House on December 10 by a resolution instructing the committee to make the inquiry. The resolution was based on a newspaper paragraph, and was entertained as a question of privilege. Journal, p. 54; Globe, p. 51.

It was conceded that Mr. Culver was neither in actual attendance on the House nor going to or returning from the seat of government at the time when he was arrested. But a liberal construction has always been given in such cases. The arrest was made during the last session of Congress, and the detention continues during the present one. It was his duty to be present, and a Member arrested during vacation, or at any other time when not entitled to assert his privilege, was entitled to his discharge from such arrest and imprisonment on the assembling of the body to which he belonged.

As to the method of proceeding, the report reviews the precedents of Parliament, and the suggestion of Cushing, that the proper course is in conformity with the modern English practice, where liberation is effected by an order of discharge, properly authenticated by the Clerk. But the committee could see no reason for the issue of an order to which no answer could be received but absolute obedience, and where, in case of contumacy, an attachment for contempt would only result in the punishment of the delinquent without effecting the object aimed at. Therefore the committee advised the more summary, simple, and complete remedy of actual deliverance by the hands of the House's own officer.

2677. Challenge of a Member by a Senator in 1796 was determined to be a breach of the privileges of the House.—March 14, 1796,[1] Mr. Abraham Baldwin, one of the Members from the State of Georgia, presented to the House certain papers relative to a correspondence between James Gunn, a United States Senator from Georgia, and himself, including a challenge addressed to him by Gunn. These were received, read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On March 15 the Speaker laid before the House two letters, one from James Gunn and the other from Frederick Frelinghuysen, United States Senator from New Jersey, on the subject referred to in the papers presented to the House on the previous day. These papers, with those submitted the day before, were referred to the Committee on Privileges, to which committee Mr. James Madison, of Virginia, was added, in the place of Mr. Baldwin, who had withdrawn at his own request.

On March 17 Mr. Madison made a report from that committee, which was, on the next day, agreed to. The report held:

That it appears to the committee, from a view of all the circumstances attending the transaction referred to them, that the same was a breach of the privileges of this House on the part of James Gunn, a Senator from the State of Georgia, and Frederick Frelinghuysen, a Senator from the State of New Jersey.

That the several letters addressed to the House by the said James Gunn and the said Frederick Frelinghuysen, together with that addressed by the latter to the committee and herewith reported, contain apologies and acknowledgments on the occasion, which ought to be admitted as satisfactory to the House, and therefore that any further proceeding thereon is unnecessary.

2678. A Member having stated, upon the authority of "common rumor," that another Member had been menaced, there was held to be ground for action.

Question as to the right of the House to interfere for the protection of Members who, without the Hall, get into difficulties disconnected with their official duties. (Footnote.)

The Speakers have been accustomed for many years to give a preliminary determination as to questions presented as involving privilege.

On April 20, 1848,[1] Mr. John G. Palfrey, of Massachusetts, saying that he rose to a question of privilege, stated that common report had represented to Members of this House that a lawless mob had assembled for two nights past and committed acts of violence, setting the laws at defiance and menacing individuals of this body and other persons residing in this city, and that he proposed to submit to the House a preamble and resolution thereon.

Mr. Thomas H. Bayley, of Virginia, raised the question of order, and inquired whether the recital of a fact, upon rumor, that a Member of this House had been menaced could make it a question of privilege.

The Speaker[2] decided that the allegation of the gentleman from Massachusetts raised a question relating to the privilege of Members, and that it would be for the House, and not for the Chair, to decide whether any breach of privilege was involved, or whether any steps were necessary for the protection of any of its Members. The House might call for specifications, and if such specifications were not made it might be sufficient ground for the House, in their own judgment, to refuse the inquiry, but it was not sufficient reason for the Chair to rule it out of order, the House alone having the power to determine a question of privilege.

The record of debates[3] shows that the Speaker said that the question was entirely new, but that the parliamentary law laid down expressly that "common rumor" was sufficient ground for action. Moreover, it was well understood that where the life, or person, or liberty of a Member was menaced in any way it was a proper subject to be acted upon by the House. The case was on record where a Member had been challenged by a person out of doors, and the House had considered that he was menaced and that it constituted a question of privilege. The Chair therefore held, upon the best consideration he could give the question, that where an allegation was made that the life, liberty, or person of a Member of this House was menaced, it was a question of privilege in regard to which any Member ought to be heard. The Speaker then quoted Jefferson's Manual in its reference to the Randall and Whitney case, and the case of a challenge to a Member of the House.[4]

The Chair therefore ruled that it was a privileged question, and that it was for the House to determine whether any steps were necessary to be taken for the protection of any of its Members.

This decision was sustained on appeal; and thereupon Mr. Palfrey offered the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas common report has represented to Members of this House that a lawless mob has assembled within the District of Columbia on each of the two nights last past and has committed acts of violence, setting at defiance the laws and constituted authorities of the United States and menacing individuals of this body and other persons residing in this city: Therefore,

Resolved, That a select committee of five Members be appointed to inquire into the facts above referred to; that said committee have power to send for persons and papers and to report facts, with their opinion whether any legislation is necessary or expedient in the premises; and that they further have leave to sit during the sessions of the House.

After an amendment had been offered and the subject had been debated, the whole subject was, on April 25, laid on the table.[1]

2679. A proposition to investigate as to duels occurring on account of words spoken in debate was admitted as a question of privilege.—On January 16, 1845,[2] Mr. Preston King, of New York, rising to a question of privilege, submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed by the Speaker, whose duty it shall be to inquire and report to this House whether any (and, if any, what) Members of this House have been engaged in fighting a duel on account of words spoken in debate on this floor; and that the said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Resolved, That if it shall appear to the said committee that any Members of this House have been engaged in fighting a duel on account of words spoken in debate on this floor, then the said committee are instructed to report the facts, with a resolution to expel from this House any Member or Members guilty of such crime.

Mr. William W. Payne, of Alabama, having proposed to object to the resolutions, the Speaker[3] said that they involved a question of privilege, and were therefore in order.

[1] The Globe (1st sess. 30th Cong., pp. 664, 649, 650, 672) shows that the resolution gave rise to an extended debate. The riotous proceedings seem to have arisen over an effort to enable certain slaves in the District of Columbia to escape from their masters. The Member who had been menaced was Mr. Joshua R. Giddings, of Ohio, who furnished a statement in writing which Mr. Palfrey read. Mr. Giddings in this statement said that he had been menaced by a mob, and gave particular places and times.

In the debate Mr. Robert Toombs, of Georgia, took the ground that the preamble of the resolution did not aver that any Member of the House had been called in question by a mob or anybody else for anything uttered or done in this House, and he held that the Chair erred if he supposed that this House had the right or authority to interfere generally for the protection of Members in any strait they might get into out of doors, disconnected with their official duties. If the Member had been called in question by anyone for the discharge of his official duty, that would be a question of privilege which would demand the intervention of the House.

Mr. Joseph R. Ingersoll, of Pennsylvania, contended that such a view was too narrow. A far wider extent of jurisdiction was embraced in the character of the assembly, in the fundamental rules of its existence, and in the sovereign necessity and duty of self-preservation which every constituent principle of continued organization implies. Why should a speech delivered be the subject of protection rather than a speech prevented? If you could notice by the power of the House an unlawful attempt to rebuke or assault a Member for the just performance of his duty, why should you not with equal rigor restrain and prevent disorderly attempts to overawe and restrain him from performing it at all? The power to make laws carried with it the power of self-protection while engaged in the act.

The question was debated until August 25, the subject of slavery being often brought in, and on that day was laid on the table.

[2] Second session Twenty-eighth Congress, Journal, pp. 217, 218; Globe, pp. 144–147.

[3] John W. Jones, of Virginia, Speaker.

The resolutions were debated at some length, the power of the House to expel for such an offense being disputed, and the argument being made that a law against dueling made the offense punishable in the District of Columbia.

Finally the resolutions, with a pending amendment, were laid on the table—yeas 106, nays 82.

2680. An appeal of a Member to the President for protection was considered derogatory to the privileges of the House.

It not being clear that a Member had been insulted by officers of the military establishment for words spoken in debate, the House declined to act on his complaint.

On January 14, 1800,[1] a message was received from the President of the United States transmitting a letter which had been addressed to him by a Member of the House, Mr. John Randolph, of Virginia,. In this letter Mr. Randolph complained that he had been grossly and publicly insulted by two officers of the Army or Navy for words of a general nature uttered on the floor of the House, with a view to effect the reduction of the military establishment.

President Adams, in his message of transmittal, said that he had directed the Secretaries of War and Navy to investigate the circumstances, but the case relating to the privileges of the House, it ought, in his opinion, to be inquired into by the House.

The message, with the accompanying letter, was referred to a committee composed of Messrs. Chauncey Goodrich, of Connecticut; Nathaniel Macon, of North Carolina; John W. Kittera, of Pennsylvania; James Jones, of Georgia; Samuel Sewall, of Massachusetts; Robert Williams, of North Carolina, and James A. Bayard, of Delaware.

The evidence showed that at the theater some incidents had occurred which caused suspicion of an attempt to insult Mr. Randolph; but these incidents had been found capable of explanation or so doubtful as not to render it certain that a breach of privilege had been committed. The committee say:[2]

> Your committee, being of opinion that the matter of complaint respects the privileges of the House, inherent in its own body and there exclusively cognizable, can not but consider the appeal in this instance to the Executive authority, however otherwise intended, as derogating from those rights of the House with which are intimately connected both its honor and independence, and the inviolability of its Members.

The committee recommended the adoption of the following resolutions:

> Resolved, That this House entertain a respectful sense of the regard which the President of the United States has shown to its rights and privileges in his message of the 14th instant, accompanied by a letter addressed to him by John Randolph, jr., a Member of this House.
> Resolved, That in respect to the charge alleged by John Randolph, jr., a Member of the House, in his letter addressed to the President of the United States on the 11th instant, and by him submitted to the consideration of the House, that sufficient cause does not appear for the interposition of this House on the ground of a breach of its privileges.

The House, after long debate, adopted the first resolution on June 29, but after amending the second resolution by words condemning the conduct of the officers, the House defeated it by a vote of 49 yeas to 51 nays.

2681. An explanation having been demanded of a Member by a person not a member for a question asked of the latter when a witness before the House, the matter was considered but not pressed as a breach of privilege.—On May 14, 1832,[1] Mr. Eleutheros Cooke, of Ohio, presented to the House a paper accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That the letter of E. S. Davis, and a statement of facts accompanying it, which has been sent to the Chair, containing, as is believed, a breach of the privileges of the House, be read.

This resolution being agreed to, the letter of Mr. Davis to Mr. Cooke was read:

SIR: During my examination before the House of Representatives in the case of General Houston you very impertinently asked, among other questions, my business in this city. Whilst the trial of General Houston was pending I deferred calling on you for the explanation which I now demand through my friend General Demitry.

In connection with this note Mr. Cooke submitted a statement explaining the circumstances, giving a statement of a threat made by Davis on the floor, and claiming that it was an attempt by menace and violence to overawe the Members and curb the freedom of debate.

Mr. Joseph H. Crane, of Ohio, moved a resolution that the communication be referred to a select committee consisting of seven Members, to report the facts, and their opinion whether the same established a contempt and a breach of the privileges of this House or not, the said committee to have power to send for persons and papers.

The House declined to agree to the resolution—87 nays to 85 yeas.

The House seems to have felt not quite sure that a breach of privilege was involved, and not disposed to enter upon another inquiry so soon after the Houston case and while much party feeling was existing.

2682. A letter from a person supposed to have been assailed by a Member in debate asking properly and without menace if the speech was correctly reported was held to involve no question of personal privilege.—On January 23, 1865,[2] Mr. James Brooks, of New York, rose and presented the following letter, addressed to him by Maj. Gen. B. F. Butler, claiming that the said letter presented a question of privilege:

WASHINGTON, January 20, 1865.

SIR: I find in the daily Globe of the 7th instant a report of your remarks in the House of Representatives on the 6th instant, an extract of which, personal to myself, is appended.

I have the honor to inquire whether your remarks are here correctly reported, except, perhaps, the misprint of "bold" for "gold," as the remarks were quoted in other papers; and also whether there were any modifications, explanations, or limitations made by you other than appear in this report.

The gentleman who hands you this will await or call for an answer at any time or place you may designate.

Very respectfully, BENJAMIN F. BUTLER, Major-General.

JAMES BROOKS, Member of the House of Representatives.

[2] Second session Thirty-eighth Congress, Journal, p. 137; Globe, p. 376.

Appended to the letter was the extract from the Globe in which Mr. Brooks was quoted as saying that—an effort was made by the Federal Government during the pendency of the late Presidential election to control the city of New York by sending there a bold robber, in the person of a major-general of the United States.

Mr. George S. Boutwell, of Massachusetts, raised a question of order that the letter did not involve a question of privilege.

The Speaker[1] sustained the point of order, saying:

It appears from the letter just read that the gentleman from New York stigmatized, in a speech which he made on this floor, a certain gentleman as a "gold robber," and that that language having been reported in the public papers a gentleman who supposes himself to be meant wrote the letter just read. It appears to the Chair that there is nothing in the language used in this letter which involves a breach of the privilege of this House. If he ruled that there were, then he would be compelled to rule that letters addressed by constituents to Members of Congress as to how they had voted or spoken on pending propositions were also infringements upon their rights.

We know that language, differing in some degree but still somewhat of the same character, has been used as preliminary to further correspondence under what is called the "code of honor," but which the Chair regards as a code of murder. If the Chair thought this language could be brought within the language of what is called the "code of honor," the Chair would have decided that the gentleman's question of privilege was well taken. But it appears most natural, and not improper, that when a person has been stigmatized here as a "gold robber," he should inquire whether the speech which contained the report had been correctly reported, and whether there had not been some qualifications of such a charge made by the gentleman from New York other than in this report. There is no menace in this inquiry that the Chair can see. The Chair thinks the inquiry a natural one, and not couched in improper language, and therefore rules that it is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Brooks appealed from the decision, but on the succeeding day withdrew the appeal.

2683. The House has declared that a communication from a person not a member, criticising words spoken in debate by a Member, should not be received.—On December 30, 1842,[2] Mr. James A. Meriwether, of Georgia, presented the following resolution:

Resolved, That the communication addressed to the Speaker of this House by Stephen Pleasanton, Fifth Auditor of the Treasury, on the 14th instant, in relation to some remarks made in the House before that time by Mr. Sprigg, a Member from Kentucky, which was received by the Speaker and laid before the House, without a knowledge of its contents, was not such a communication as ought to have been received and printed by the House; and that the same be withheld from the Journal and files of this House, and the original returned to the writer.

The letter was in relation to a statement in debate by Mr. James C. Sprigg, of Kentucky. Mr. Sprigg had criticised the light-house service, and the Fifth Auditor in his letter criticised the statement as "wholly erroneous." Considerable debate was occasioned by the resolution, the ground being taken that Members debating on the floor should not be subjected to replies from persons outside presented and made a part of the records of the House in this way.

The Speaker[3] stated that he was not aware of the nature of the communication, or he would not have presented it.

Mr. Meriwether's resolution was agreed to without division.

2684. A communication addressed to the House by an official in an Executive Department calling in question words uttered by a Member in debate, was criticised as disrespectful and a breach of privilege, and was withdrawn.—On August 12, 1848,[1] Mr. George Fries, of Ohio, by leave, presented a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, which was read to the House.

This communication was in response to a speech in which Mr. Thomas L. Clingman, of North Carolina, had denounced the Indian Bureau as thoroughly corrupt. The letter of the Commissioner was addressed "To the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States," and besides entering into a defense of the Indian Bureau charged the Member of the House making the charges with improper conduct in his representative capacity.

A motion was made by Mr. John A. Rockwell, of Connecticut, that the communication, being disrespectful in its language, be not received.

Considerable discussion arose, it being urged that the letter invaded the privileges of the House, a member being privileged as to his remarks on the floor from being questioned in any other place.

Mr. Fries withdrew the communication.

2685. A menace to the personal safety of Members involves a question of the highest privilege.—On June 10, 1876,[2] during debate some confusion occurred in the Hall in consequence of some glass falling from one of the escutcheons in the ceiling.

Mr. Nathaniel P. Banks, of Massachusetts, after calling attention to the danger to the lives of Members from such possible occurrences offered the following:

Ordered, That the Clerk be directed to inquire into the cause of the disturbance which has just occurred and report the facts found to the House.

The Speaker pro tempore[3] said:

This is a question of the personal safety of Members and is one of the highest privilege. The Chair understands that the Hall is under the control of the Clerk, and that the Clerk has already sent a messenger to ascertain how this has occurred, and he will report to the House what it means.

The order was agreed to.

2686. An officer of the Army having written a letter, which was read in the House, falsely impugning the honor of a Member, the House condemned the action as a gross violation of privilege.

It is an invasion of privilege for a Member in debate to read a letter from a person not a Member calling in question the acts of another Member.

On April 30, 1866,[4] Mr. James G. Blaine, of Maine, offered in the House a letter from James B. Fry, Provost-Marshal-General, impugning the official conduct of Mr. Roscoe Conkling, a member of the House from New York. The letter having been read, a resolution was adopted for a select committee of five to investigate the statements made, respectively, by Mr. Conkling and General Fry, and as to alleged frauds in the recruiting service. The Speaker appointed on this committee Messrs. Samuel Shellabarger, of Ohio, William Windom, of Minnesota, Benjamin M. Boyer, of Pennsylvania, Burton C. Cook, of Illinois, and Samuel L. Warner, of Connecticut.

On July 19, 1866, the committee reported. As part of their report they say:

Your committee deem it proper most earnestly to protest against the practice which has obtained to some extent of causing letters from persons not Members of the House to be read as a part of personal explanation, in which the motives of Members are criticised, their conduct censured, and they are called to answer for words spoken in debate. Such attacks upon Members, made in the House itself and published in its proceedings, and scattered broadcast to the world at the expense of the Government, are, in the opinion of your committee, an improper check upon the freedom of debate, a violation of the privileges, and an infraction of the dignity of the House.

The committee presented the following resolutions, which were agreed to by the House—yeas 96, nays 4:

Resolved, That all the statements contained in the letter of Gen. James B. Fry to Hon. James G. Blaine, a Member of this House, bearing date the 27th of April, A D. 1866, and which was read in this House on the 30th of April, A. D. 1866, in so far as such statements impute to the Hon. Roscoe Conkling, a Member of this House, any criminal, illegal, unpatriotic, or otherwise improper conduct or motives, either as to the matter of his procuring himself to be employed by the Government of the United States in the prosecution of military offenses in the State of New York, in the management of such prosecutions, in taking compensation therefor, or in any other charge, are wholly without foundation in truth; and for their publication there were, in the judgment of this House, no facts connected with said prosecutions furnishing either a palliation or an excuse.

Resolved, That General Fry, an officer of the Government of the United States, and head of one of its military bureaus, in writing and publishing these accusations named in the preceding resolution, and which, owing to the crimes and wrongs which they impute to a Member of this body, are of a nature deeply injurious to the official and personal character, influence, and privileges of such Member, and their publication originating, as in the judgment of the House they did, in no misapprehension of facts, but in the resentment and passion of their author, was guilty of a gross violation of the privileges of such Member and of this House, and his conduct in that regard merits and receives its unqualified disapprobation.

2687. A controversy between a Member and the officials of one of the Executive Departments as to a question of the administration of the duties of that Department was held to involve no question of personal privilege.—On December 19, 1901,[1] Mr. David A. De Armond, of Missouri, claiming the floor for a question of personal privilege, proceeded to have read papers and to make statements concerning transactions which he had had, as a Representative, with the Post-Office Department concerning the appointment of carriers in the rural free-delivery service, and wherein his recommendations to the Department had been disregarded.

Mr. Sereno E. Payne, of New York, made the point of order that no question of personal privilege was presented.

The Speaker[2] said in relation to the question presented by the point of order:

[1] First session Fifty-seventh Congress, Record, pp. 443–445; Journal, p. 165.

[2] David B. Henderson, of Iowa, Speaker.

If a Representative has a controversy with one of the Departments about patronage, the gentleman from Missouri will readily see that it does not constitute a question of personal privilege, which a Member of the House may at any time make the pretext for taking the floor and occupying the time of the House. If the gentleman thinks that attacks have been made upon him in regard to the administration of his office in his representative capacity—if something of that kind were brought before the House—the view of the Chair might be entirely different; but up to this time nothing has been submitted to the House to be read that comes within the rules as a question of personal privilege. * * * There should be some tangible matter laid before the House, the Chair thinks. * * * The gentleman knows well the difference between conclusions and facts. It seems to the Chair that the House should have specific facts before it in order that it may pass upon the question whether the facts thus presented constitute a violation of the privileges of a Member of the House. That is the opinion of the Chair. * * * The gentleman from Missouri will see that there is no tangible thing in the nature of a question of personal privilege before the House. The point of order has been made to that effect, and the Chair has ruled that that does not constitute a question of personal privilege. * * * The point of order was made against the gentleman's claim that he had a question of personal privilege when the document that he sent up was read. The Chair is well aware that a Member might be attacked physically; that there might be no document at all. * * * The Chair desires to state that it is a question for the House to decide whether a matter is a question of privilege or not. Many Speakers, for the purpose of saving the time of the House, have passed preliminarily upon questions of this kind. As to the points of order which are pending, the Chair believes that both are well taken. Such matters as that which the gentleman from Missouri is now trying to bring before the House have usually been made matters of "personal explanation" by unanimous consent. The Chair can not see that anything thus far developed by the gentleman constitutes a question of privilege, and thinks that the points of order are well taken. * * * If the Chair is to admit discussion of every disturbance that a Representative has within his district over rural free-delivery or post-office appointments the transaction of the business of this country will soon be prevented by the consideration of such questions. Therefore the Chair must hold that nothing has been presented by the gentleman that comes within the rule as a question of personal privilege. The remedy of the gentleman is in an appeal from the decision of the Chair, or to ask unanimous consent to make a personal explanation, which the Chair will be glad to submit to the House.

2688. A resolution to investigate the failure of the Post-Office Department to remove a postmaster charged with an attempt to influence a Member corruptly was held not to present a question of privilege.—On September 23, 1893,[1] Mr. John L. Bretz, of Indiana, presented, as involving a question of privilege, and caused to be read, letters from a postmaster containing a corrupt proposition intended to influence the action of a Member of Congress with a view to securing a retention of said postmaster in office.

Mr. Bretz thereupon submitted the following as a privileged resolution:

Whereas on the 16th day of September, 1893, charges of an attempt to bribe a public officer and incompetency to perform the official duties of the office were filed with the Hon. Robert A. Maxwell, Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, against the present Republican postmaster at Celestine, Ind., and the said Maxwell's attention specially called to the nature and character of said charges, and a request was made for the immediate removal of said postmaster; and

Whereas the said Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General has failed and refused to make said removal: Now, therefore,

Be it resolved, That a committee of three Members of this House be appointed by the Speaker, whose duty it shall be to investigate and inquire into the reasons, if any exist, why said removal is not made, and report to this House at an early day the result of said investigation.

The Speaker[2] held that said resolution was not privileged.

2689. A Member is not entitled to the floor on a question of personal privilege unless the subject which he proposes to present relates to himself in his representative capacity.—On February 11, 1901,[1] during the consideration of the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and while general debate was in progress, Mr. Thaddeus M. Mahon, of Pennsylvania, called attention to a meeting of Boer sympathizers over which another Member, Mr. William Sulzer, of New York, had presided, and whereof the expenses had absorbed almost all the funds raised for the cause.

Mr. Sulzer, after occupying the floor a limited time in reply, again claimed the floor for a question of personal privilege.

The Chairman[2] said:

Without attempting to pass upon the application of any language made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the gentleman from New York personally, it is the duty of the Chair to rule that any language used must have reflected upon the gentleman in his representative capacity.

Mr. Sulzer insisted that it had been intimated that he had collected funds for widows and orphans of the Boers and that these funds had not been turned over to those for whom they had been collected, and urged that this affected his position as a Representative.

After debate the Chairman held:

The Chair is ready to rule. The rule under which this question is invoked is Rule IX:

"Questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings; second, the rights, reputation, and conduct of Members individually in their representative capacity only."

Now, unless the question of personal privilege capable of being invoked here relates to conduct of gentlemen in their representative capacity, it is a restriction on the rule. The Chair is bound to say he understood nothing from the gentleman from Pennsylvania as reflecting upon the gentleman from New York individually or in his representative character. * * * The Chair holds that the gentleman has not presented a question of personal privilege.

2690. It was held in 1894 that the act of the Sergeant-at-Arms in pursuance of the law for deductions of Members' salaries for absence might not be reviewed on the floor as a question of privilege.—On April 26, 1894,[3] Mr. Thaddeus M. Mahon, of Pennsylvania, presented, as involving a question of privilege, that he had received from the Sergeant-at-Arms a circular note requesting him to certify the number of days he had been absent during the current fiscal month, for which deduction should be made pursuant to section 40 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. Mahon insisted that said section of the Revised Statutes (sec. 40) had been in effect repealed. He therefore submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms is hereby directed to pay to Members and Delegates their salary on the 4th day of each and every month, as provided by law, and that he shall not deduct any part of a Member's salary on account of absence under the act of August 16, 1856, until the absence of a Member has been duly certified to him under a rule or some action of this House by the officer authorized to certify the same.

[2] William H. Moody, of Massachusetts, Chairman.

[3] Second session Fifty-third Congress, Journal, pp. 358, 359.

Mr. Joseph H. Outhwaite, of Ohio, made the point that no question of privilege was presented.

The Speaker[1] sustained the point of order, holding as follows:

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Mahon] submits a resolution which he claims raises a privileged question; and in order to determine whether this resolution does raise a privileged question it is necessary to look to the rules of the House and to the resolution itself. The rules of the House provide that the Sergeant-at-Arms shall keep the accounts of Members and pay them their salaries according to law. This House separately and alone has no control of the salary of its Members. The Constitution provides that Representatives shall receive a salary to be fixed by law. Congress has passed a law fixing the salary of Representatives, and all that this House has ever undertaken to do under its rules in dealing with the question of salaries is to provide that the Sergeant-at-Arms shall keep the accounts for the pay and mileage of Members and Delegates and pay them as provided by law. When you turn to the law you find that the Sergeant-at-Arms is required to deduct from the monthly payments of each Member or Delegate the amount of his salary for each day that he has been absent from the House, unless the reason for such absence was the sickness of himself or some other member of his family. Gentlemen state that this is not the law. It is not the purpose or province of the House of Representatives to determine that question. This House can make law, but the construction of law is for the courts and not for the House. The Sergeant-at-Arms is a bonded officer, a disbursing officer of the Government. He is charged with the duty of executing public law. If the Sergeant-at-Arms should plead the opinion of this House as to whether a law existed or was repealed, such opinion would have no effect in relieving him from any liability on his bond if such opinion were wrong. This House can not construe the law.

Now, let us see what the resolution is. First, "The Sergeant-at-Arms is hereby directed to pay to Members and Delegates their salaries on the 4th day of each and every month, as provided by law." That is the rule of the House now. If it be the purpose to change the rule, it is not a privileged question unless reported from the Committee on Rules. So that the first part of this resolution can not, certainly, be considered as privileged. What is the second?

"That he shall not deduct any part of a Member's salary on account of absence under the act of August 18, 1856, until the absence of a Member has been duly certified to him under a rule or some action of this House by the officer authorized to certify the same."

That is a proposition, not that the law for the deduction from salaries of Members is repealed by implication, not that the law does not exist, but that the Sergeant-at-Arms shall not enforce the law until the absence of Member has been certified to him under a rule or some action of the House by an officer authorized to certify the same.

Now, how does that constitute a question of privilege? That is a change of the rules. What allegation is there in this resolution that any right of a Member of this House or Members collectively has been infringed or invaded? The Chair can not see any. The Chair desires to say, in justice to the Sergeant-at-Arms, that the form of the certificate which has been read was suggested by the Chair, upon the request of the Sergeant-at-Arms. That form of certificate was intended to put it wholly within the power of the Member himself to say whether or not any deduction should be made under section 40 of the Revised Statutes.

The Chair believed then and believes now that every disbursing officer of the United States who is charged by law with the performance of a duty in paying out money has a right to make all reasonable regulations, which must be complied with by those to whom the money is to be disbursed before they can demand its payment. The regulation which the Sergeant-at-Arms has made is simply to require the Member himself to certify whether or not under that law any deduction should be made. The Chair desires to say further, so that the House may fully understand it, that as he now understands the law the Chair would not certify the pay of any Member as to the amount that might be due him for a month's salary unless the Member first furnished information as to how long he had been absent, for which deductions should be made. The Chair holds that there is no question of privilege in this resolution.

[1] Charles F. Crisp, of Georgia, Speaker.

Mr. Mahon thereupon submitted, as involving a question of privilege, the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the House that the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives has no authority to require each Member of the House to report to him whether he has been absent from the sessions of the House, and the reasons for such absence, in the absence of any rule of the House giving him such authority, and that the notice of such requirement given by the Sergeant-at-Arms is in derogation of the rights of Members of this House.

Mr. Richard P. Bland, of Missouri, and Mr. William M. Springer, of Illinois, made the point that the resolution did not present a question of privilege.

The Speaker sustained the point, for the reasons indicated in the preceding decision of the Chair.

Mr. Mahon appealed from the decision of the Chair. Mr. Outhwaite moved to lay the appeal on the table; and the question being put, Shall the appeal lie on the table? it was decided in the affirmative, yeas 167, nays 76.

2691. One Member having, in a newspaper article, made charges against another Member in the latter's individual and not his representative capacity, a committee of the House found no question of privilege involved.

A distinction has been drawn between charges made by one Member against another in a newspaper and the same made in debate on the floor.

A charge made outside the House of disreputable conduct on the part of a Member before he became a Member has been held not to involve a question of privilege.

On May 4, 1868,[1] Mr. William Windom, of Minnesota, as a question of privilege, submitted the following:

Whereas Elihu B. Washburne, a Member of this House from the State of Illinois, did, on the 19th day of April, 1868, in the columns of a newspaper published in the city of St. Paul, Minn., styled the St. Paul Press, make a violent attack upon the character of Ignatius Donnelly, a Member of this House from the State of Minnesota, in which he charged him, among other things, with bribery and corruption, and with being a fugitive from justice, in the following words: [Here follows the letter in full.]

And whereas the said Elihu B. Washburne did, on the 2d day of May, 1868, in his place on the floor of the House of Representatives, repeat said charges against the said Ignatius Donnelly, in the following words: [Here follows the words in full.]

Resolved, That a select committee of seven be appointed by the Chair to investigate the truth or falsehood of the charges so made, with power to send for persons and papers, and with leave to report to this House at any time

The Speaker[2] said:

The Chair is of the opinion that this is a question of privilege upon the ground that "charges affecting the character of a Member of Congress," when made distinctly, even by a person not a fellow Member, are regarded as questions of privilege. General charges and denunciations, vague and not specific in their character, are not usually regarded as questions of privilege. But when charges have been made in newspapers by persons not holding the relations to a Member of Congress that a fellow Member does, imputing distinctly that affecting the honor and reputation of a Member, they are regarded as questions of privilege. This, however, is subject to the rules of the House; and if objection is made to the consideration of this resolution the Chair will submit to the House the question: Shall the resolution be considered at this time for its decision?

---

[1] Second session Fortieth Congress, Journal pp. 650–653; Globe p. 2355.

[2] Schuyler Colfax, of Indiana, Speaker.

No objection was made and the resolution was considered and agreed to.

On June 1, 1868,[1] Mr. Luke P. Poland, of Vermont, from the select committee appointed to investigate certain charges made by Mr. Elihu B. Washburne, of Illinois, against Mr. Ignatius Donnelly, of Minnesota, submitted a report. The investigation had arisen over a letter written by Mr. Washburne, and published in a newspaper, charging, among other things, that Mr. Donnelly, before he was a Member of the House, had left Philadelphia under suspicious circumstances between two days. The committee say in regard to this charge:

The committee have endeavored to give the subject such careful and considerate attention as it deserves, and while anxious to do exact and equal justice to both the gentlemen interested in it, they have been equally anxious not to establish a precedent that should go beyond the proper legal and parliamentary jurisdiction and authority of this House, in sustaining and protecting its own privileges and that of its Members. And especially have your committee desired not to go beyond the true line of privilege in a case where a precedent, once established, would necessarily furnish occasion for frequent and perplexing appeals for the exercise of the power of the House for the defense and protection of the reputations of its Members from attacks having no reference to their official character.

Upon such consideration and examination as your committee have been able to give this question, they are unanimously of the opinion that the charges of disreputable conduct (or of criminal conduct, if the language will bear that interpretation), made by Mr. Washburne against Mr. Donnelly anterior to his becoming a Member of the House, are not a breach of privileges of the House, or of Mr. Donnelly as a Member, and therefore furnish no proper ground for an investigation with a view to protect and defend the privileges of the House or its Members by punishing the person violating them.

Libelous publcations in reference to that parliamentary body itself are a breach of its privileges which may be punished, and so a libelous publication against a single Member of such body, in his capacity as a Member, or affecting his conduct or character as such, is equally so, as casting discredit upon the body. But a libelous publication concerning a Member in his private character and capacity only has never been regarded as a breach of privilege, either of the body of which he is a Member or of the Member himself, and he must seek redress for such private injury in the same manner other citizens do, by vindication through the public press, or by resort to the legal tribunals. The principle is much the same as that applicable to the person of a Member. If an assault be made, or other personal injury be done, to a Member while in attendance upon the House, or while going to or returning from such attendance, it is a breach of privilege; but an assault upon the person of a Member not in attendance, and in no way affecting his attendance as a Member, is not.

As has been already stated, if the words of this letter had been used by Mr. Washburne upon the floor of the House, they would have been disorderly, a breach of the privileges of the House and of Mr. Donnelly as a Member, and he could have properly been punished therefor. This is upon the ground that the use of any language upon the floor derogatory to the personal character of a Member is calculated to provoke disturbance and disorder in the proceedings, and bring the body itself into contempt and disgrace. These reasons do not apply to the publication of the same words in a newspaper a thousand miles distant.

The committee therefore asked to be discharged from the consideration of the subject.

2692. In order to afford a basis for a question of personal privilege a newspaper charge against a Member should present a specific and serious attack upon his representative character.—On January 30, 1882,[2] Mr. William E. Robinson, of New York, claiming the floor for a question of privilege, had read at the Clerk's desk extracts from newspapers criticising his conduct in championing the cause of Irish suspects imprisoned in Great Britain and reminding him that he was elected to Congress to represent a district of New York, and not an "imaginary Irish republic."

Mr. Thomas M. Browne, of Indiana, made the point of order that no question of privilege was involved.

The Speaker [1] said:

The Chair is inclined to hold that unless a Member is criticised in his representative or official capacity in such way as to affect his standing as Representative comments by newspapers on matters that can not be brought before the House for its action are not questions of personal privilege.

The Chair then went on to speak of the difficulty in determining in such cases a rule to follow, but ended by sustaining the point of order.

2693. On May 18, 1892,[2] Mr. William W. Bowers, of California, claiming the floor for a question of personal privilege, stated that a Member had sent to the Clerk's desk a paper reflecting on himself in that the matter referred to the complaint of certain settlers in a county of his district who claimed that the Government and Congress had been unconsciously used as a part of a conspiracy to defraud them. Mr. Bowers stated that he had been threatened by lobbyists in the matter, and that the presentation of the article was part of a plan, and that the article was intended as a reflection on him as Representative of the district.

The article nowhere charged Mr. Bowers by name or directly, although it might be construed as making insinuations against him.

The article having been read, Mr. William D. Bynum, of Indiana, made the point of order that there was nothing in the article giving rise to a question of personal privilege.

The Speaker [3] sustained the point of order, saying:

The Chair does not see that it presents a question of privilege.

2694. A newspaper charge that a Member had been influenced in his action as a Representative by the Speaker was held to involve a question of privilege.—On March 17, 1902,[4] Mr. Frank C. Wachter, of Maryland, rising to a question of personal privilege, had read the following from a newspaper:

While the Cuban reciprocity fight was at its warmest and the "insurgents" were making daily assaults against the Ways and Means Committee, Speaker Henderson sent for Representative Wachter, of Maryland, of the Baltimore district.

"Why are you so much interested in this sugar-beet question?" demanded the Speaker, angrily. "You have no sugar-beet interests."

"Well, it seems fair enough to me," replied the Baltimore man. "Furthermore, I have some constituents who own sugar-beet factories."

"How many?"

"Oh, two or three."

"How many have you got interested in the Sparrows Point improvement, for which $300,000 or $400,000 are asked?"

"My whole district is virtually interested in that."

"Well, then, it is up to you, if you are a good Congressman, to choose between sugar beet and your item in the river and harbor bill."

Mr. Wachter having proceeded with remarks, Mr. James D. Richardson, rising to a point of order, stated that no question of personal privilege was involved.

The Speaker [1] overruled the point of order, stating that the Member had been attacked in his representative capacity.

2695. A Member may not present as involving a question of personal privilege a newspaper criticism of his relations with other Members or the Speaker.—On December 16, 1903,[2] Mr. John Lind, of Minnesota, claimed the floor for a question of personal privilege and proceeded to discuss an editorial in a newspaper, saying:

> It comments upon my committee assignments and in that connection insinuates that the relations between the minority leader and myself are not cordial. Such is not the fact, Mr. Speaker, so far as I am advised and know. Our personal and political relations are cordial. Besides that, the minority leader recommended my assignment to two other committees regarded by this House as more prominent than the assignments which I received.

Mr. Sereno E. Payne, of New York, made the point of order that no question of privilege was presented.

The Speaker [3] took the view that no question of privilege was presented.

2696. The House has entertained as a question of privilege and ordered the investigation of newspaper charges against a Member in his representative capacity.—On January 30, 1880,[4] Mr. Joseph H. Acklen, of Louisiana, as a question of privilege, called the attention of the House to a newspaper publication charging him with making to the House from the Committee on Foreign Affairs an unauthorized report. Mr. Acklen having explained, offered a resolution directing the Committee on Foreign Affairs to investigate the truth or falsity of the statements in the paragraph to which he had called the attention of the House. The resolution was agreed to by the House.

2697. On May 12, 1882,[5] Mr. Fetter S. Hoblitzell, of Maryland, as a question of privilege, submitted the following, which was considered and agreed to:

> Whereas a letter appeared in the Baltimore Herald of the 4th instant reflecting on Mr. Hoblitzell, a Representative from the State of Maryland: Therefore,
> Resolved, That the Committee on Claims are hereby directed to make immediate investigation into the conduct of the clerk of that committee in connection with the letter referred to and to report its action to the House at as early a day as possible.

Mr. Hoblitzell had charged that the clerk of the committee had placed a letter on the files of the committee not referred to the committee by the House, the said letter reflecting upon the conduct of Mr. Hoblitzell in connection with a certain claim.

2698. On February 25, 1884,[6] Mr. E. John Ellis, of Louisiana, rising to a question of personal privilege, had read at the Clerk's desk an extract from a newspaper, wherein it was stated that he had received a sum of money for assisting in getting a contract under the Government in the Post-Office Department. After remarks he submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads be instructed to investigate the charges reflecting upon Mr. Ellis, a Representative from Louisiana, in connection with star-route frauds recently published, and for this purpose are authorized to send for persons and papers.

2699. On December 4, 1862,[1] Mr. J. M. Ashley, of Ohio, claimed the floor on a question of personal privilege, and the Speaker, after learning that charges had been made in a newspaper against Mr. Ashley, said:

It has been decided that publications in a newspaper are not questions of privilege unless it is proposed to make them the basis of some action on the part of the House.

Mr. Ashley having stated that he proposed to ask an investigation, the Speaker[2] recognized him for a question of privilege, and he presented the following, which were agreed to by the House:

Whereas charges derogatory to the character and standing of a Representative are made in the Toledo Daily Blade and other newspapers published in the Tenth Congressional district of Ohio, in connection with certain letters written by Hon. J. M. Ashley to Hon. F. M. Case, touching his application and appointment as surveyor-general of the Territory of Colorado, of the date of February 2, 1861, March 12, March 18, and March 19, 1862, and published in said papers of September last: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed for the purpose of investigating the truth of the charges above referred to, and instructed to inquire into the whole subject-matter, with power to send for persons and papers, to examine witnesses on oath or affirmation, and to employ a stenographer at the usual rate of compensation, with leave to report at any time.

2700. Language which may be replied to as a matter of personal privilege must reflect on the Member in his representative capacity.— On February 21, 1893,[3] Mr. Joseph E. Washington, of Tennessee, submitted as a question of privilege that during the proceedings under the call he had been charged with representing corporations instead of his constituents in his opposition to the bill H. R. 9350, and proceeded to reply to said charge.

Mr. William H. Cate, of Arkansas, made the point of order that no question of privilege was presented by Mr. Washington.

The Speaker[4] sustained the point of order, saying that the language complained of appeared to be very general and did not seem to charge any gentleman with representing railroads. The Chair would ask the gentleman from Tennessee and the House to bear in mind that a mere desire to reply to something that some gentleman had said on the floor did not constitute a question of privilege. The language complained of must be something that reflected upon the Representative in his capacity as a Representative.

2701. A newspaper charge that a Member of the House had been influenced by Executive patronage was submitted as privileged, but the House declined to investigate.

A contention that common fame was sufficient basis for the House to entertain a proposition relating to its privileges.

On February 12, 1858,[1] Mr. Charles B. Hoard, of New York, arose and proposed to submit the following resolution as a question of privilege:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by the Speaker to inquire and investigate whether any improper attempts have been or are being made by any persons connected with the executive department of this Government, or by any persons acting under their advice or consent, to influence the action of this House, or any of its Members, upon any question or measure upon which the House has acted, or which it has under consideration, directly or indirectly, by any promise, offer, or intimation of employment, patronage, office, or favor under the Government, or under any department, officer, or servant thereof, to be conferred or withheld in consideration of any vote given or to be given, withheld or to be withheld, with power to send for persons and papers, and leave to report at any time, by bill or otherwise.

The same having been read, Mr. Edward A. Warren, of Arkansas, made the point of order that the proposed resolution did not present a question of privilege.

After debate, the Speaker[2] stated that, following the precedents in former Congresses, he would entertain the proposition so far as to submit the question to the House as to whether it did or did not involve a question of privilege.

The Speaker held that the resolution on its face presented a question of privilege, and while he doubted whether the newspaper articles which were introduced to support its allegations were such as justified the predicate of the resolution, he would submit the question to the House as to whether a question of privilege was involved. The Speaker quoted as a precedent the action of Speaker Cobb in the Thirty-first Congress.

Pending the question submitted by the Speaker, the House voted, on motion of Mr. Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, that it be laid upon the table.

On March 4[3] Mr. Hoard modified the resolution heretofore submitted to read as follows:

Whereas the Member from New York, the Hon. Mr. Hoard, read from the Clerk's stand, in this House, the following paragraph from the New York Tribune of the 11th February, to wit:

"WASHINGTON, Wednesday, February 10, 1858.

"I learn that, until Monday morning, it was expected that Burns, of Ohio, would vote against the Lecomptonites. On the morning of that day, however, he came to another perception of his duty on the understanding with the President that his son-in-law should retain the valuable place of postmaster at Keokuk, Iowa, and that he himself should be gratified with the office of marshal of the northern district of Ohio when his present term in the House is completed."

Resolved, That a committee of five persons be appointed by the Speaker to inquire if there was any collusion or bargain made between the said Mr. Burns and the President that if he, Burns, would vote to refer the President's Kansas message to the standing committee on the Territories, that the said Burns's son-in-law should retain the position of postmaster at Keokuk, Iowa, and also that he, the said Burns, should be gratified or appointed marshal of the northern district of Ohio after his present term in the House expired; and to further investigate whether any improper attempts have been made or are being made, directly or indirectly, by any person connected with the executive department of this Government, or by any other person with their advice and consent, to influence the action of any Member of this House upon any question or measure upon which the House has acted or which it has under consideration; with power to send for persons and papers, and with leave to report at any time, by bill or otherwise.

The Speaker having stated the question to be, Shall the said preamble and resolution, as modified, be received and entertained on the ground that the privileges of the House are involved? a debate arose, Mr. Hoard contending that common fame was sufficient basis for the House to entertain the proposition, and quoted parliamentary authorities in support of his contention. It was urged in opposition that the investigation would be inexpedient and useless and that the report emanated from irresponsible sources.

The whole subject was laid on the table, on motion of Mr. Mathias H. Nichols, of Ohio, by a vote of yeas 92, nays 80.

2702. An "absurd and purposeless" anonymous letter proposing a corrupt bargain to a Member of the House was held by a committee of the House to create no breach of privilege.—On April 17, 1880,[1] Mr. Van H. Manning, of Mississippi, as a question of privilege, submitted the following:

Whereas a certain anonymous letter, dated House of Representatives, Washington, District of Columbia, March 4, 1880, addressed to Hon. William M. Springer, offering a bribe of $5,000 if he would prevent the unseating of William D. Washburn, of Minnesota, the contestee in the pending election case of Donnelly v. Washburn, was mailed on the 8th day of March, 1880, in the post-office of the House of Representatives, and delivered to the Hon. William M. Springer, then and now the chairman of the Committee on Elections, before which said election case at that time was pending; and

Whereas said letter purports to be an attempt to corruptly influence the action of said Hon. William M. Springer as a member of said committee and of the House of Representatives; and

Whereas another private letter was sent to and received by the said Springer, in reference to the said contest, signed by H. H. Finley; and

Whereas the language by the said Springer, published in the Congressional Record of the 6th instant, in his speech on the subject before the House, is construed by many Members as a charge against said Donnelly of having inspired the writing of the said letter; and

Whereas said Donnelly has requested an investigation of said matter: Now, therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of seven Members of this House be appointed by the Speaker to inquire and report to this House as to the authorship of said anonymous letter, who sent it, and the purpose for which said letters were sent, and all other matters in connection with the same, and that said committee be authorized to inquire and report to the House thereon whether, in either or all of the letters in controversy and written to Hon. William M. Springer, there has been any breach of the privileges of the House or of any Member thereof, and said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, etc.

This resolution was agreed to by the House.

On March 3, 1881, the committee reported,[2] and both majority and minority concurred in the view that there was no breach of the privileges of the House or of any Member, since the anonymous letter could not be traced to any source, and was of itself absurd and purposeless.[3]

2703. A newspaper article charging certain Members by name with conspiracy to defraud the Government was presented as a matter of privilege.—On December 12, 1889,[4] Mr. Benjamin Butterworth, of Ohio, as a question of privilege, presented a preamble and resolution, providing for the appointment of a committee to investigate a charge made in a certain newspaper that certain persons, including several Members of the House and Senate, himself included, had entered into a corrupt contract to defraud the United States through the sale of ballot boxes. No objection was made to the receipt of the resolution as a question of privilege, and it was agreed to by the House.

2704. An accusation in a newspaper that certain Members had received an excess of mileage pay was held to involve a question of privilege.—On December 27, 1848,[1] Mr. William Sawyer, of Ohio, claimed the floor for a question of privilege, and stated that he, with most of the Members of the House, was accused, in the New York Tribune of Friday last, of having charged and received an excess of mileage, and, as a consequence, with having been guilty of fraud on the Treasury.

Mr. Sawyer thereupon demanded the right to be heard on the question as a question of privilege.

The Speaker[2] stated that it was for the House to decide upon the extent of its own privileges, and he therefore propounded it to the House, whether they would entertain the case submitted by the gentleman from Ohio as a question of privilege.

And the question being taken, the House decided in the affirmative, and thereupon Mr. Sawyer proceeded with his remarks.

Having concluded without moving any specific proposition on the subject, Mr. Thomas J. Turner, of Illinois, said that he rose also to a question of privilege, and stated that he, with other Members of the House, was charged in the same paper to which the gentleman from Ohio had alluded with fraud and peculation on the Treasury.

Mr. Turner proceeded to speak on the question as a question of privilege, when Mr. Robert M. McLane, of Maryland, rose to a question of order, and insisted that the gentleman from Illinois was out of order, because the decision of the House upon the case presented by the gentleman from Ohio, by which it was declared a question of privilege, was not a decision of the same effect on the case of the gentleman from Illinois. This was no question of privilege in itself; the gentleman from Illinois was therefore out of order.

The Speaker decided that the question was the same as that raised by the gentleman from Ohio, but that, on the demand of the gentleman from Maryland, he would again call upon the House to say whether the question should be again entertained as a question of privilege.

The House thereupon decided, yeas 85, nays 76, that it was a question of privilege.

2705. A newspaper article charging Members of the House generally with abuse of the franking privilege was held to involve a question of privilege.—On January 4, 1906,[3] Mr. Thetus W. Sims, of Tennessee, claiming the floor for a question of privilege, asked for the reading of the following newspaper article:

---

[1] Second session Thirtieth Congress, Journal, pp. 152, 153; Globe, pp. 108, 109.

[2] Robert C. Winthrop, of Massachusetts, Speaker.

ABOLISH THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE?

We quite agree that something ought to be done for the relief of the Post-Office Department. Its work is simply tremendous, and, by an interesting coincidence, its usefulness is quite as great. There is no section of the governmental machinery more important or more accurately and satisfactorily conducted. But the burden put upon Mr. Cortelyou and his coadjutors can be materially lightened without imparing its efficiency. It is our opinion, indeed, that the people and the Government both would be better off if the franking privilege were abolished utterly.

That this privilege has been outrageously abused is a fact of universal knowledge. Congressmen load the postal cars with all sorts of freight—furniture, libraries, kitchen utensils, the family wash, pianos, poultry, barnyard animals, etc., without limit. They frank a cow, a washtub, or a churn as glibly as they do a letter or a speech that no one ever heard. They go further—they lend their franks in large, uncounted bunches to societies and propagandas that would flourish on the public Treasury as they already thrive upon the people's discontent. The whole system has been converted to the most abominable ends. It presents the perfected spectacle of graft. But its worst expression is to be found in the lumbering up of the mail cars, the preposterous demands upon the Department's resources of transportation, and the corresponding and concurrent crippling of the postal service in all its proper and legitimate activities.

We note the presentation of an alternative arrangement—an arrangement under the operation of which Members of Congress will receive a direct allowance for the purpose of conducting their official correspondence without cost to themselves. The expedient is most commendable. We quite agree that Members of Congress, who are but ill-paid public servants, should be spared the constant drain upon their resources involved in postage and the like. They should at least be left entirely free of artificial taxes and protected in the complete enjoyment of what small emolument has been assigned them. But this franking concession, which has grown to the proportions of insolvent and predaceous graft, this should be contracted within the limits of common decency and transformed into an explicit allowance, no matter how generous and liberal it may be.

We think there are very few Congressmen who would care to oppose this adjustment in full view of the public gaze. Why not try it, gentlemen?

Mr. Sims later proposed this resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads be, and hereby is, instructed to investigate whether or not there are or have been abuses of the franking privilege by Members of Congress or in the name of Members of Congress.

Question being made as to the matter, the Speaker[1] said:

The Chair hardly thinks that the article presents a question of personal privilege. * * *. The Chair will state to the House that the resolution is privileged. The Chair will read from the Digest:

"In presenting a question of personal privilege a Member is not required in the first instance to make a motion or offer a resolution; but such is not the rule in presenting a case involving the privileges of the House."

Now, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Sims] has had read an editorial, as he states, and having had read the editorial it seems to the Chair to involve the privileges of the House. He now sends up the resolution which had just been reported. In the opinion of the Chair, the privileges of the House are involved.

2706. It was held that a newspaper report of a Member's speech might not be examined as a matter of privilege.—On January 22, 1867,[2] Mr. Lawrence S. Trimble, of Kentucky, rose and proposed as a question of privilege to call attention to a report of the Associated Press of remarks made by him in the House.

[1] Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois, Speaker.

[2] Second session Thirty-ninth Congress, Journal, pp. 228, 229; Globe, p. 659.

The Speaker [1] decided that the gentleman from Kentucky was out of order, on the ground that no question of privilege was involved in such a report.

Mr. William E. Finck, of Ohio, having appealed, the appeal was laid on the table, yeas 113, nays 1.

2707. A newspaper publication stating that a certain Member would unite with others in a certain legitimate course of action was held not to involve a question of personal privilege.—On April 17, 1897,[2] Mr. Robert E. Burke, of Texas, rising to a question of privilege, stated that he held in his hand a newspaper in which were printed the names of a number of Members, among them his own, who were credited with the intention of forming an opposition to the policy of the House of adjourning for three days at a time. Mr. Burke proceeded to state that he should vote upon the question according to the dictates of his own judgment, without reference to the opinions or purposes of other men.

The Speaker [3] said:

The Chair hardly thinks this can be regarded as a question of personal privilege.

2708. No question of privilege arises from the fact that a newspaper has attributed to a Member certain remarks which he denies having used.—On July 13, 1894,[4] Mr. Allan C. Durborow, of Illinois, as involving a question of privilege, sent to the Clerk's desk and had read an article published in a newspaper in which were attributed to him certain expressions which he denied having used.

Mr. Charles H. Grosvenor, of Ohio, made the point that the article just read did not present a question of privilege.

The Speaker [5] pro tempore sustained the point of order.

Mr. Durborow then, by unanimous consent, made a personal explanation denying that he had in any manner expressed the sentiments attributed to him in said paper.

2709. A newspaper allegation that a certain number of Representatives, whose names were not given, had entered into a corrupt speculation was held to involve a question of privilege.

Instance wherein the Speaker submitted to the decision of the House the question as to whether or not a matter involved privilege.

It is in order to move to discharge a committee from the consideration of a proposition involving a question of privilege.

On January 12, 1891,[6] Mr. Alexander M. Dockery, of Missouri, having claimed the floor on a question of personal privilege, submitted the following preamble and resolution, viz:

Whereas on the 1st day of December last the following preamble and resolution were introduced and referred to the Committee on Rules:

Whereas it is alleged in the Washington correspondence of the St.Louis Globe-Democrat, under date of September 20 last, that 12 Senators and 15 Representatives, pending the passage of an act entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes," approved July 14, 1890, were admitted to partnership in various silver "pools" by which they realized $1,000,000 profits in the advance of the price of silver after the passage of the said act: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures is hereby instructed to inquire into all the facts and circumstances connected with the said alleged purchase and sale of silver, and for that purpose it shall have power to send for persons and papers and administer oaths, and shall also have the right to report at any time. The expenses of said inquiry shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House upon vouchers approved by the chairman of said committee; and

Whereas the said Committee on Rules has failed to report the resolution to the House for its action, notwithstanding the allegations of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat involves the integrity of the proceedings of the House: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be discharged from the further consideration of said resolution and that it be now considered by the House.

After debate[1] on the question of order raised against the said preamble and resolution by Mr. Nelson Dingley jr., of Maine,

The Speaker[2] stated that, in accordance with the practice in respect to questions of this character, he would submit the same to the House, and thereupon the Speaker stated the question to be: Does the said preamble and resolution present a question of privilege? And it was decided in the affirmative, yeas 149, nays 80.

2710. A general charge of violation of law by Members, although not specifying the offense as within the existing term of service, was held to present a question of privilege.—On January 4, 1904,[3] Mr. James Hay, of Virginia, claiming the floor for a question of privilege, offered the following:

Whereas Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General J. L. Bristow, in his report to the Postmaster-General, dated October 24, 1903, and which report has been transmitted to a committee of this House, has charged that long-time leases for post-office premises were canceled and the rent increased upon the recommendation of influential Representatives;

And whereas it is charged in the same report that "if a Member of Congress requested an increase in the clerk hire allowed a postmaster, Beavers usually complied, regardless of the merits of the case;"

And whereas certain cases of an aggravated character are cited on pages 133, 134, and 135 of said report to sustain the above charges;

And whereas on page 145 of said report it is charged that Members of Congress have violated section 3739 of the Revised Statutes, and that "in the face of this statute Beavers has made contracts with Members of Congress for the rental of premises, either in their own names, the names of their agents, or some member of their families;"

And whereas these charges and others contained in said report reflect upon the integrity of the membership of this House, and upon individual Members of this House whose names are not mentioned: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Speaker of this House appoint a committee consisting of five members of this House to investigate said charges; that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, to enforce the production of the same; to examine witnesses under oath; to have the assistance of a stenographer, and to have power to sit during the sessions of the House, and to exercise all functions necessary to a complete investigation of said charges, and to report the result of said investigation as soon as practicable.

[2] Thomas B. Reed, of Maine, Speaker.

[3] Second session Fifty-eighth Congress, Journal, p. 89; Record, pp. 446, 447.

Mr. John J. Gardner, of New Jersey, made the point of order that the resolution did not show particularly that Members of the present House were involved, or, if they were, that they were involved as Members of this House.

After debate, the Speaker[1] said:

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. Gardner] makes the point of order that the resolution does not present a question of privilege. I read from the preamble of the resolution:

"And whereas on page 145 of said report it is charged that Members of Congress have violated section 3739 of the Revised Statutes and that 'in the face of this statute Beavers has made contracts with Members of Congress for the rental of premises, either in their own names, the names of their agents, or some member of their families.'"

The gentleman from New Jersey says that for anything which appears in that branch of the preamble a Member of some former Congress, who may not be a Member of this Congress, may be the one referred to as having made the contract. The gentleman also cites from the report to which the resolution refers that matters therein referred to are stated to have occurred in 1899, some in 1896, and some in 1901, if my recollection of the gentleman's remarks is correct.

The Chair is frank to say that if this were an indictment and the Chair were acting as a court that part of the indictment if separated from other portions of the instrument would, in the opinion of the Chair, be not sufficient; that the allegation ought to be made with particularity and refer to Members of this Congress. But the next clause of the resolution is as follows:

"And whereas these charges and others contained in said report reflect upon the integrity of the membership of this House, and upon individual Members of this House whose names are not mentioned: Therefore, etc."

It does not appear from the allegation or from anything so far as the Chair is informed in the report, that these alleged improprieties or offenses were committed since the 4th day of March last.

Waiving, however, the want of particularity in the resolution—and the Chair refers to the same in stating the position of the gentleman from New Jersey—this resolution is presented by a Member of this House, and, while its allegations are general, perchance they may include a Member of the House touching an act committed since the 4th day of March last, when the term of office began. The Chair therefore would be slow to hold that it does not present a question of privilege. It is the duty of the Chair to rule and say, subject, of course, to the subsequent action of the House, whether or not this resolution does present a question of privilege. If in doubt, the Chair would let the House pass upon that question. The Chair, however, is not in doubt, and overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from New Jersey.

2711. A newspaper article vaguely charging Members of Congress generally with corruption may not be brought before the House as involving a question of privilege.—On July 31, 1890,[2] Mr. William C. Oates, of Alabama, as a question of personal privilege, submitted the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas in the National Economist of July 26, 1890, a newspaper publication known as the official organ of the National Farmers' Alliance and Industrial Union, and which has a wide circulation, the following editorial appears on page 305, to wit: "The bond owners are now happy; they have won the fight and the bonds they now hold are payable, principal, interest, and premium, in gold only. It would be interesting to know just how many millions it took to force this bill through Congress. Men in these days of corruption and trickery do not change their avowed beliefs and betray their constituencies without a consideration. It will now be in order to placate those whom they have so wickedly betrayed;" and

Whereas the said editorial charges that a measure has been passed through Congress by bribery and the corruption of its Members the integrity of this House and the rights of the people alike demand that the truth or falsehood of the charge shall be known and dealt with as it deserves: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee composed of seven Members of this House be appointed to investigate the said charge, and that said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, may employ a clerk and stenographer if necessary, may sit during the sessions of the House, and report to the House by resolution or otherwise.

Mr. Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois, made the point of order that the said preamble and resolution did not present a question of privilege.

After debate, the Speaker [1] sustained the point of order on the following grounds:

Whether this is or is not a question of privilege does not in the slightest degree prevent its being brought before the House at the proper time; for, even if it is not a question of privilege, any Member has a right to present a resolution and have it referred to the proper committee for examination. But the question whether this is a matter of privilege or not is one which concerns the transactions of business in the House.

It is not always easy to determine the line of demarcation between matters which are questions of privilege and matters which are not. Still, there are questions which are very very plainly on the one side of the line, and the Chair thinks this is one of them. Here is a newspaper paragraph of the very vaguest character, which makes no assertion except by implication, which makes no statement upon which anybody can be expected to predicate a belief or a conviction. That paragraph is brought before the House, and it is proposed to stop the business of the House until a committee of investigation is ordered. No gentleman on the floor, notwithstanding the number that have spoken, has in any way made himself responsible for the paragraph by expressing the slightest confidence or belief in its statements or by giving any indication that there can be any testimony produced which would have a tendency to prove either the truth or the falsity of the insinuation there made.

Now, it is within the knowledge of every Member of this House that there must be floating about at this time, as there probably have been at any time within the last ten or twenty years, paragraphs of the same kind and character almost without number; but the House will at once see the inconvenience that would result to the transaction of its business if any Member had the right, at any time, upon the production of a newspaper paragraph like this, to demand that we should proceed to investigate it to the exclusion of other business. It seems very clear to the Chair that this is not a question of privilege; and therefore, if the House thinks as the Chair does, the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. Oates, will be remitted to his right to present a resolution on this subject and have it referred to a committee in the proper form.

From the decision of the Chair Mr. Oates appealed, and the question being put, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House? it was decided in the affirmative, yeas 95, nays 71.

2712. A newspaper article in the nature of criticism of a Member's acts in the House does not present a question of personal privilege.—On February 1, 1904,[2] Mr. Robert Baker, of New York, claiming the floor for a question of personal privilege, asked to have read the following extract from the columns of the Washington Post:

Republican Members of the House will now be able to sleep o'nights. Representative Baker, of New York, no longer will haunt their dreams. His anger has been placated and his ferocity has subsided. He has withdrawn his threat that no Republican Member shall have unanimous consent to extend in the Record remarks begun on the floor of the House.

A week or so ago Mr. Baker wanted to make a speech, but the man in charge of the Democratic time could not give him as many minutes as he required. When the allotted minutes were exhausted, he asked unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Some one on the Republican side objected. This aroused Mr. Baker's ire, and he served public notice that henceforth he would object whenever a Member on the Republican side asked unanimous consent to extend remarks.

But Saturday Mr. Baker made another speech, and again found himself short of time. He asked unanimous consent to extend his remarks, and no objection was offered. The embargo on extended Republican speeches, therefore, is lifted.

[1] Thomas B. Reed, of Maine, Speaker.

[2] Second session Fifty-eighth Congress, Record, p. 1469.

The extract having been read, Mr. Sereno E. Payne, of New York, made the point of order that no question of privilege was involved.

The Speaker[1] sustained the point of order, saying:

The Chair thinks it is hardly a question of personal privilege.

2713. On May 1, 1906,[2] Mr. John W. Gaines, of Tennessee, claiming the floor for a question of privilege, proceeded to read the following article from the Washington Post:

Mr. Gaines, of Tennessee, endeavored to be heard above the noise and confusion, Mr. Wadsworth objecting to any further discussion of seeds under the paragraph relating to "animal industry." This angered the Tennesseean, and as he sat down, by command of the Chair, he managed to say that the bill was loaded with all kinds of appropriations to take care of and suppress the "mouth and foot disease, hollow horn, and hollow tail," but took away from the farmer the few seeds that he every year looked forward to receiving.

This new outburst of eloquence on the part of Mr. Gaines threw the House into convulsive laughter. When the Members had partially recovered their composure Mr. Gaines rushed down the aisle, carrying a mass of manuscript in both hands, holding it aloft, shouting that he had hundreds of letters from farmers favoring free seeds.

As Chairman Wadsworth reached out his hand for them Mr. Gaines laid them on a desk and began pulling from the bunch various documents. It developed that among these "hundreds "of letters there were an unusually large proportion of bills of various sorts and other "pub. docs." that had no relevancy to the seed question.

Mr. John Dalzell, of Pennsylvania, made the point of order that no question of privilege was involved.

The Speaker[1] ruled:

The Chair reads from the Manual:

"A newspaper article in the nature of criticism of a Member's acts in the House does not present a question of personal privilege."

The Chair has listened to the reading of the article which the gentleman furnished him. In the opinion of the Chair it does not present a question of personal privilege.

2714. A newspaper article criticising Members generally involves no question of privilege.—On April 23, 1902,[3] Mr. Thomas J. Creamer, of New York, claiming the floor for a question of privilege, asked to have read an article from a New York newspaper criticising New York Members for their course in relation to a proposed public building in New York City, saying:

It is not at all surprising to learn from our special Washington dispatch this morning that "the New York Members of the House were not consulted." If New York had real Representatives instead of more than a dozen dummies in the House they would not wait to be invited by the committee. They would have to be consulted.

Unless a strenuous effort is made to have the Senate bill taken up and passed our "Representatives" are liable to learn something to their disadvantage.

The Speaker[4] said:

This presents no question of personal privilege. * * * If the gentleman wants to ask unanimous consent for a personal explanation, the Chair will be glad to submit the request.

2715. A declaration in a newspaper interview by one Member that another Member had broken a party agreement was held to involve no question of personal privilege.—On December 11, 1905,[1] Mr. William B. Lamar, of Florida, claiming the floor for a question of privilege, submitted a newspaper paragraph, claiming that it reflected on him in his representative capacity:

Much of the trouble comes from the fact that he has removed from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce Dorsey W. Shackleford, of Missouri, and William B. Lamar, of Florida, the two Democrats who last year submitted to the House a subsidiary report on the Hearst railroad-rate bill.

In addition to this action, which it is claimed was taken by Mr. Williams without notice to the two men concerned, he yesterday made a statement that Shackleford and Lamar had broken faith with the caucus agreement on the Davie rate bill last session.

"There is nothing personal in this," said Mr. Williams. "Shackleford and Lamar simply broke the party agreement reached in the caucus."

This paragraph, as is not expressed but as was well understood in the House, referred to Mr. John Sharp Williams, of Mississippi, leader of the minority and, under an arrangement with the Speaker, the one selecting the members to be named on the minority portions of the committees.

The Speaker [2] held that no question of personal privilege was involved.

2716. Charges alleged to have been made against Members in the report of an agent of a foreign power and presented by a Member were held to involve a question of privilege.—On March 27, 1902,[3] Mr. James D. Richardson, of Tennessee, as a question of privilege, presented a preamble and resolution, reciting that a certain secret report made to the Government of Denmark had set forth that a certain sum of money, from the amount to be paid by the United States to Denmark for the purchase of the West Indian Islands, was to be used for bribing certain Members of the United States Congress and American newspapers; and providing for a select committee to investigate the charges.

Mr. Sereno E. Payne, of New York, made the point of order that as the preamble showed the report to be secret no facts could be known to the gentleman presenting the resolution, and therefore there could be no facts on which to base a question of privilege.

In the course of the debate the Speaker [4] said:

The Chair would like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the allegations are that the Members of Congress have been corrupted and bribed; also the newspapers. With regard to the newspapers, the Chair thinks that is a matter which alone would be hardly within the jurisdiction of the House. * * * And the term "Congress" includes both House and Senate. The allegations are not so specific as to show whether any Member of the House is included in the charge. In respect to this the Chair is very strongly of the opinion that that body must be the custodian of its own morals, and no specification is made here which directly affects the House, as the Chair remembers the resolution when read, although the general term would include both Houses.

Thereupon Mr. Richardson modified his amendment so as to insert the words "including Members of the House of Representatives."

Mr. Richardson also stated upon his responsibility as a Member that he believed such charges had been made.

Thereupon the Speaker said:

The Chair desires to say, on the point of order made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Payne], that it is clear, especially as the matter has been amended at the suggestion of the Chair, that this is a matter of high privilege. It has troubled the Chair somewhat to decide how much we should be governed by the statements made by a member of a foreign government.

But the Speaker concluded that, as the gentleman from Tennessee had stated that he believed the charges had been made, he was clearly of opinion that the point of order was not well taken. Therefore he overruled it, and the resolution was admitted.

2717. A declaration upon the floor of the House, that a statement made by a Member on his own responsibility is false, presents a question of privilege.—On June 10, 1886,[1] Mr. Leonidas C. Houk, of Tennessee, rising to a question of privilege, recalled a certain statement which he made on the 30th of March preceding, regarding events happening in Tennessee during the war, and the following declaration made in reply thereto by Mr. James D. Richardson, of Tennessee: "As a Representative from the State of Tennessee I denounce the statement as false."

Mr. Nathaniel J. Hammond, of Georgia, made the point of order that no question of privilege was involved, as it was merely a controversy between two gentlemen as to a matter of history.

The Speaker[2] ruled—

The Chair is in some doubt about this question. A few days ago the Chair had occasion to make a ruling upon a somewhat similar question; in fact, very similar in some respects although quite different, the Chair thinks, in others. In this case it appears a statement of the gentleman from Tennessee, not a quotation or the repetition of some statement made by somebody else, adduced as evidence, but a personal statement of his own, was denounced as false upon the floor of the House.

In the case which was before the House a few mornings since a gentleman had cited certain evidence in support of a charge he had made, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Kelley, denounced that as a slander, but without imputing to the gentleman who had cited the evidence any personal misstatement. Here, as the Chair has already stated, it appears from what the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. Houk, has just stated, that the statement made by him on his own responsibility as a Representative on the floor was denounced as false, which the Chair is inclined to think * * * a question of privilege.

2718. An employee of the House having in a newspaper charged a Member with falsehood in debate, a resolution relating thereto was entertained as a question of privilege.

Priority of a question of privilege over a merely privileged question.

Early custom of the Speakers to leave to the House to decide whether or not a proposition involved privilege.

On January 10, 1846,[3] Mr. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky, moved the following resolution:

Whereas John P. Heiss, a person in the employment of this House, having in a newspaper charged Charles Hudson, a Member of this House, with falsehood in debate:

Resolved, therefore, That the said John P. Heiss be dismissed from the employment of the House as one of its printers.

[2] John G. Carlisle, of Kentucky, Speaker.

[3] First session Twenty-ninth Congress, Journal, p. 223.

Mr. Reuben Chapman, of Alabama, objected to the reception of the resolution as not in order pending the motion of Mr. Hannibal Hamlin, of Maine, that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The Speaker[1] stated that the resolution was only in order as a question of privilege, and that it was for the House, and not the Speaker, to decide whether the resolution did or did not involve the privileges of a Member of this House.

The House decided, 116 to 57, that the resolution did involve a question of privilege.

The record of the debates[2] shows that the Speaker declared the motion of Mr. Hamlin undoubtedly a privileged motion, which could at any time be made by the rule, but that there was this difference between the two motions—that the motion of the gentleman from Maine was a privileged question and the other was a question of privilege, and must put everything else aside. There followed some argument as to whether it was really a question of privilege. It was urged in support of the contention that the letter aimed a blow at the freedom of debate on the floor.

2719. One Member having charged another with perverting facts in a debate, the Speaker allowed the latter to raise a question of personal privilege.—On February 18, 1886,[3] Mr. Byron M. Cutcheon, of Michigan, claiming the floor for a question of personal privilege, alleged that Mr. Edward S. Bragg, of Wisconsin, had in debate this day charged him with perverting facts in a certain table of statistics published by him in the Record of the previous day's debate.

Mr. Nathaniel J. Hammond, of Georgia, having raised a question of order that no question of personal privilege was involved, after debate the Speaker[4] said:

> The gentleman from Michigan rises to a question of personal privilege, and says that the gentleman from Wisconsin, in his remarks, has questioned his motives; or, in other words, attributed improper motives in the use of the table in question. This is not a question affecting the dignity of the House itself or the integrity of its proceedings, but it is a question of personal privilege made by the gentleman from Michigan. Now, of course, the Chair can not determine whether any question of personal privilege is involved unless he can ascertain exactly what was said.

The remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin being read, showed that he had charged the gentleman from Michigan with printing as the losses of one day's battle at Bull Run, the losses occurring during about two weeks of time.

The Speaker thereupon allowed the gentleman from Michigan to have the floor on a question of personal privilege, saying that "the remark made by the gentleman from Wisconsin might, without any strained construction, be understood as attributing to the gentleman from Michigan a disposition not to be ingenuous in the discussion of the bill."

2720. A mere difference between two Members in debate as to matters of fact involves no question of privilege.—On March 13, 1894,[5] Mr. Elijah A. Morse, of Massachusetts, claimed the floor to present a question of privilege, and proceeded to discuss certain matters of fact concerning which he differed from the opinion which had been expressed by other Members of the House.

Mr. Benjamin A. Enloe, of Tennessee, made the point that no question of privilege was presented.

The Speaker [1] held that a mere issue between two Members as to matters of fact does not present a question of privilege, and therefore sustained the point of order.

2721. A difference of opinion as to historical facts, a Member not having made a false statement knowingly with intent to deceive the House, does not give rise to a question of personal privilege.—On January 27, 1886,[2] Mr. Charles A. Boutelle, of Maine, claiming the floor upon a question of personal privilege, referred to some resolutions recently presented by him in regard to the removal of a tablet or inscription from the engine room of the dry dock at Norfolk, Va., and announced his intention to file certain historical data in answer to the statement of Mr. George D. Wise, of Virginia, concerning the dry dock.

Mr. Hilary A. Herbert, of Alabama, made the point of order that no question of personal privilege was raised.

The Speaker [3] ruled:

It happens almost every day in the discussions on the floor that Members differ in their statements respecting facts, especially historical facts, such as the one involved in this case, and unless there is some improper motive attributed, some purpose to deceive or impose upon the House, or some reflection upon the representative character of a Member, the Chair can not see that any question of privilege is involved. It frequently happens that gentlemen rise for the purpose of making "personal explanations" with the consent of the House, but those are not, technically speaking, under the rules of the House, matters of privilege. The Chair has not been able to see, from what has been read by the gentleman from Maine, that the gentleman from Virginia in his remarks imputed to him any improper motive or purpose whatever; but the two gentlemen differed simply upon a question of fact. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Alabama.

Again, on June 8, 1886,[4] a question arose concerning remarks published in the Congressional Record as a speech delivered by Mr. Joseph Wheeler, of Alabama, wherein certain statements were made concerning the late Secretary of War Edwin M. Stanton.

Mr. William D. Kelley, of Pennsylvania, having replied to these statements,

Mr. Wheeler, on the ground of its being a question of privilege, claimed the floor to reply to Mr. Kelley, who, he asserted, had charged him with perverting a session of the House, with having slandered the dead, and with having stated to the House that which might be regarded as an infringement of the truth.

Mr. William W. Brown, of Pennsylvania, made the point of order that no question of privilege was presented.

The Speaker [3] held that unless some statement in the speech of Mr. Kelley imputed improper or corrupt motives to Mr. Wheeler, or that he had made a false statement knowingly, with intent to deceive the House, no question of privilege was presented by Mr. Wheeler. The Speaker also held that in a discussion of a proposition which implies in any degree the censure of a Member of the House there must necessarily be allowed more latitude of expression in reference to that matter than in the ordinary discussion of a matter of legislation pending before the House.

2722. Reference in debate to a Member as a source of information, gives the Member no claim to the floor for a question of personal privilege.—On May 16, 1902,[1] Mr. Thetus W. Sims, of Tennessee, was recognized for a question of privilege; and having addressed the House and resumed his seat without making any motion, Mr. John W. Gaines, of Tennessee, claimed the floor for a question of privilege, saying, "my very honorable colleague states that he based his vote and action in this Methodist Church matter upon information received from me and from a letter that was directed to me by the book agent of that concern," and further proceeding in explanation of his action on that claim. Mr. Sims had criticised the management of that claim, but had not called in question the actions of Mr. Gaines further than to refer to him as a source of information.

Mr. Sereno E. Payne, of New York, made the point of order that Mr. Gaines had stated no question of personal privilege.

The Speaker[2] sustained the point of order.

2723. A Member may not bring before the House as a question of privilege charges of disreputable conduct on his part before he became a Member.—On April 15, 1879,[3] Mr. J. R. Chalmers, of Mississippi, in the course of a personal explanation, presented a resolution providing for a committee to investigate the charges made that he, while an officer in the Confederate army, was a participant in the "Fort Pillow massacre."

Questions were raised as to whether or not a Member might bring such a question forward as a question of privilege.

The Speaker[4] said:

> The Chair thinks that this is hardly a question of privilege. It is in the nature of a personal explanation. The Chair is inclined to believe the point of order which was intended to be made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Garfield] is a correct one; that this does not embrace a question of privilege; that it does not relate to any stricture upon the gentleman from Mississippi in reference to anything done by him during his occupancy of a seat upon this floor. The Chair has listened to it as a personal explanation with the apparent consent of the House.

The House, on May 7, laid the resolution on the table.

2724. A Member is not entitled to raise a question of personal privilege on account of a newspaper charge relating to his conduct while a Member, but not as a Member.—On February 27, 1860,[5] Mr. John Cochrane, of New York, claiming the floor for a question of personal privilege, read an extract from the New York Tribune reflecting upon his course in relation to the recent visit of the New York Seventh Regiment to the city of Washington, and claimed that, inasmuch as the said article charged him with having been chairman of the committee of arrangements, when he was not even a member of the committee, a question of privilege was thereby presented.[6]

The Speaker [1] decided that no question of privilege was involved in the matter as presented by Mr. Cochrane.

Mr. Cochrane having appealed, the appeal was laid on the table.

2725. A proposition to investigate the propriety merely of a citizen's conduct at a time before he became a Member, may not be presented as a question of privilege.

Review of precedents relating to investigations of charges in regard to conduct of a Member at a time preceding the existing term of service.

The Speaker may, on a difficult question of order, decline to rule until he has taken time for examination of the question.

On April 26, 1904,[2] during debate on the bill (S. 2163) entitled "An act to require the employment of vessels of the United States for public purposes," Mr. William Bourke Cockran, of New York, in the course of his remarks, proposed as a matter of privilege a resolution, which he read.

Mr. Sereno E. Payne, of New York, made the point of order that the resolution did not present a question of privilege.

Debate having arisen, and Mr. Cockran having asked for the present consideration of the resolution, the Speaker [3] said:

The resolution having been presented and a point of order made upon it, the Chair declines to rule upon the point of order until he has had an opportunity to examine the precedents.

On April 27 [4] the Speaker submitted to the House his decision, as follows:

Yesterday, during consideration of the bill relating to the use of certain vessels belonging to the United States, the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cockran], claiming recognition for a question of privilege, proposed a resolution, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Whereas the Hon. John Dalzell, a Member of this House and of its Committee on Ways and Means, has charged on the floor that the Hon William Bourke Cockran, a Representative from New York and a member of the same committee, had been paid money by a political party to support a candidate for the Presidency nominated in opposition to the party with which the said William Bourke Cockran had theretofore been affiliated, and

"Whereas the said charge, though denied specifically on this floor by the said William Bourke Cockran, has not been withdrawn by the said John Dalzell; and

"Whereas said charge if true establishes such conduct as should unfit any man for membership in this House, and if false should be so declared and its author censured severely: Therefore, be it

"Resolved, That a select committee of five Members be appointed by the Chair to inquire into the truth of said charge, and to report the testimony with their conclusions thereon to this House at its session beginning the first Monday of December next; and be it further

"Resolved, That said committee be, and it is hereby, given full power to compel the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such papers as the Members thereof may deem necessary to the full and proper discharge of the duty hereby imposed on them."

Rule IX of the House is as follows:

"Questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings; second, the rights, reputation, and conduct of Members individually in their representative capacity only; and shall have precedence of all other questions, except motions to adjourn."

[3] Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois, Speaker.

[4] Journal, pp. 693, 694; Record, pp. 5750, 5751.

Now, it is manifest that under the rules of the House the gentleman from New York may not interrupt the orderly course of business to present an extraneous matter unless that matter involves a question relating to the integrity of the House itself, or, what is the same thing, the integrity of one of its Members in his representative capacity.

A preliminary question presents itself first: Does the allegation presented in the preamble of the resolution recite accurately the charges alleged to be made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

As the language referred to was uttered on the floor, within the hearing of all the House, and is a part of the Record, it is possible for the Chair to form an opinion; but while that is so, the question is one of fact, relating to the interpretation of language, and more properly belongs to the House itself to decide, should the decision of the question of law bring the matter within the field of the House's jurisdiction. Therefore the Chair dismisses this branch of the inquiry.

Assuming the declarations of the preamble to establish prima facie what they assume to establish, is a question of privilege presented?

The Chair is warranted in taking judicial knowledge of the fact so abundantly established in the debate that the offense set forth as charged against the gentleman from New York, if committed at all, was committed while the gentleman from New York was neither a Member nor a Member-elect of this House.

May the House punish a Member for that which he did in his capacity as a citizen, before his election as a Member?

In view of the high constitutional importance of this question, the Chair on yesterday declined to rule until he had examined the precedents thoroughly. He finds that the question has often arisen, and that while there has been some diversity of opinion, there is in the main a well-defined line of decisions indicating that the House may not take such action.

As early as 1796 the charge was made against Humphrey Marshall, of Kentucky, a Member of the United States Senate, that he had committed the crime of perjury in Kentucky eighteen months before his election to the Senate. After careful examination the Senate found that it did not have jurisdiction under the Constitution to take cognizance of the alleged offense. It should perhaps be said in this connection that the case of William Blount, who was expelled from the Senate in 1797 for treasonable designs against the United States, has sometimes been cited as a precedent the other way; but the Chair does not find that this particular question was discussed in that case. And the case of John Smith, charged with complicity in the alleged conspiracy of Aaron Burr, and whose proposed expulsion failed in the Senate in 1807, can hardly be drawn into precedent.

In 1799 the House declined to expel Matthew Lyon for a violation of the alien and sedition law, committed while a Member but before his reelection to the then existing House, the point being especially urged that his constituents had reelected him with a full knowledge of his actual prosecution and conviction.

In 1858 it was proposed to expel from the House Mr. O. B. Matteson, who had resigned from the preceding House to escape expulsion for corruption in his legislative acts; but the House, after careful examination by a committee, declined to punish him, it being urged that he was amenable only to the people of his district.

Later, in 1875, in a case referred to in section 31 of the Parliamentary Precedents, the majority of the Judiciary Committee, citing the case of Humphrey Marshall, concluded that the Constitution did not vest in the House jurisdiction to try a Member for an offense committed before his election. In that case the offense charged was the bribery of Members of the preceding Congress.

It should be stated that this decision was rendered in the full knowledge of the famous Credit Mobilier case in the preceding Congress, in 1872, when the House censured two Members for bribery of fellow-Members, committed before their election to the existing House, but while they were Members of the preceding Congress. It should be noted that the Members in this case were censured on the report of a select committee, and that the Judiciary Committee of the House, in an elaborate report presented by Mr. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, combated strongly those conclusions as to the right to punish. The report of 1875 was made in the Congress of which Mr. Randall was Speaker.

In the case of Brigham H. Roberts, which was referred to yesterday, it was alleged, if the recollection of the Chair is correct, that Roberts was actually engaged in the practice of polygamous cohabitation not only before his election, but up to the time his case was decided.

The Chair might also refer to the case of William N. Roach in the Senate in 1893, wherein the Senate, after debate, neglected to investigate a charge that Mr. Roach had been an embezzler at a time previous to his election to the Senate.

It will be observed that in only one of the cases cited has the House assumed to punish a Member for an act committed prior to his election to the then existing House, and that case dates to a period of great popular excitement.

As to acts committed outside the House, and having no relation to the legislative capacity of the Member, the Chair finds even less grounds for proceeding.

In 1879 a Member from Louisiana, Mr. Acklen, claiming the floor for a question of personal privilege, asked an investigation of a charge that he had committed the crime of seduction in Louisiana at a time prior to his election. Mr. John H. Reagan, of Texas, having objected that no question of privilege was presented, Mr. James A. Garfield, of Ohio, sustained Mr. Reagan's position, holding that the House had no jurisdiction. Mr. Speaker Randall expressed his concurrence in Mr. Garfield's opinion, but submitted the case to the House. And the House, without division, decided that no question of privilege was involved.

Again, in 1884, Mr. William Pitt Kellogg, of Louisiana, asked, as a question of privilege, that the House investigate his alleged connection with the star-route frauds, certain testimony reflecting on his conduct having just been given before a committee of the House itself. Mr. William R. Morrison, of Illinois, made the point of order that no question of privilege was involved. Mr. Speaker Carlisle said:

"The House has no right to punish a Member for an offense alleged to have been committed previous to the time when he was elected a Member of the House. That has been so frequently decided in the House that it is no longer a matter of dispute."

Mr. Nathaniel J. Hammond, of Georgia, urged that the House should not investigate the conduct of a Member at a time prior to his election, and on his motion resolutions proposed by Mr. Kellogg were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It does not appear that that committee ever reported on the matter.

So it seems to the Chair that even if it had been alleged on the floor that the gentleman from New York had committed an actual crime in 1896, and even if it were an ascertained fact that he had committed a crime at that time, it would be very doubtful under the precedents cited whether or not he would be punishable by this House, and hence, as a necessary consequence, whether or not a resolution of investigation would involve a question of privilege.

But the Chair feels justified in taking cognizance of the fact that what is alleged to be charged constitutes no crime. At most the only question is one as to the propriety of the conduct of a private citizen. The House could not rightfully punish him if it desired so to do. The Chair thinks that a reading of the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Kilbourne v. Thompson will raise a serious doubt as to whether the House could compel a syllable of testimony under this resolution.

Therefore the Chair holds that the resolution may not be entertained as a question of privilege.

Mr. John S. Williams, of Mississippi, having appealed, the appeal, on motion of Mr. Payne, was laid on the table by a vote of yeas 170, nays 126.
